That art was Ariſtæus's invention, and occaſioned him to be honoured as Jupiter in Arcadia. Poſt eâ (Cea) relictâ, cum Dædalo ad Sardiniam tranſitum fecit. Huic opinioni Pindarus refragatur, qui eum ait de Cea inſulâ in Arcadiam migraſſe, ibique vitam coluiſſe. Nam apud Arcadas pro Jove colitur, quod primus oſtenderit qualiter apes debeant reparari (53). i. e. "Afterwards "having left it (Cea), he paſſed over with Dædalus to "Sardinia. This opinion Pindar contradicts, who ſays, "that he removed from the iſland of Cea into Arcadia "and there dwelt. For he is worſhipped as Jupiter "by the Arcadians, becauſe he firſt ſhewed the me-"thod of recruiting loſt bees." Juſtin gives Ariſtæus a great Kingdom in Arcadia. I ſhall cite his words in the following note. It is not true, as Mr. Lloyd aſſerts, that Apollonius makes Ariſtæus paſs from Arcadia into the iſland of Cea. He has copied that miſtake from Salmaſius (54).

[F] I ſhall not omit the Aſtronomical diſcovery that is aſcribed to Ariſtæus.] To conſider the words of Juſtin only in a ſuperficial manner, one might fancy that he attributes to Ariſtæus the firſt diſcovery of the Solſtices; but they who read with attention, may eaſily obſerve, that he ſpeaks of the riſing of the Dog-ſtar. Ariſtæum in Arcadiâ latè regnaſſe, eumque primum & apium & mellis uſum & lactis ad coagula hominibus tradidiſſe, ſolſtitialeſque ſolſtitialeſque ortus ſideris primum inveniſſe (55). i. e. " That Ariſtæus had large dominions in Arcadia, and " that he firſt taught men the uſe of bees and honey, " and the method of curdling milk, and that he " found out the Solſtitial riſe of the ſtar." The moſt able Critics have remarked that it ſhould be read, either Solſtitialiſque ortus Sideris, i. e. " the riſing of the " Solſtitial St[illegible]," or Solſtitialeſque ortus Sirii, " the " Solſtitial riſing of Sirius (56)." Both theſe readings give us the Dog-ſtar, as they pretend. It is certain that this Star had a particular relation to our Ariſtæus; for this reaſon, the heats of the Dog-ſtar laid waſte the Cyclades, and occaſioned there a peſtilence, which Ariſtæus was entreated to put a ſtop to. He went directly into the iſland of Cea, and built an altar to Jupiter: he offered ſacrifices to that Deity; and offered ſome likewiſe to that malignant Star, and eſtabliſhed an anniverſary to it. That produced a very good effect; for it was from thence that the Eteſian winds had their origin which continue forty days, and temper the heat of the ſummer.

" To Jove and baleful Sirius did decree

" And ſtill the Cean Prieſts before the riſe
" Of parching Sirius offer ſacrifice."

Diodorus Siculus does not plainly enough intimate whether the Eteſian winds were the effect of Ariſtæus's ſacrifice (58). He ſeems to ſay that this ſacrifice having been offered about the time of the Dog-ſtar's riſing, a time which concurs with the ſeaſon of the Eteſian winds, the plague ceaſed. But it is certain that he pretends that the vehement heats of the Dog-ſtar were qualified by the religious acts which Ariſtæus performed. He finds therein a ſubject for admiration, that the ſame perſon, whoſe ſon had been torn to pieces by dogs, corrected the malignity of a Star called the Dog. I omit his Greek and only produce Rhodomannus's tranſlation. Singularem hanc rerum converſionem, ſi quis penitius examinet, meritò demiretur. Qui enim filium a canibus diſcerptum vidit, is cœleſte ſidus canis nomine appellatum quod hominibus exitium adferre putatur, mitigavit, & mortalibus non paucis auctor ſalutis extitit (59). i. e. " If any one examine narrowly this ſingular turn of " affairs, he may with reaſon admire it: for he who " ſaw his ſon torn to pieces by dogs, is the ſame " perſon who mitigated the fury of a celeſtial Star " called the Dog, which is ſuppoſed to bring de- " ſtruction on mankind, and thus he appeared as the " author of health to a great many mortals." Other writers ſay in clear and expreſs terms, that the devotions of Ariſtæus were the cauſe of theſe winds. Canicula exoriens æſtu eorum (60) loca & agros fructibus orbabat: & ipſos morbo affectos pœnas Icario cum dolore ſufferre cogebat, eo quod latrones recepiſſent. Quod juſſum Ariſtæus confecit, & ab Jove impetravit ut Eteſiæ flarent (61). i. e. " The Dog-ſtar ariſing deſtroyed the fruits of their " gardens and fields by its heat: and brought diſeaſes " upon them with Icarian pains, which they were " obliged to ſuffer as a puniſhment for receiving rob- " bers. Their King Ariſtæus, the ſon of Apollo and " Cyrene, the father of Actæon, begged of his father, " to know by what means he might free the city " from its calamity. The God commands him " to expiate the death of Icarius by a great many " ſacrifices, and to beg of Jupiter, that at the time " of the riſing of the Dog-ſtar he would give them " ſuch a wind for forty days as might temper its heat. " This command Ariſtæus performed, and obtained " of Jupiter that the Eteſian winds ſhould blow." The Scholiaſt on Apollonius ſays expreſsly, that at the prayers of Ariſtæus the Eteſian winds blew. Ὅτι ἐτησίαι ἔπνευσαν Ἀριστέου αἰτησαμένου (62). Conſult alſo the Commentary of Germanicus on the Phænomena of Aratus (63). Let us ſay ſomewhat of the anniverſary which he eſtabliſhed. He ordained, that every year, the Prieſts of Cea ſhould offer ſacrifices before the riſing of the Dog-ſtar, and that the inhabitants ſhould put themſelves under arms, to obſerve the riſing of that conſtellation, and to offer victims thereunto (64). Ἐνομοθέτησε δὲ τοῖς κώοις (read it κέοις) κατ' ἐνιαυτὸν μεθ' ὅπλων ἐπιτηρεῖν τὴν ἐπιτολὴν τοῦ κυνὸς, & θύειν αὐτῷ (65). Cicero ſays, that they believed they could foreſee by the obſervation of the Star, whether the year would be healthful or not. Ceos accepimus ortum caniculæ diligenter quotannis ſolere ſervare, conjecturamque capere, ut ſcribit Ponticus Heraclides, ſalubriſne an peſtilens annus futurus ſit (66). Manilius attributes the ſame thing to the Cilicians (67). I do not know whether the inhabitants of Calabria, who made vows to the Dog-ſtar, had borrowed from Ariſtæus directly or indirectly, that act of religion:

What ſuperſtitions are here! but they are none of the ſtrangeſt that were among the Pagans. The paſſage of Juſtin, which I quoted at the beginning of this note, will here furniſh us with an incident. M. le Fevre of Saumur fancied himſelf the firſt that had underſtood him. " Juſtin, ſays he, does not offer to ſay that " Ariſtæus taught the uſe of milk: that had been " contrary to the truth, and to all antiquity; he " only ſpeaks of the art of curdling the milk. Sed " oſtendiſſe hominibus qua arte coagulum ex lacte confici " confirmarique poſſet (69). " Neither does he pretend, " that Ariſtæus found out the uſe of honey: Milk and " honey ſerved for the nouriſhment of the Sovereign of " the Gods. Nam Jupiter pater ille hominumque " Deumque melle nutritus eſt ac lacte (70). " He there- " fore ſpeaks of the invention of curdling the milk " with honey. Ergo aliud docuit Ariſtæus, ſcilicet " coagulum fieri ex mixturâ, ſeu, ut Græci vocant, cra- " mate mellis & lactis. Hunc locum à nemine hactenus " intellectum arbitror (71). i. e. Ariſtæus therefore taught " a quite different thing, namely that curd was made " by a mixture, or as the Greeks call it Crama, of " milk and honey. I am of opinion that this place " has not hitherto been underſtood by any one." This explication appears to me to be very ingenious; but the reaſons on which it is founded prove too much; for if the ancient tradition about the aliments which were given Jupiter in his infancy had hindered Juſtin from ſaying, that Ariſtæus ſhewed mankind the uſe of honey, he ſhould not have told that Gargoris King of the Cynetes (72), or Cunetes, was the firſt inventor of honey; and yet he has ſaid ſo expreſly, and in ſuch a manner as cannot poſſibly bear two ſenſes. Quorum (Cunetum) rex vetuſtiſſimus Gargoris, mellis colligendi uſum primus invenit (73). i. e. " Whoſe (the Cune- " tes's) moſt ancient King Gargoris firſt found out " the uſe of gathering honey." I do not ſee that it can be pretended, that Juſtin has had ſuch a regard for poetical traditions, as to be afraid of advancing ſuch things as contradicted them. A multitude of Writers have ſaid that Ariſtæus invented honey: their words amount to that abſolutely, and cannot be changed from this meaning, He invented a certain mixture of honey and milk to make a coagulation. Therefore one might reaſonably ſuppoſe that Juſtin ſaid as they did, and that he had no regard to what the Poets had aſſerted about the milk and honey of Jupiter. Obſerve by the way, that Ariſtæus's inventions conſiſted ſometimes in mixtures; for he was the firſt who taught the Thracians to mix honey with the Maronean wine. Ariſtæum primum omnium in eadem gente mel miſcuiſſe vino, [G] . . . . Nor his daughter Macris.] There are not many Authors that ſpeak of her; but ſee what Apollonius relates of her (75). It was ſhe who took the young Bacchus into her lap, after Mercury had drawn him out of the midſt of the flames. It was ſhe that made him take ſome honey. She lived at that time in the middle of the Iſland of Eubœa. She expoſed herſelf to the indignation of Juno on account of the good office ſhe had done this child, and was obliged to quit the country, and to retire into another of the Phæacian Iſlands, where ſhe did ſignal ſervice to the inhabitants (76). We may infer from hence that Ariſtæus, Bacchus's uncle by marriage (77), was a great deal older than he. That does not overturn what Diodorus Siculus relates about the admiſſion of Ariſtæus to the Orgia, &c; nor what others ſuppoſe, that he commanded ſome troops in Bacchus's army (78); for it is a ſtanding rule that the ſuperiority belongs to a ſon of Jupiter, even tho' he be the younger.

ARISTÆUS the Geometrician lived before Euclid, and compoſed ſome works which bore a good character. See underneath a fine paſſage of Pappus [A].

[A] Here is a fine paſſage of Pappus about our Ariſtæus.] I call it ſo, becauſe it teaches us ſomething very curious concerning Euclid: which is, that this great Geometrician, out of regard to Ariſtæus, was unwilling to appear more knowing than him in Conicks. I have already ſpoken on this head (1). Theſe are Pappus's words, Ariſtæus autem, qui ſcribit ea quæ ad hoc uſque tempus tradita ſunt, ſolidorum libros quinque conicis cohærentes vocavit. . . . . Euclides autem ſecutus Ariſtæum ſcriptorem luculentum in iis quæ de conicis tradiderat, neque antevertens neque volens eorum tractationem deſtruere, cum mitiſſimus eſſet & benignus erga omnes, præſertim eos qui mathematicas diſciplinas aliquâ ex parte augere & amplificare poſſent, ut par eſt, & nullo modo infenſus ſed accuratus, non arrogans velut hic (Apollonius Pergæus) quantum oſtendi potuit de loco per ejus conica memoriæ prodidit (2). i. e. "But "Ariſtæus, the Author of thoſe things which are deli- "vered down to this very time, called his five books "of ſolid bodies connected with conicks. . . . But Eu- "clid followed Ariſtæus, a clear writer in thoſe things "which he had delivered about conicks, neither ſur- "paſſing him, nor being willing to overthrow his "manner of treating them, as he was very good "natured and benevolent to all, eſpecially thoſe who "could any way advance and improve mathematical "learning, as is proper, and not at all peeviſh but "accurate; not arrogant as this man (Apollonius Per- "gæus) has recorded, as far as could be ſhewn from "a paſſage in his Conicks."

ARISTEAS the Proconneſian. Moreri thinking it ſufficient to ſay that he lived in the time of Cyrus [A], and that he wrote the Hiſtory of the Arimaſpians, and a work concerning the origin of the Gods, the whole filled with fables [B], has forgot a thing

[A] Moreri ſatisfies himſelf with ſaying that he lived in the time of Cyrus.] That is proved by the the teſtimony of Suidas. Note that Cyrus began to reign in Perſia in the 55th Olympiad. Voſſius infers from thence, that Suidas ſaying on the one hand that Ariſteas flouriſhed in the 50th Olympiad, and on the other, that it was in the time of Cyrus, he has not been exact (1). The anonymous writer, who has deſcribed the Olympiads, places Ariſteas under the fiftieth: that does not agree with what others have related, that Homer was his diſciple (2). Tatian has made him prior to Homer (3), and has been reprimanded for it by Voſſius, as though by that he was too willing to favour the good cauſe in this point, which is that the age of Homer followed a great while after that of Moſes (4). That cenſure does not ſeem to me to be well founded; for Tatian had a right to make uſe of a tradition which he found eſtabliſhed amongſt the Pagans. We have ſeen that our Ariſteas has been ſaid to have taught Homer; and we read in Herodotus, that Ariſteas appeared to the world three ages after having compoſed a Poem (5). It is not agreed then that he flouriſhed in the time of Cyrus. Note, that Herodotus was born in the firſt year of the 74th Olympiad, and that he does not ſpeak of this laſt appearance of Ariſteas as of a thing that had newly happened: he inſinuates, on the contrary, that the tradition of the Metapontines concerning this affair was of long ſtanding; for he does not ſay that they fixed the time of it.

[B] His writings were filled with fables.] Aulus Gellius relates, that being at Brunduſium he ſaw ſeveral parcels of books expoſed to ſale, and that he was offered thoſe which he cheapened at a very low price. They were all the works of Greek Writers, who had collected together a great many ſurprizing and incredible ſtories. Ariſteas is the firſt of theſe Writers: Faſces librorum venalium expoſitos vidimus. Atque ego avide ſtatim pergo ad libros. Erant autem iſti omnes libri Græci miraculorum fabularumque pleni: res inauditæ, incredulæ; ſcriptores veteres non parvæ auctoritatis, Ariſteas Proconneſius, & Iſigonus Nicæenſis, & Cteſias, & Oneſicritus, & Polyſtephanus, & Hegeſias. Ipſa autem volumina ex diutino ſitu ſqualebant, & habitu adſpectuque tætro erant. Acceſſi tamen, percunctatuſque pretium ſum: & adductus mirâ atque inſperatâ vilitate libros plurimos ære pauco emo; eoſque omnes duabus proximis noctibus curſim tranſeo: atque in legendo carpſi exinde quædam & notavi mirabilia & ſcriptoribus ferè noſtris intentata; eaque his commentariis adſperſi (6). i. e. "We ſaw ſome parcels of books ſet "out to ſale. And I made the beſt of my way di- "rectly to the books. But they were all Greek vo- "lumes full of ſtrange ſtories; incredible things, ſuch "as were never heard of; ancient Writers of no ſmall "authority, Ariſteas the Proconneſian, and Iſigonus the "Nicæan, and Cteſias, and Oneſicritus, and Poly- "ſtephanus, and Hegeſias. But the volumes by be- "ing grown mouldy, made a very mean figure. "However I went up and aſked the price, and being "tempted by the ſurprizing and unexpected cheapneſs, "I bought a great many books for a little money; "and run them all over the two next nights: and in "reading I obſerved and excerpted ſeveral ſtrange "things, and ſuch as had ſcarcely been attempted by "our Writers; and have ſcattered them up and down "theſe Commentaries." The remainder of this chapter of Aulus Gellius is wholly filled with chimerical narrations, which he had read either in theſe writings or in Pliny. We are to know, that the Hiſtory of the Arimaſpians, written by Ariſteas, was a Poem (7): and let any one conſider, you'll ſay to me, whether the Author did not write it without deſigning that his ſtories ſhould be believed? Arioſto never had any ſuch thought. Wherefore thing which he might have ſet down as the moſt ſingular in this Article. Let us then make up the defect, and obſerve that this Ariſteas, being dead in his own country (a), was ſeen the very day and the ſame hour reading a lecture in Sicily. This ſpectacle having been repeated ſeveral times and for ſeveral years, obliged the Sicilians to build an altar to Ariſteas, and to offer ſacrifices to him (b). Herodotus has enlarged ſufficiently upon this miracle [C]. Pliny relates, that in the Iſle of Proconneſus the ſoul of Ariſteas was ſeen to go out of the body by his mouth, in the ſhape of a Raven (c). Others ſay, that his ſoul went forth of his body, and returned back as he pleaſed [D]. Strabo repreſents Ariſteas as one of the greateſt Enchanters that ever were (d). Some pretend that in order to obviate the diſbelief which ſome ſhewed of his doctrine, he perſuaded them that his ſoul took ſeveral flights ſeparate from the body (e). Six of his verſes are preſerved in the treatiſe of Longinus (f). Some others are found in the Chiliads of Tzetzes (g). We find him to be twice quoted in Pauſanias (h). They who pretend that he was not wholly dead, when his ſoul made theſe excurſions (i), do not a little take off from the marvellous of the prodigy. There is no need to Wherefore ſhould we not form our judgments of the ancient Poets in the ſame manner as of him? To this I anſwer, that it was not Ariſteas's intention to divert his readers by tales which were to be taken for fables; for he had not recourſe to theſe ſtories for any other reaſon but to remove the incredulity which he met with in ſome people. He was not thought to be a Philoſopher, and that notion was founded upon his ſaying that no body had ever inſtructed him (8). He removed that objection, by maintaining that his ſoul had quitted his body, and that in ſoaring towards heaven it had ſeen all the Grecian and Barbarian countries, and finiſhed its courſe in the Hyperborean climates. He boaſted that he had diſcovered by that means the ſituation of places, the cuſtoms of their inhabitants, the natural qualities of the elements, &c. and that he had even obſerved heaven with more exactneſs than the earth. Was not this producing his ſtories like credentials? Did he not intend thereby to eſtabliſh ſuch an authority as made the other things which he had to ſay be received? Therefore he muſt needs have propoſed theſe things as real facts. They were taken as ſuch; for more credit was given to this man, than to thoſe Philoſophers who taught without any diſguiſe (9). Note, that Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus relates that it was not univerſally agreed, that our Ariſteas was the Author of the books which bore his name (10).

[C] He was ſeen ſeveral times after his death.... Herodotus has enlarged ſufficiently upon this miracle.] Here is the ſubſtance of his narration. Ariſteas, one of the principal perſons in the Iſland of Proconneſus, entered one day into a Fuller's houſe, and there died. The Fuller ſhut up his door, and went to tell Ariſteas's relations of his death. This news ſoon ſpread all over the city; but whilſt the diſcourſe was hot about it, there came a man who declared that he had met Ariſteas going to Cyzicus (11), and had ſpoke with him. The relations went to the Fuller's houſe, with every thing neceſſary for his interment, and could neither find Ariſteas dead nor living. He ſhewed himſelf at the end of ſeven years, and compoſed the Poem of the Arimaſpians, and then diſappeared. Two or three years after he ſhewed himſelf to the inhabitants of Metapontum (12), and commanded them to raiſe an altar to Apollo, and to place hard by it a ſtatue in honour of Ariſteas the Proconneſian. He told them that they were the only Italians whom Apollo had honoured with a viſit, and that he had accompanied him in that journey, and that he was not Ariſteas, but a Raven, when he accompanied him thither. Having ſaid theſe things, he diſappeared. The Metapontines conſulted the oracle at Delphi, to know what was to be done in that caſe. It anſwered them that they would do well to be obedient. Then they executed that order (13). The Hiſtorian teſtifies that in his time the ſtatue of Ariſteas was to be ſeen in a place of public reſort at Metapontum, near the altar of Apollo, and ſurrounded with Bay-trees. Let us add to this a ſtory related by Athenæus. The Metapontines, after Ariſteas's return (14), dedicated a Brazen Bay-tree to Apollo. This Bay-tree having ſpoken at a time when a Theſſalian dancer was coming into the ſquare at Metapontum, the Prieſts, that were preſent, were ſuddenly ſeized with ſo ſtrange a fury, that they tore the woman to pieces. Note, that ſhe had received from Philomela a conſecrated preſent: which was a crown of Golden Bays, that the people of Lampſacus had conſecrated at the temple of Delphi (15). Obſerve alſo, that Æneas of Gaza, in relating the ſtory of Herodotus, has added thereto this circumſtance: that the ſacrifices of the Metapontines were thought to belong to Apollo and Ariſteas in common as to two Divinities (16). Origen has obſerved that it was at the deſire of Apollo that this Ariſteas was honoured as a God by the inhabitants of Metapontum (17). Meurſius pretends that Athenagoras has charged the Heathens with having honoured our Ariſteas in the Iſle of Chios, and having taken him for the ſame God with Apollo and Jupiter (18). Χῖοι Ἀριστέαν τὸν αὐτὸν Διὶ καὶ Ἀπόλλωνι νομίζοντες (19). i. e. "The Chians, who took Ariſteas to be the ſame perſon with Jupiter and Apollo." Huetius thinks with a great deal of probability, that inſtead of Χῖοι, it ſhould be read Κῆοι; and that he means there Ariſtæus the ſon of Apollo and Cyrene (20); for this laſt Ariſtæus was honoured in the Iſle of Cea (21). It is of him that Suffridus underſtands the paſſage of Athenagoras (22). Huetius ſhews, that theſe two perſons have often been confounded one with the other (23). Thoſe who will have all Romance to be founded upon ſome true adventure, might ſuppoſe that Ariſteas having feigned himſelf dead in the Fuller's houſe, found means to get from thence during the maſter's abſence, and to eſcape privately out of the city; that he returned thither after having kept himſelf concealed for ſome years; and that he wrote a Poem, where he gave an account of his extaſies (24); that he was well pleaſed to have it taken in a literal ſence, and not in ſuch a poetical one as we take theſe verſes of Horace,

Quo me, Bacche, rapis tui
Plenum, quæ in nemora aut quos agor in ſpecus
Velox mente nova (25),

That is,

"Whither, O Bacchus, doſt thou hurry me
"Fill'd as I am with thy Divinity?
"What groves and darkſome caves have I ſurvey'd
"With motions rapid by thy God-head made."

and ſeveral others which Huetius quotes (26). I cannot tell how to think as he does, that Maximus Tyrius confirms this conjecture, that is, that Ariſteas did not pretend to have his expreſſions taken in a literal ſenſe (27). Maximus Tyrius ſuppoſes the very contrary, as we have ſeen above (28). As for what regards the apparition to the Metapontines, it may be ſuppoſed that ſome impoſtor eaſily perſuaded them of what Herodotus relates; for they were Pythagoreans and conſequently believed the Metempſychoſis.

☞ ARISTEAS, the author of a ſuppoſititious book concerning the 70 Interpreters of the Old Teſtament [A], the impoſture of which has been ſufficiently ſhewn by Mr. Van Dale [B], and

[A] A ſuppoſititious book concerning the ſeventy Interpreters of the Old Teſtament.] The Greek tranſlation of the Hebrew text of the Scriptures, which we call the Septuagint, was finiſhed, according to Archbiſhop Uſher (1), in the year 277 before the Birth of Chriſt, and in the 8th year of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The account of this affair, according to this book publiſhed under the name of Ariſteas, is as follows (2). Ptolemy Philadelphus being intent upon collecting a great Library at Alexandria, committed the care of that affair to Demetrius Phalereus, a noble Athenian, who was then at his court, directing him to ſearch all nations for books of importance. In the enquiry which he made, he heard of the book of the Law of Moſes among the Jews, and acquainted the King, who deſired, that the book might be ſent for from Jeruſalem, with Interpreters from the ſame place, to tranſlate it into Greek. Ariſteas, Sofibius of Tarentum, and Andreas, three Noblemen at King Ptolemy's court, who were favourable to the Jews, took this opportunity to requeſt the King, in behalf of thoſe perſons of that nation, who had been taken captive by Ptolemy Soter, and were then in bondage in Egypt. The King granted their requeſt, and ordered their releaſe, and that twenty drachms for every perſon ſhould be paid out of his treaſury to thoſe, who had them in ſervitude, and the ſame ſum for their children, and the mothers, who bore them. This made the whole expence to amount to ſix hundred and ſixty talents, which proves the number of thoſe, who were ranſomed, to have been one hundred and ninety eight thouſand men, women, and children; for ſo many might have been ranſomed at the rate of twenty drachms each. When this was done, Ariſteas propoſed, that a letter ſhould be written to Eleazar, High-Prieſt of the Jews at Jeruſalem, to ſend from thence a true copy of the Hebrew Original of the Law, and with it ſix men out of each tribe of Iſrael, to tranſlate it into the Greek language; which was accordingly done, and Ariſteas, the pretended Author of this Hiſtory, and Andreas were ſent with the letter, who carried with them from the King ſeveral gifts for the temple, and money for the ſacrifices to be offered there, and for other uſes of the ſanctuary, one hundred talents; in utenſils of ſilver twenty talents, and of gold fifty talents. The precious ſtones, which adorned theſe utenſils, were twice the value of gold. When they came to Jeruſalem, they were received with great reſpect by the High-Prieſt and all the Jews, and had their requeſt immediately granted. The High-Prieſt gave them a true copy of the Law of Moſes, all written in letters of gold, and ſent with them ſix Elders out of every Tribe, who were ſeventy two in all, to tranſlate it into Greek; upon which they returned to Alexandria. On their arrival the King ſending for thoſe Elders to court, made trial of them by ſeventy two queſtions to each in order; and approving their wiſdom, which appeared from their anſwers, gave to each of them three talents, and ſent them to the Iſland of Pharos, which joined to Alexandria, in order to perform the work, which they were ſent for. Demetrius having conducted them over the Heptaſtadium, (which was a bank of ſeven furlongs in length, and joined that iſland to the continent,) into an houſe provided for them, they immediately applied themſelves to the tranſlation; and as they agreed to the verſion of each period, by a common conference together, Demetrius wrote it down. Thus in the ſpace of ſeventy two days they executed the work; and the whole being read over and approved of in the King's preſence, he gave to each of them three rich garments, two talents of gold, and a cup of gold of a talent weight; and then ſent them home into their own country.

[B] The impoſture of which has been ſufficiently ſhewn by Mr. Van Dale.] This had been attempted before by ſeveral other Writers before him, and particularly by Dr. Hody; but Mr. Van Dale found, that they had not ſo far exhauſted the ſubject, but that his extenſive learning could furniſh him with materials for a more accurate diſcuſſion of that ſubject. And therefore he publiſhed in the year 1705 at Amſterdam his Diſſertatio ſuper Ariſtea de LXX Interpretibus, cui ipſius prætenſi Ariſteæ textus ſubjungitur. Additur Hiſtoria Baptiſmorum, cum Judaicorum, tum potiſſimum priorum Chriſtianorum, tum denique & rituum nonnullorum, &c. Accedit & Diſſertatio ſuper Sanchoniatone: i. e. "A Diſſertation upon the Hiſtory of Ariſteas "concerning the LXX Interpreters: to which is ad-"ded the Greek Text of the pretended Ariſteas; with "an account of the Baptiſms of the Jews, and "eſpecially of the primitive Chriſtians, and laſtly of "ſeveral Ceremonies &c. and a Diſſertation upon "Sanchoniathon," 4to, pagg. 506. He has given us Garbitius's tranſlation of Ariſteas. Mr. Van Dale obſerves in his Diſſertation (3), that the Jews were a people unknown for a conſiderable time, ſo that we do not find even the name of them in Herodotus. They made ſome little figure in the world under Alexander the Great. But it is ſaid, that what Joſephus relates of the honour, which was paid them by that King is contradicted by Diodorus Siculus, Quintus Curtius, and Arrian. Upon which occaſion our Author remarks how little regard is to be paid to the Jewiſh Hiſtorian, who has not ſcrupled to corrupt the ſacred Hiſtory in order to pay his court to the Greeks, for whom he wrote; which he proves from a prodigious number of inſtances. Mr. Bernard, the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, obſerves upon this, that it were to be wiſhed, that ſome learned man would undertake a direct criticiſm upon Joſephus, by examining all the facts, which he relates, comparing them with the accounts of the other Hiſtorians, and remarking every where the certainty or doubtfulneſs of theſe facts. Such a work is ſo much the more neceſſary, as Joſephus is an Hiſtorian in great eſteem, and his authority conſidered as of vaſt importance, and his agreeable manner of writing capable of impoſing upon his readers. But it is evident, that he has committed a prodigious number of miſtakes. We ſhall mention but one. The Scripture tells us, that Saul having a deſign to expoſe David's life, promiſed his daughter in marriage to him, who ſhould bring him an hundred fore-ſkins of the Philiſtines; and that David ſlew two hundred of them, whoſe fore-ſkins he brought to Saul. Joſephus being apprehenſive leſt this fact ſhould appear ridiculous to the Greeks, changed theſe hundred fore-ſkins into ſix hundred Heads of the Philiſtins. Mr. Van Dale proves afterwards, that the copies of the books of Moſes were very rare before the Captivity of Babylon; and that the Jews, who were led into captivity, had the opportunity of carrying but a ſmall number with them. After their return they never had any commerce with the Gentiles but upon the moſt urgent neceſſity; from whence it may be concluded, that it and by ſeveral other learned writers [C]. It is not known who this Ariſteas was, but he is very improbable, that there ſhould be found ſix men in every Tribe in Judæa, who underſtood Hebrew and Greek ſufficiently to make that tranſlation of their Law into Greek, which is aſcribed to them. It would be difficult to prove, that after the diſperſion of the ten Tribes there remained Iſraelites enough in Judæa, diſtinguiſhed from each other, to furniſh ſix intelligent perſons of each of theſe ten Tribes. If there had been ſo many Iſraelites in Paleſtine, there would have been no neceſſity, that the Cuthites and other ſtrangers, who came to ſettle there, ſhould ſend for a Jewiſh Prieſt from Babylon, to inſtruct them in the Jewiſh Religion. Beſides it is very improbable, that Ptolemy ſhould ſend for ſo great a number of Interpreters for the mere tranſlation of the Law; and granting, that he might think proper to employ ſo many of them, he might have found them in Egypt, where a multitude of Jews had ſettled, who might have been engaged in ſuch a tranſlation; ſince if we credit Ariſteas, after it was finiſhed, the Jews in Egypt approved of it, and found it very agreeable to the original. But that, which renders the Hiſtory of Ariſteas abſolutely ridiculous and contemptible, is the great number of abſurd ſtories, which it is full of. He tells us, for inſtance, that the River Jordan overflows its banks in the time of harveſt like the Nile, and waters a vaſt extent of the country, and that it afterwards joins another river, and then empties itſelf with it in the Sea. This is evident to every reader to be entirely falſe. He ſays, that the weaſel conceives at the ear, and brings forth her young at her mouth. There is nothing more impertinent than the greateſt part of the ſeventy two queſtions, which he tells us King Ptolemy propoſed to the LXXII Interpreters, to each of them one; and their anſwers are equally abſurd, tho' Ariſteas highly commends them, and repeats at every anſwer, that it was approved of by the King. The feſtival, which he pretends was inſtituted in memory of the arrival of theſe Interpreters, appears no leſs fabulous. Mr. Van Dale obſerves, that if he ſhould be aſked, whether he does not believe there was a tranſlation of the Law in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, he cannot abſolutely deny, but that ſome Grecizing Jew might have given ſome kind of verſion of the Pentateuch alone. But that ſuch an opinion is only founded upon mere conjectures, which do not appear very ſolid. He examines in particular what Ariſteas and the other ancient Writers have related concerning the manner, in which the pretended verſion of the ſeventy Interpreters was performed. He ſhews, that they do not agree among themſelves upon this point, and the difference of their accounts ſhews the little regard, which the Hiſtory deſerves. He endeavours likewiſe to confute Philo Judæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, St. Irenæus, St. Epiphanius, St. Auſtin, and ſeveral other Fathers, who imagined, that the ſeventy Interpreters were divinely inſpired in their tranſlation. Mr. Bernard obſerves (4), that Philo had particular reaſons to believe this; but with regard to the Fathers of the Church, it is very probable, that the Apoſtles having almoſt conſtantly made uſe of that verſion in their writings, was one of the principal reaſons, which gave them ſo high an opinion of the importance of it. Beſides it is certain, that the Authors of this verſion, whoever they were, did not tranſlate every where exactly, either out of ignorance or deſign. Mr. Van Dale takes notice of the thirteen conſiderable paſſages, in which they deſignedly made very great alterations, for fear of offending the King, or giving occaſion of ſcandal to the Gentiles, or diſcovering the myſteries of the Jewiſh Religion; for theſe are all the reaſons, which are alledged for thoſe alterations; which reaſons are only founded upon conjecture. St. Auſtin, who had a lively genius, ſolves very ingeniouſly the objection urged againſt theſe Interpreters, on account of their having falſly tranſlated ſeveral paſſages of the original. He ſays, that the Holy Ghoſt having inſpired theſe Interpreters, he might, as he was the Author of the Scriptures, make what alterations he thought proper. But it happens very unfortunately, that divers of theſe alterations are real faults, which proceeded from their having read the words of the original wrong, or miſunderſtood the ſenſe of them. Mr. Van Dale obſerves, that he could have wiſhed, that St. Auſtin had proved firſt, that there ever were ſuch men in the world as the LXXII Interpreters, and afterwards that they were divinely inſpired. He mentions then the diſputes, which the Jews had among themſelves about this verſion, and examines in what language it was written. He thinks, that what gave occaſion to this verſion was the temple, which the Jews built in Egypt in the territory of Heliopolis under the reign of Ptolemy Philometor and in the time of Judas Maccabæus, about 160 years before the Birth of our Saviour. Before the Jews had built this temple in Egypt, the Law was read only in Hebrew in their Synagogues, and there was occaſion but for a ſmall number of Scribes and Doctors for that purpoſe; and very few perſons underſtood Hebrew. But after Onias had cauſed that temple to be raiſed, and a greater number of Prieſts, Levites, and other Miniſters became neceſſary, as few of theſe perſons underſtood Hebrew, it was thought proper to tranſlate the Law into a language, which was more common, ſuch as the Greek, in order that they might more eaſily learn the religious rites and ceremonies, as well as the laws and precepts of morality. But for fear that the Hebraizing Jews, who deſpiſed and condemn'd this Greek tranſlation, ſhould abſolutely decry it, a great many wonderful ſtories were invented by degrees, which furniſhed materials for the Hiſtory of Ariſteas, and which it is probable that Author, who had but a very inconſiderable ſhare of judgment, was fond of propagating in the world. The reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus ſeemed a very proper time to place this event in, becauſe every perſon knew the prodigious pains, which that King was at in collecting a noble Library. It is not certainly known, what were the books of the Old Teſtament, which were tranſlated by the pretended LXXII Interpreters. The learned are not agreed upon that point. Some are of opinion, that they tranſlated only the five Books of Moſes; which is the ſentiment of Joſephus. But Voſſius pretends, that they tranſlated all the Books of the Old Teſtament, either, as he obſerves, becauſe it was reaſonable to do ſo, or becauſe they were engaged to do it by the King's bounty. Mr. Van Dale enquires from whence Voſſius had all this, and ſhews that it is nothing but a mere conjecture without any foundation. He examines likewiſe, whether it is true, that the ancient Poets and Philoſophers read the Scriptures in Greek or any other language, and confutes what the learned Huetius Biſhop of Avranches had advanced upon that ſubject. He thinks that there is not much greater ſolidity in the notion of ſome learned men, who have affirmed, that the Hiſtories of the Old Teſtament gave occaſion to many of the fables among the Pagans. And he does not incline to believe, that Plato borrowed his doctrines from the ſacred Writings, as ſeveral men of learning have aſſerted with a great deal of confidence. He ſhews that Juſtin Martyr, who cited very probably by memory ſeveral paſſages from Moſes, has repreſented that Legiſlator as ſaying ſome things, which he never intended. Lactantius, tho' in other reſpects he is ſufficiently credulous, yet is very oppoſite to thoſe, who imagine that Plato and other Philoſophers of Greece were acquainted with the Scriptures. I am ſurprized, ſays he (5), that Pythagoras and afterwards Plato, who in order to diſcover the truth travelled among the Egyptians, Magi, and Perſians, that they might learn the cuſtoms and ſacred rites of thoſe nations, (for they thought that wiſdom was to be found in Religion,) did not go among the Jews, who were the only people, that poſſeſſed it, and whom it was very eaſy to have acceſs to. But I believe that divine Providence prevented them from underſtanding the truth; but it was not then permitted to ſtrangers to know the Religion of the true God and Righteouſneſs. This paſſage is very remarkable, and deſerves a particular attention. Mr. Van Dale concludes his Diſſertation with an examination of what Philo ſays, that a feaſt was kept annually in the Iſle of Pharos in honour of the tranſlation of the LXXII Interpreters, and of the rewards, which Ptolemy gave to them and to the High-Prieſt of the Jews, who had ſent them.

[C] And by ſeveral other learned Writers.] The reader may conſult Mr. Du Pin's Hiſtory of the Writers

he pretends that he was ſent to the High-prieſt of the Jews by Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt, to deſire him to ſend ſix learned Interpreters of every Tribe, in order to tranſlate the Jewiſh Law into Greek. He profeſſes himſelf to be a Pagan; but he has failed extremely of ſupporting that character in his book, as Mr. Van Dale has ſhewn in many inſtances (a). It therefore appears from his whole performance that he was a diſguiſed Jew. It is certain, that he wrote before Flavius Joſephus; but it is probable, that he was later than Philo Judæus, who makes no mention of him. Nay it was Philo himſelf who furniſhed him with the rough-draught of his pretended Hiſtory, which he adorned in his own manner. The Fable itſelf is perhaps more antient than Philo; but ſeveral ornaments were added to it from time to time. Van Dale is of opinion, that the laſt mentioned Author was the firſt who publiſhed this ſtory. Scaliger in his Animadverſions upon Euſebius's Chronicon is of opinion, that this book was written by a Jew of Alexandria. Valeſius in his Notes upon Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (b) obſerves, that the forgery is ſufficiently evident from the Epiſtle of Demetrius Phalereus to Ptolemy Philadelphus cited in that hiſtory; for Hecatæus of Abdera is quoted in the Epiſtle as an antient Author, whereas it is certain, that he was not older than Demetrius Phalereus. Beſides, that Epiſtle is full of barbariſms and ridiculous expreſſions, tho' it is well known that Demetrius, who was an Athenian, was remarkable for his eloquence. Ariſteas likewiſe ſpeaks of Heptaſtadium, which was not built till after the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as Valeſius has proved in his Commentaries upon Ammianus Marcellinus. Mr. Van Dale remarks, that the firſt inventors of this Fable were miſtaken in the time in which they placed it. They pretend, that it was under Ptolemy Philadelphus, who out of regard to religion ordered the Jewiſh law to be tranſlated into Greek; and they mention a great many inſtances of his piety. But it is evident to all who are converſant in hiſtory, that this Prince was a very vicious and irreligious man. Demetrius Phalereus likewiſe, who is ſaid there to have firſt prompted Ptolemy to his deſign, was no leſs notorious for his ill character; and therefore it is improbable, that he ſhould have ſo great a regard for the Jewiſh law, as is pretended. But it is very remarkable, that this Demetrius, who is repreſented to have been Library-keeper to Ptolemy, was not living at the time, when this tranſlation is ſaid to have been undertaken. Add to this, that no profane Hiſtorian mentions his ever having held that place under that King. Beſides, Joſephus and Ariſteas do not agree in the ſum, which Ptolemy gave for the ranſom of every Jewiſh ſlave in Egypt; and Juſtin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, and many other writers, particularly Philo Judæus, who gives the Hiſtory of this tranſlation in ſo pompous a manner, do not mention at all the ranſoming of the Jews; which renders the ſtory extremely ſuſpected. Ptolemy's letter to the High Prieſt quoted by Joſephus, does not in the leaſt agree with that in Ariſteas; and what is very ſtrange, St. Epiphanius, who appeals to the authority of the latter, cites this letter in a different manner from the other two. This Father has likewiſe committed ſeveral other miſtakes, which prove that what he had advanced is entirely fabulous. It appears alſo, that Juſtin Martyr's account is no more credible than that of St. Epiphanius. And therefore Mr. Van Dale concludes from theſe and other remarks, which we ſhall mention in the note [B], that the pretended Ariſteas is a real Jew in diſguiſe, or one of thoſe Proſelytes, who uſed to go up to Jeruſalem to perform their devotions. That, which very probably gave occaſion to this fable, was, that Ptolemy took a great deal of pains in collecting all kinds of Books, which could be found, both ancient and modern, which he procured at a vaſt expence. We are informed, that he gave a very large ſum for the originals of Æſchylus, Sophocles, and Euripides (c).

Mr. Millar in his Hiſtory of the Church in the Old Teſtament (6) is of opinion, that there was without doubt a Verſion made of the Hebrew text in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus; but the Jews being then much given to religious romances, this narrative of Ariſteas appears to be one of that kind written by ſome Helleniſtical Jew; for tho' the Author pretends to be an Heathen Greek, yet he every where ſpeaks as a Jew. He makes Ptolemy, continues that learned Author, advance an incredible ſum for redeeming captives and making this Verſion, which Dr. Prideaux (7) computes to near two millions ſterling money, which is more than the whole Library was worth. The queſtions propoſed to the ſeventy two Interpreters, and their extemporary anſwers ſeem very much to carry the air of a fiction. The repreſentation of ſeventy two Elders being ſent to Alexandria from Jeruſalem, and chooſing ſix out of every Tribe, looks like a Jewiſh invention, with reſpect to the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, and the number of the twelve Tribes, ſince it is not probable, that an Heathen Greek ſhould know any thing of them; for the names of the twelve Tribes being ſunk into that of Jews, few knew them by any other deſignation. But how comes all this to be done by the advice of Demetrius Phalereus, when it appears from Hiſtory, that when this Verſion was made, he was baniſhed, impriſoned, or dead? Nor is it probable, that ſix Elders of every Tribe in Paleſtine ſhould be found ſo well ſkilled in both languages, as to make an exact Verſion from the Hebrew into Greek. Beſides no reaſon can be alledged why ſeventy two ſhould be ſent, when ſeven were ſufficient to execute that work (8).

ARISTIDES,

ARISTIDES, ſurnamed the Juſt, flouriſhed at Athens in the ſame time with Themiſtocles. They could never agree together; and it appeared at that time, that to be ſuperior to another in virtue, is not the way to be ſo in credit [A]. The boiſterous eloquence of Themiſtocles cauſed him to triumph over the juſtice of his rival. It is remarkable that one of thoſe who voted for Ariſtides's baniſhment was ſwayed thereto by the great reputation of probity which he obſerved him to bear [B]: but here is a particular ſtill more remarkable. This great man, who ſo ſtrictly obſerved the rules of equity in his own houſe and towards his fellow citizens, yet made no ſcruple to prefer utility to honeſty in caſes of politicks [C]. He lived in great poverty, and gloried in it [D]. He did not leave behind him enough to marry his daughters, nor even to pay his funeral charges. The Republick undertook all thoſe expences (a). He was ſufficiently generous in not joining with the adverſaries of Themiſtocles, at a time when there was room to believe that they might quite cruſh him (b); for without Ariſtides's meddling in it, Themiſtocles would have been condemned to baniſhment. Authors differ about the circumſtances of Ariſtides's death (c); but it cannot be doubted that Seneca has made a great miſtake about that particular [E]. We ſhall relate in the article of [A] To be ſuperior to another in virtue; is not the way to be ſo in credit.] This is Cornelius Nepos's thought. In his cognitum eſt quanto antiſtaret eloquentia innocentiæ; quanquam enim adeo excellebat Ariſtides abſtinentia, ut unus poſt hominum memoriam, quod quidem nos audierimus, cognomine Juſtus ſit appellatus, tamen a Themiſtocle collabefactus teſtula illa exilio decem annorum multatus eſt (1). i. e. "In theſe men it appeared "how much eloquence had the advantage of innocence; for altho' Ariſtides excelled ſo much in diſintereſtedneſs, that he alone, in the memory of man, "as far as we have heard, had the ſirname of the "Juſt, yet being overthrown by Themiſtocles he was "condemned by the oſtraciſm to a ten years baniſhment." Though you be the honeſteſt man in the world, and have not the art of clamouring and bluſtering in your ſpeeches, you muſt expect to be defeated, when you have a diſpute with the greateſt rogue in the city.

[B] One of thoſe who voted for his baniſhment was ſwayed thereto by the great reputation for probity which he obſerved him to bear.] One of the citizens of Athens, who gave his ſuffrage for Ariſtides's baniſhment, frankly told him, who aſked his reaſon for ſo voting, I don't know the man, but I don't like him, becauſe he has taken ſo much pains to be ſurnamed the Juſt. Cedenſque animadverteret quemdam ſcribentem ut patriâ pelleretur, quæſiſſe ab eo dicitur, Quare id Ariſtides faceret, aut quid Ariſtides commiſiſſet, cur tantâ pœnâ dignus duceretur? Cur ille reſpondit, ſe ignorare Ariſtidem, ſed ſibi non placere, quod cupide elaboraſſet ut præter cæteros juſtus appellaretur (2). A great many people are in this man's way of thinking; but don't ſpeak their minds ſo freely. Every thing that excells diſpleaſes them: they ſhew a more juſt regard for ſuch virtue as is very common, than for a diſtinguiſhed virtue. That reputation of Ariſtides, whereof the Athenians gave one day ſo authentick a teſtimony to his face (3), has ſuffered no injury by time: it has been preſerved through all ages; read this paſſage of Auſonius.

[C] He made no ſcruple to prefer utility to honeſty, in caſes of Politicks.] Here is a new example of what we have ſaid above (5), concerning the RELIGION OF THE SOVEREIGN. Ariſtides had cauſed the Athenians to ſwear to a certain thing, and himſelf had taken the oath in their name. Afterwards he adviſed them to do whatſoever they ſhould find proper for the public advantage, and to throw the whole guilt of the perjury upon him alone, whilſt they ſhould take advantage of ſuch favourable circumſtances as fortune preſented them withal. This was his general maxim, as Theophraſtus has obſerved: Καθ' ὅλου δ' ὁ Θεόφραστος φησὶ τὸν ἄνδρα τοῦτον περὶ τὰ οἰκεῖα καὶ τοὺς πολίτας ἄκρως ὄντα δίκαιον, ἐν τοῖς κοινοῖς πολλὰ πράξαι πρὸς τὴν ὑπόθεσιν τῆς πατρίδος ὡς συχνῆς ἀδικίας δεομένην (6). i. e. "Upon the whole, Theophraſtus ſays, that this man "in his private affairs and his conduct towards the "citizens was ſtrictly juſt: but that in the buſineſs "of the publick, he took ſeveral ſuch time-ſerving "meaſures, as tho' the ſtate had required much roguery." What an unhappy ſituation it is to ſit at the helm of public affairs. The welfare of the State does not require only one or two pieces of injuſtice during a man's life, but a great many more. Ariſtides perhaps was not excuſed for an hundred. Note, that Cicero gives us quite another idea of him (7).

[D] He gloried in his poverty.] He had a very rich relation, named Callias, who obſerving that he was publickly accuſed of not furniſhing him with neceſſary food (8), begged of him to teſtify before the judges, whether it was not true that he never would receive ſuch ſums as Callias had very frequently offered him; and whether he had not made him anſwer, that he gloried more in his poverty, than Callias did in his riches: he anſwered, yes. His reaſon was, that one might ſee a great many people who made a good and a bad uſe of riches; but that it was rare to find a man who ſupported poverty nobly (9). It was therefore, it may be ſaid, from a principle of pride that he deſpiſed riches; that is to ſay, in order to diſtinguiſh himſelf from the crowd. It is a great pleaſure to covetous and ambitious men to be able to object that to thoſe who are not like themſelves. But what do they get by it? Though it were true that all men act from a principle of ſelf-love, is it nothing but to draw ones glory rather from this thing than that? Is it not a ſufficiently juſt motive to admire the one, and to deſpiſe the other? Ælian relates a thing which at firſt ſight appears not perfectly compatible with the manifeſt poverty of Ariſtides: They who had betrothed his daughters, went off, ſays he, from that alliance; becauſe, continues he, his extreme poverty was then known (10). I am apt to think him miſtaken in his reaſoning. That poverty was no ſecret during the life of Ariſtides; but it was known at the ſame time that he was a man of great credit. But the moſt venal and ſelf-intereſted minds do not think they engage in a diſadvantageous bargain, in marrying one in the moſt deſtitute circumſtances, ſo long as it can be ſaid that ſhe is the daughter of a favourite who has an hundred lucrative employments at his diſpoſal. Thus you ſee what might be the reaſon why the daughters of Ariſtides, with no dowry at all, found matches during his life time; but when he was dead, there was no more to be expected from them; they therefore were abandoned for want of money. A great genius (11) puts a judicious reflection into the mouth of a favourite: Such a one thought himſelf honoured with my alliance upon even terms, and yet he thinks to make a ſacrifice to my favour, in aſking my niece of me. So true it is, that when a perſon ſeeks after the kinſwomen of a man of great intereſt, he is more intent upon the advancements which he can procure for him, than the fortune of the relations.

des ſmiled, and ſaid to the Officers who accompanied him, Adviſe that fellow not to open his mouth ſo villainouſly any more. Seneca relates the thing thus. Ducebatur Athenis ad ſupplicium Ariſtides, cui quiſquis occurrerat, dejiciebat oculos, & ingemiſcebat non tanquam in hominem juſtum, ſed tanquam in ipſam juſtitiam animadverteretur. Inventus eſt tamen qui faciem ejus inſpueret: poterat ab hoc moleſte ferre, quod ſciebat neminem id auſurum puri oris. At ille abſterſit faciem, & ſubridens ait comitanti ſe magiſtratui, "Admone iſtum, "ne poſteà tam improbe oſcitet (12)." Lipſius has very well remarked upon this paſſage, that Seneca has taken one perſon for another: He has aſcribed to Ariſtides what belongs to Phocion. It was Phocion who was condemned to die: it was he who was ſpit upon when he was led to the priſon where he was to drink the hemlock juice; and it was he who turning to the magiſtrates that accompanied him, aſked if there was not any one that would curb the inſolence of that foul-mouth'd fellow (13). Seneca has turned the words in his own manner: he has made a conceit: Verba noſter etiam per argutiolam invertit (14). This is evidently not the firſt time that he has changed, both things and words: It were to be wiſhed that he was the only perſon who has taken that liberty. People are too fond of ſaying a ſmart thing, not in ſuch a manner as it was ſaid at firſt, but after ſuch a form as they think better. That he was abſolutely miſtaken, is plain, from what Plutarch relates. That Hiſtorian owns, that ſomebody had ſaid that Ariſtides died in baniſhment; but he reſutes that (15). For a much ſtronger reaſon ought we to reject as a fable, what Seneca ſays. Note, that Lancello de Perugia has not corrected this fault: perhaps he knew it; but choſe rather to take it for a certain fact, in order to have room to maintain that injuſtice was at that time greater than juſtice, ſince the Senate of Athens put to death a perſon whoſe virtue was ſo very illuſtrious (16).

☞ ARISTIDES, an Athenian Philoſopher of the 2d Century of great eloquence, became a convert to the Chriſtian Religion, tho' he did not change his habit or profeſſion as a Philoſopher [A]. He preſented to the Emperor Hadrian, at the ſame time with Quadratus, that is, about the year 124, an Apology for the Chriſtian Faith (a), in which he repreſented the proofs of it; and which, as St. Jerom informs us (b), was extant in his time, and was a convincing teſtimony to the men of learning of the great genius and abilities of the Author. The ſame Father likewiſe obſerves in another paſſage of his writings (c), that this Apology was full of the ſentences and opinions of the Philoſophers, and that Juſtin Martyr afterwards imitated him. Guilletiere in his Deſcription of Athens publiſhed in French, and quoted by Fabricius in his Notes upon St. Jerom de Viris Illuſtribus tells us, that there is a manuſcript of this Apology of Ariſtides extant in a Monaſtery not far from Athens. So early a defence of Chriſtianity as this, and by a perſon of Ariſtides's character, would undoubtedly be of great advantage to us, if it could be recovered. Mr. le Clerc in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (d) obſerves, that ſome Writers place the Apologies of our Author and Quadratus under the year 136, when the Decennalia of the Emperor Hadrian were celebrated [B].

Fabricius in his notes upon the paſſage of St. Jerom quoted above, obſerves, that as Ariſtides was a Philoſopher before he became a Chriſtian, he ſtill retained his former habit, that is the Cloak or Pallium, which was the peculiar dreſs of the Philoſophers. This ſhews evidently that the Chriſtians in general did not uſe that kind of garment. *Itaque & Ariſtides, cum Philoſophus eſſet antequam Chriſtianus, poſtquam Chriſtianus factus eſt, etiam in priſtino habitu permanſit, nec veſtem Philoſophicam (Pallium) mutavit. Mr. Le Clerc acknowledges, that this was very frequently the caſe, but cannot allow, that it was always ſo; and conſequently, that Father Pagi's reaſoning is not abſolutely concluſive. T.

☞ ARISTIPPUS, the Founder of the Cyrenaic Sect of Philoſophy [A], was the ſon of Aretades (a), and born at Cyrene in Lybia. He flouriſhed about the 96th Olympiad. The great reputation of Socrates induced him to leave his own country, and remove to Athens, that he might have the ſatisfaction of hearing his diſcourſes (b). Plutarch tells us (c), that he received this advantageous character of Socrates from Iſchomachus, whom he met with accidentally at the Olympic Games. He enquired of him by what

[A] The Founder of the Cyrenaic Sect of Philoſophy.] The ſucceſſion of the Ionic Philoſophy, which before Socrates was ſingle, was after his death divided into many ſchools, ſome of which continued but a ſhort time, while others had a longer ſucceſſion. The Cyrenaic Sect was one of thoſe of the ſhorteſt duration. We ſhall give ſome account of their opinions. They rejected natural Philoſophy, imagining ſuch diſquiſitions to be abſolutely incomprehenſible. They made uſe of Logic, which they conſidered as a very uſeful art. But Meleager and Clitomachus aſſerted, that they had an equal contempt both for Natural Philoſophy and Dialectic, which they repreſented as entirely unneceſſary, ſince without theſe, a man may be able to underſtand what things are good, and what evil, and to diſcourſe well, and to diveſt himſelf of ſuperſtition and the fear of death (1). They maintained, that the ſenſes do not always inform us truly; that nothing extrinſecal can be perceived; and that only thoſe things are the objects of our preception, which are felt by an inward ſenſation, as grief and pleaſure. That we do not know the colour or ſound of any thing, but only that we feel ourſelves affected in ſuch a manner (2). Sextus Empiricus (3) repreſents this doctrine more fully and perſpicuouſly as follows. The paſſions or affections are the judges and only faculties, which are what manner of diſputes that Philoſopher made ſo great an impreſſion upon the youth; and from the imperfect account which Ichomachus gave him of them, he was ſo paſſionately affected, that he grew pale and lean, till he took a voyage to Athens in order fully to gratify his curioſity. He was chiefly delighted with thoſe diſcourſes of Socrates, that related the moſt to pleaſure (d); which he aſſerted to be the ultimate end, in which all happineſs conſiſts. His manner of life was agreeable to his opinion; for he indulged himſelf extremely in all the luxuries of dreſs, wine, and women (e). Tho' he had a good eſtate, and three country ſeats, yet he was the only one of the diſciples of Socrates, who took money for teaching; which being obſerved by that Philoſopher, he aſked Ariſtippus, are capable of comprehending, and are not fallacious. But with regard to thoſe objects, which affect the paſſions, there is nothing, which is comprehenſible, or exempt from fallacy. We may ſay indeed, that we are made white, or affected with what is ſweet; but we cannot aſſert, that what cauſes this affection, is white or ſweet. For it is poſſible, that we may be affected with whiteneſs from an object, which is not white, and with ſweetneſs from a thing, which is not ſweet. Thus to a man, who has weak or jaundic'd eyes, all things ſeem either darkiſh and obſcure or yellow. And by preſſing our eyes, we imagine we ſee things double. A madman fancies that he ſees two ſuns or two cities of Thebes. It is reaſonable therefore to conclude, that we comprehend nothing but the paſſions and ſenſations of our minds. For we muſt aſſert, that the things ſeen are either the paſſions themſelves, or the cauſes of thoſe paſſions. If we ſay, that our paſſions are the things ſeen, we muſt likewiſe affirm all things ſeen to be true and comprehenſible. If we ſay, that the things ſeen are the cauſes of thoſe paſſions, we muſt confeſs all things ſeen to be falſe and incomprehenſible. For that paſſion, which we feel, ſhews us itſelf and nothing more. So that to ſpeak with propriety, the paſſion or affection it ſelf is the only thing apparent to us; and for that reaſon no perſon is miſtaken in his own affection, or ſenſations of mind, but every one in the external objects of them. Hence they aſſert, that there is not any one common principle in mankind, by which they judge; but they impoſe common names upon their particular judgments. All promiſcuouſly uſe the words white and ſweet; but they have no common principle of white and ſweet; for every man is only ſenſible of his own affections. Now whether the ſame affection happens to any two perſons from an object, which is white, neither of them is able to determine, becauſe they are not capable of receiving each other's affection. As there is no common affection in us, it would be raſh to aſſert, that whatever ſeems thus to me, ſeems ſo to another perſon; for our different conſtitutions may occaſion different ſenſations in us. It is evident that we are differently affected by the different conſtitutions of our ſenſes from the caſe of thoſe, who are defective in their ſight, troubled with the jaundice, or who have their faculties of ſight entire and in their natural ſtate; ſince the ſame object may appear of different colours to different perſons. Of the affections of the mind ſome are agreeable, others harſh and troubleſome; and a third kind of a middle nature. Laertius obſerves, that they aſſert two paſſions or affections of the mind, pain and pleaſure; the former a ſmooth motion, the latter an harſh and rough one. There is no difference between one pleaſure and another, nor is one more agreeable than another. But pleaſure is the object, which all creatures deſire; and pain what they all avoid. With regard to the pleaſure of the body, which they aſſert to be the ultimate end of mankind, according to Panætius in his treatiſe of the Sects, quoted by Laertius, they do not allow it to be that calm, ſedate pleaſure, reſulting from the privation of pain, and a freedom from all diſturbance, which Epicurus maintained to be our proper end. For they affirmed that there is a difference between the end and happineſs. The end is only ſome particular pleaſure; but happineſs conſiſts of the aggregate of all pleaſures, wherein are included both the paſt and future. Beſides, particular pleaſure is deſirable in itſelf; Happineſs, not for itſelf, but for the ſake of all the particular pleaſures. That pleaſure is our chief end, is evident from hence, that we are determined to it from our earlieſt infancy, without any inſtruction of others, by the mere impulſe of nature; and that when we have attained it, we ſeek nothing farther. On the other hand, we avoid nothing ſo much as the reverſe of it, which is pain. They affirmed, that pleaſure is good, tho' proceeding from the vileſt actions, as Hippobatus relates in his Book of the Sects (4). For tho' the action be diſhoneſt, yet the pleaſure ariſing from it is deſirable and good. Exemption from pain was not eſteemed pleaſure by them, as it was by Epicurus; nor was the ceſſation of pleaſure accounted pain, ſince both of them conſiſt in motion; whereas, neither ceſſation of pain nor privation of pleaſure are motions, becauſe the former is like the ſtate of a man in a profound ſleep. They affirmed, that ſome men thro' perverſeneſs of mind, are incapable of chooſing pleaſure; and that all the pleaſures and pains of the mind do not proceed from the pains and pleaſures of the body; ſince we feel in our minds a ſatisfaction on account of the proſperity of our country, beſides the pleaſure which we take in our own private happineſs. They did not believe the remembrance of paſt, or the expectation of future enjoyments to be pleaſure, as Epicurus thought; ſince time puts a ſtop to the motion of the ſoul. Pleaſure, according to Ariſtippus (5), is μονόχρονος, that is, conſiſts only in one part of time, the preſent; for the recollection of paſt pleaſure, or the expectation of future is vain and trifling; ſince that only is good, which we experience at preſent. He declared, that he was not at all affected with either the paſt or the future, the former being already gone, and the latter not yet come, and what it will prove when it comes, is abſolutely uncertain. From hence he argued, according to Ælian (6), that men ought not to be ſollicitous either about things paſt or future; ſince it was the ſign of a firm and well conſtituted mind not to be at all troubled about them. He adviſed men likewiſe to take care only for the preſent day, and in that day only for the preſent part of it, in which ſomething was done or thought of. For, he ſaid, the preſent was only in our power, not the paſt nor future, the one being gone, the other uncertain whether it will come. Μόνον γὰρ ἴφασκεν ἡμέτερον εἶναι τὸ παρὸν, μήτε δὲ τὸ φθάσαν, μήτε τὸ προσδοκώμενον· τὸ μὲν γὰρ ἀπολωλέναι, τὸ δὲ ἄδηλον εἶναι, εἴπερ ἔσται. The Cyrenaics would not allow, that pleaſure conſiſted in ſeeing or hearing only; for we hear with delight thoſe, who counterfeit lamentation; but thoſe, who really mourn, we hear with diſpleaſure. They called the privation of pain and pleaſure the middle ſtate. They aſſerted, that the pleaſures of the body are much ſuperior to thoſe of the mind; and therefore the pains of the body are more grievous. Hence it happens, that offenders are more tormented with corporeal puniſhment. Pain is unnatural to us, and pleaſure natural. They thought it ſufficient for a man to enjoy the ſatisfaction of one ſingle pleaſure at a time. They conſidered riches, as the efficient cauſes of pleaſures; but not as deſirable of themſelves. They maintain'd that all good conſiſts in pleaſure; and virtue itſelf is only commendable, as being a cauſe of pleaſure (7). That there is nothing juſt, honeſt, or diſhoneſt by nature, but only by law and cuſtom. However that a good man will do nothing abſurd or evil, by reaſon of the cenſures of the world, and the puniſhments, which offenders are obnoxious to. That wiſdom is a good, but not to be deſired in itſelf, but only for the ſake of thoſe things, which proceed from it. That a friend is to be loved for the uſe we make of him, as the body cheriſhes every part of itſelf, as long as it continues ſound. That ſome virtues are common to fools, as well as to wiſe men. That the exerciſe of the body contributes to the attainment of virtue. That a wiſe man will never give way to envy, intemperance, or ſuperſtition; for all theſe proceed from want of judgment. But they allowed him to grieve and fear, as being natural to mankind (8).

pus, How he came to have ſo much? Who in reply aſked him, How he came to have ſo little? Socrates likewiſe expreſſed his diſapprobation of this upon another occaſion; for when Ariſtippus ſent him part of the money, which he had received, he returned it, ſaying, that his Demon would not ſuffer him to take it (f). Upon his leaving Socrates, he went to Ægina, as Athenæus informs us (g), where he lived with more freedom and luxury than before. Socrates ſent frequent exhortations to him, in order to reclaim him, but all in vain. And with the ſame view he publiſhed that Diſcourſe, which we find in Xenophon. Here Ariſtippus became acquainted with Lais, the famous Courtezan of Corinth; for whoſe ſake he took a voyage to that city [B]. He continued at Ægina till the death of Socrates, as appears from Plato's Phædo, and the Epiſtle, which he wrote upon that occaſion [C]. He returned at laſt into his own country, Cyrene, where he profeſſed Philoſophy, and inſtituted a Sect, which, as we obſerv'd above, was called the Cyrenaic, from the place, and by ſome Writers (h) the Hedonic or voluptuous, from its doctrines, which we have given an account of in the note [A]. During the height of the grandeur of Dionyſius, the Sicilian Tyrant, a great many Philoſophers reſorted to him; and among the reſt Ariſtippus, who was tempted thither by the magnificence of that court (i). Dionyſius aſking him the reaſon of his coming, he replied, that it was in order to give what he had, and to receive what he had not; or, as others repreſent it, that when he wanted wiſdom, he went to Socrates, but now as he wanted money, he was come to him (k). He very ſoon inſinuated himſelf into the favour of Dionyſius; for being a man of a ſoft eaſy temper, he conformed himſelf exactly to every place, time and perſon, and was a compleat maſter of the moſt refined complaiſance. We have ſeveral remarkable paſſages concerning him during his reſidence at that court mentioned by Diogenes Laertius [D]. The great ſhare of favour which he enjoyed at the court of Dionyſius, was perhaps the

His paſſion for her induced him to take a voyage to Corinth; in which being ſurprized by a violent ſtorm, he was extremely uneaſy. Upon this one of the paſſengers ſaying to him, We ordinary people are not afraid, but you Philoſophers are ſubject to fear (9); or, as Ælian repreſents it (10), Are you afraid like other people? He replied, Our ſouls are not of equal value (11): you hazard a wicked and unhappy life: I riſque happineſs (12). When he was reproved for frequenting Lais, he ſaid, that he poſſeſſed her, and not ſhe him. For pleaſure, added he, is no crime; but the crime is for a man to be a ſlave to his pleaſures (13). Lais in emulation of Phryne, gave admittance to all ſorts of people, both rich and poor; upon which Ariſtippus being reprehended by his ſervant for beſtowing ſo much on her, ſince ſhe had entertained Diogenes the Cynic without any reward; he anſwered, That he gave her money, that he might enjoy her, and not that others might not have the ſame liberty. Diogenes reproached him for his freedom with Lais, telling him, that he converſed with the ſame woman himſelf; and therefore he ought to abandon her, or become a Cynic like himſelf. Ariſtippus aſked him by way of reply, whether he thought it abſurd to live in the ſame houſe, in which others had lived before, or to ſail in a ſhip, which had carried other paſſengers. And therefore it was not more abſurd to have an affection for a woman, whom others had enjoyed (14).

[C] The epiſtle, which he wrote upon that occaſion.] It is the ſixteenth among the Socratic Epiſtles, and is as follows, according to Mr. Stanley's tranſlation (15). Of the death of Socrates, I and Cleombrotus have received information; and that when he might have eſcaped from the eleven Officers, he ſaid he would not, unleſs he was acquitted by law; for that were as much as in him lay to betray his country. My opinion is, that being unjuſtly committed, he might have got his liberty any way, conceiving that all, which he could do ill or inconſiderately, muſt be juſt. From whence again I blame him not, as if he had done ill even in this. You write me word that all the friends and diſciples of Socrates, have left Athens out of fear the like ſhould befall any of you. It is well done; and we being preſent at Ægina will continue here a while, then come to you, and, wherein we are able, ſerve you.

[D] Several remarkable paſſages concerning him, during his reſidence at that court, mentioned by Diogenes Laertius.] Dionyſius at a feaſt, commanded that all ſhould put on women's purple habits, and dance in them. But Plato refuſed, repeating theſe lines;

I cannot in this gay effeminate dreſs
Diſgrace my manhood, or my ſex betray.

But Ariſtippus readily ſubmitted to the command, and made this reply immediately:

——— At feaſts, where mirth is free,
A ſober mind can never be corrupted.

At another time interceding with Dionyſius in behalf of a friend, but not prevailing, he caſt himſelf at his feet; and being reproved for that exceſs of humility, he replied, that it was not he, who was the cauſe of that ſubmiſſion, but Dionyſius, whoſe ears were in his feet. Dionyſius ſhewed him three beautiful Courtezans, and ordered him to take his choice. Upon which he took them all three away with him, alledging that Paris was puniſhed for preferring one to the other two. But when he had brought them to his door, he diſmiſſed them, in order to ſhew, that he could either enjoy or reject with the ſame indifference. This was the reaſon, that Strabo, or, as others ſay, Plato told him, that he was the only perſon, who cared not whether he wore purple or rags. He was likewiſe admired, becauſe he could wear a threadbare or a rich Mileſian cloak with equal decorum, accommodating himſelf to both. When Dionyſius ſpit upon him, he took it patiently; and being reproved for it, he anſwered, that the Fiſhermen will ſuffer themſelves to be waſhed by the ſea, that they may catch a gudgeon (κάβιον); and therefore it was not unreaſonable in him to endure to be ſprinkled with a little ſpittle to catch a fool; as the Engliſh tranſlation of Diogenes Laertius has render'd this paſſage. But Mr. Stanley obſerves (16), that the word βλίνος, when pronounced, is equivocal: for βλίνος ſignifies a Fiſh like a gudgeon, and βλήνος a Tyrant. He deſired money of Dionyſius, who obſerved to him, that he had aſſured him a wiſe man wanted nothing. Give me, ſays he, what I aſk, and we will talk of that afterwards. When Dionyſius had given it him, Now, ſays he, you ſee I do not want. By this complaiſance, he gained ſo much upon Dionyſius, that he had a greater regard for him, than for all the reſt of the Philoſophers, tho' he ſometimes ſpoke with ſuch freedom to that King, that he incurred his diſpleaſure. When Dionyſius aſked, Why Philoſophers haunted the gates of rich men; but not rich men thoſe of Philoſophers? he replied, Becauſe the latter know what they want, and the others not. Another time, when Dionyſius urged him to diſcourſe upon a point of Philoſophy; he replied, That it was abſurd, that he, who was but a learner, ſhould inſiſt upon his ſpeaking, and yet teach him when he ſhould ſpeak. The King being offended at this, commanded him to retire to the the reaſon, as Mr. Stanley obſerves (l), that he was envied by the reſt of the Philoſophers, among whom was Xenophon, who out of reſentment to him publiſhed the diſcourſe between him and Socrates concerning pleaſure (m). Plato likewiſe animadverts upon him very ſeverely in his Phædo, for being at Ægina at the time of Socrates's death. While Plato was at Dionyſius's court at the ſame time as Ariſtippus, he reproved him for his ſumptuous manner of life. Upon this Ariſtippus aſked him, whether he thought Dionyſius a good man or not? and Plato affirming, that he thought him ſo, he replied, that Dionyſius lived more ſumptuouſly; and therefore it was not incompatible with goodneſs (n). Phœdo aſked him, by way of raillery, who it was that ſmelt ſo ſtrong of Unguents? It is I, unhappy man as I am, anſwered Ariſtippus, and the Perſian King, who is more unhappy than me. But as other things are not the worſe for this, ſo neither is man (o). He had a conteſt alſo with Antiſthenes the Cynic Philoſopher, as appears by an Epiſtle of the latter among the Socratic Epiſtles, and Ariſtippus's anſwer to it [E]. However notwithſtanding this diſpute between them, Ariſtippus was very ready to employ his intereſt at court for ſome friends of Antiſthenes, to preſerve them from death, as we find by a letter of his to that Philoſopher (p). Diogenes followed the example of his maſter Antiſthenes in ridiculing Ariſtippus, and called him the Court-Spaniel (q). We have many Apophthegms of his preſerved [F]. He wrote a great many books, and particularly the Hiſtory of Libya in three books dedicated to Dionyſius, and ſeveral Dialogues, with four books of the luxury of the Antients (r). There are four Epiſtles of his extant in the Socratic Collection publiſhed by Leo Allatius. After he had lived a long time with Dionyſius, his daughter Arete ſent to him, to deſire his preſence at Cyrene, in order to take care of her affairs, ſince ſhe was in danger of being oppreſſed by the Magiſtrates. But the lower end of the table; which he readily ſubmitted to, ſaying, that he perceived his deſign was to make it a place of honour (17). The next day the Tyrant aſk'd him, what he thought of that place in which he ſat then, in reſpect of that, wherein he ſat the night before? He anſwered, That they were alike to him: To day, ſays he, becauſe I left it, it is contemned, tho' yeſterday it was eſteemed the moſt honourable. That, where I ſit to day, is accounted moſt honourable, which yeſterday, without me, was eſteemed the loweſt (18). Being aſk'd, Why Dionyſius was angry with him? He replied, For the ſame reaſon that other men are angry; or, as Mr. Stanley renders this paſſage of Laertius, For the ſame reaſon he falls out with others. Another time Dionyſius repeating (out of Sophocles, as Plutarch affirms, who aſcribes this to Zeno) theſe verſes,

He, that with Tyrants ſeeks for bare ſupport,
Enſlaves himſelf, tho' free he came to court.

He immediately anſwered;

He is no ſlave, if he be free to come.

Diocles, as Laertius informs us, related this in his Lives of the Philoſophers; tho' others aſcribe this ſaying to Plato. Dionyſius offering Plato a great ſum of money, which he refuſed, Ariſtippus being at the ſame time at court, ſaid, that Dionyſius beſtowed his liberality upon ſure grounds, ſince he gave little to thoſe, who aſked much; but he offered a conſiderable ſum to Plato, who required nothing. Another time Helicon of Cyzicus, one of Plato's friends, having foretold an Eclipſe of the Sun, which happened accordingly, he was much honoured for it. Ariſtippus jeſting with other Philoſophers, ſaid, that he could foretell a ſtranger thing than that. They demanding what it was, he ſaid, that he could prognoſticate, that Plato and Dionyſius would ſoon be at variance; which accordingly happened (19).

[E] As appears by an Epiſtle of the latter among the Socratic Epiſtles, and Ariſtippus's anſwer to it.] Ariſtippus's Letter to Antiſthenes, who was diſpleaſed at his manner of life, is written in an ironical ſtyle. We ſhall give it in Mr. Stanley's tranſlation. We are unhappy beyond meaſure. How can we be otherwiſe, living with a tyrant, daily eating and drinking deliciouſly, perfum'd with choiceſt unguents, attired in rich looſe garments brought from Tarentum. And none will deliver me from the cruelty of Dionyſius, who detains me, not as a rude perſon, but one that is verſed in Socratic learning; ſupplying me, as I ſaid, with meat, unguents, garments, and the like; fearing neither the judgments of Gods nor men. And now the misfortune is much encreaſed. He hath beſtowed on me three Sicilian Virgins of extraordinary beauty, and many utenſils of ſilver. And when this man will give over doing ſuch things I know not, you do well therefore to be concerned for the miſeries of others. In requital whereof I rejoice in your happineſs, and return you thanks. Farewel. "The figs, which you "have, lay up againſt Winter and the Cretan Meal; "for theſe things ſeem to be better than riches. "Waſh and drink of the fountain of Enneacrunus. "Wear the ſame garment in Winter as in Summer, "and that ſordid, as becomes a free perſon living "under the Athenian Democracy. As for me, I "knew as ſoon as I came into a city and iſland go"verned by a Monarch, I ſhould ſuffer thoſe ills, of "which you write to me. Now the Syracuſians, Agri"gentines, Geloans, and the reſt of the Sicilians com"paſſionately admire me (20). But for my madneſs "in coming inconſiderately to theſe unſeemly things, "I wiſh this curſe to fall upon me, that I never be "quit of theſe evils; becauſe being of years of diſ"cretion, and pretending to wiſdom, I would not "undergo hunger and cold, nor contemn glory, nor "wear a long beard. I will ſend you ſome great "white lupines to eat, after you have acted Hercu"les to the boys; of which things you eſteem it not "abſurd to diſcourſe and write. But if any man "ſhould ſpeak of lupines to Dionyſius, I think it "were againſt the rules of tyranny. Of the reſt go, "and diſcourſe with Simon the Leather-dreſſer, than "whom you eſteem nothing more wiſe; for I am "allowed familiarity with Artificers, becauſe I live "under obedience to others."

(20) Mr. Stanley reads νῦν δὲ ἐλεοῦντες με περιβλέποντα in Doric, which is an acute irony; for περιβλέπειν ſignifies to look on a thing with admiration; which is not proper to compaſſion.

[F] We have many Apophthegms of his ſtill preſerved.] Suidas obſerves, that he ſurpaſſed all the Philoſophers in the acuteneſs of his Apophthegms. He once ordered fifty drachmas to be given for a partridge; and being reproved by a certain perſon for his extravagance, he replied, Would not you have bought the fowl, if you could have had it for a farthing? To which the other aſſenting: Well then, ſaid he, fifty drachma's are no more to me than your ſingle farthing to you. Being demanded, what was the greateſt benefit, which he had received by Philoſophy, he anſwered, to converſe freely with all men. Being reproached with his expenſive manner of living; Certainly, ſaid he, if this were ſuch a criminal thing, the Gods would never be ſo laviſh at their banquets; or, as Mr. Stanley renders this paſſage of Laertius, It would not be practiſed upon days of feſtival to the Gods. To one, who aſked him in what reſpect the Philoſophers excelled other men, he replied, In this, that they would live uprightly and juſtly, if there were no Laws in the world. Being aſked what was the difference between the learned and the ignorant; he made anſwer, The ſame, that is between a wild horſe, and one that is managed. As he was going one time into a Courtezan's lodging, and

But he fell ſick in his return home, and died at Lipara, an Æolian Iſland, as we may collect and perceived one of the young men, who were with him, bluſh, he told him, that the ſhame did not lie in going in thither, but in not being able to get out again. To one, who deſired him to reſolve a riddle, he replied, that it was abſurd to reſolve that, which unreſolved affords ſo much entertainment. Being railed at, he left the room; and the perſon who abuſed him, following him, and aſking him why he went away; he anſwered, Becauſe it is in your power to rail, but it is not in my power not to hear you. He uſed to ſay, That it was better to be a beggar than an illiterate man; ſince one wants only money, but the other humanity. A perſon obſerving, that the Philoſophers frequented the houſes of rich men; Why, ſaid he, the Phyſicians frequent the chambers of the ſick, yet that is no reaſon, why a man ſhould rather chuſe to lie ſick than be cured. To one, who boaſted of his great reading, he ſaid, that as they, who feed and exerciſe moſt, are not always more healthy than they, who only eat and exerciſe to ſatisfy nature; ſo neither they, who read much, but they, who read no more than is uſeful, are truly learned. To his Lawyer, who having pleaded his cauſe for him, and gained it, aſked him, what good Socrates had done him: Very much, ſaid he, for he made all your words good, which you have ſpoken to day in my behalf. Among other uſeful inſtructions, which he gave to his daughter Arete, he adviſed her particularly to deſpiſe ſuperfluity. To one, who aſked him what his ſon would be the better for being a Scholar; If for nothing elſe, ſaid he, yet for this alone, that when he comes into the Theatre, one ſtone will not ſit upon another. When a certain perſon recommended his ſon to him, he demanded five hundred drachma's; and upon the father's replying, that he could buy a ſlave for that ſum; Do ſo, ſaid he, and then you'll be maſter of a couple (21). He uſed to ſay, that he took money of his friends, not ſo much for his own uſe, as that they might know what money was good for, or how to beſtow it; Being reproached, becauſe having a ſuit of law depending, he feed a Lawyer to plead for him; Juſt ſo, ſaid he, when I have a great ſupper to make I always hire a cook. To one, who extolled himſelf for his excellent ſkill in ſwimming; Are not you aſhamed, ſays he, to boaſt of that which every Dolphin can do better? Being aſked what was the difference between a wiſe man and a fool; he replied, Send both of them together naked to thoſe, who are acquainted with neither of them, and then you'll know. To one, who valued himſelf upon his being able to drink a prodigious quantity without being intoxicated; 'Tis no more, ſaid he, than a mule can do. Being reproved for taking money, as he had been the diſciple of Socrates; So much the rather, ſaid he, for Socrates, when they ſent him proviſion and wine, took what he wanted, and returned the reſt; and there was good reaſon for it, becauſe the chiefeſt of the Athenians were his purveyors; but I have none but Eutuchidas, a ſervant, whom I bought. Being reproved by a certain perſon, (who according to Mr. Stanley was Plato,) for his coſtly and voluptuous feaſts; I warrant you, ſaid he, that you would not have beſtowed three farthings upon ſuch a dinner; which the other confeſſing, Why then, ſaid he, I find myſelf leſs indulgent to my palate, than you are to your covetous humour; or, as it is otherwiſe repreſented, I find, that I love my belly, and you love your money. When Simus, Treaſurer to Dionyſius, ſhewed him his houſe magnificently furniſhed, and paved with coſtly marble, for he was a Phrygian, and conſequently profuſe; Ariſtippus ſpit in his face, upon which the other growing angry, Why truly, ſaid he, I could not find a fitter place. Being aſked, how Socrates died? I wiſh, ſaid he, that I may but die in the ſame manner. Polyxenus the Sophiſt coming to his houſe, but ſeeing a company of Ladies richly dreſt, and great preparations for a banquet, began a long diſcourſe againſt luxury; which when Ariſtippus had patiently liſtened to for ſome time, he aſked him to dine with him. Polyxenus agreeing to this, Ariſtippus aſked him, why he had reproved him with ſuch ſeverity; ſince he found, that he did not condemn the feaſt, but the expence of it? His ſervant carrying after him a great weight of money, and being ready to ſink upon the road under his burden, he bid him throw away all what was too much for him to carry. Horace mentions this fact in his third Satyr of the ſecond Book:

Quid ſimile iſti
Græcus Ariſtippus? qui ſervos projicere aurum
In mediâ juſſit Lybiâ, quia tardius irent
Propter onus ſegnes.

Being at Sea, and underſtanding that the owners of the veſſel were Pirates, he took out his money, and after he had told it before their faces, let it drop into the water; and then, as if he had done it againſt his will, fell into a great agony of grief for his loſs. Some report, that he made uſe of theſe expreſſions at the ſame time; It is better, that this ſhould be thrown away by Ariſtippus, than that Ariſtippus ſhould periſh for the ſake of his money. He condemned men for examining the goods, which were brought to market, and yet never making any inſpection into their lives and converſations, or, as Mr. Stanley tranſlates it, taking no care to furniſh their minds. Others aſcribe this to Diogenes. While he lived in Aſia, he was ſeized by Artaphernes, the King's Lieutenant; upon which a perſon coming to him, and aſking him, where his confidence was now? He replied, When had I more occaſion to be confident than now, when I am going to diſcourſe with Artaphernes? With regard to thoſe perſons, who forſook Philoſophy, to apply themſelves to mechanical Sciences, or, as it is render'd in the Engliſh Tranſlation of Diogenes Laertius with leſs propriety, who had a generous education, and neglected the ſtudy of Philoſophy; he compared them to Penelope's Suitors: For tho' they might have the liberty of courting Melantho, Polydora, and the reſt of her Waiting-Gentlewomen, yet they could never hope to marry the Miſtreſs. Ariſto had a ſaying to the ſame purpoſe, who obſerved, that Ulyſſes, when he went to the infernal Regions, ſaw all the dead, and diſcourſed with ſeveral of them, but he was never permitted to ſee the Queen herſelf. Being aſked, what things were moſt proper for children to be inſtructed in? He anſwered, Thoſe, which might prove of the greateſt advantage to them, when they came to be men. Being reproached for going from Socrates to Dionyſius; he replied, That he went to Socrates, when he wanted ſerious inſtructions (παιδεία); and to Dionyſius for diverſion (παιδιά). To a Courtezan, who told him, that ſhe was with child by him, You can no more tell me that, ſays he, than you can ſay, that you are hurt by a particular thorn, when you have paſſed thro' a field of brambles. Having received money of Dionyſius at the ſame time that Plato accepted a Book only, and being reproached for it; The reaſon is plain, ſays he, I want money, and Plato wants books (22). Having loſt a conſiderable farm, he ſaid to one, who ſeemed exceſſively to compaſſionate his loſs, You have but one field; I have three left: why ſhould not I rather grieve for you? Plutarch, who relates this in his Book De Tranquillitate Animi, obſerves upon it, that it is very abſurd to lament for what is loſt, and not to rejoice for what is left. When a perſon told him, That the land for his ſake was loſt; he replied, That it was better ſo, than that he ſhould be loſt for the land (23). Seeing a perſon vent his anger in words, he adviſed him not to ſuit his words to his paſſion, but to appeaſe his paſſion with words (24). Obſerving a little woman extremely beautiful, This, ſays he, is a little evil, but a great beauty (25). Thoſe, who invert theſe words, and read, a little beauty, and a great evil, miſtake the meaning of Ariſtippus, who plays upon this common ſaying. To one, who aſked his advice, whether he ſhould marry or not, he ſaid No, for if you take a beautiful wife, ſhe will be common; if an ugly one, a fury (26). He uſed to adviſe young men to carry ſuch proviſion with them, as in a ſhipwreck they might ſwim away with (27). He obſerved, that as a ſhoe too big is unfit for uſe; ſo is a great eſtate. The largeneſs of the ſhoe is uneaſy to the wearer. Riches may be uſed upon occaſion either wholly or in part (28). Being caſt by ſhipwreck aſhore on the Iſland of Rhodes, and perceiving mathematical lect from his letter to his daughter publiſhed among the Socratic Epiſtles [G]. Beſides Arete his daughter, whom he educated in Philoſophy, he had alſo a ſon, whom he diſinherited for his ſtupidity; and being reproved by his wife on that account, who alledged that he came from himſelf, he ſpitting, replied, This comes from me too, but is not of the leaſt advantage to me (s). Arete had a ſon, who was named Ariſtippus from his grandfather, and had the ſurname of Μητροδίδακτος from his mother's inſtructing him in Philoſophy. Among his auditors, beſides his daughter Arete, we have an account of Æthiops of Ptolemais, and Antipater of Cyrene. Arete communicated the Philoſophy, which ſhe received from her father, to her ſon Ariſtippus, who tranſmitted it to Theodorus the Atheiſt, who inſtituted the Sect called Theodorean. Antipater communicated the Philoſophy of Ariſtippus to Epitimedes his diſciple; Epitimedes to Paræbates; Paræbates to Hegeſias and Anniceris; and theſe two laſt improving it by ſome additions of their own, obtained the honour each of them of giving a name to the Hegeſiac and Annicerian Sect (t). Laertius mentions two other perſons of the name of Ariſtippus; one, who wrote the Hiſtory of Arcadia; the other, a Philoſopher of the new Academy.

. [G] His letter to his daughter Arete publiſhed among the Socratic Epiſtles.] It is the twenty ſeventh in that collection, and was written juſt before his death. It is as follows. I received your letter by Teleus, in which you deſire me to make all poſſible haſte to Cyrene, becauſe your buſineſs with the Magiſtrates is not conducted in a proper manner, and your huſband is unfit to manage your domeſtic affairs, by reaſon of his exceſſive modeſty, and his having been accuſtomed to a retired life. As ſoon therefore as I obtained leave of Dionyſius, I entered upon my voyage towards you; but fell ſick at Lipara, where the friends of Sonicus provide carefully for me, with ſuch humanity, as is proper for a perſon near his death. As for your demand, what regard you ſhould pay to thoſe, whom I manumitted, and who profeſs that they will never deſert Ariſtippus whilſt they have any ſtrength, but ever ſerve him and you, truſt them in all things; for they have learned from me not to be falſe. For your ſelf I adviſe you to apply to the Magiſtrates, which advice will be of advantage to you, if you affect not rather to have much. You will live moſt at eaſe, if you contemn exceſs; for they cannot be ſo unjuſt as to leave you in want. You have two orchards left, ſufficient to maintain you plentifully; and that eſtate in Bernicia, if you had nothing elſe left you, would be enough to ſupport you. I do not adviſe you to neglect ſmall things; but not to be troubled for them, ſince vexation is not good even for great. If when I am dead you want my advice for the education of young Ariſtippus, go to Athens, and above all eſteem Xantippe and Myrto, who have often ſpoken to me to bring you to the Eleuſinian feſtivals. Whilſt you lead this pleaſant life with them, let the Magiſtrates of Cyrene be as unjuſt as they pleaſe; they cannot prejudice you in your natural end (25). Endeavour to live with Xantippe and Mynto, as I did formerly with Socrates, compoſing your ſelf to their converſation; for pride is not proper in that place. If Tyrocles (26), the ſon of Socrates, who lived with me at Megara, come to Cyrene, it will be very proper to ſupply him with what he wants, and to reſpect him as your own ſon. " If you will not nurſe a daughter, " becauſe of the great trouble it may give you, ſend " for the daughter of Eubois, to whom you have formerly expreſſed much kindneſs, and named after " my mother; and I alſo have often called her my " friend. Above all take care of little Ariſtippus, that " he may be worthy of us and of Philoſophy; but for " this I leave him as his true inheritance; the reſt " of his eſtate is ſubject to the enmity of the Magiſtrates " of Cyrene. But you did not write me word, that any " perſon offered to take that away from you. Rejoice, " dear daughter, in the poſſeſſion of thoſe riches, which " are in your power, and make your ſon poſſeſs them " likewiſe. I wiſh he were my ſon; but being diſappointed of that hope, I depart with aſſurance, that " you will lead him in the paths trodden by good " men. Farewell, and grieve not for us." T.

(26) Leo Allatius, as Mr. Stanley obſerves, reads Lamprocles; but this cannot poſſibly be; for Lamprocles was dead long before.

ARISTO, a native of the Iſland of Chios; differed a little from the ſentiments of his maſter Zeno the chief of the Stoicks, as may be ſeen in Moreri's Dictionary, with ſome of his tenets. Not to repeat what is to be found there, I ſhall content my ſelf with obſerving, that the reaſon, why he rejected Logick and Natural Philoſophy, was that he judged that Logick is of no uſe, and that Natural Philoſophy is above the reach of the human mind (a). I add to this, that having at firſt kept to Morality he afterwards retrenched a good deal from it; for he would not have any thing be taught upon the particular duties of the huſband towards his wife, or of the father towards his children, or of the maſter towards his ſervants; and would have reſtrained the maſters to teach only what wiſdom is in general. Seneca juſtly blames him for it [A], and ſhews that particular precepts and ſentences may be of wonderful uſe [B]. Ariſto ſaid that the Nature

[C] Ariſto ſaid that the nature of God was not intelligible; which makes us think that he abſolutely neglected the contemplation of divine things.] For as he abandoned the ſtudy of natural Philoſophy, by reaſon he could come to no certainty in it, ſo for the ſame reaſon it is probable he abandoned that of Theology. Divinarum rerum parum ſtudioſus videtur fuiſſe, cum iſtud ſæpe jactaret, Quæ ſupra nos, nihil ad nos, ut mirum ſit Ariſtonem Theologos inter hic a Velleio aſcribi. i. e. " He ſeems to have been little diſpoſed to the " ſtudy of Divinity, ſeeing this was his favourite " proverb, Thoſe things which are above us, do not " concern us, for which reaſon I wonder that Velleius " ſhould here place Ariſto among the Theologiſts." Theſe are the words of a Jeſuit who commented on Cicero's work de Natura Deorum (6). He very unjuſtly makes it a matter of wonder that Velleius, one of the Interlocutors, has placed Ariſto amongſt the Theologiſts; ſeeing this Philoſopher was no leſs worthy of that place, than the reſt whoſe ſentiments Velleius has given us. See here a ſpecimen of his doctrine. Cujus (Zenonis) diſcipuli Ariſtonis non minus magno in errore ſententia eſt; qui neque formam Dei intelligi poſſe cenſeat, neque in Diis ſenſum eſſe dicat, dubitetque omnino Deus animans necne ſit (7). i. e. " The opinion " of whoſe (Zeno's) ſcholar Ariſto is no leſs erro- " neous; who imagines that neither the form of God " can be known, nor that the Gods have any ſenſe, " nay, even doubts whether God is an animated be- " ing or not." Minucius Felix, ſpeaking of the ſame opinion, has theſe words. Socraticus Xenophon formam Dei veri negat videri poſſe, & ideo quæri non oportere; Ariſto Chius comprehendi omnino non poſſe: uterque majeſtatem Dei intelligendi deſperatione ſenſerunt (8). i. e. " Xenophon the diſciple of Socrates, denies that the " form of the true God can be ſeen, and therefore " that it ought not to be inquired into; Ariſto of " Chios affirms, that it can in no wiſe be com- " prehended: both of them ſhewed a ſenſe of the " majeſty of God, by deſpairing to underſtand it." A certain Commentator has committed here a childiſh miſtake; he is of opinion that the perſon mentioned in Cicero is not the ſame with that ſpoken of in this paſſage of Minucius, ſuppoſing that Minucius ſpeaks of one Ariſtus. Quod Minucius Ariſto Chio, id Cicero de Natura Deorum lib. 1. tribuit Ariſtoni (9). i. e. " That which Minucius fathers upon Ariſtus of Chios, " Cicero in his Book de Natura Deorum lib. 1. fathers " upon Ariſto." Elmenhorſt thro' want of attention, thought that the Ariſto of Minucius was the dative or ablative caſe, whereas it is the nominative: beſides, it is not impoſſible but Father Leſcalopier might aſcribe to Ariſto what is due to Socrates. Celebre hoc proverbium Socrates habuit: " Quod ſupra nos, nihil ad " nos (10)." i. e. " Socrates uſed to urge this fa- " mous proverb, What is above us does not concern us." Thence Lactantius infers that he deſpiſed religion. Ejus viri (Socratis) quoties de cæleſtibus rogabatur nota reſponſio eſt, " Quod ſupra nos, nihil ad nos (11)." i. e. " Every body knows the anſwer that man (Socrates) " uſed to make, when he was aſked any queſtions " concerning heavenly ſubjects, What is above us, does " not concern us." Let it be obſerved, that generally ſpeaking we ought not to ſuſpect thoſe of a neglect of divine ſervice, who look upon the nature of God as inexplicable, ſeeing there are a great many people who make this a reaſon for worſhipping God with more humility and reverence; ſo that this remark upon Ariſto is a perſonal thing, and founded upon its being known beſides, that incomprehenſibility was in him a motive to neglect. I will not take upon me to affirm that he was no obſerver of religion, but only confine my ſelf to the probability of the conjecture; for, with ſubmiſſion to Lactantius, the maxim of Socrates, which I have been ſpeaking of (12), was no inducement to that Philoſopher to neglect the ſtudy of Divinity; his doctrine upon that ſubject was as noble as could be expected from a Heathen (13), and he ſeems to have had no other deſign than that of ſetting bounds to the curioſity of mankind, for reaſons which our moſt pious Doctors have thought fit to make uſe of, as that we ought to reſt ſatisfied with being ignorant of thoſe things which God has thought proper to conceal from us, and that there is danger in deep reſearches. " In a word, he diſapproved of mak- " ing too curious an enquiry into the wonderful art " and contrivance which the Gods had diſplayed " in the ordering of the univerſe &c. (14)." You will find the ſequel of this paſſage in the remark [S], on the article ANAXAGORAS (15), and there you will eaſily ſee, that by the heavenly things which Socrates did not approve the ſtudy of, we are not to underſtand matters of religion but Aſtronomy.

tained againſt Arceſilaus the doctrine of certainty; and one day ſeeing a monſter, which was a bull that had a matrix, he thought his adverſary would draw a good argument from thence in favour of incomprehenſibility. Wretch that I am, cries he, what a ſtrong proof is there in behalf of Arceſilaus (16). From this we may learn that the Dogmatiſts, in order to prove that the nature of animals was clearly known, affirmed, that we may diſtinguiſh with certainty betwixt the male and female of every ſpecies, there being certain diſtinct parts peculiarly adapted to either ſex. If they reaſoned after this manner, it is certain that the bull I have been ſpeaking of, ſerved to refute them, but then we muſt agree that they went upon a very weak argument; for the Scepticks did not deny but that according to appearance there was a diſtinction betwixt the males and females, they only argued that we could not know for certain, whether or no their nature was really ſuch as it appeared to be. Now it is of no weight to urge, in anſwer to this, the exiſtence of this bull. Might not they have replied, We know not whether it has in reality a matrix or not; it may be only an appearance. Ariſto one day ſaid to an Acataleptick, You don't then ſee that rich man who ſits next to you? The other made anſwer, No. Who has put out your eyes then, reply'd Ariſto (17)? This was but a childiſh argument, ſeeing that the dogma of incomprehenſibility does not ſuppoſe that we are deprived of the uſe of ſight; he ſhould have made anſwer to Arceſilaus, The appearance of a rich man ſitting next to me ſtrikes my eye, but yet I am not certain whether this man exiſts or not, or what is his nature. It has been obſerved, that of all the dogma's of the Stoicks, Ariſto chiefly eſpouſed this, The wiſe man is never doubtful. There was a Philoſopher named Perſeus, who in order to confute him on this head, brought him twins, one of whom depoſited ſomething in the hands of Ariſto, and the other demanded it again, and becauſe Ariſto was put to a non-plus, he was ſaid to have been confuted by Perſeus (18). For my part I can't comprehend the meaning of this: were theſe twins ſo extremely alike, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh them, or were they in ſome things unlike as twins generally are? This is what Diogenes Laertius does not obſerve, who is ſometimes ſo inſufferably ſhort, that one might ſay that we have only ſome ill-digeſted extracts of his hiſtory of the Philoſophers. If theſe twins were eaſy to be diſtinguiſhed, whence could ariſe the uncertainty of Ariſto? If it were ſcarce poſſible to diſtinguiſh them, the ſuſpence he was in could not be cenſured or be made uſe of to confute him, for the very act of ſuſpending his judgment was a proof of his regard to that maxim, The wiſe man is never in ſuſpence.

[E] His Sect exiſted but a little time.] Cicero ſpeaks of it as of a Sect whoſe doctrines had diſappeared: Sententiæ.... Ariſtonis, Pyrrhonis, Herilli nonnullorumque aliorum evanuerunt (19). Sive Ariſtotelem & Theophraſtum ... ſequuti ſunt, ſive .... etiam Ariſtonis difficilem atque arduam, ſed jam tamen fractam & convictam Sectam ſequuti ſunt (20). i. e. "The opinions "of Ariſto, Pyrrho, Herillus and ſome others are va"niſhed. Whether, ſays he in another place, they fol"lowed Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, or the hard and "crabbed, tho' now exploded and confuted Sect of A"riſto." Indeed it was a difficult matter for ſentiments ſo extravagant as his were to gain credit; for he allowed no difference in things excepting in vice and virtue: "other things, ſays he, are neither bet"ter or more deſireable the one than the other." His contrarius Ariſto Chius præfractus, ferreus, nihil bonum niſi quod rectum & honeſtum eſt (21). i. e. "Ariſto "of Chios, that crabbed, hard Philoſopher, was of a "different opinion, alledging that nothing was good "but what was right and honeſt." He went farther than his maſter Zeno; who did not deny but that there were ſome things diſtinct from virtue which were deſireable, altho' they did not contribute to the acquiſition of the ſovereign good. This poſition is ſcarce reconcileable to truth, however, it is leſs ſhocking than that of Ariſto; for who can conceive that health ſhould not be more eligible than ſickneſs? Ut Ariſtonis eſſet explosa ſententia dicentis, nihil differre aliud ab alio, nec eſſe res ullas præter virtutes & vitia, inter quas quicquam omnino intereſſet, ſic errare Zenonem, qui nulla in re niſi in virtute aut vitio propenſionem, ne minimi quidem momenti ad ſummum bonum adipiſcendum eſſe diceret. Et quum ad beatam vitam nullum momentum ea res haberet, ad appetitionem autem rerum, eſſe in his momenta diceret: quaſi verò hæc appetitio non ad ſummi boni adeptionem pertineret (22). i. e. "As the opinion "of Ariſto was exploded, who affirmed that there was "no difference betwixt any thing except virtue and "vice; ſo Zeno was alſo in an error, who held that "nothing but virtue and vice had the leaſt relation "towards the attaining the chiefeſt good; and that "altho' other things were not conducive to the happineſs of life, yet theſe were deſireable: as if a "thing's being deſireable did not make it a part of "the chief good." Where is the wonder that this Sect was ſo ſhort liv'd, when Ariſto himſelf fell off from his principles at an age that moſt favoured his maxims, and became a lover of pleaſures in his old age (23), when it moſt ſuited him to be rigid and ſevere, præfractus & ferreus?

Is not this declaring that the doctrine of this Philoſopher never produced this effect but when it was miſunderſtood? He ſhould alſo have added, that every Teacher is therefore obliged to forbear laying down ambiguous maxims, or to prevent falſe gloſſes being put upon them.

[G] They aſcribed to him ſome works which belonged to ARISTO of Cea a Peripatetick Philoſopher.] Diogenes Laertius after having mentioned the titles of ſeveral works of our Ariſto, adds that Panætius and Soſicrates aſcribed them all, except one, to Ariſto the Peripatetick (25). He does not ſay, that this Peripatetick was a native of the Iſland Cea; but I conjecture, that this muſt have been his country, ſince we cannot underſtand this as meant of ARISTO the Alexandrian, another Philoſopher of the Peripatetick Sect, who lived under the reign of Auguſtus, and of whom conſequently Panætius could make no mention; for it may be proved that in the year of Rome 650 he was not living (26). Moreri therefore was miſtaken, when he ſaid that Ariſto of Alexandria is the Author to whom ſeveral Writers aſcribe ſome treatiſes of Ariſto the Chian. This laſt wrote a diſcourſe de Senectute (on old Age), which is not taken notice of by Diogenes Laertius, probably becauſe it made only part of ſome other book. Hunc librum de Senectute ad te miſimus: omnem autem ſermonem tribuimus non Tithono, ut Ariſto Chius, parum enim eſſet auctoritatis in fabula, ſed M. Catoni ſeni, quo majorem auctoritatem haberet ratio (27). i. e. Aldobrandinus quotes this paſſage of Cicero, as if it ought to be read Ariſto Ceus (28), but the beſt editions have it Ariſto Chius. He is therefore in the wrong, to pretend that Ariſto of Cea, the Peripatetick Philoſopher, is the Author of the treatiſe de Senectute: he might with more reaſon have applied to him this other paſſage ſage of Cicero: Hujus (Stratonis) *Lyſias & oratione locuples, rebus ipſis jejunior. Concinnus deinde & elegans hujus Ariſto; ſed ea, quæ deſideratur à magno Philoſopho, gravitas in eo non fuit. This can only be meant of one Ariſto a Peripatetick, and therefore Mr. Menage deſerves cenſure for giving it as his opinion, that it was ſpoken of our Ariſto (30).

[H] See ſome miſtakes of Voſſius.] He ſays, that Ariſto of Alexandria, a Peripatetick, in the time of Auguſtus, is Author of a treatiſe on the Nile (31). His reaſon is, becauſe Strabo obſerves, that he had ſeen in his time two Books upon this River, the one compoſed by Eudorus, and the other by Ariſto the the Peripatetick (32). But, Voſſius goes on, there having been two Ariſto's of the Peripatetick Sect, the one of Alexandria, the other of the Iſland Cea; wherefore do I inſiſt upon its having been that of Alexandria, who compoſed the treatiſe on the Nile? Why, becauſe it is more likely that an Egyptian ſhould write of this River, than an Iſlander of the Ægean Sea. He preſently after confutes this reaſon, for he confeſſes it is probable that either Ariſto of Chios, or that Ariſto of Cea wrote a Book upon the Nile, ſeeing that the Scholiaſt of Apollonius relates the opinion of Ariſto of Chios upon the riſe of this river (33). But he has confounded Chius and Ceus, adds Voſſius. We perceive therefore a manifeſt defect of exactneſs in the argument. But further, this learned man juſtly incurrs cenſure for not having known the true reaſon why the treatiſe of the Nile, referred to by Strabo, ought rather to be aſcribed to Ariſto the Alexandrian, than to Ariſto of the Iſland of Cea. Now the reaſon is this; becauſe Strabo ſpeaks of a book that was publiſhed in his own time: but Ariſto of Cea flouriſhed a long time before Strabo, as Voſſius himſelf allows; for he tells us, as Diogenes Laertius had done before him, that Panætius and Socrates (34) have aſcribed to this Ariſto almoſt all the books which were aſcribed to Ariſto the Stoick. Lloyd and Hoffman have copied this long paſſage of Voſſius word for word, and have not forgot to put Socrates inſtead of Soſicrates.

ARISTO (TITUS) a Roman Lawyer, under the Empire of Trajan, was ſo worthy and ſo learned a man, that he deſerved not to have been forgotten in Moreri. He was a perfect maſter of the Public and Civil Law; of Hiſtory, and Antiquity [A]. If he did not readily anſwer the queſtions that were aſked him, it was becauſe by the ſtrength of his judgment he went to the very ſprings of the reaſons for and againſt, that he might compare them together. He was a man otherwiſe an enemy to luxury, and without any pride, and looked for the recompence of a good action only, in the action it ſelf, and not in the applauſes of the multitude (a). He did not profeſs being a Philoſopher [B], but not any of them, who did profeſs it, ſurpaſſed him in the practice of virtue. He ſhewed an incomparable ſteadineſs of mind during a long illneſs [C], and at laſt he deſired his friends to aſk the Phyſicians if he could recover, and declared to them, that in caſe he was judged incurable, he would kill himſelf; but if he could be well again, [D] Pliny . . . . has a fine reflection upon his greatneſs of ſoul.] "It is a common thing, ſays he, to "be hurried into the arms of death by an impetuoſity of ſpirit; but nothing leſs than a great ſoul, "after having deliberated upon the expediency of "living or dying, weighs exactly the motives on "either ſide, and determines itſelf by the ſtrength "of reaſon, either to keep life or to lay it down." Id ego arduum in primis, & præcipuâ laude dignum puto. Nam impetu quodam & inſtinctu procurrere ad mortem, commune cum multis; deliberare vero, & cauſas ejus expendere, utque ſuaſerit ratio, vitæ mortiſque conſilium ſuſcipere vel ponere, ingentis eſt animi (6).

[E] Pliny expreſſes his friendſhip for Ariſto in terms of the greateſt tenderneſs.] He had a very great deſire of retiring to his country ſeat, and of ſpending his leiſure time there in his ſtudies; but he denied himſelf this pleaſure, becauſe he would not leave Ariſto who had laboured under a tedious indiſpoſition; this melancholy object gave him a thouſand inquietudes, and not only robb'd him of his time, but even of the leaſt inclination of beſtowing any part of it upon his ſtudies. Let us hear him ſpeak himſelf: Diu jam in urbe hæreo, & quidem attonitus. Perturbat me longa & pertinax fortitudo Titi Ariſtonis, quem ſingulariter & miror & diligo (7). i. e. "I have now "lingered a long time in the city, and indeed with "great uneaſineſs of mind; for I am very much af"flicted at the long malignant diſtemper of Titus "Ariſto, for whom I bear a ſingular veneration and "love." Thus he begins his Letter: "The Phyſi"cians, ſays he in the ſequel of it, give us hopes of "his recovery. May God verify their promiſes, and "once deliver me from this uneaſineſs, after which "I will go to my country-ſeat at Laurentum, that is "to my books, my papers, and philoſophical retire"ment; for at preſent I cannot find time to ſit down to "write or read, nor indeed will the anxiety of my mind "permit me. I have given you here my fears, my "wiſhes, and what I deſign hereafter." Et medici quidem ſecunda nobis pollicentur: Supereſt, ut promiſſis Deus adnuat, tandemque me hac ſolicitudine exolvat; qua liberatus Laurentinum meum, hoc eſt libellos & pugillares, ſtudioſumque otium repetam. Nunc enim nihil legere, nihil ſcribere aut aſſidenti vacat, aut anxio libet. Habes quid timeam, quid optem, quid etiam in poſterum deſtinem (8). I have ſet down this paſſage at full length, as well to do honour to Ariſto, as to Pliny the younger; for it gives us the picture of a noble ſoul, and is a proof that virtue has always found a ſanctuary in ſome generous breaſt even in cities that have been moſt corrupted by a long ſeries of proſperity, and that ſucceeded by the continued rage and fury of civil wars, and the government of Tyrants, which may very well be ſaid of Rome at that time.

[F] Some aſſure us that Ariſto lived to an extream old age; but the proof they have of it is very weak.] The proof made uſe of for this purpoſe is, that Ariſto was one of the Council for Caſſius, that is to ſay, Caius Caſſius Longinus, who was Conſul in the reign of Tiberius. Now betwixt Tiberius and Trajan they reckon ſixty years, and it is well known that Ariſto was conſulted by Trajan upon a point of Law. Thus Bertrand (9). But this argument vaniſhes by conſidering that Caſſius lived till the reign of Veſpaſian (10), and that betwixt the beginning of his reign and that of Trajan there intervened but about twenty eight years (11).

See alſo Aulus Gellius, who tells us, that he had read in one of Ariſto's pieces, that all ſorts of theft were allowed of among the ancient Egyptians. Id etiam memini legere me in libro Ariſtonis Juriſconſulti haudquaquam indocti viri, apud veteres Ægyptios, quod genus hominum conſtat & in artibus reperiendis ſolertes extitiſſe, & in cognitione rerum indaganda ſagaces, furta omnia fuiſſe licita & impunita (13). i. e. "I remem"ber alſo myſelf to have read in a book of Ariſto "the Lawyer, a man of no mean learning, that a"mong the ancient Egyptians, (who by all accounts "were a people very ingenious in the invention of "arts, and ſagacious in their ſearches after the nature "of things) all kinds of theft were tolerated with "licence and impunity." Bertrand conjectures, that this was a treatiſe on Theft, becauſe Aulus Gellius quotes it by itſelf, and ſince he was a perſon that knew that Ariſto was Author of ſeveral Books (14).

☞ARISTOMENES, a General of the Meſſenians, eminent for his incomparable valour, conduct and virtue, as well as for the various and aſtoniſhing events of his fortune, was the ſon of Nicomedes and Nicotelea, private perſons of Meſſenia in Peloponneſus [A], but of a family which was royal before the ruin of their country, and the undoubted deſcendents of Hercules (a). Meſſenia had been conquered by the Spartans, and reduced to the loweſt terms of ſlavery under them, when Ariſtomenes reſolved in conjunction with others, who preferred the liberty of their country to all the conſiderations of their own intereſt and ſafety, to reſcue it from this diſtreſs. He procured the aſſiſtance of the Argives and Arcadians (b), and immediately broke out into open hoſtilities againſt the Spartans. He came to an action the firſt year of the war at Deræ, a ſmall Meſſenian village, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to ſuch advantage in the battle, that he was ſaluted King by his little army. But in order to impreſs a ſtronger apprehenſion of his courage upon the enemy, he went himſelf by night to Sparta, and fixed with his own hand a ſhield in the temple of Minerva Chalciæcus, with an inſcription, that Ariſtomenes gave it to the Goddeſs out of the Spartan ſpoils (c). It is uncertain, whether he had any ſhare in another action, which though

[A] Was the ſon of Nicomedes and Nicotolea private perſons of Meſſenia in Peloponneſus.] Mr. Thomas Rowe, the author of The Lives of ſeveral ancient and illuſtrious men omitted by Plutarch, obſerves (1), that tho' the age, in which Ariſtomenes lived, was not much removed from that, which was juſtly called fabulous, and tho' the account which we have of his life, is almoſt entirely owing to his countrymen, yet they have in general paid a ſtrict regard to truth; and in one reſpect particularly their conduct is very extraordinary. They were not at all pleaſed to have it thought, according to the uſual cuſtom, that their deliverer was the ſon of ſome God or Dæmon (2). They diſcouraged a fable of his mother's being honoured with the embraces of a God under the ſhape of a Dragon; and in thoſe religious reſpects, which they paid to his memory, they conſidered him only as the ſon of private Meſſenians. Mr. Rowe remarks very juſtly, that there is a great deal of good ſenſe in this pretended humility. The compliment is ſtronger to their country, nor can it be reaſonably reckoned a reflection on their Hero, that being all mortal, he performed ſuch actions, for which others were generally believed the offspring of Deities.

though admired for the reſolution ſhewn in it, was cenſured as impious [B]. Soon after this, the Lacedæmonians had Tyrtæus a ſchoolmaſter ſent them for their General by the Athenians, who inſpired them by his verſes with an uncommon ardour and courage (d); ſo that the war was now carried on with vigour. The Meſſenians received troops from Argos, Sicyon, Elis and Arcadia, together with ſome of their countrymen, whoſe anceſtors had fled upon the ill ſucceſs of the former war (e). Ariſtomenes engaged the Spartans under Alexander, one of their Kings, at a village called the Monument of the Goat, and defeated them. This victory raiſed his reputation very high [C], and poſſeſſed him with new reſolution, ſo that he attacked Pheræ a town in Laconia, which he plundered. He ſeized likewiſe upon ſome of the nobleſt virgins at Caryæ [D], who were afterwards ranſomed for conſiderable ſums of money. But he met with ill ſucceſs in his attempt upon the Matrons of Sparta, who were ſacrificing to Ceres at Ægila in Laconia [E]. However the Spartans found means to corrupt Ariſtocrates, who was King and General of the Arcadians, and commanded a large body of troops ſent by them to the aid of the Meſſenians. When the two armies were ready to engage, Ariſtocrates took his officers aſide, and with a pretended concern aſſured them, that upon conſulting the entrails, he found the battle would inevitably prove unſucceſsful, and therefore adviſed them to retire without engaging. The Meſſenians adjur'd them by every thing dear and ſacred not to abandon them in ſuch an exigence, but all in vain. Ariſtomenes with his little guard made a noble ſtand, but at laſt the ſuperior force of the enemy obliged him to retreat. This defeat obliged the Meſſenians to abandon Andania and all the inland country, and to retire to Ira,

[B] An action, which, tho' admired for the reſolution ſhewn in it, was cenſured as impious.] Panormus and Gonippus, two young Meſſenians of Andania, the town where the revolt from the Spartans began, and where Ariſtomenes himſelf was born and educated, Men of a vigorous conſtitution, and yet of a beauty uncommon in their ſex, uſed to make excurſions into the Spartan territories. Upon a day ſacred to Caſtor and Pollux, all the Spartan army having performed their ſacrifices to the Gods, were engaged in feaſts and ſports proper to the ſolemnity. The young Meſſenians putting on white coats and purple upper garments, and holding ſpears in their hands, rid on two very fine horſes into the midſt of Sparta. The people of the city received them with adoration as the Deities themſelves, who condeſcended to be preſent at the rites, which they were paying to them. But the young men immediately ſtriking thoſe who ſtood near them, with their lances, ſlew and wounded ſeveral; and having violated the ſacred ſolemnities, before the Spartans were recovered from their ſurprize, broke out from among them, and returned ſafe to Andania (3). Polyænus relates this ſtory in a different manner, and tells us (4), that Ariſtomenes and a friend of his were the perſons, who performed this action; and that having both mounted white horſes, and fixed golden ſtars upon their heads, in the evening they approached the Lacedæmonians and their wives and children, who were engaged in the ſolemnity, in honour of the Dioſcuri, at a little diſtance from the city. They imagining that Caſtor and Pollux had honoured them with their preſence, gave themſelves up with the more freedom to drinking and joy. But Ariſtomenes and his companion diſmounted, and killed ſeveral of them, and immediately made their eſcape on horſeback. But Polyænus is ſuppoſed to be miſtaken in this point, tho' it is not improbable, that Ariſtomenes might have encouraged this deſign. The boldneſs of it, ſays Mr. Rowe, muſt be agreeable to his genius; and the want of reſpect to the Spartan Deities ſhewn in it, perhaps would hardly have been a ſufficient reaſon for his diſapproving it.

[C] This victory raiſed his reputation very high.] It is ſaid, that he purſued the enemy to a wild pear-tree, which grew in the middle of the plain; and that Theoclus, a ſoothſayer, whom he kept always with him, charged him not to proceed any further, becauſe Caſtor and Pollux, guardians of Sparta, their native city, were ſitting on the tree. After this victory, he entered into Andania in a kind of triumph. He was met by the matrons and virgins, who ſtrew'd flowers where he was to paſs, and ſung to his glory the following verſes:

O'er Stonyclerus' glorious plain,
Strew'd over with the mighty ſlain,
To the tall hill, that crown'd with wood,
High to the ſkies erects its head,
Great Ariſtomenes purſu'd;
The trembling Spartans round him fled (5).

Tyrtæus, the General of the Spartans, on the other hand had occaſion for all his Poetry to keep them from deſpairing. He was obliged to make new elogies, which at laſt had their uſual ſucceſs. And to ſhew that he could do other things beſides making verſes, he ſupplied the loſs of his troops by liſting ſome of the Helotæ, making them citizens of Sparta, and promiſing them that they ſhould marry the widows of thoſe, who periſhed in the battle. Qui tribus præliis fuſos eo uſque deſperationis Spartanos adduxit, ut ad ſupplementum exercitus ſervos ſuos manumitterent, hiſque interfectorum matrimonia pollicerentur, ut non numero tantum amiſſorum civium, ſed & dignitati ſuccederent (6).

(6) Juſtin. lib. 3. cap. 5.

[D] He ſeized likewiſe upon ſome of the nobleſt virgins at Caryæ.] He deſigned to have attacked Sparta it ſelf; but it is ſaid, that a viſion of Helena and the Dioſcuri deterred him from that enterprize. He then undertook one of greater conſequence than hazard. He ſeized on ſome of the richeſt and nobleſt virgins of Caryæ, while they were performing ſome religious ſolemnities to Diana. As he carried them off, he was obliged to reſt one night in a Meſſenian village. While he was aſleep ſome of his young men, heated with wine, attempted the chaſtity of the virgins. Ariſtomenes awakened by the noiſe and confuſion came among them immediately; but neither his preſence, nor all the perſuaſions, which he could make uſe of, were ſo powerful as the luſt, which urged them to theſe extravagancies. He was enraged at this, and killing ſome of the moſt furious with his own hand, put a ſtop to the madneſs of the reſt, and brought all the women ſafe to Andania; who were afterwards redeemed (7).

(7) Pauſan. Meſſen. and Rowe, pag. 80.

[E] Met with ill ſucceſs in his attempt upon the matrons of Sparta, who were ſacrificing to Ceres at Ægila in Laconia.] The Temple of that Goddeſs at Ægila was of great antiquity, and much reſorted to. Some matrons were ſacrificing there to Ceres on a ſolemn occaſion, when Ariſtomenes, who had been informed of their meeting, came upon them of a ſudden. The matrons invoking the Goddeſs to their aſſiſtance, took the weapons which they uſed for their ſacrifice, and the ſpits on which the victims were roaſted, and with them made ſo vigorous a defence, that they wounded ſeveral of the Meſſenians, and forced the reſt to retire. Ariſtomenes himſelf being wounded and beat down with their torches was taken priſoner. The liberties of Meſſenia had been loſt with his life, if the Prieſteſs Archidamia had not had more tenderneſs for him than her companions. It is ſaid, that love enter'd into her compaſſion. She freed him that very night, pretending to the other Ladies, that he had unbound himſelf, by burning the cords which he was tied with, and after that eaſily found a way for his eſcape (8). The ſtory was believed, and Pliny tells us, that he eſcaped in that manner. Iterum captus, ſopitis cuſtodibus ſomno, ad ignem advolutus lora cum corpore exuſſit (9). Polyænus likewiſe in the ſecond Book of his Stratagems (10) affirms the ſame.

Ira, a caſtle of great ſtrength, which the Spartans beſieged for above eleven years together. Ariſtomenes with a body of three hundred men ravaged all the country, as well his own as that of Sparta (f). But he was ſurprized in one of his excurſions, and carried priſoner to Sparta [F], from whence he eſcaped by the moſt aſtoniſhing accident imaginable [G]. Soon after this he attacked the forces of the Corinthians, which they had ſent to aſſiſt the Spartans in the ſiege of Ira, and deſtroyed the greateſt part of them (g). He then offered to Jupiter Ithomates ſacrifices called Hecatomphonia [H], becauſe no perſon had a right to offer them till after he had ſlain an hundred of his country's enemies with his own hand. The Spartans being engaged in the celebration of ſome religious rites, made a truce with the Meſſenians for thirty days. But during this time ſome archers, auxiliaries from Crete, continued their incurſions into the country of the Meſſenians. Ariſtomenes walking out alone upon the ſecurity of the truce, was on a ſudden ſeized and bound by ſeven of them. But he eſcaped from them in a very unexpected manner by means of a young maid, who delivered him in conſequence of a dream, which ſhe had the night before [I].

(g) Idem, cap. 19.

[F] Surprized in one of his excurſions, and carried priſoner to Sparta.] He drew out his troops one evening, and by haſty marches reached Amyclæ before the break of day. He ſurpriſed the town, plundered it, and returned home with his prey before the Spartans, who were ſent in purſuit of him, could overtake him. But he continued theſe excurſions too long to be able to practiſe them always with the like ſucceſs. In one of them he fell into a body of troops, that lay in ambuſh. It was above half the Lacedæmonian army, and commanded by both the Kings. Notwithſtanding the ſurprize, and the prodigious diſparity between them, he made a brave defence, and was very near forcing his way thro' them, when, after having received ſeveral other wounds, he was knocked down with a ſtone. Before he recovered his ſenſes, the Spartans ruſhed in upon him and took him priſoner. Fifty of his band were taken with him, and they were carried to Sparta, where they were doomed to death (11).

(11) Pauſan. Meſſen. and Rowe pag. 84.

[G] From whence he eſcaped by the moſt aſtoniſhing accident imaginable.] After ſome deliberation, it was reſolved, that he and the fifty men, who were taken with him, ſhould be thrown into Ceada, which was the name of a Cave, into which ſuch criminals, as were condemned to death for crimes of the blackeſt nature, uſed to be thrown. This puniſhment reſembled that of the Tarpeian rock among the Romans. The other Meſſenians were daſhed to pieces, or at leaſt deſtroyed by the fall; and nothing leſs than a miracle could preſerve Ariſtomenes from ſharing the ſame fate. Some Authors have reported (12), that an Eagle receiving his body, bore it gently down on its wings. Others, as particularly Polyænus (13), tell us, that he was thrown down armed, his companions being all diſarmed; and that his ſhield gathered air, and made the fall ſlow and gentle. This is ſuppoſed to have given occaſion for the former ſtory, becauſe it is certain that this ſhield had an Eagle engraven on it (14). But whatever broke his fall, it is agreed he came to the bottom without receiving any injury. He lay among the dead bodies of his companions, wrapping himſelf up in his garments, and waiting for death with all the conſtancy of an Hero. The third night of his being there, he heard a noiſe, and looking out, ſaw by the glimmering light a fox coming to the carcaſſes. He waited till it was within his reach, and then haſtily ſeized upon it. He kept his hold with one hand, and with the other held his cloak to its mouth, whenever it attempted to bite him. He ran after it where the way was broad enough; and where it was too narrow, he let the beaſt drag him after it. He came at laſt ſo far, that the paſſage was only large enough for the fox; and finding by the light coming in, that he was not far from an open place, he ventured to let his guide go, and making way for himſelf with his hands, got out of his dungeon, and quickly came ſafe to Ira, where the Meſſenians received him with inexpreſſible tranſports of joy (15). Pliny relates the ſtory in the following manner; that Ariſtomenes having been wounded and taken priſoner, made his eſcape out of a cave, into which he was thrown, by following the narrow paſſages which the fox had made in the earth. Ipſe convulneratus & captus ſemel per cavernam latomiarum evaſit, anguſtos vulpium aditus ſecutus (16). Polyænus in the paſſage quoted above, places this eſcape of Ariſtomenes after his offering the ſacrifice called Hecatomphonia three times on account of his victories over the Lacedæmonians; and tells us, that when he was caſt down into the cavern, he did not reſign himſelf up to deſpair, but ſearched all about for a paſſage in order to eſcape, which he diſcovered by means of a fox, which came in thro' it. Upon this he took one of the bones of the dead bodies, and caught hold of the tail of the fox; and notwithſtanding the beaſt bit him, he followed it, and opened a way with the bone till he got out. He went immediately to the Meſſenians, who were juſt going out to battle, and put himſelf at the head of their Phalanx. The Lacedæmonians ſeeing Ariſtomenes in arms, whom they imagined to have been deſtroyed by being thrown down the precipice, which no perſon had ever eſcaped with life, immediately betook themſelves to flight, preſuming, that he was of a rank ſuperior to human nature.

(16) Plin. ubi ſupra.

[H] He then offered to Jupiter Ithomates ſacrifices called Hecatomphonia.] Pliny tells us (17), that he had killed three hundred Lacedæmonians with his own hand; and we are informed, that he made theſe oblations three different times. The firſt after the battle at the Monument of the Goat; the ſecond after this defeat of the Corinthians; and the third after ſeveral excurſions, which he made with great ſucceſs. Plutarch in his Life of Romulus, after having oppoſed the Roman Authors, who to heighten the glory of that Prince, tell us, that in an engagement, wherein fourteen thouſand of the Veientes periſhed, he killed himſelf above half that number, obſerves, that the Meſſenians are a little extravagant likewiſe in reporting, that their General Ariſtomenes killed three hundred Lacedæmonians with his own hand at three different times; upon which account he thrice offered up a man as a victim. Xylander's tranſlation of this paſſage of Plutarch is as follows: Sed quod nonnulli aiunt quatuordecim millibus Veientium cæſis, amplius dimidiâ parte eorum Romuli manibus interfectos fuiſſe, id planè fabuloſum omninoque incredibile eſt; quando & Meſſenios inflatiùs Ariſtomenem ſuum prædicare arbitrantur, qui TER HOMINEM IMMOLAVERIT (quæ Hecatomphonia vocantur,) quod tertium centum de Lacedæmoniis hoſtibus viros in pugnâ interfeciſſet. This verſion of Plutarch is a juſt repreſentation of the Author's ſenſe, who only tells us, that Ariſtomenes thrice offered up a ſingle man as a victim. But the Engliſh tranſlation of that paſſage is undoubtedly wrong, where it informs us, that he offered three hundred victims for as many Lacedæmonians whom he himſelf ſlew (18). Mr. Rowe (19) is not convinced of the juſtice of Plutarch's remark, with regard to the falſity of Ariſtomenes's having killed three hundred men. He obſerves, that the glory of Romulus is compleatly fabulous; but he cannot ſee the leaſt reſemblance between it and the account, which the Meſſenians give of their Hero. That a man of Ariſtomenes's valour and boldneſs ſhould in a war of near twenty years, full of actions, kill himſelf three hundred enemies, has nothing that ſeems to carry an air of improbability in it. A man, that doubts of ſuch facts as theſe, muſt believe little certain in Hiſtory. It may be ſaid too, that Ariſtomenes's offering ſuch ſacrifices, as intimated that he had killed three hundred Spartans, tho' he really had not compleated that number, might be the action of a good Politician and prudent General, to ſtrike a terror upon his enemies, and raiſe the courage of his own men, in a war ſo very unequal. But as the thing before [I]. Ira had now been eleven years beſieged; and Ariſtomenes having with Theoclus before conſulted the Oracle at Delphi about the fate of their country, and received an obſcure anſwer, was alarmed by an accidental obſervation, which was conſidered as the accompliſhment of that prediction [K], and prepared for a fate, which ſeemed to him inevitable [L]. The Meſſenians were not very cloſely beſieged in Ira, and appeared to be in little danger from the Spartans, when the city was ſurprized by the enemy by means of an intrigue, which one of the Citizen's wives had with one of the Spartan ſervants [M]. Ariſtomenes with his troops fought his way through them, and took refuge among the Arcadians. He reſolved with five hundred choſen men to attack Sparta itſelf; but is not incredible, we are not obliged to ſuppoſe ſuch artifices. Clemens Alexandrinus has improved this ſtory into the ſacrificing of three hundred Spartans by Ariſtomenes; one of whom was Theopompus, King of Sparta, a Prince, who, unluckily for that Author, was dead before Ariſtomenes was born. This Romance is faithfully copied by Euſebius and other Apologiſts for Chriſtianity, antient and modern (20).

[I] By means of a young maid, who delivered him in conſequence of a dream, which ſhe had the night before.] When he was ſeized, the Cretans diſpatched two of their number to Sparta with the good news; the reſt carried him to a Meſſenian cottage; for it was almoſt evening when they took him, and they were not near enough to the territories of Sparta to reach them that night. The cottage was inhabited only by an old widow and her daughter. The young maid had dreamt the night before, that ſome wolves had brought into the houſe a lion bound, with his nails pluck'd off; that ſhe had unbound the lion, and given him nails, which he immediately employed to tear his keepers to pieces. She recollected the dream upon Ariſtomenes's being brought in, and as ſoon as ſhe heard his name, did not doubt of its being prophetical, and reſolved to do all that ſhe could in order to the fulfilling of it. She plied the Cretans largely with drink, till they fell faſt aſleep; then taking the ſword of one, that ſeemed to ſleep ſoundeſt, ſhe cut Ariſtomenes's bonds, and gave him the ſword, with which he immediately ſtabbed the wretches that ſeized him. The maid he took with him to Ira, and married her to his ſon Gorgus, a young man about eighteen years of age (21).

(21) Pauſan. Meſſen. and Rowe, pag. 88, 89.

[K] Alarmed by an accidental obſervation, which was conſidered as the accompliſhment of that prediction.] The anſwer, which the Oracle had given them, was as follows:

Ἕς τι τράγος πίηται Νέδης ἁλικοῤῥόου ὕδατι,
Οὐκ ἔτι Μεσσήνη ῥῶμα· σχεδόθεν γὰρ ὄλεθρος.

That is,

" Of thy Meſſenia conſtant care
" The Gods ſhall take, till at the brink
" Of Neda's ſtream a goat ſhall drink;
" Thence date her ruin and deſpair.

The river Neda has its ſprings in Mount Lycæus; it runs thro' Arcadia, then turning back towards Meſſenia divides it from Elis. The Meſſenians took a great deal of care to prevent goats from drinking at the river. But about this time Theoclus the Soothſayer walking by the river-ſide, ſaw a wild fig-tree, which inſtead of growing upwards bent to the water, and juſt touched it with ſome branches. That tree the people of the country called τράγος, and as that was the word made uſe of by the Oracle, Theoclus began to think, that the prediction was now fulfilled, and the ruin of Meſſenia very near. He carried Ariſtomenes to the place, and acquainted him with his opinions. The General entered into his ſentiments, and from that time waited for their impending ruin (22).

(22) Pauſan. Meſſen. cap. 20. and Rowe, pag. 89, 90.

[L] Prepared for a fate which ſeemed to him inevitable.] The Meſſenians had ſome ſacred myſtical pledges delivered down to them from a very remote antiquity, on the preſervation of which their country's final ruin or ſafety was believed to depend. If theſe were loſt, they were to be deſtroyed without any hopes of recovery; if preſerved, however low they might be reduced, they ſhould certainly flouriſh out of their ruins. Ariſtomenes took theſe one night, and going to Ithome, a city, once the capital of the Meſſenians, but ruined in the firſt Spartan war, buried them in the moſt deſolate place, which he could find there, and invoking Jupiter Ithomates and all the Meſſenian Deities, ſolemnly committed to their truſt the laſt hopes of his ſinking countrey (23).

[M] The city was ſurprized by the enemy by means of an intrigue, which one of the citizen's wives had with one of the Spartan ſervants.] The Meſſenians were ſtill maſters of the valley between the foot of the mountain and the river Neda, and ſeveral of them lived in houſes without the walls of the city. A ſervant of Emperamus, a noble Spartan, who uſed to water his maſter's herds at the river, ſaw and lik'd the wife of a Meſſenian, who lived without the walls, as ſhe came to fetch water over-againſt him. He entered into a familiar converſation with her, and uſed his opportunities ſo well, that at laſt he engaged her to admit his viſits on ſuch nights, as her huſband watched; for all the citizens took their turns in guarding the caſtle, where there was ſome danger of a ſurprize from the enemy. The fortifications had been built up haſtily, and there was no guard-houſe, nor indeed ſhelter for thoſe, that were upon the ground. One night there aroſe a great ſtorm and ſhower of rain, and the General's abſence made the guard negligent in performing their duty. Ariſtomenes had made an agreement with a Cephallenian Merchant, his friend, to furniſh the Meſſenians with ſome corn and other proviſions. The man coming to Ira fell into the hands of the Lacedæmonians, and Ariſtomenes being informed of his misfortune, attacked the party, that had made him priſoner, freed him, and carried him with all the proviſions, which he was bringing with him, ſafe to Ira; but he was himſelf wounded in the action. His wound confined him to his houſe, and prevented his walking the rounds, as he generally did every night. The Centinels ſecure on this account forſook their poſts, and retired every one to his own houſe. The huſband, whoſe wife had the intrigue with the Spartan, was one of them that night, and the Gallant as uſual ſupplied his abſence. The wife was ſurprized at his return, but found time to hide her adulterer, and then received her huſband with a well diſſembled tenderneſs, and expreſſed her wonder what happy accident had brought him home ſo much ſooner than ſhe expected. He told her the whole ſtory, and as ſoon as ever the Spartan heard, that the caſtle was left unguarded, he made all haſte he could to the camp before the town, which in the abſence of both the Kings was at that time commanded by his maſter. He acquainted him with the negligence of the beſieged, and convinced him how imprudent it would be to neglect an opportunity that might never offer itſelf again. The darkneſs of the night, and the terrible ſtorm that ſtill continued, favoured the Spartans ſo much, that with ſcaling ladders they were got within the caſtle, without meeting any oppoſition from the Meſſenians. Gorgus the ſon of Ariſtomenes was the firſt man, who perceived, that they were in the town. His father, wounded as he was, came out, and endeavoured to encourage the citizens. They were ſo confounded, that there was not any poſſibility of forming them into any conſiderable body. He went about all night with a little troop, which he had collected out of the ſtraglers to call up ſuch from their houſes as were yet ignorant of the confuſion. But it was in vain to attempt any thing, ſince his orders could not be heard nor obeyed. As ſoon as they had lighted any torches, the wind and rain immediately extinguiſhed them. The Spartans on their ſide thought it was ſufficient, if they could maintain the poſts they were in till the morning. When it was day, Ariſtomenes preſſed his ſoldiers to make their laſt

but his design was prevented by the treachery of Aristocrates, who was punished with death [N]. The inhabitants of Pylus and Mothone, and some other sea-port towns of Messenia, upon the taking of Ira, sailed to Cyllene, a port of Elis, from whence they sent to Aristomenes, and the other Messenians in Arcadia, to assist them in their design of seeking out some new country. He informed them, that he determined to spend the remainder of his life in disturbing the tyrants of his country, but gave them Mantiolus, the son of Theoclus, and Gorgus his own son to be their Generals. About the same time his brother-in-law Euergetidas joined him, and having learned with a great deal of regret that Aristomenes's design upon Sparta, had been prevented by treachery, he took fifty Messenians, and attacked the Spartans, who were still employed in plundering Ira; and after a prodigious slaughter fell himself with his companions. The rest of the Messenians went to their countrymen at Cyllene (b). While they were doubtful what course to steer, Anaxilas, Monarch of Rhegium, whose ancestors were Messenians, desired their assistance in the war which he was engaged in against the Zanclæi, a people of Sicily, and promised them whatever they should gain from the Zanclæi. This they immediately agreed to, and executed it with great success [O]. Aristomenes, after the departure of his countrymen, efforts for their country, and yet force the enemy out of the town. They were moved with what he said, and despair itself encreasing their courage, they prepared to attack the Spartans. The women got to the tops of the houses to throw down tiles and stones on the enemy; but the violence of the storm was so great, that they could not stand against it themselves. They came down, they took arms, and encouraged the men, as well by their example as by words. But the storm increasing and becoming yet more dreadful by the day, all their attempts were ineffectual. The rain was accompanied with peals of thunder, and the lightning flashed directly in the Messenians faces. The Spartans took new courage from its thundering on their right hand; they were besides that much more numerous; yet they thought it greater prudence to weary out the enemy, than to attack them. They rested by turns, and had fresh supplies from their camp continually; while the Messenians had neither repose nor refreshment. They were half dead with cold, hunger, and thirst; and the women, who were still in arms, could not possibly bear up any longer. They had held out thus till the third day, when Theoclus took Aristomenes aside, and said to him, To what purpose are all these pains? You see the fate of your country; and it were a sort of impiety to oppose the Decrees of Heaven any longer. For me I am resolved to give up a life, which is no longer necessary nor useful to Messenia. Be it your care to preserve yours for her. Watch over your country's ruins; and while you live, let not Sparta have a sure and easy conquest. Having said this he rushed headlong with a few followers upon the enemy, and after a great slaughter fell himself. Aristomenes putting the women and children in the middle of his troops, giving his son Gorgus the rear, and leading the body himself, forced a passage out of the town. The Lacedæmonians readily made a way for him, and thought it safer to make a bridge for an enemy, than by too obstinate a resistance to provoke him to attempts, that might yet prove fatal to them (24).

(24) Paus. Messen. cap. 22. and Rowe, pag. 91-95.

[N] His design was prevented by the treachery of Aristocrates, who was punished with death.] This King had before given an instance of his treachery towards the Messenians; for when the Arcadians heard of the taking of Ira, they enjoyned him to lead them against the Spartans, that they might prevent the ruin of their confederates, or share themselves in it. But Aristocrates, who was still in the interest of Sparta, instead of bringing any forces to the assistance of the Messenians, assured his countrymen, that they had no friends to succour, all of them having perished with the town. They were soon after better informed, and sending their principal Nobility before, they went out themselves in a large body to meet the exiles at Mount Lycæus. They received them with the utmost hospitality (25). They offered to distribute them all among their cities, and to give them some part of the country (26); and they actually gave their daughters in marriage to some young Messenians, that were unmarried. Aristomenes, who could not sit tamely, and see his country ruined, chose out of all his army five hundred men, whom he knew to be of a valour proper for desperate actions. He then assembled the Arcadians with their King, whom he had not all this while suspected of any other crime but cowardice, and laid before them the design, which he had projected. It was this, that while the Spartans were busied in their new conquest, and all taken up in plundering Ira, he intended to march in the evening, and attack Sparta itself. Three hundred Arcadians voluntarily offered their assistance in this design. But the sacrifices not promising a favourable success in the enterprize, it was delayed till the next day, and by that time Aristocrates had discovered it to the Spartans. The servant, whom he sent to Anaxander, in his return fell into the hands of the Arcadians, who began to entertain some suspicions of their King. They searched him, and found upon him a letter of Anaxander's, which was examined in an Assembly of the Nation. The Spartan King had in that letter made a grateful mention of the ancient services of the Arcadian, and assured him that he might depend on suitable returns for all his merits. The importance of the last discovery was at large insisted upon, and the treachery of the unhappy Prince exposed in the clearest terms. The justice of the Arcadians was very expeditious. Without much deliberation they resolved to stone the King, and desired the Messenians to assist them in the execution. They look'd upon Aristomenes, as expecting orders from him. He turned his eyes on the ground, and burst out into tears. The Arcadians then were the executioners of their own sentence; and after the King was dead, and thrown out of their territories unburied, they erected a pillar in the temple of Jupiter Lycæus, with this inscription (27):

Plutarch in his Book De serâ Numinis vindictâ relates this story in a different manner, and only tells us, that Aristocrates having betrayed the Messenians in the Cyprian War, tho' he was not detected for above twenty years after, and was King of the Arcadians, yet had at last his guilt discovered, and was capitally punished for it. Such, says Mr. Rowe (28), was the end of Aristocrates, and such the principles of a generous race, undebauched by slavish Sophistry, and justly ignorant of any power that was not guided by the Laws, and accountable to them. However, if what Polybius relates be true, that they put all Aristocrates's family to death with him, their vengeance perhaps was a little too severe.

[O] This they immediately agreed to, and executed with great success.] They sailed to Rhegium, took Anaxilas and his forces on board, and landed them in Sicily;

trymen, married his ſiſter and two of his daughters to the moſt eminent men of the country, where he ſtaid, and his third daughter to Demagetus King of Jalyſus, a city in Rhodes [P], which induced him to remove thither. He reſolved upon a voyage to Sardis, the capital of Lydia, and intended to have travelled from thence to Ecbatana to the court of Phraortes King of Medea. But his death prevented this deſign [Q]. His character in moſt reſpects was very great and valuable [R]; and his conduct was of ſuch importance to the Meſſenians, that his death was the only ſecurity of the Lacedæmonians conqueſt. At laſt Epaminondas recalled the exiles from all parts, and built a city for them, which he called Meſſene. Ariſtomenes's bones were by an order of the Oracle returned to his country, and buried in the new city. The Meſſenians ſacrificed a bull to him, which they bound to a pillar, and if the beaſt ſtruggled ſo as to move the pillar, the omen was eſteemed propitious; but if the pillar remained unmoved, it was conſidered as a ſign of ſome approaching calamity (i).

Sicily; where he fought the Zanclæi by land, while the Meſſenians engaged their fleet. The Zanclæi were defeated in both the battles, and were immediately beſieged in their city both by ſea and land. After a ſhort ſiege, a great part of their walls being battered down, they fled to the Temples and Altars, and ſat as ſuppliants there. Anaxilas was for putting ſome of them to the ſword, and ſelling the reſt with their wives and children; but the Meſſenian Generals oppoſed his barbarity. They promiſed a compleat pardon to all; they entered into a treaty with them, and permitted all that pleaſed, to remain in the city under their Government. They altered the name of the city, and called it Meſſene, in remembrance of their own country (29).

[P] Married . . . . his third daughter to Demagetus King of Jalyſus, a city in Rhodes.] This King had conſulted in perſon the Oracle of Delphi about the choice of a wife. The Prieſteſs ordered him to marry the daughter of the moſt valiant man of Greece. Ariſtomenes was at that time at Delphi about his own private affairs; and the Rhodian Prince having heard of his character was eaſily ſatisfied that he had no occaſion to ſeek any farther. He aſked his daughter of him, and upon his conſent took her and his father-in-law with him to Rhodes (30).

(30) Pauſan. Meſſen. cap. 24. and Rowe, pag. 100, 101.

[Q] Death prevented his deſign.] Mr. Rowe is of opinion, that it is moſt probable, that he died of ſickneſs. But Pliny tells us (31), that after having ſeveral times eſcaped the Lacedæmonians hands miraculouſly, he was at laſt taken by them, and put to death; that he was then cut open, and his heart found all over hairy. Tertio capto Lacedæmonii pectus diſſecuere cauſa videndi (or as other copies read it, diſſecuere viventi), that is, cut him open alive,) hirſutumque cor repertum eſt. Valerius Maximus aſſerts (32), that the Athenians having cut out his heart, out of curioſity to ſee of what kind it was, ſince he was ſo remarkable for his craftineſs, having ſeveral times eſcaped them, they found it hairy. Oculis ejus admirabilius Ariſtomenis Meſſenii cor; quod Athenienſes ob eximiam calliditatem exutum, pilis refertum invenerunt; cum eum aliquoties captum, & aſtutiâ elapſum, cepiſſent. It is evident here, that Valerius Maximus has miſtaken the Athenians for the Lacedæmonians, ſince we do not find that Ariſtomenes was ever engaged in a war, or taken by the Athenians. Stephanus Byzantinus likewiſe in his Book de Urbibus (33) relates the ſame ſtory of Ariſtomenes's being taken by the Lacedæmonians during the Meſſenian war, and that when his heart was taken out, to ſee whether there was any thing peculiar in it, it was found hairy. But tho' we cannot, as Mr. Rowe obſerves (34), give an account of the firſt Authors of this ſtory, we have a great deal of reaſon to diſbelieve it. Thoſe Writers, that have been moſt accurate in their relations of the Meſſenian Wars and Life of Ariſtomenes, make no mention of it. Thoſe, that do, are of a much inferior reputation; they commit intolerable errors in what they ſay, and ſeem to have been induced to relate it by the ſtrangeneſs of it, without giving themſelves any pains to examine into its truth. The quoting of the authority of ſome Writers for the proof of this ſtory, in whoſe works we have good aſſurance that it never was told, would make us even apt to ſuſpect, that ſome of thoſe, in whom we find it, were ſenſible themſelves that they were relating a fable. Thus Stephanus, for inſtance quotes Herodotus, who never names Ariſtomenes; together with Plutarch, in whoſe works there is no account of this ſtory; and Rhianus, whom Pauſanias expreſly follows, but without hinting at this ſtory. Ariſtomenes was the Hero of Rhianus's Poem, and it is highly incredible that he ſhould bring him to ſuch a wretched end (35).

[R] His character in moſt reſpects was very great and valuable.] He was a man, ſays Mr. Rowe (36), of the greateſt perſonal valour, of a body and mind well match'd, fit to contrive and execute the moſt arduous enterprizes, and bear the greateſt fatigues. He was bold and daring, perhaps to a fault; but the prodigious inequality of the war that he was engaged in, made the boldeſt of attempts excuſeable. This muſt defend his expoſing ſo much and ſo often a life, on which ſo much depended. This alone muſt be the apology for the meanneſs of his making war with women, and plundering the country, which he was reduced to do for ſeveral years. He does not ſeem to have been very religious; and tho' we ſhould free him from any concern in aſſuming the form of Caſtor and Pollux, his attacking Prieſteſſes and Matrons, engaged in the ſervice of the Deities, has ſomething of an air of impiety. His generous love for Meſſenia and liberty, which was the conſtant motive of his actions, which never abandoned him to his laſt moments, ſhould cover his failings. And upon the whole, if the repreſentations we have of him, and the account of his actions, are not extremely flattered, we may ſay, that if there were many of the ancient Heroes more ſucceſsful in their wars, there were few that deſerved ſucceſs more. If others have attempted the deliverance of their countries with better fortune, hardly any ſtruggled thro' ſo many difficulties, or fell more greatly. T.

☞ARISTOPHANES, the celebrated Comic Poet, was a citizen of Athens, of the town which was called Cydathenæum, and of the Tribe Pandionis (a). His father's name was Philip (b). The diſtinguiſhed merit of our Poet excited ſo much envy againſt him, that his right of being a citizen of Athens was conteſted, and his enemies endeavoured to repreſent him as a ſtranger [A]. But he effectually confuted this ſuggeſtion, and

[A] His right of being a citizen of Athens was conteſted, and his enemies endeavoured to repreſent him as a ſtranger.] He did not make uſe of his eloquence to anſwer his enemies, but only repeated the two verſes of Telemachus in the Odyſſey;

Μήτηρ μὲν τ' ἐμὲ φησὶ τῦ ἔμμεναι, αὐτὰρ ἔγωγε
Οὐκ οἶδ', ὃ γὰρ δὴ τις ἑὸν γόνον ἄυτὸς ἀνίγνω.

That is,

The occaſion of this charge againſt him, was, that he had an eſtate at Ægina, as he intimates in his comedy of the Acharnenſes, where he ſays to the Athenians;

and ſurmounted the calumnies of his enemies. We cannot be in the leaſt uncertainty concerning the time when he flouriſhed, ſince he was contemporary with Plato, Socrates, Euripides, and the Generals Lamachus and Demoſthenes, and moſt of his plays were written during the Peloponneſian war. He expoſed the deſigns of the Magiſtrates and Generals of the Athenians with a great deal of wit and ſeverity upon the Theatre; and at the ſame time took care to defend the Commonwealth againſt its enemies abroad. Lacedæmon and other cities, which were jealous of the grandeur of Athens, experienced very frequently that Ariſtophanes alone was worth an army to that city, and that it was impoſſible to ſucceed while they followed the advice of this Poet, who had made the ſtage a kind of ſchool for the Art of War, and all other virtues, which can render a city formidable to its enemies [B]. In ſhort, as Mr. Rymer in his Short View of Tragedy (c), tells us, this Author appears in his function a man of wonderful zeal for virtue and the good of his country, and laid about him with an undaunted reſolution, as it were ſome Chriſtian Martyr, for his faith and religion. "He plainly run a muck, as that Critic "expreſſes himſelf, at all manner of vice, wherever he ſaw it, be it in the greateſt Philo- "ſophers, the greateſt Poets, the Generals, or the Miniſters of State." This greatneſs of mind in our Poet raiſed him ſo noble a character, and ſpread his fame ſo far, that Lilius Giraldus tells us, that the Great King, or King of Perſia coming to Greece, and deſiring to ſee every thing remarkable at Athens, aſked where the Comic Poet was. But Madam nians; the Lacedemonians demand of you the iſland of Ægina, not becauſe they have any great regard for it, but becauſe they want to revenge themſelves upon me, and deprive me of my eſtate. This probably gave occaſion to his enemies to repreſent him as a native of Ægina. Thoſe, who have affirmed him to be an Egyptian, Rhodian, Melian (1), or Lindian (2), had no foundation for their aſſertions. A man of his temper could not fail of procuring himſelf enemies in the commonwealth. He had a lively and warm diſpoſition, and his genius particularly carried him to raillery; and as he had a great deal of ſpirit and reſolution, and was a declared enemy to ſlavery and to all thoſe who wanted to oppreſs their country, he found ſufficient matter to exert his talents upon, and to ſhew the ſtrong love, which he had for liberty. The Athenians ſuffered themſelves at that time to be governed by men, who had no other views than to make themſelves maſters of the commonwealth. Ariſtophanes, who was too ſagacious not to perceive their deſigns, was the only man who ventured to oppoſe them, and went upon the ſtage in perſon, where he diſcovered to his countrymen the pernicious practices of their Generals and chief Magiſtrates. He ſhewed them the proper methods to prevent theſe attempts, and preſerved them by that means from the greateſt misfortunes imaginable. Cleo was the firſt, whom he attacked and expoſed upon the ſtage, in his comedy of the Equites; and as there was not one of the Comedians, who would venture to act the character of a man of his great authority, Ariſtophanes repreſented it himſelf with ſuch ſucceſs, that the Athenians obliged Cleo to pay a fine of five talents, which were given to the Poet (3). He afterwards directed his ſatyr againſt Lamachus, and did not ſpare even Pericles and Alcibiades (4).

[B] A kind of ſchool for the art of war and all virtues, which can render a city formidable to its enemies.] He aſſembled the ſpectators, not with a view to flatter them with low and deceitful praiſes, or to divert them by mean and groſs buffoonry, but to give them the moſt ſolid inſtructions, which he render'd agreeable by a thouſand pleaſant fictions, which no other perſon could ever have invented. He was not contented with reminding them of their duty, but he likewiſe reproached them with their faults, and told them that they reaſoned like children, and that when their reſolutions were attended with any ſucceſs, it was merely from the kindneſs of the Gods, who took pleaſure in working of miracles; but that theſe Gods would at laſt be weary of protecting fools. This freedom of his, which would now appear very extravagant, was ſo well received by the Athenians, that they caſt handfuls of flowers upon the head of the Poet, and carried him in triumph thro' the city with the greateſt acclamations, and paid him the higheſt compliments imaginable. To reward him likewiſe for the love which he ſhewed to the commonwealth, they made a public decree, that he ſhould be honour'd with a crown of the ſacred Olive-tree in the citadel, which was the greateſt honour that could be paid to a citizen (5). In ſhort, he followed the affairs of the Athenians in ſo exact a manner, that his Comedies are a faithful hiſtory of that people. For which reaſon, when Dionyſius, King of Syracuſe, deſired to learn the ſtate and language of that city, from the beſt Author, Plato ſent him the Comedies of Ariſtophanes, and told him that they were the beſt repreſentation of the ſtate of Athens. Itaque Platonem memorant Dionyſio Regi Syracuſano ſtatum reipublicæ Athenienſis & linguam ex optimo autore perdiſcere cupienti, hunc autorem miſiſſe, hortatumque eſſe, ut fabulas hujus poetæ diligenter tractaret, ſi quidem reipublicæ Athenienſis ſtatum perfecte vellet cognoſcere (6). Mr. Rymer in the paſſage above quoted in the text of this article, obſerves, that in the days of Ariſtophanes, it was on all hands agreed, that the beſt Poet was he, who had done the moſt to make men virtuous and ſerviceable to the public. In his Comedy of the Frogs (7), he introduces Æſchylus diſputing with Euripides for precedence, and ſpeaking to him in this manner:

[C] That this Author was miſtaken in the repreſentation of that fact.] The queſtion is, who this King of Perſia was, who came to Greece. It could not poſſibly be the firſt Darius or Xerxes; for Ariſtophanes was not born perhaps, when Xerxes made war upon the Athenians; and Darius Nothus and Artaxerxes never came to Greece. Giraldus, as Madam Dacier obſerves, is inexcuſable for having given the air of a fable to a fact ſo very honourable to the memory of Ariſtophanes. He would not have committed ſuch a miſtake, if he would have given himſelf the pains of extracting all the particulars of this great man's life from his own works, and by that means confirmed what he had advanced. But very few writers value themſelves upon this exactneſs, which is the nobleſt qualification of an Hiſtorian. The real ſtate of that fact is as follows. The King of Perſia enquired of the Embaſſadors ſent from Greece concerning Ariſtophanes. The Reader perhaps will be pleaſed to ſee in what manner he relates this ſtory, in the chorus of the ſecond act of his Comedy intitled Acharnenſes.

Οὕτω δ' αὐτῷ περὶ τὴς πόλεως ἔδη πόῤῥω κλέος ἦκεν,
Ὅτε γὰ βασιλεὺς Λακεδαιμονίων πρεσβεῖαι βασανίζων,
Ἠρώτησε πρώτα μὲν αὐτὺς πότεροι ταῖς ναυσὶ κρατοῦσιν,
Εἶτα δὲ τοῦτον τ' ποιητὴν ποτέροις ἥκει κακὰ πολλά.
Τότης γὰ ἴφη τὺς ἀνθρώπυς πολὺ βελτίως γεγενῆθαι,
Καὶ τῷ πολέμῳ πολὺ νικήσειν, τοῦτον σύμβουλον ἔχοντας.

That is,

The glory of this Poet and the reputation of his courage have extended ſo far, that the great King diſcourſing one day with the Embaſſadors of the Lacedæmonians, aſked them in the firſt place what people of Greece were the ſtrongeſt at ſea, and then who they were, whom this Poet ſatyrized in his Comedies; for, ſays he, it is his inſtructions, that make men better, and qualify them to triumph over their enemies. Friſchlin in his life of our Poet, has not repreſented this ſtory in its full light, tho' he refers us to the paſſage juſt quoted from Ariſtophanes. He only tells us, that the King of Perſia enquired among what people he lived, Certè adhuc vivus Ariſtophanes tam illuſtre nomen ſuis Comœdiis eſt adeptos ut fama illius etiam ad Perſas pervenerit; & Rex ipſe Perſarum, facta Poetæ hujus mentione, de eo percontatus ſit, quibuſnam cum hominibus iſte comicus viveret; ſicut ipſe teſtatur in Acharnenſibus.

[D] The firſt, who brought the old Comedy to any degree of perfection.] Friſchlin informs us, that he reduced it to a better and more uſeful form; whereas it had before been rude and unconnected. Cratinus and Eupolis had taken a greater liberty in abuſing thoſe, who were obnoxious to them, than was proper. And Ariſtophanes himſelf in his firſt Comedies made uſe of great ſeverity in his expreſſions, which he afterwards moderated in his latter performances. Primus autem hic veterem comœdiam, rudem adhuc & diſperſam collegit, eamque in meliorem atque utiliorem formam traduxit. Nam Cratinus & Eupolis multo acerbius & turpius alios infectati fuerant, quam decebat. Sed & ipſe Ariſtophanes initio eandem verborum amariciem in ſuis uſurpabat fabulis, quam tamen in poſtremis comœdiis, juſta moderatione adhibitâ, plurimum mitigavit (14). (14) Idem, ibid.

Horace mentions this liberty of the old Comedy in his fourth Satyr of the firſt Book;

Eupolis atque Cratinus, Ariſtophaneſque Poetæ,
Atque alii, quorum Comœdia priſca virorum eſt,
Si quis erat dignus deſcribi, quod malus, aut fur,
Quod mœchus foret, aut ſicarius, aut alioqui
Famoſus, multâ cum libertate notabant.

The ſame Poet likewiſe tells us in his Art of Poetry (15), that after Tragedies were brought to perfection, the Old Comedy ſucceeded them with great applauſe; (15) Ver.

Suſarion, or, as ſome Writers call him, Sannyrion, was the Author of the Old Comedy, the deſign of which was only to excite laughter, without any regard to order and decency. For the Chorus ſometimes walking, and at other times dancing about the altars ſung verſes, ſimplex carmen, as Donatus terms it (16). This was regulated by Cratinus, who appointed three Actors, and mixed inſtruction with entertainment. For it was lawful under the Democracy to expoſe thoſe by name upon the ſtage, who were obnoxious on account of their ill conduct, and the Actors made uſe of maſks, to reſemble the perſons, who were thus intended to be ridiculed. But as the State grew to an Oligarchy, that licence was removed, and Eupolis was thrown into the ſea, and drowned by thoſe, againſt whom he had written his Comedy called Baptæ. Nay there was a Law enacted (17), againſt naming (ὀνομαστὶ κωμῳδεῖν) any perſon, of whom they wrote a Comedy. Horace mentions this in the paſſage above quoted; (16) See Rous's Archæolog. Attic. lib. 2. cap. 11. (17) Hermogen. Partit. pag. 76.

This induced Ariſtophanes to attempt the Middle Comedy, which he gave a ſpecimen of in his Cocalus, that is now loſt, in which he did not introduce real perſons, as in his Equites, Clouds, and Frogs, but fictitious ones. Madam Dacier in the Preface to her Tranſlation of Plautus obſerves, that our Poet was one of the firſt Writers of the Old Comedy, and that we ſee in his latter works ſome inſtances of the Middle Comedy.

Comedy. She tells us likewiſe in her Preface to Ariſtophanes, that the Learned in general are of opinion, that his Plutus is of this latter kind; but this does not appear ſo evident to her. In the Middle Comedy fictitious names were made uſe of, becauſe it was unlawful to expoſe perſons by their real names. Now Ariſtophanes in his Plutus names all thoſe expreſly, whom he attacks. It is true, his ſubject is feigned; and this, as that ingenious Lady remarks, might perhaps overthrow the diſtinction, which is made between the middle and the new Comedy; for it is very probable, that the Poets had the liberty of inventing their ſubjects in the middle as well as in the new Comedy. However that be, it is certain, that the Satyr is a little more diſguiſed in that piece, than in others, which we have of this Poet: but tho' it is more artful and delicate, yet it is not at all the leſs ſevere and poignant. The time, when the old Comedy flouriſhed, was during the Peloponneſian War, and a little before it, when Theopompus, Pherecrates, Crates, Eupolis, Cratinus, our Poet, and others exhibited their performances (18). But when Alexander King of Macedonia grew formidable to Greece, the Poets being apprehenſive of offending him, changed the argument of their Plays, and inſtead of abuſing States and People, ridiculed the vices of private men; and this was called the New Comedy. Menander, Philemon, Poſidippus, Diphilus, and Apollodorus were eminent in this kind among the Greeks; and were imitated by Plautus and Terence among the Latins. The new Comedy likewiſe differed from the old with regard to the ſtyle of it, for that of the latter was more lofty and unequal; whereas that of the former more pure, equal, and elegant. The old Comedy was divided into Acts and Chorus; the parts of the new were the Argument, Prologue, and Acts; and what was performed by the Chorus in the former was done by the Prologue in the latter. The new Comedy was never extended beyond five Acts; the old had frequently more; and therefore Friſchlin tells us (19), that he found it difficult to diſtinguiſh the Comedies of Ariſtophanes into Acts, and the Acts into Scenes, after the manner of the Romans; and he mentions ſeveral other differences between the old and new Comedy.

[E] The clouds, which he wrote in order to expoſe Socrates to the ridicule of the Athenians] The Athenians were ſo prodigiouſly charmed with this Play, that they decreed, that the name of Ariſtophanes ſhould be written above thoſe of his competitors; and it is ſaid to have made ſo great an impreſſion upon their minds, that it coſt Socrates his life. But it will be neceſſary for the underſtanding of this piece to trace the Hiſtory a little higher. After that great Philoſopher had been declared the wiſeſt of mankind by the Oracle of Delphi, he being ſurprized at ſo ſolemn and unexpected a compliment to him, was a long while in doubt in what ſenſe that Oracle ſhould be underſtood. "The God cannot poſſibly be guilty "of a falſity, ſaid he to himſelf; but what then muſt be "his meaning? I am not maſter of any eminent ſhare "of wiſdom." In this perplexity he went to viſit a perſon who had the greateſt reputation at that time; and after he had diſcourſed with him for ſome time, and propoſed ſeveral queſtions in his uſual manner, he found that all his wiſdom conſiſted in the great opinion, which he had in himſelf, and which he knew how to poſſeſs others with. This diſcovery engaged him to endeavour to examine the affair with the utmoſt accuracy, and to make new trials in order to penetrate into the meaning of the Deity. He took the pains therefore to confer with all thoſe, who were thought moſt ſkilful in their particular art or profeſſion, from the Magiſtrate down to the loweſt Artificer; but he found them as ignorant as the former perſon, whom he converſed with; and by examining himſelf afterwards, he diſcovered that he was wiſer than the reſt upon no other account but becauſe while he knew nothing, he had that opinion of himſelf that he knew nothing; whereas others imagined that they knew every thing, while in reality they were abſolutely ignorant. Upon this he concluded, that he had found the true ſenſe of the Oracle; and that the wiſdom of mankind conſiſts in acknowledging their ignorance; while true and abſolute wiſdom is to be found only in the Deity. This humility of his did not abate the reſentments or jealouſy, which the Athenians bore towards him. On the contrary they gave ſuch a malicious turn to his curioſity in this point, that they repreſented, that he had made this enquiry only with a view to triumph over them more effectually, and to ſhew them the advantage, which he had over them. It was this render'd him odious to the people; and as the hatred, which men have for virtue, always urges them to exceſs, a deſign was ſoon formed to deſtroy him. Their next taſk was to find means to effect this. Socrates was always attended by the chief men of Athens, who went to hear him every day, and to learn from his converſation rules to direct their conduct. And as he ſpake very frequently of the Immortality of the Soul and of the Deity in a manner not ſuitable to the conceptions of the vulgar, this gave occaſion to the forming of two heads of accuſation againſt him. The former was, that he corrupted the youth by teaching them the principles of injuſtice for the ſake of his own profit. The ſecond was, that he indulged himſelf in curious enquiries concerning what paſſed in heaven and in the ſubterraneous regions; and that he did not acknowledge the Exiſtence of the Gods. This ſcheme being concerted, it was found ſomewhat difficult to put it in execution on account of the great intereſt and reputation of Socrates; and therefore it was thought proper to ſound the inclinations of the people. For this purpoſe Melitus, Anytus and Lycon went to Ariſtophanes; who readily promiſed to write a Comedy upon that ſubject (20). Ælian in his Various Hiſtory (21) tells us, that the Poet was hired for a ſum of money by Anytus and Melitus; which opinion is likewiſe adopted by Eunapius in his Life of Ædeſius (22), and by Thomas Magiſter in his Argument of this Comedy, and other Scholiaſts, who ſuppoſe, that this Comedy was acted juſt before the accuſation and condemnation of Socrates. But Palmerius in his Exercitations (23) is of a contrary opinion, and obſerves that this Comedy was written while Cleon was ſtill living, who was killed, according to Thucydides, in the tenth year of the Peloponneſian war, at which time Aminias was Archon, and according to Diodorus, in the ſecond year of the 89th Olympiad. But the accuſation and death of Socrates happened under Lachetes the Archon in the firſt year of the 95th Olympiad, twenty three years after the death of Cleon. So that this Comedy was compoſed four or five and twenty years before that Philoſopher was accuſed, which renders Ælian's account very abſurd. Palmerius therefore thinks, that the account of an old Scholiaſt in his Protheoria prefixed to this Comedy is more probable, that Ariſtophanes wrote it upon occaſion of the conteſts, which frequently aroſe between the Philoſophers and Comic Writers; Τῶν κωμικῶν πρὸς τοὺς φιλοσόφους ἐχόντων τινὰ ἀντιλογίαν; which is likewiſe confirmed by another ancient Scholiaſt upon theſe words in the firſt Scene of the firſt Act, Οἱ τὸν ἀέρα λέγοντες ἀνακίθωνα ὡς ἐφ' πτερωτὸν; where he ſays, that Crates the Comic Writer ridiculed Hippo the Philoſopher in a much more ſevere manner, and that Diphilus did the ſame to Bœda another Philoſopher; and that Eupolis expoſed Socrates himſelf with a great deal of vivacity and wit. From all which conſiderations Palmerius concludes, that the reaſon of Ariſtophanes's ſatyrizing of Socrates was not that he had received money of Anytus and Melitus for that purpoſe, or had any particular prejudice againſt him, but only on account of the party, which was formed, and the diſputes, which ſubſiſted between the Philoſophers and dramatic Poets. Ergo Ariſtophanis in Socratem maledicentiæ cauſa non fuit corruptela & pecuniarum acceptio ab Anyto & Melito, vel denique odium; ſed ſtudium partium & diſſidia philoſophorum cum poetis dramaticis; quod notare non erit inutile. Kuſter in his Notes upon this Comedy is of the ſame opinion with Palmerius. But Baron Spanheim in his Notes and Emendations upon the ſame Comedy obſerves, that tho' the remarks of the latter are of ſome importance, yet his zeal againſt Ælian for charging Ariſtophanes with bribery from Anytus and Melitus has occaſioned him to forget the true cauſe of that Poet's hatred againſt Socrates; most admired of all his Comedies. He had a peculiar averſion to Euripides, the Tragic Writer,

Socrates, alledged by Ælian in the ſame paſſage, where he tells us, that this Philoſopher never went to the theatre, except to ſee the Tragedies of Euripides, who was his intimate friend, and whom he had a great regard for on account of his wiſdom and probity, as well as for the excellence of his Poetry. But he had a contempt for the Comic Poets, and never went to ſee their Plays, except when Alcibiades the ſon of Clinias, or Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus obliged him to go thither. He was ſhock'd at the great licentiouſneſs of the old Comedy; and as he was a man of piety, probity, candour, and wiſdom, he could not bear that the characters of his fellow-citizens ſhould be abuſed, and that a chief article of their Laws ſhould be violated with impunity, which appointed, that men ſhould be reproved for their faults in private, and all the proper endeavours be uſed to reform them, before their crimes were made publick. This gave Ariſtophanes an occaſion of reſentment againſt Socrates and Euripides, and he was very glad of this opportunity of revenging himſelf upon them; for, as Madam Dacier obſerves, the contempt, which is ſhewn to the writings of men of wit, is ſuch an affront to the Authors as they never pardon; and this is particularly the caſe of the Poets, who are naturally diſpoſed to idolize their own performances, and expect every perſon ſhould pay adoration to them as well as themſelves. Ælian aſſures us, that this contempt, which Socrates expreſſed to the Comic Poets, was the ground of their averſion to him, and the motive of Ariſtophanes's writing the Clouds againſt him; and not merely the ſollicitation of Anytus and Melitus. Ὁ δὲ αὐτοῖς οὐκ ἐρέσκετο, ἀλλὰ δικαίως κατεφρόνει (ἦτε ἀνὴρ σώφρων, καὶ δίκαιος, καὶ ἀγαθὸς, καὶ ἐπὶ τούτοις σοφὸς) ἀνοσίων κερτόμων καὶ ὑβρισῶν καὶ ὑγιὲς λεγόντων οὐδέν. Ἅπερ ἐλύπει δικαίως αὐτούς. Καὶ ταῦτα οὐ τὰς κωμῳδίας ἦν αὐτῷ τὰ σπέρματα. ἀλλ' οὐ μόνον ἃ παρὰ Ἀνύτου καὶ Μελίτου ὡμολόγηται. Some learned men have been of opinion, that our Poet was an intimate friend of Socrates, and that he wrote this Comedy merely for diverſion without any deſign to offend him. It is probable that they aſſerted this, becauſe Socrates went to ſee this Play, and roſe up at it before all the ſpectators, that the ſtrangers might know him; and becauſe Plato has given Ariſtophanes a place in his Sympoſium, which they imagine he would not have done, if that Poet had compoſed this Comedy in order to ruin Socrates. But this manner of reaſoning is abſurd; for that Philoſopher went to this Play to ſhew the contempt, which he had for it; and Plato's Dialogue was written long before Socrates was accuſed (24). Mr. Rymer in his Short View of Tragedy (25) obſerves, that many have been offended with Ariſtophanes as acceſſary to the death of Socrates: but he tells us, that whoever conſiders the ſtate of affairs at that juncture, when the Clouds was acted, might ſooner believe the Poet's deſign was rather previous, to try the ſtrength of a party by the countenance of the people; and by the ſucceſs of this Play they diſcovered how far the intereſt of Alcibiades prevailed. "Alcibiades, continues he, was the dangerous man to the Government, too big for the Republick and for Ariſtophanes himſelf. Socrates came not to be judicially arraigned in twenty years after the Comedy. They firſt had made ſure of his Protector, and got him out of the way. Upon which the Common-wealth party took heart, and would make the Philoſopher anſwer for the rare accompliſhments, which Alcibiades had drawn from him, and ſo ill employed. Socrates ſhould not have mocked at the old Religion, till ſure of ſome means to introduce a better. Socrates had not the gift of miracles. Alcibiades with his companions could learn from Socrates to blaſpheme the eſtabliſhed worſhip; but were too ſenſual for a purer faith and divine ſpeculations. Thereupon followed ſo many mad pranks amongſt them. As that for example, when the Gods of the town (ſet at every man's door) were, as, they had been ſo many ſign-poſts, all in one night broken down. How would the people look after this outrage? What could they expect but hell to ſwallow them up all quick the next morning?" Ariſtophanes, ſays the ſame Critic, in a ſober way, was not againſt a reformation. He attempted an alteration, and wrought it effectually. As particularly; the Athenians, wanting a true calculation of the courſe of the Moon, were often in great confuſion about their holy-days. They kept faſt often when they ſhould have feaſted; and other times had their feſtival on a work-day; and many times the feaſt and faſt came a-pick a-pack. To rectify this in that very Play (the Clouds) againſt Socrates, there the Chorus returns, and addreſſes to the ſpectators in this manner:

As we were departing, the Moon (our Lady) met us,
And bid us tell ye,
Firſt that ſhe gives her love to you, and your confederates.
In the next place, that ſhe is angry with you, as ill dealt withal by you,
For her good turns to all of you, not in words, but effectually:
In particular, every month ſhe ſaves you two pence half-penny in lanthorn and candle-light:
And then going abroad a-nights you cry, Hold, boy, there needs no link, 'tis Moon-ſhine.
In other reſpects ſhe likes you well,
Saving that you are out in your accounts moſt ſhamefully, Jumbling all things hand over head confoundedly;
Inſomuch that the Gods threaten her immoderately;
When their appetite is baulk'd, and they go home with hungry noſtrils, becauſe you want a good Almanac.
For when you ſhould be ſacrificing,
Then you are at the Seſſions, trying felons and pick-pockets.
On the other hand, when 'tis Ember-Week in heaven,
And all are faſting, with an a-lack and well a-day,
For the death of Memnon or Sarpedon,
Then ſmoak your hecatombs. . . . .

"By this every body was convinc'd, that the form by "Law publiſhed wanted amendment. The Prieſts "from all parts were gathered together. They were "aſhamed of their Calendar. Reform, reform, was "the only cry amongſt them. Not one nolumus in "all the convocation. And thereupon Meton the "Mathematician was ſent for, and ſet to work; "and from thence our Chronographers had a new "Epocha. . . . . This ſmall ſally or ſtart out from "the Play is of greater moment, is of more weight "and importance, than all the Tragedies on our "Stage could pretend to. And yet for modern "Comedy, doubtleſs our Engliſh are the beſt in the "world." Thus far Mr. Rymer. But let us now examine the ſcheme of this Comedy, in which our Poet has endeavoured to repreſent the moſt ſolid merit and virtue under all the colours and appearance of vice. His deſign appears to have been, according to Madam Dacier, to perſuade the Athenians, that Socrates corrupted the youth, and that he acknowledged other Gods than thoſe of the city. It was a difficult taſk to raiſe a good Comedy upon this, and Ariſtophanes was perhaps the only perſon, who could have ſucceeded in it. He feigns therefore, that Strepſiades a countryman being deeply involved in debt, went to enter himſelf into Socrates's ſchool, in order to learn how to cheat his creditors; but as he was too old himſelf, he put his ſon there in his room. The ſon profited ſo well by the lectures of this Philoſopher, that he began with beating his father, and then proved by his eloquence, that it was reaſonable to do ſo. This action introduces the unravelling of the plot, which ends with the burning of Socrates's houſe. There is nothing more ingenious than the whole texture of this ſubject; but what is moſt agreeable, is, that the Poet has ſo exactly imitated the air and manner of Socrates in ridiculing him, that the Philoſopher himſelf ſeems to ſpeak in the part he acts. Madam Dacier tells us, that ſhe was ſo highly charmed with this play, that after ſhe had tranſlated and read it over two hundred times, it did not become the leaſt tedious to her, tho' ſhe never found the ſame in any other work; and that the pleaſure, which ſhe received from it, was ſo exquiſite, that ſhe forgot all the averſion and horror, which Ariſtophanes deſerved for abuſing his wit ſo far as to repreſent truth under the blackeſt colours

Writer, whom he ſatyrizes in ſeveral of his Plays [F]. A great part of his Comedies were compoſed in the time of the Peloponneſian war. He wrote that which is intitled Peace in the thirteenth year of that war, when upon the death of Cleon and Braſidas, who were killed in the battle at Amphipolis, a treaty of peace for fifty years was concluded between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, though it continued but ſeven years, as appears from the fifth book of Thucydides. The Acharnenſes was written after the death of Pericles and the loſs of the battle in Sicily, in order to deter the people from intruſting the ſafety of the Commonwealth to ſuch imprudent Generals as Lamachus. Soon after this he repreſented his Aves or Birds, by which he admoniſhed the Athenians to fortify Decelæa, which he calls by a fictitious name Nephelococcygia. The Veſpæ or Waſps was written after another loſs in Sicily, which the Athenians ſuffered from the miſconduct of Chares. The Lyſiſtrata was compoſed, when all Greece was involved in a war; in which Comedy the women are introduced debating upon the affairs of the Commonwealth and Peace, and at laſt agree not to ſuffer their huſbands to enjoy the liberty of their beds, till they ſhould conſent to make peace. His Plutus [G] and other Comedies of that kind were written after the Magiſtrates had given orders, that no perſon ſhould be expoſed by name upon the ſtage (d). Athenæus in his Deipnoſophiſts has given us the names of thirty ſix of his Comedies, which are now loſt. He invented a peculiar kind of verſe, which was called by his name, and is mentioned by Cicero in his Brutus. Suidas tells us that he likewiſe invented the Tetrameter and Octameter verſe. The merit of his works is not perhaps ſo obvious to the generality of modern readers, as it was among the Antients [H]. But he is univerſally admired on account of the true Attic elegance of his ſtyle. We are told of impoſture, and to ruin a man, who was wiſdom itſelf, and the greateſt ornament of the city of Athens. We may obſerve here, that Ariſtophanes wrote two Comedies of the Clouds, as well as two intitled Plutus. Several learned men, and particularly Samuel Petitus, aſſert that they were the ſame plays a little changed; and that the former was called, the firſt and ſecond Clouds, and the latter the firſt and ſecond Plutus, becauſe they were acted twice. But the ingenious Lady quoted above is of opinion, that theſe Comedies were entirely different, and upon different ſubjects. She founds this opinion upon what Ariſtophanes himſelf tells us in the prologue to his Clouds: I have no deſign, ſays he, to impoſe upon you by preſenting you twice or thrice the ſame thing a little diſguiſed. I always exhibit upon the ſtage not only new ſubjects; but even thoſe which have no reſemblance to each other, and which are always equally beautiful and entertaining:

Οὐδ' ὑμᾶς ζητῶ ξαπατᾶν, ὃς ἓν τρὶς ταὐτ' ἰσάγων;
Ἀλλ' ἀεὶ καινὰς ἰδέας εἰς φέρων, σοφιζόμαι,
Οὐδ' ἀλλήλαισιν ὁμοίας κ' πάσας δεξιάς.

Other writers have imagined, that Plutus and the Clouds are only a collection of the fragments, which remain of the two Plutus's and the two Clouds. But this is very improbable; ſince every thing appears to be uniform and conſiſtent in them.

[F] He had likewiſe a peculiar averſion to Euripides, the tragic writer, whom he ſatyrizes in ſeveral of his plays.] He has done this particularly in his Frogs, his Acharnenſes, and Theſmophoriazuſæ, that he might deſtroy the eſteem, which men had of that Poet, as the beſt writer of Tragedies in that age. In his Frogs, he introduces Bacchus enquiring very anxiouſly upon the earth for a tragic Poet, and becauſe he could not meet with any there, deſcending into the infernal regions, in order to bring up Euripides again from the Elyſian fields. But Æſchylus and Socrates diſputing the ſuperiority with Euripides with regard to the ſublimity of their performances, there aroſe a warm conteſt, in which Æſchylus had the advantage over Euripides. By this means that Poet was brought into great contempt, and conſidered as much inferior to the reſt of the tragic Writers. Ariſtophanes likewiſe, that he might expoſe him ſtill more, wrote his Theſmophoriazuſæ, in which Euripides is accuſed by the women, who celebrated the ſacred rites of Ceres, for ſhewing an unreaſonable prejudice againſt the fair ſex, and treating them with great ſeverity in his Tragedies; upon which account they threaten him with the utmoſt vengeance (25).

(25) Friſchlin. in Vitâ Ariſtophan.

[G] His Plutus.] The deſign of Ariſtophanes in this Comedy, was to reproach the Athenians with their avarice, which had occaſioned them to commit very great errors in the moſt important affairs. He introduces Chremylus an old countryman, of great probity, but very poor, going with a ſervant of his to conſult Apollo concerning his ſon, whether he ſhould leave an honeſt courſe of life, and apply himſelf to methods of injuſtice, after the example of the reſt of the world, ſince the diſhoneſt raiſe themſelves vaſt fortunes, while the lovers of virtue are ſunk in poverty, as himſelf was. The oracle directs him to follow that perſon, whom he ſhould firſt meet with after he went out of the Temple. Happening therefore upon a blind old man who was Plutus, he followed him, agreeably to the advice of the oracle, tho' he was ignorant who Plutus was. But his ſervant being uneaſy at this, aſked his maſter at laſt why he followed that perſon; upon which Chremylus declared the oracle to him. Plutus then informs them who he was, and the reaſon of his being ſtruck blind by Jupiter. This induced them to conduct him to the Temple of Æſculapius, in order that his ſight might be reſtored. Poverty upon this interpoſes to prevent it; and expoſtulates with them for endeavouring to remove Plutus's blindneſs, and to expell her out of Greece, tho' ſhe conferred greater advantages upon them, than Plutus could poſſibly do with all his riches. However, poverty was obliged to retire, and they carried Plutus home upon the recovery of his ſight; by which means they all became rich of a ſudden, and even thoſe, who had before lived in poverty by purſuing a courſe of honeſty and virtue, were now raiſed to wealth and affluence. Petitus (26) is of opinion, that this Comedy was acted in the fourth year of the 92d Olympiad, when Diocles was Archon of Athens.

[H] The merit of his works is not perhaps ſo obvious to the generality of Readers now, as it was among the Ancients.] Madam Dacier obſerves, that all kinds of writing paſs thro' the hands of three ſorts of Readers; thoſe of a very good taſte, thoſe of an indifferent one, and thoſe, (who are much the largeſt number,) who have no manner of taſte or judgment at all. The firſt judge as truly of every thing as if they had lived in each particular age; the moſt ſecret beauties and defects make the moſt lively impreſſion upon them, and they are ſenſible of thoſe delicate ſtrokes, which eſcape the eyes of others. The ſecond ſpecies of Readers do not form any judgment of themſelves; they are confined within certain bounds, which they cannot paſs; they have a faint perception ſometimes of a beauty or defect; but the minuteſt circumſtance imaginable, is capable of making them miſtake the one for the other. And even thoſe paſſages, which affect them in the moſt forcible manner, give them only a languid and imperfect ſenſation. The laſt kind of Readers are perpetually in the wrong; they imagine, that there is nothing beyond their own conceptions of things; they judge only from themſelves, and abſolutely condemn every thing, which does not reſemble their own ideas. The firſt of theſe will be charmed with the beauty and delicacy of Ariſtophanes's ideas, the told that St. Chryſoſtom, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, had ſo great a fondneſs for his writings (e), that he always placed them under his pillow when he went to bed. Friſchlin obſerves, that Julius Cæſar Scaliger (f) compares Horace to our Poet; but he is of opinion, that Plautus has a greater affinity to him in his manner of writing, and has imitated him in a great many parts of his Plays. He remarks likewiſe, that though Ælian ſtiles him (g) a Trifler and Buffoon, and one who deſired to be conſidered as ſuch; and tho' Plutarch reproaches him with a turgid and inelegant manner of writing, yet as the former of theſe writers was prejudiced in favour of Socrates, and the latter of Menander, their judgment is not to be depended upon. Friſchlin has written an expreſs vindication of our Poet in anſwer to the objections urged againſt him by Plutarch. How great an opinion Plato had of Ariſtophanes is evident even from Plutarch's acknowledgment, who tells us, that this Poet's diſcourſe upon Love was inſerted by that Philoſopher in his Sympoſium. Cicero likewiſe in his firſt book De Legibus, ſtiles him the moſt witty Poet of the old Comedy, and commends him highly for endeavouring to expel the new Deities out of the city, and to prevent the admiſſion of ſcandalous forms of religion. There have been ſeveral tranſlations and editions of this Poet [I]. Athenæus (h) informs us, that he wrote his Comedies when he was drunk, as Alcæus likewiſe did his Poems. But this ſeems very improbable to ſome writers (i). It appears from his Comedy called Peace, that he was bald. The the ſublimity and boldneſs of his inventions, the vivacity of his imagination, and the copiouſneſs of his wit, which could turn to ridicule things of the moſt real merit and importance. In ſhort, they will admire Ariſtophanes in the ſame manner as the greateſt men of the former ages have admired him, who have unanimouſly given him the ſuperiority in Comedy. Perſons of the ſecond diviſion will not be ſo much ſtruck with the beauties which they will obſerve, as with the defects, that they will imagine they diſcover in him. They will not abſolutely condemn him; but they will read him with a certain languor and indifference, which is no leſs injurious to him than even contempt itſelf. The Readers of the laſt order will be ſurprized at the regard ſhewn to plays, in which we find no intrigues, no tricks of ſervants, no old men made dupes of, or any of the other common ſubjects, which are the ſoul of our modern Comedies. They will undoubtedly applaud the excellency of their own critical taſte, and make no ſcruple of contradicting the ſenſe of all antiquity; they will imagine themſelves to be alone poſſeſſed of politeneſs and good ſenſe, and accuſe every one of want of taſte and delicacy, who is of a different opinion from themſelves. Madam Dacier profeſſes, that if ſhe had a deſign to pleaſe theſe three kinds of judges, ſhe would not attempt to preſent them with perfect pieces; for it is a conſtant maxim with her, that a moderate beauty will pleaſe much more generally than a faultleſs one; and this point might be proved by inconteſtable reaſons. The reaſon that prevents the greateſt part of men from having a true reliſh of the works of the ancients, is, that they do not remove the conſideration of their own age out of the queſtion, but judge of every thing by the genius of the times in which they live; whereas nothing is more unreaſonable than this. For there is a prodigious difference between the ſeveral ages; and if men continue always under this prejudice, that there is nothing valuable, but what has the peculiar characteriſtics of their own times, it will be found, that the beſt works will neceſſarily have a very limited duration; and the greateſt writers being thus diſcouraged by ſo mortifying an apprehenſion, will never have the reſolution to labour for immortality, which they ſee it is in vain to expect. The prepoſſeſſion which prevailed in Auguſtus's time in favour of the writings of the Antients, tho' very exceptionable, yet is more tolerable than the contrary extreme. While every thing, that had the character of antiquity, was thought good of courſe, an Author might at leaſt hope, that time would give him the privilege, which was granted to every production, that had received the ſanction of age; and to comfort himſelf for the contempt he met with during his life, he might anticipate the honour which would be paid him after death. Whereas the contrary prejudice damps the mind, and deprives it of all thoſe pleaſing hopes of future honour, which animate it to the nobleſt attempts. The ingenious Lady proceeds then to conſider what it is, which forms a true taſte, and to account for the variety of judgments amongſt mankind with regard to the productions of wit and genius; and laſtly to ſhew the reaſons, why many perſons cannot perceive that elegance and beauty in Ariſtophanes's Comedies, which were ſo much admired by the beſt judges among the Ancients.

[I] There have been ſeveral tranſlations and editions of this Poet.] Nicodemus Friſchlin, a German diſtinguiſhed in the XVIth Century by his ſkill in the Latin and Greek tongues, tranſlated Plutus, the Clouds, the Frogs, the Equites, and the Acharnenſes, into Latin verſe; but his tranſlation would undoubtedly have been more uſeful and exact, if it had been in proſe. He divided likewiſe theſe five Comedies into five acts each, and every one of thoſe acts into ſeveral ſcenes, after the manner of Plautus and Terence. But this diſtinction was never uſed in the old and middle Comedy, and therefore injudiciouſly applied to Ariſtophanes. However Kuſter has retained it in his edition, becauſe many learned men have quoted that part according to acts and ſcenes. Quintus Septimius Florens rendered into Latin verſe, the Waſps, the Peace, and Lyſiſtrata; but his tranſlation is very obſcure on account of the obſolete words and phraſes, which he has made uſe of. The Birds, the Eccleſiazuſæ and Theſmophoriazuſæ were publiſhed in Æmilius Portus's edition with a Latin verſion of Divus Juſtinopolitanus, which is very erroneous and abſurd; upon which account Kuſter rejected it in his Edition, and ſubſtituted in the room of it Tanaquil Faber's elegant tranſlation of the Eccleſiazuſæ, Tiberius Hemſterhuiſius's verſion of the Birds, and his own tranſlation of the Theſmophoriazuſæ. Mr. Stanley in his Lives of the Philoſophers (27), has given us an Engliſh tranſlation of the Clouds. And Madam Dacier publiſhed at Paris 1692, a French verſion of Plutus and the Clouds, with critical Notes, and an examination of both thoſe plays according to the rules of the theatre. Mr. Lewis Theobald likewiſe tranſlated thoſe two Comedies into Engliſh, and publiſhed them with remarks. Monſieur Boivin the younger, publiſhed a French verſion of the Birds at Paris 1729. With regard to the ſeveral editions of this Poet, the Reader will find an accurate catalogue of them in Fabricius's Bibliotheca Græca. But we ſhall ſpeak more particularly of the noble Edition, publiſhed by Ludolfus Kuſter at Amſterdam in Folio 1710, and dedicated to Charles Montague late Earl of Halifax. The Greek text was compared with ſeveral manuſcripts, for which the Editor was obliged to Laurence Alexander Zacagni, Library keeper of the Vatican; to Mr. Joſeph Waſſe, the Reverend Mr. Charles Daubuz, Dr. John Potter, then Profeſſor of Divinity and now Biſhop of Oxford, and Dr. Richard Bentley Maſter of Trinity College at Cambridge. He made uſe likewiſe of the old Editions of that Poet, particularly that publiſhed by Aldus at Venice in 1498 in Fol. and another at Florence by the heirs of Philip Junta in 1425 in 4to. but the Theſmophoriazuſæ and Lyſiſtrata were not printed in theſe two Editions. Kuſter has ſubjoined to the text the ancient and modern Greek Scholia; the former of which were collected by Marcus Muſurus, and publiſhed by Aldus upon the nine firſt Comedies; to which Kuſter has added the Scholia upon the Lyſiſtrata. The Scholia collected by Muſurus, were written partly by the ancient and celebrated Gram-

The time of his death is unknown; but it is certain, that he was living after the expulſion of the Tyrants by Thraſybulus, who is mentioned by him in his Plutus and other Comedies. He left two ſons, Philip and Arator, to whom Suidas adds a third, Philaretus, and other writers a fourth, named Nicoſtratus (k).

marians Apollonius, Didymus, Symmachus, Ariſtarchus, and others, who are mentioned in them; and the reſt by Thomas Magiſter and John Tzetzes, and other Greeks of that age; and they ſeem to have been interpolated by Muſurus himſelf in ſeveral places. To theſe Scholia, collected by Muſurus, the Editors of the Florence Edition abovementioned have a great many obſervations upon ſeveral of the firſt Comedies, from common Writers, and very often without any judgment. But Kuſter has diſtinguiſhed theſe from the genuine Scholia. We have likewiſe Greek Scholia written by Odoardus Biſetus upon all the Comedies of Ariſtophanes, and by Ægidius Bourdinus upon the Theſmophoriazuſæ only; and theſe Scholia are publiſhed in Kuſter's Edition, tho' they are not of any great importance. He has given us likewiſe the Latin Notes of Carolus Giraldus upon the Plutus; of Florens Chriſtianus upon the Waſps, Peace, and Lyſiſtrata; of Iſaac Caſaubon upon the Equites, which were never publiſhed before, and were ſent him from Paris by Nicholas Franciſcus Rémondus; of Tanaquil Faber upon the Eccleſiazuſæ; of Palmerius upon Lyſiſtrata; of Baron Spanheim upon the three firſt Comedies; and of Dr. Bentley upon Plutus and the Clouds. To theſe Kuſter has added his own Notes upon all the Comedies, except the Waſps and Peace. He obſerves, that Dr. Bentley's obſervations, tho' written ex tempore, ſhew his incomparable judgment and ſagacity, and will raiſe in the learned an impatient curioſity to ſee thoſe, which he promiſed upon all the works of Ariſtophanes. Kuſter has ſubjoined to his Edition four Indexes, which he compiled himſelf; the firſt containing the Greek Words and Phraſes in the text of Ariſtophanes; the ſecond of the things contained in the old Scholiaſts; the third of the words and glaſſes, which are occaſionally explained by the Scholiaſts; and the fourth of the Authors quoted in the old Scholiaſts. ☞ARISTOTIMUS, the ſon of Damaretus, and grandſon of Etymon, made himſelf Tyrant of Elis (a), by the aſſiſtance of Antigonus, the ſon of Demetrius, King of Macedonia [A] (b). But his cruelty and perfidiouſneſs ſoon made him loſe his new Sovereignty, together with his life. He had put to death a great number of the chief Citizens of Elis, and baniſhed ſtill a greater number; whereupon the Ætolians ſent an embaſſy to him, deſiring him to ſet at liberty the wives and children of thoſe who had been baniſhed. Ariſtotimus refuſed it at firſt; but afterwards, as though he had changed his mind, he promiſed to grant the Ætolians their requeſt, and appointed a day on which the relations of the exiles ſhould be at liberty to retire out of Elis. Theſe unhappy women, thinking they ſhould paſs the remaining part of their lives with their baniſhed huſbands, took with them all that they had moſt valuable, and went in a body to the gates of the city; but there, by Ariſtotimus's command, they were ſtopped, all their goods plundered, themſelves put into priſon, their young children murthered before their eyes, and the virgins raviſhed. Such a barbarous treatment exaſperated all the people againſt Ariſtotimus, and a conſpiracy was formed againſt him [B] with ſo happy a ſucceſs, that he was killed (c) before the altar of Jupiter Salvator (the Saviour), where he had taken ſanctuary. This happened about the latter end of the fifth month of his reign, or the beginning of the ſixth (d). Thus were the Citizens of Elis reſtored to their antient liberty. The public Council of the Ætolians decreed that a ſtatue ſhould be erected to the honour of Cylon, who killed the Tyrant (e). We may obſerve that Juſtin calls Ariſtotimus Tyrant of Epirus [C], inſtead of Elis.

[A] By the aſſiſtance of Antigonus — King of Macedonia.] This was Antigonus ſurnamed Gonatas, who reigned thirty four years in Macedonia, and died in the year 243 before the Chriſtian Æra, according to Archbiſhop Uſher (1). But this does not acquaint us with the exact time, in which Ariſtotimus invaded the ſovereign power at Elis. It cannot be preciſely determined. Juſtin relates it immediately after he has given an account of the death of King Pyrrhus, which happened in the year 272 before Chriſt (2). So that all that we can affirm poſitively is, that Ariſtotimus's tyranny muſt be placed between the two years we have mentioned.

[B] A conſpiracy was formed againſt him.] The fact, as related by Juſtin (3), is as follows: Hellanicus, one of the chief Citizens of Elis, who was not afraid of death on his own account, he being already advanced in years, and having no family to leave in the Tyrant's power, aſſembled his moſt particular friends at his houſe, and exhorted them earneſtly to avenge their country. They ſcrupled at firſt to expoſe themſelves to danger for the publick good, and deſired time to conſider. Whereupon Hellanicus ordered his ſervants to lock the doors, and to go immediately and acquaint Ariſtotimus, that he had a fair opportunity to apprehend the conſpirators. And addreſſing himſelf to his timorous friends, Since I could not perſuade you, ſaid he, to reſtore the liberty of your Country, I will be revenged of you for having deſerted its cauſe. They, ſeeing what danger threatened their lives on every ſide, reſolved at laſt to expoſe themſelves to that, which was the moſt honourable, and immediately went to attack the Tyrant. Pauſanias tells us (4) the names of theſe conſpirators, who beſides Hellanicus, were Chilon, Lampis, and Cylon, the laſt of whom had the honour of deſtroying the Tyrant with his own hands.

[C] Juſtin calls Ariſtotimus Tyrant of Epirus.] It is not eaſy to determine, whether Juſtin or Pauſanias is miſtaken. One may ſay in favour of Juſtin's opinion, that Epirus bordering upon Macedonia, of which Antigonus was King, it was not difficult for him to aſſiſt Ariſtotimus in the invaſion of Epirus. But it muſt alſo be obſerved on the other hand, that Epirus might be conſidered as belonging to the Kingdom of Macedonia, ſince Pyrrhus was King of Epirus (5), before he invaded Macedonia: ſo that Antigonus might claim Epirus as part of his eſtate. However that be, it was, no doubt, too conſiderable a Province, to be reſigned by Antigonus to an Uſurper. What might lead Juſtin into an error is, that there was in Epirus a city called Elæus, which name does not differ much from Elis. We may obſerve, that Juſtin himſelf tells us, that Peloponneſus (6) had been ſurrendred by treachery to Antigonus, who could thus eaſily aſſiſt Ariſtotimus in his expedition againſt Elis, which is ſituated in the Peloponneſus. ARISTOTLE, commonly called the Prince of Philoſophers, or the Philoſopher, by way of eminence, the founder of a Sect which ſurpaſſed, and at laſt ſwallowed up all the

the others (a). Not but that it has had its reverſes, and its misfortunes, and in this ſeventeenth Century above all has been violently ſhaken (b); but the Catholick Divines on one ſide, and the Proteſtant Divines on the other, have run to its help as to a fire, and have fortified themſelves ſo well with the ſecular arm againſt the new Philoſophers, that there is no probability that it will long loſe its dominion. Moreri found ſo many fine materials in a work of Father Rapin (c), that he gave a very long article of Ariſtotle, and very capable of excuſing me from putting my hand to this work. I have no deſign alſo to ſay as much as it will bear, and I ſhall content my ſelf with producing in the Notes only one part of the errors I have collected concerning this Philoſopher. I think I have found ſome in the narration of Father Rapin [A]. It is not certain that Ariſtotle followed Pharmacy in Athens, whilſt he was a diſciple of Plato (d); but we have no more certainty that he did not follow it. There is but little credit to be given to the tradition that [A] I think I have found ſome errors in the account that Father Rapin gives us of Ariſtotle.] As this remark will be pretty long, I will divide it into ſeveral heads.

I. To ſay, that altho' Ariſtotle had deſerted his ſtudies out of pure libertiniſm, and had for ſome time abuſed the indulgence of his tutor, yet that nevertheleſs he made a proficiency in Poetry; witneſs the Poem he compoſed on the Death of the Warriors ſlain at the ſiege of Troy (1), is by no means a juſt way of reaſoning; for ſince Euſtathius and Porphyry, who make mention of this Poem, do not expreſly ſay, that he compoſed it in his youth (2), we have reaſon to think that he wrote it after he applied himſelf again to ſtudy: and if ſo, this Poem can never be made uſe of as a proof of the progreſs he made in Poetry, notwithſtanding his licentiouſneſs.

(1) Rapin, Compariſon of Plato and Ariſtotle, p. 303.

(2) Father Rapin no where ſays that they made this remark.

II. To ſay, that after having ſquandered away in his debauches part of the inheritance left him by his father, he entered himſelf a ſoldier in the troops of the Republick (3), is an improper and a very looſe expreſſion: if it had been ſaid of a man born at Athens or Lacedæmon, one might eaſily have underſtood the meaning of it, but we are ſpeaking of a native of Macedonia. Athenæus tells us, that he knew but one Author, who ſaid that Ariſtotle, after having ſpent his patrimony, liſted himſelf a ſoldier, and afterwards took to ſelling druggs, when he found that the army did not ſuit him (4). The only Author of this Hiſtory was Epicurus, and it is probable that Ælian is indebted to him alone for this particular (5). Ariſtocles, who rejected it, only quotes Epicurus (6). However this caſe ſtands, no one of the Authors, which Father Rapin quotes, ſpecifies in what troops Ariſtotle ſerved; and they all agree in ranging the facts in this manner. Firſt of all, Ariſtotle ſpent his ſubſtance; then he went into the army; after that he kept ſhop; and laſt of all attended the Lectures of Plato. Father Rapin will have it, that he was a diſciple of Plato at the ſame time that he ſold druggs: The Authors he refers to (7) ſay nothing of his doing both theſe things at the ſame time; but I am not therefore of opinion that we ought to cenſure him for this notion, for it is very reaſonable to ſuppoſe that, as Ariſtotle had waſted his ſubſtance, he was conſtrained to ſupport himſelf for ſome time, by carrying on a little trade of perfumes and medicines, which he retailed at Athens. This is what Father Rapin ſays with relation to the time when Ariſtotle began the ſtudy of Philoſophy. Francis Patricius goes ſtill a great way further: he is of opinion, that Ariſtotle was a hearer of Plato, till the age of forty, and that he practiſed Pharmacy and Phyſick till that time, in order to get a livelihood. Satis conſtat inter omnes ad quadrageſimum uſque ætatis annum Platonis fuiſſe auditorem; quo univerſo tempore Pharmacopolii arte, nec non etiam Medica, victum quæritaſſe ſatis eſt & hiſtoriæ & rationi conſonum (8). He adds, that formerly Phyſicians were alſo Apothecaries, and that we have three reaſons to make us believe that Ariſtotle was a Phyſician. He was of a race of Phyſicians: he compoſed a book on Health and Diſeaſes; and he trained up Alexander to the ſtudy of Phyſick more than any other, into which that Monarch gained a great inſight, as well in the theory as in the practice of it (9): and laſt of all Patricius brings Timæus to confirm it. This Hiſtorian has ſpoke very diſreſpectfully of Ariſtotle; and openly reproached him with ſhutting up a very famous Apothecary's ſhop. Τὸ πολυτίμητον ἰατρεῖον ἀποκεκλεικότα (10). If it may be permitted me, I would offer it as my opinion, that Timæus only uſes this epithet, πολυτίμητον, out of ſneer and irony; otherwiſe I cannot ſee how we can reconcile this paſſage of Suidas with that which Euſebius gives us of the ſame Timæus. He gives us a fragment where a Peripatetick anſwers ſeveral aſperſions publickly caſt upon Ariſtotle, and particularly that of the Hiſtorian Timæus, who had given out, that Ariſtotle in his old age ſhut up his phyſick-ſhop which was a very deſpicable one. Ἦ πῶς ἄν τις ἀποδέξαιτο Τιμαίου ἢ Ταυρομενίτην λέγοντος ἐν ταῖς ἱστορίαις, ἀδόξῳ θύρᾳ ἀντὶ ἰατρείου τὰς τυχούσας, ἐψὶ τῆς ἡλικίας, κλεῖσαι (11); i. e. "Who "can have patience to hear Timæus of Tauromeni-"um, who ſays in his Hiſtory, that in his advanced "years he ſhut up the doors of an obſcure phyſick-"ſhop?" This paſſage has been very ill tranſlated; for the Latin Tranſlation makes Timæus ſay that Ariſtotle in his old age was Porter to the ſhop of a Phyſician of no note. Quis Timæum Tauromenitanum audiat, dum ſuis in Hiſtoriis illum ait affectâ jam ætate, neglectis obſcuri cujuſdam medici officinæ claudendis foribus præfuiſſe. Was not here a very worthy employment for Ariſtotle in his old age? What an honour was it to be Porter to an Apothecary or ſome obſcure Phyſician?

III. Clemens Alexandrinus aſſures us, (theſe are the words of Father Rapin (12),) that Ariſtotle had ſome conferences at Athens with a Jew, in order to inform himſelf of the Religion of the Ægyptians. Euſebius ſays the ſame, and both build their belief of it upon the credit of Clearchus a Peripatetick. Theſe words will bear a great deal of abatement; for, I. all that Clemens Alexandrinus aſſerts may be reduced to this, that "Clearchus the Peripatetick ſaid, that he knew "a Jew who had had ſome converſation with Ari-"ſtotle." Κλέαρχος ὁ Περιπατητικὸς ἱστόρηκε φησὶ τινὰ Ἰουδαῖον, ὃς Ἀριστοτέλει συνεγένετο (13). As to the place and ſubject of theſe conferences, any one elſe is more likely to inform you than Clemens Alexandrinus. II. It is entirely falſe that Euſebius affirms any thing upon this point: he only gives us the words of Clemens Alexandrinus. III. Clearchus, to whom we muſt aſcend as to the firſt ſource, does not ſay that Ariſtotle uſed to converſe with a Jew at Athens, but on the contrary that it was in Aſia (14), nor does he ſay whether their diſcourſe turned upon the Religion of the Egyptians, or any other particular ſubject; but expreſſes himſelf in very general terms. I am inclined to think that if we had his book, we ſhould therein find a particular account; but we have only one paſſage of it, which was quoted by Joſephus in the firſt book againſt Apion, to prove that the Jewiſh Nation was not unknown to the Greeks. Had Father Rapin conſulted the originals, would he have ſaid, that it was probable that Ariſtotle, inſtead of making a voyage into Egypt (which at that time of day was thought neceſſary in order to be a compleat ſcholar) was content to inſtruct himſelf particularly in the myſteries and religion of the Egyptians, that he might ſave that time which is ſo liable to be loſt in making voyages? Is it not paſt all doubt that he was upon his travels in Aſia, when he had theſe conferences, if we are to believe what Clearchus ſays of the matter? We ſhall ſee in the note [B], whether any credit is to be given to his authority.

V. The other faults of Father Rapin, which I have taken notice of, are interſperſed in the following notes.

that he learned many things of a Jew, and ſtill leſs to the ſtory of his pretended Judaiſm [B]. Thoſe who pretend that he was a Jew himſelf, are much more groſly miſtaken [C]. The wrong pointing of a paſſage has been the cauſe of their miſtake (e). They [C].

(e) See the note

[B] There is but little credit to be given to the tradition that he learned many things from a Jew, and ſtill leſs to the ſtory of his pretended Judaiſm.] This tradition has no other foundation than that paſſage of Clearchus, which I have been mentioning; and indeed this would have been ſufficient authority, had it been taken from that Clearchus, who was one of the moſt celebrated Diſciples of Ariſtotle; but in all likelihood this is another Clearchus; for, I, the Author quoted by Joſephus ſays, that Ariſtotle, during his travels in Aſia, met with a Jew, who had afterwards frequent converſation with him and ſome other men of letters; ἡμῶν τε καί τισιν ἑτέροις τῶν σχολαστικῶν. Now ſome learned men pretend, that in Ariſtotle's time the word σχολαστικὸς was never made uſe of to ſignify a ſcholar, a diſciple, or ſtudent (16). However this be, ſince this voyage into Aſia is not reconcileable with the Hiſtory of Ariſtotle, it is not probable that one of his own diſciples could have any thoughts of feigning in a Dialogue ſuch a tranſaction as this, which both himſelf and others knew to be falſe. It muſt of conſequence have been ſome more modern Clearchus, who has ſuppoſed that he made this journey; and indeed he might very innocently be led into this miſtake, ſince it is well known that Solinus aſſures us, that Ariſtotle accompanied Alexander in his expedition againſt Darius (17). The anonymous Author of the Life of Ariſtotle (18) mentions the ſame fact. II. If it is true, that Ariſtotle had ſeveral conferences with ſo learned a Jew as that mentioned in the paſſage of Clearchus, could he have believed what he ſays of the origin of the Jews? or would he have ſaid that the Jews are deſcended from the Calani, a people of India, and that they took upon them the name of Jews in Syria from a province they were poſſeſſed of named Judea? This is what Ariſtotle pretends in the paſſage of Clearchus quoted by Joſephus. Now is it to be imagined, that his Jew would have left him under ſo childiſh an error? and might we not have expected to find more traces of Judea, and of the Jewiſh Nation in all the writings of Ariſtotle, after ſo many diſcoveries as the Jew would have communicated to him? III. We read in Diogenes Laertius, that the Gymnoſophiſts were deſcended from the Magi, and that there were ſome who derived the Jews from the ſame ſtock (19). We ſee here two ſuppoſitions: as to the former, they ſupport it by the authority of Clearchus, the diſciple of Ariſtotle; but as to the ſecond, they bring no proof for it from any Author: but is it not plain that here was the moſt favourable opportunity in the world, nay the moſt manifeſt neceſſity for citing Clearchus, concerning this pretended Indian origin of the Jewiſh Nation ſpoken of in Joſephus? If the Book de Somno, wherein Ariſtotle ſpeaks of this Indian deſcent, had been wrote by the ſame Clearchus referred to by Diogenes Laertius (20), can it be ſuppoſed they would have failed quoting him? I paſs over the other reaſons given by Jonſius (21); theſe three are ſufficient to convince me that Ariſtotle never ſaid thoſe words which the Clearchus of Joſephus puts in his mouth; and I am partly of their opinion, who blame Cunæus for reproaching Ariſtotle with an abſurdity he never was guilty of. Petrus Canæus lib. 1. de Repub. Hebr. c. 4. Ariſtotelem falſe nimis & temere perſtringit, quod hic apud Clearchum ſtatuat Judæus ab Indiæ ſapientibus eſſe propagatos; verba Cunæi hæc ſunt: " Portentoſum eſt " & cum ſumma inſcitia conjunctum quod Ariſtoteles " apud Clearchum autumavit, Judæos eſſe ab Indiæ " ſapientibus propagatos ſed nomen mutaviſſe. Quippe " philoſophos illos, qui apud Indos Callani appellantur, " in cava Syria Judæos dici. . Pudet me anilitatis, " adeo hoc nihil eſt (22)." i. e. " Petrus Cunæus lib. 1. " de Repub. Hebr. c. 4. laſhes Ariſtotle ſomewhat too " ſmartly and haſtily, becauſe that in Clearchus he is " ſaid to have maintained that the Jews were originally " deſcended from the wiſe men of India: the words " of Cunæus are as follow: " It is a ſurprizing in- " ſtance of the moſt unpardonable ignorance, that A- " riſtotle, in Clearchus, ſhould fancy that the Jews " were deſcendants of the Indian Magi, but that they " only changed their name: for example, that thoſe " Philoſophers, who among the Indians were called " Calani, in Cava Syria ſhould be called Jews. I " am aſhamed of ſo idle a notion, which is mere " nonſenſe." It may be objected to me, that Clearchus knew the Jew who diſcourſed with Ariſtotle, and that therefore he muſt have lived at the ſame time; but I deny that he knew him, and Joſephus does not ſay it. It was Clemens Alexandrinus who added this clauſe, probably truſting to his memory for it, which is almoſt an infallible way to pervert the ſenſe of a paſſage with regard even to the eſſential circumſtances of it. See an inſtance of the inadvertency of Tranſlators. That of Euſebius (23) tranſlates εἰδέναι by vidiſſe, i. e. " to have ſeen;" that of Clemens Alexandrinus is content to render it by noſſe, i. e. " to have known." Now it is no neceſſary conſequence, that a man muſt have lived at the ſame time with another, becauſe he ſhould ſay he knew a man who ſaid or did this or that; for he might mean no more, than that he knew the books wherein this man has ſaid ſuch or ſuch words; but when it is ſaid that an Author ſaw this or that man, the conſequence is certain, that they muſt have been contemporaries (24). This thing will admit of no difficulty, and conſequently, the Tranſlator of Euſebius has taken a liberty which together with that of Clemens Alexandrinus ſtrangely falſifies the inferences that might be drawn from this paſſage of Clearchus, as it ſtands quoted by Joſephus. There are ſome Jews who would perſuade us, not only that Ariſtotle had copied the works of Solomon; but alſo that he became a proſelyte of righteouſneſs (25).

Not content with this, they have produced a letter, which they ſuppoſe him to have written to Alexander to acquaint him with the news of his converſion. You will find this letter in a work of Rabbi Gedalia Ben Jachija, and in the Moderna Theologia Judaica of Mr. Lent, Profeſſor in Theology at Herborn (26). Read likewiſe this paſſage of Mr. Couſin. Father Bartolocci, in page 471 of Tome I. of his Bibliotheca magna Rabbinica " relates a moſt improbable ſtory, which the " Rabbies tell of Ariſtotle. Some of them pretend, " that he was born of the ſeed of Iſrael, and deſ- " cended of the children of Coha, of the tribe of " Benjamin. Others of them ſay, that he was not " originally a Jew, but that he embraced their religion " in the latter part of his life. They add, that he " took all his Philoſophy from the Books of Solomon, " found in the city of Jeruſalem at the time of its " being taken by Alexander, and that he afterwards " burnt them, to have the credit and reputation of " the wiſdom contained in them. They add further, " that in order to juſtify his changing his religion, " he wrote a letter to Alexander, which is tranſcribed " at full length in this place of the magna Bibliotheca, " in which the Rabbies make him to ſay, that Lo- " gick is a cheat, and that Philoſophy is lying and " deceitful, and that evil falls upon the head of " thoſe who learn it, becauſe they go to hell by " the way of diſputation (27)." Selden quotes ſome Jewiſh Authors who affirm, 1, that Ariſtotle a little before he died, communicated to his diſciples the doctrine that he had learned from the Hebrews concerning the immortality of the ſoul, and that of future puniſhments and rewards: 2, that with regard to all thoſe points wherein his doctrine contradicted the law of the Jews, he was converted and made a quite new man by the High Prieſt Simeon the Juſt (28).

[C] Thoſe who pretend that he was a Jew . . . are guilty of a . . . . groſs miſtake.] See what gave riſe to this error. The ancient verſion of Joſephus, by George of Trebizond, has it thus, Atque ille, inquit, Ariſtoteles Judæus erat: i. e. " And he ſays, Ariſtotle " was a Jew." Whereas it ſhould have been pointed in this manner, Atque ille, inquit Ariſtoteles, Judæus erat. i. e. " And he, ſays Ariſtotle, was a Jew." Upon that Marſilius Ficinus takes upon him to ſay, that Ariſtotle, according to the report of Clearchus, was a Jew. Clearchus Peripateticus ſcripſit Ariſtotelem fuiſſe Judæum (29). They are deceived who have ſaid that he was the diſciple of Socrates three years ſucceſſively [D]; for when he was born, Socrates had been dead twelve or fifteen years. They ſpeak variouſly of Ariſtotle's conduct towards his maſter Plato [E]. Some will have it that through vanity and a prodigious ingratitude, he ſet up altar againſt altar, by erecting a ſchool at Athens, during Plato's life, on purpoſe to make him uneaſy; others ſay, that he did not ſet up for a Profeſſor till after the death of his maſter. Very diſadvantageous things are ſaid concerning his amours [F]. It is pretended that he had idolatry in his conjugal paſſion, and that if he had not retired from Athens, the proceſs of irreligion, which

[D] They are deceived, who have ſaid, that he was the diſciple of Socrates three years ſucceſſively.] The life of Ariſtotle, aſcribed to Ammonius, or John Philoponus, contains this error. The learned Nunneſius, who made remarks upon this life, ſays, that he has found none amongſt the ancients, except Olympiodorus, who has affirmed that Ariſtotle was a diſciple of Socrates †. He adds, that Cardinal Beſſarion * has committed the ſame miſtake; and that Leonard Aretin, in Book VI of his letters, and Octavian Ferrarius, in his work de Sermonibus exotericis, have pointed out this anachroniſm.

[E] They ſpeak variouſly of Ariſtotle's conduct towards his maſter Plato.] Diogenes Laertius ſays, that Plato, when he ſaw that Ariſtotle had ſeparated from him, uſed to ſay, He has kicked at us, as colts do againſt their dam (33). Ælian explains at large this expreſſion of Plato. The colt, ſays he (34), kicks at its dam, after it has filled itſelf with her milk. In like manner Ariſtotle, after he had imbibed from Plato the milk and nouriſhment of Philoſophy, finding himſelf well fed and luſty with the excellent food that his maſter had ſupplied him with, ſpurn'd at him with his heels, and opened a ſchool in oppoſition to that of Plato. Conſult Helladius, who varies the images a little, and turns the compariſon to that of a horſe which takes delight in biting its father. Ἀριστοτέλης ὁ τῆς περιπατητικῆς προεστὼς ὑπὸ Πλάτωνος ἵππος ἐπωνομάζετο, ἐναντιοῦσθαι δοκῶν τῷ διδασκάλῳ· ἡδὺ γὰρ ὁ ἵππος τὸν ἑαυτοῦ φιλεῖ πατέρα δάκνειν (35). i. e. "Ariſtotle, the Prince of the Peripatetick ſchool, was "called a horſe by Plato, becauſe he ſet up in oppoſition "to his maſter, for the horſe takes a pleaſure in biting "his own father." See ſomething ſtill worſe of him. Ælian relates in another place (36), that Ariſtotle diſpleaſed Plato by going too gayly apparell'd, by his air of raillery, and by his over-talkativeneſs; ſo that Plato fixed his affections on ſome others of his ſcholars. Ariſtotle now having ſet up againſt his maſter, embraced the opportunity which the abſence of Xenocrates, and the ill ſtate of health of Speuſippus afforded him. Theſe were, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, the ſword and ſhield of Plato, and therefore it was an eaſy matter at that time to inſult him. Ariſtotle took hold of this ſeaſon to go with a great tribe of ſcholars into the ſchool of Plato: this good old man was then eighty years old, and had almoſt loſt his memory: Ariſtotle taking advantage of the infirmity of his maſter, put a hundred enſnaring queſtions to him, purſued him through all the turnings and windings of his Logick, and proudly triumphed in his victory. After this affront, the good old man did not teach in publick, but confined himſelf at home with his ſcholars, and Ariſtotle poſſeſſed himſelf of his place; but Xenocrates upon his return to Athens, hearing how matters had been carried on, gave a very ſmart rebuke to Speuſippus, for letting Ariſtotle take poſſeſſion of the ſchool, and made ſo vigorous an oppoſition againſt the uſurper, that he made him quit his place, and reinſtated the former maſter. If Ariſtotle did really uſe him in this manner he ought to be deteſted, but I cannot give credit to this relation. His followers have maintained that he was not wanting either in reſpect or gratitude in his behaviour towards his maſter, and indeed his being the author of another Philoſophy was no proof of it: the other Platonicks would be in the wrong to expect that he ſhould exactly follow the ſteps of Plato in every thing; for did not Plato himſelf improve upon the lights, which Socrates had given him? Whether this be ſo or not, it is aſſerted in the life of Ariſtotle, that he did not ſet up any ſchool in the Lyceum, during the life of his maſter, and they prove it from this reaſon, that Chabrias and Timotheus, who were relations of Plato, and at that time men of great power in Athens, would never have ſuffered it. They add, that Ariſtotle dedicated an altar to Plato with an honourable inſcription; and that he did not teach in Athens till after the death of Speuſippus, who ſucceeded Plato. Laſt of all, they remark that he did not undertake this employment of himſelf, but by the ſollicitations of the Athenians, who deputed meſſengers to him upon that account. The old Latin verſion of this life of Ariſtotle is in ſome places more full than the original. For example, in that place where the Author denies that Ariſtotle ſet up a ſchool in the life-time of Plato, the tranſlation remarks that this was a piece of calumny of Ariſtoxenus and Ariſtocles; whereas the Greek has not a word about it. See what Euſebius quotes from Book VII of this Ariſtocles, where you will find a paſſage of Ariſtoxenus, which ſeems to compriſe under general and pretty obſcure terms this accuſation againſt Ariſtotle; and then you will ſee that Ariſtocles, after having refuted ſeveral other accuſations, deſerts his cauſe with regard to the ingratitude of this diſciple (37). Therefore F. Rapin was miſtaken in his aſſertion (38) when he ſaid that Euſebius entirely clears him of this aſperſion (39). I cannot imagine the reaſon why this Jeſuit joins with Euſebius as two different Apologiſts, Ammonius and Philoponus; for the life of Ariſtotle which he cites has but one Author; who according to ſome is Ammonius, according to others Philoponus.

[F] There were ſome very diſadvantageous reports ſpread of him concerning his amours.] We are preſented here with a complication of obſcenities. The calumniators of Ariſtotle gave out that he uſed to retire to the houſe of Hermias, who was commander of Atarne, a little city of Myſia, near the Helleſpont, and that Hermias indulged him in criminal gratifications: Ὃν οἱ μὲν φασὶ παιδικὰ γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ (40). i. e. "Whom "ſome uſed to call his darling." That he gave him his daughter or niece to wife; and that ſeeing him ſmitten with his concubine, he gave her up to him (41); that Ariſtotle was ſo doatingly fond of this woman, that after having married her, he offered up to her the ſame ſacrifice that the Athenians did to Ceres; and that he moreover made an acknowledgment of his obligations to Hermias in an Hymn which he compoſed in honour of him. I need not acquaint my readers, ſince they will plainly diſcover without it, that all theſe ſlanders came not from the ſame pen, but were deviſed by different Authors. One of the apologiſts of Ariſtotle has obſerved, that they did not agree in levelling againſt him the ſame accuſations; but that every one of his accuſers laid diſtinct crimes to his charge (42). It may be anſwered indeed, that this is a mark there was no confederacy and colluſion in the caſe; but give me leave alſo to reply, that it is a mark that they had no good proof for any thing they ſaid; for when a formal accuſation has been once proved, all thoſe who write againſt the accuſed are perpetually reproaching him with it. The ſame Apologiſt obſerves, that if of ſo great a number of crimes, which all the particular accuſations laid together would have amounted to, any one had been true, he would have ſuffered for it a thouſand times over, if poſſible, by the judges of thoſe times. Amongſt other things laid to his charge, his enemies gave out that he was a traitor to his country, and that letters of his had been intercepted which were written againſt the intereſts of the Athenians (43). But to return to the wife of Ariſtotle; ſome ſay that which the Prieſts had made againſt him [G], might have had the ſame conſequences with that againſt Socrates. Though one may very juſtly give him great praiſes, yet it is certain that moſt part of the lies or errors concerning him ought to be ſought for in the encomiums that have been heaped on him: as for example, is it not a falſity only to ſay, that if in his Phyſicks Ariſtotle has ſpoken like a man, in his Ethicks he has ſpoken like a God (f); and that there is room to doubt whether in his Ethicks he was more of the Lawyer than of the Prieſt, more of the Prieſt than of the Prophet, more of the Prophet than of God (g)? it was not till after her death that her husband offered to her the ſacrifices, which the Athenians uſed to offer to Ceres. Φασὶ (Lycon Pythagoræus) θύειν Ἀριστοτέλη θυσίαν τετελεσμένην τῇ γυναικὶ τοιαύτῃ, ἱερεῖον Ἀθηναῖς τῇ Δήμητρι (44). Ariſtocles makes the following reply to theſe accuſations, I, that the Books of Apellicon concerning the commerce of Hermias and Ariſtotle were an ample defence of theſe two friends: II, that Ariſtotle had ſufficiently juſtified his marriage with Pythias in his letters to Antipater. This Pythias was ſiſter to Hermias and his daughter by adoption. Ariſtotle made it appear, that he did not marry her till after the death of Hermias; that ſhe was a woman of a good life, but reduced to ſuch diſtreſt circumſtances after the death of her brother, that he thought himſelf under an obligation to marry her out of the regard he bore to Hermias.

(44) Idem, ibid.

[G] The Athenian Prieſts carried on a proceſs of irreligion againſt him.] The particular circumſtances of this affair are unknown. Diogenes Laertius is content with barely telling us (45), that the Prieſt Eurymedon charged Ariſtotle with impiety on account of the Hymn compoſed in honour of Hermias, as alſo of an inſcription engraved on the ſtatue of the ſame Hermias in the temple of Delphi. Phavorinus makes Demophilus the Author of this accuſation (46). It is impoſſible to be imagined by what artifice they could find any ſhadow of proof in the inſcription of Hermias, ſince it only conſiſted of four verſes, and thoſe not bearing the leaſt alluſion to things of a ſacred nature, but only to the perfidiouſneſs of the King of Perſia towards this unhappy friend of Ariſtotle. Athenæus tells us, that the other foundation of the accuſation, namely, the Hymn compoſed in honour of Hermias, was unjuſt, ſince it was not a religious Poem, nor any ſacred performance, as Demophilus pretended (47). Athenæus ſays further, that Eurymedon had ſuborned this Demophilus to give more weight to the accuſation (48). Demophilus in all probability was ſome man of quality and great authority in Athens, and perhaps did not ſee into the depth of Prieſt-craft, nor underſtand that the Prieſt Eurymedon only meant to make uſe of him as an inſtrument to render poor Ariſtotle more ſuſpected. The argument they went upon was this: If, ſay they, the Prieſts ſhould be the only perſons, who arraigned Ariſtotle, his caſe might appear leſs criminal, for their great piety is alarmed at the ſlighteſt matters, which ſeem to have any tendency to the diſhonouring of Religion: but behold! here is one Demophilus, who is ſo ſcandalized at the blaſphemies of Ariſtotle, that he demands publick juſtice on him: conſequently the crime muſt be very flagrant. The Hymn in queſtion is ſtill in being, and may be found in Athenæus and Diogenes Laertius; nor is there to be diſcovered in it the leaſt ſtroke of impiety. But his accuſers urged that Ariſtotle did manifeſtly profane divine Songs, by proſtituting them to the honour of a mortal man; and they further alledged, that he uſed to ſing this Hymn every day at dinner (49). Ariſtotle not thinking it ſafe to truſt to the interpretation that his little Poem might meet with, made his retreat very privately to Chalcis, in the Iſland Eubœa, and pleaded his cauſe at a diſtance by writing. Athenæus mentions ſome ſentences of this defence, but does not vouch for its being the genuine one of Ariſtotle (50). Phavorinus, in Diogenes Laertius, aſſures us, that Ariſtotle wrote an Harangue in the judicial kind, and that he was not only the firſt, who made any harangues of that kind in his own cauſe, but alſo that this was the firſt time he ever made any for himſelf (51). Nunneſius tells us, that Seneca de Vitâ beatâ obſerves, that this was the only one Ariſtotle ever made in his life (52). However that be, it is certain that the ſafeſt way he could take was to plead at a diſtance; for his accuſers were a ſett of people, who would never have let him been at reſt, and who would have employed ſo many engines againſt him, till at laſt they would have found one which would do his buſineſs effectually. It was ſcarce poſſible, ſo great a Wit as he was, for him to forbear, upon ſome occaſions, turning into jeſt the ridiculous manner of publick worſhip among the Athenians, and ſpeaking his mind a little too freely on the impoſtures of the Prieſts. They would, no doubt, have ſearched into all his private converſations, have ſuborned witneſſes; and, in a word, have cruſhed him ſo that he never would have been able to riſe again. How do we know but that he might have been taxed with uttering horrid blaſphemies when he intended to ſpeak only of the immutable Power of the all-perfect Being? Origen ſays that the indictment lodged againſt Ariſtotle for profaneneſs, was founded upon ſome particular doctrines of his (53): he ſays in another place, that one doctrine of the Peripateticks was, that prayers and ſacrifices were of no ſignification (54). Probably that notion was founded upon this falſe principle, that infinite Wiſdom knows at all times what is beſt for it to do, and that it never changes its rule of acting at the deſires or intereſts of mankind, as if it ſtood in need of being directed or prevailed upon by our prayers and interceſſions not to do what we think it has already determined to do. Such a principle as this, when not qualified by the doctrines of Religion, is impiety with a witneſs, and had the Athenian Prieſts once faſtened on this handle, Ariſtotle would never have eſcaped them. The anſwer which he made to thoſe who aſked him the reaſon of his retiring, ſhews that he was apprehenſive of their reſolution, right or wrong, to find out proofs againſt him. Πρὸς τὸν ἐρόμενον διὰ τί ἀπέλιπε τὰς Ἀθήνας, ἀπεκρίνατο ὅτι ἐβούλετο Ἀθηναίους δὶς ἁμαρτεῖν εἰς Φιλοσοφίαν· τὸ περὶ Σωκράτην πάθος αἰνιττόμενος, καὶ τὸν κατ' αὐτὸν κίνδυνον (55). i. e. "When one aſked him why he fled "from Athens, he made this anſwer; becauſe he "would not give occaſion to the Athenians to offend "a ſecond time againſt Philoſophy, alluding to the "ſuffering of Socrates, and his own danger." He uſed to quote a verſe of Homer, to ſignify that he could have no thoughts of living in a city, where the tribe of informers was ſo far from decreaſing, that ſome were no ſooner gone but others immediately ſtarted up in their room. One would be apt to imagine, that he knew himſelf to be guilty of having by ſome ſtroke of raillery perſonally affronted Eurymedon the Prieſt of Ceres (56), and that this was what rouzed the zeal of the man, who had for twenty years before paſſed over unmoleſted this pretended impious Hymn; for it was more dangerous to offend this ſort of Gentlemen in their own perſons, than in the perſons of their Gods. See the remark [R], where we will ſhew what were the ſentiments of ſome Authors about the cauſe of Ariſtotle's flight. I have mentioned towards the end of the article, how that Heſychius aſſures us, that he was actually condemned and executed at Athens; nor have I uſed any hyperbole in ſaying twenty years, ſince Ariſtotle had taught at Athens thirty years when the proceſs againſt him for irreligion obliged him to fly to Chalcis (57): nor did he return to Athens till after he had been Tutor to Alexander, which charge he did not undertake till after Hermias was dead.

Pallavicini makes no difficulty of owning in a manner, that without Ariſtotle, the church would have been deficient in ſome articles of faith [I]. The Chriſtians are not alone in authorizing his Philoſophy; the Mahometans are no leſs fond of him (b); and they ſay, that Another Philoſopher has out-done Averroes, and ſaid, "that Ariſtotle was a ſecond nature." Theſe are the words of Balzac, in page 459 of the Diſcourſes printed at the end of his Chriſtian Socrates. This puts me in mind of the ſcruples of a certain Author, who ſeeing that nature herſelf ſet her ſignet to what Ariſtotle invented, durſt not doubt the truth of what he ſaid. Recte & hoc Ariſtoteles, ut cætera; nec poſſum non aſſentiri viro, cujus inventis nec ipſa natura diſſentit (58). i. e. "Ariſtotle wiſely ſaid this, as he does "every thing elſe; nor can I but aſſent to a man "from whoſe inventions nature herſelf does not dif-"fer." A Spaniſh Divine pretends, that it is impoſſible for the utmoſt ſtretch of human underſtanding, without the particular aſſiſtance of a genius, to penetrate into the ſecrets of nature ſo far as Ariſtotle has done (59). He muſt therefore of conſequence believe that Ariſtotle had a good or evil genius, which inviſibly inſtructed him in a thouſand things, the knowledge of which human underſtanding cannot attain to. William Biſhop of Paris affirms, in ſeveral places of his works (60), "that this Philoſopher, in all his un-"dertakings, uſed to adviſe with a Spirit, which he "had brought down from the ſphere of Venus, by "the ſacrifice of a haltered lamb, and ſome other "ceremonies." Others ſay, that he had no need of ſuch aſſiſtance; and it was the opinion of a famous Divine, Henry of Aſſia (61), "that Ariſtotle was able, "by the mere ſtrength of his natural genius, to arrive "at as perfect a knowledge in Divinity, as that which "was communicated to our firſt father when he was "aſleep in Paradiſe (62), or to Saint Paul in his ec-"ſtacy." A Council held in France, under Philip Auguſtus, made an order to burn Ariſtotle's Metaphyſicks. An Engliſh Doctor, of the Order of St. Auguſtin (63), has left behind him in writing, that it was believed at that time, that no other than Antichriſt was to underſtand thoroughly the Books of Ariſtotle, which he would make uſe of to confute all thoſe who entered into diſpute with him. Let us put an end to this little collection with a paſſage of Agrippa, who tells us that the Divines of Cologne maintained, that Ariſtotle was the fore-runner of the Meſſias in the myſteries of nature, as John the Baptiſt was in the myſteries of grace. Digniſſimus profectò hodie Latinorum Gymnaſiorum Doctor, & quem Colonienſes mei Theologi etiam Divis adnumerarent, librumque ſub prælo evulgatum ederent, cui titulum facerent de Salute Ariſtotelis (64), ſed & alium verſu & metro de Vitâ & Morte Ariſtotelis, quem theologicâ inſuper gloſſâ illuſtrarunt, in cujus calce concludunt, Ariſtotelem ſic fuiſſe Chriſti præcurſorem in naturalibus, quemadmodum Joannes Baptiſta in gratuitis (65). i. e. "That moſt worthy Teacher, even at "this time of the Latin Schools, whom my Divines "of Cologne would have canonized, and publiſh'd a "book with this title, de Salute Ariſtotelis, as alſo "another in verſe and metre, de Vita & Morte Ari-"ſtotelis, which they have moreover illuſtrated with "a theological Comment, at the end of which they "conclude, that Ariſtotle was in the ſame manner "the fore-runner of Chriſt in natural things, as John "the Baptiſt was in ſpiritual." To ſpeak without prejudice in favour of one ſide or the other, one may venture to ſay, that theſe extravagant Panegyricks have heaped more diſhonour than reputation on the memory of Ariſtotle: and one may apply to them in ſome reſpects that expreſſion of Tacitus, peſſimum inimicorum genus laudantes (66), i. e. "flatterers, thoſe "worſt of enemies." One may beſtow on Ariſtotle ſo many praiſes that are juſtly due to him, that there is no manner of excuſe to be made in behalf of thoſe, who not content with giving him ſuch, have run into the moſt fulſome hyperboles (67). Why would it not have been ſufficient to have ſaid that he dipt his pen in good ſenſe (68)? This is what all Philoſophers ought to do, if we will take the word of the Prince of the Stoicks for it. Ὁ Ζήνων ἔλεγεν, ὅτι δεῖ τὸν φιλόσοφον εἰς νοῦν ἀποβάπτοντα προφέρειν τὸν λόγον (69). i. e. "Zeno "ſaid, that a Philoſopher ought to advance nothing "but what was tinctured with good ſenſe." Thoſe who have a mind to ſee the collections of praiſes, which have been heaped upon Ariſtotle, will do well to read George of Trebizonde (70), Pererius in chap. 1. of his fifth Book de Principiis, Juſtus Lipſius in Diſſertation iv of Book 1 Munuductionis ad Philoſophiam Stoicam, Theodore Angelutius in his Anſwers to Francis Patricius, &c.

[I] Cardinal Pallavicini . . . confeſſes . . . that without Ariſtotle the Church would have been deficient in ſome articles of faith.] The author of Cardinal Pallavicini's new Goſpel did not fail to lay hold of (71) theſe words of Chap. XIX, Book VIII, Num. 13. Di ciò ſi doveva in gran parte l' obligazione ad Ariſtotele, il quale ſe non ſi foſſe adoperato in diſtinguer accuratamente i generi delle ragioni, noi mancavamo di molti articoli di Fede. i. e. "In which reſpect ſhe is under great ob-"ligations to Ariſtotle, for if he had not been ſo em-"ployed in the accurate diſtinction of all ſorts of "reaſonings, we ſhould have wanted many articles of "faith." This encomium puts me in mind of a paſſage of Nicius Erythræus, as great a flatterer of Ariſtotle as was poſſible. This Author pretends that in vain the ſubtle and learned Patricius attacked with all his might the doctrine of the Lyceum, a doctrine impregnable to all attacks, and which will ever triumph in the deſtruction of its rivals. Altius Ariſtotelis auctoritas radices egit, quam ut cujuſquam vim impetumque pertimeſcat: viget ſemperque vigebit hominis diſciplina; tantumque quis exiſtimabitur ſcire, quantum ex doctrinæ ejuſdem fontibus hauſtum, intelligentiâ comprehenſum habuerit; ac nemo, cui cor ſapiat, non ſatius eſſe ducet in iis, quæ ad Philoſophiam pertinent, cum Deo, ut ita dicam, Philoſophorum errare, quam cum aliis rectè ſapere, minorum gentium magiſtris. Itaque ille, omnibus in gymnaſiis ad ſapientiam properantibus dux ſemper habebitur: ille Theologorum quaſi militiæ, adverſus religionis noſtræ hoſtes, definitiones, argumentorum copiam, & alia præclarè dicta multa, tanquam amentatas haſtas elargietur, quas illa theologicis lacertis, ac viribus de cælo ſuppeditatis, torqueat ac vibret (72). i. e. "The authority "of Ariſtotle has taken too deep root to be afraid "of the power of any man: his doctrine does and "will flouriſh, and the meaſure of every ones under-"ſtanding will be rated by what proportions of know-"ledge he has imbibed from his fountain of learn-"ing; nor will any one who has a grain of ſenſe, "not chooſe, in matters relating to Philoſophy, to "err with the God, if I may ſo ſay, of Philoſophers, "than to think right with any other petty retailers "of literature. He will ever be followed as a guide "in all ſchools, which take the ready road to wiſdom: "He will never be wanting to ſupply our Divines "militant with a ſufficient ſtore of definitions, ar-"guments, and excellent ſayings, which like ſo ma-"ny javelins they will hurl, with more than human "force, upon the adverſaries of our religion." I think myſelf obliged in juſtice to declare that Cardinal Pallavicini does not advance this maxim as his own, nor does he lay it down as an obſervation that he would recommend to the world: he only mentions it as an ill-natured piece of raillery of Father Paul: he in very plain terms calls it an impertinent banter, and pretends that the councils which made that ſubtle diſtinction betwixt the ſubſtance, the perſon, and the hypoſtaſis, were no leſs liable to be the ſubjects of it. In ſhort he does not deny the charge, but is content with laughing at thoſe who laugh at him for it (73). Father Paul, after having given us the decree of the VIth Seſſion, mentions what matters were canvaſſed in it; and among other expreſſions, ſays, that thoſe who were verſed in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory remarked, that all the other councils taken together, had decided fewer articles than this one Seſſion, in which Ariſtotle had a great ſhare: In che haveva una gran parte Ariſtotele, coll' haver diſtinto effatamente tutti i generi di cauſe, a che, ſe egli non ſi foſſe adoperato, noi mancavamo di molti articoli de Fede (74). i. e. "In which Ariſtotle had a great ſhare, by having "well diſtinguiſhed all ſorts of reaſons, in which if "he had not employed himſelf, we ſhould have want-"ed many articles of faith." that now at this time, notwithſtanding the ignorance that they ſuffer to reign among them, they have ſchools for this ſect [K]. This will be an eternal ſubject of ſurpriſe for thoſe who know well what Philoſophy is, to ſee that the authority of Ariſtotle has been ſo reſpected in the ſchools for ſeveral ages, that when a diſputant quoted a paſſage of this Philoſopher, he who maintained the Theſis durſt not ſay tranſeat, he was obliged to deny the paſſage, or to explain it after his manner [L]. It is thus that they uſe to act in the ſchools of Divinity, with regard to the holy Scripture. The Parliaments, who have forbid all other Philoſophies but that of Ariſtotle (i), may be better excuſed than the Doctors; for whether the Members of Parliament were perſuaded, as it is very probable that this Philoſophy was the beſt of all, or whether they did not believe it, the publick good was ſufficient to make them forbid new doctrines, for fear the Academical diviſions ſhould ſpread their malicious influences upon the tranquillity of the State. What then ought to aſtoniſh wiſe men the moſt is, that the Profeſſors were ſo furiouſly bigotted to the philoſophical hypotheſes of Ariſtotle. If they had been thus prejudiced in favour of his Poetry, and his Rhetorick, there would have been leſs room to be ſurpriſed; but they have been fond of the weakeſt of his works, I mean his Logick and his Phyſicks [M]. [K] Even to this day the Mahometans .... have ſchools for his Sect.] "The Peripatetick Philoſophy is "ſo firmly eſtabliſhed in every place, that now ſcarce "any other is taught in any of the Univerſities of "Chriſtendom; even thoſe which are conſtrained to "receive the impoſtures of Mahomet teach the ſci"ences no otherwiſe than as they are comformable "to the principles of the Lyceum, to which they are "ſo ſtrongly attached, that Averroes, Alfarabius, Al"mubaſſar (77), and ſeveral other Arabian Philoſo"phers have often deviated from the ſenſe of their "Prophet, to avoid contradicting thoſe of Ariſtotle, "whom the Turks have in their Turkiſh dialect and "in Arabic, as Belon * relates (78)." The Author from whom I have taken theſe words, ſays in another volume (79), that according to the account of Olearius, the Perſians have all Ariſtotle's works expounded by a great many Arabian Commentaries, which generally call his Philoſophy the goblet of the world. Bergeron, ſays he, in his treatiſe of the Tartars, remarks, that they have in their poſſeſſion the Books of Ariſtotle tranſlated into their own language, teaching his doctrine, with as much deference as can be paid him here, at Samarcand the Univerſity of the Great Mogul, and at preſent the capital city of the Kingdom of Usbec.

[L] When any diſputant quoted a paſſage from this Philoſopher, he who maintained the Theſis durſt not ſay tranſeat, he was obliged to deny the paſſage, or to explain it after his manner.] If any one dare diſpute the truth of this, I would recommend to his peruſal ſeveral courſes of Philoſophy printed in the XVIth Century, which will inform us that the following method was then practiſed. Firſt of all the reſpondent proved his Theſis by authorities, and then by arguments; the proofs of authorities were paſſages taken out of Ariſtotle. The anſwer to the objections conſiſted alſo of two parts, in the firſt he reconciled with his Theſis ſuch paſſages of Ariſtotle as ſeemed to make againſt it, and which ſerved his antagoniſt for proofs of authority, and in the ſecond part he took off the arguments drawn from reaſon, but never uſed to ſay, I confeſs that Ariſtotle was of this opinion, and yet I deny my Theſis to be falſe, or I aſſert the contrary, but uſed to employ all his ſkill in finding out ſuch a ſenſe for the paſſages objected to him, as might quadrate with his ſide of the queſtion. And the ſame method is ſtill obſerved in the Divinity Schools, amongſt thoſe of the Romiſh Church with regard to the writings of St. Auſtin and Thomas Aquinas.

[M] They have been fond of the weakeſt of his works; I mean his Logick and his Phyſicks.] To be convinced of the meanneſs of theſe performances, we need only read Gaſſendus's Exercitationes paradoxicæ adverſus Ariſtoteleos (80). He has there ſaid enough in general, againſt the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle, to convince every impartial reader how defective it is; but he overthrows in particular the Dialecticks of this Philoſopher. He applied himſelf in like manner to take to pieces his Phyſicks, Metaphyſicks, and Ethicks, but being apprized of the formidable reſentment conceived againſt him by the Peripateticks, he thought it better to drop his undertaking, than to expoſe himſelf to troubleſome perſecutions.

(80) They are in Vol. 3. of his works.

Let it be noted by the way, that we don't pretend to deny, but that there are many things both in the Logick and Phyſicks of Ariſtotle, which ſhew an exalted and profound genius: but granting this, we muſt at the ſame time allow that Caſaubon in the praiſes he gives him, runs very much into the hyperbole: Ego pueros puto fuiſſe, (Stoicos in Logica) præ divino Ariſtotele, & eorum in hoc genere ſcripta ὕδλον ἐ φλύναφον præ Ariſtotelis Organo: quo opere omnia mortalium ingenia (divina aut de rebus divinis ſemper excipio) longè ſuperavit (81): i. e. "In my opinion, they (the Stoicks "in regard to their knowledge in Logick) were mere "children in compariſon of the divine Ariſtotle, and "all their writings of this kind trifling and nonſenſe "in compariſon of Ariſtotle's Organum, in which work "he has ſhewn a genius far ſuperior to all mankind. "(I would be underſtood to except inſpired Authors, "and thoſe who have wrote upon divine ſubjects.") Nor is Rapin more moderate in his praiſes of him, as appears by this paſſage: "There was nothing like "any regular or eſtabliſhed ſyſtem of Logick before "Ariſtotle †. This great genius did with ſo much "reaſon and learning fathom the depth of the hu"man mind, that he penetrated into the moſt ſecret "receſſes of it, as appears by the exact diſtinction "he made of its operations. No one had hitherto "unlock'd the ſtore-houſe of human ideas, or ex"plored its dimenſions. Ariſtotle was the firſt who "invented the method of attaining to ſcience by the "evidence of demonſtration, and of coming geome"trically to that demonſtration, by the infallible rule "of Syllogiſm, a work ſure the moſt accompliſhed, "an undertaking the moſt ſurprizing that the mind "of man was capable of. This is a ſhort account of "Ariſtotle's art of Logick, which is the ſureſt and "only method of coming at certainty in argumenta"tion, and which will ſerve as an unerring rule "whereby to think juſtly, and reaſon truly (82)." One might do juſtice to this Philoſopher's treatiſe on Syllogiſm, without running into ſuch extravagant commendations of it. There are indeed in his Phyſicks ſome very ſublime queſtions, which he diſcuſſes and illuſtrates in a very maſterly way; but notwithſtanding the whole work if taken all together is a very mean performance: infelix operis ſumma. The chief occaſion of this defect is, that Ariſtotle forſook the path that the moſt eminent Natural Philoſophers before him had troden: they uſed to account for all the changes in nature from a new modification of the particles of matter, and never allowed of generation properly ſo called; which doctrine he rejected (83), and by that rejection he loſt and bewilder'd himſelf. He was obliged to teach, that new entities were produced, and the former ones annihilated; he abſtracted them from matter,

This juſtice muſt be done his blindeſt followers, that they have forſaken him in the things where he has claſhed with Chriſtianity [N]. Theſe things are of the utmoſt conſequence, ſeeing he maintained the eternity of the Univerſe, and did not believe that Providence extended to ſublunary beings. As for the immortality of the ſoul it is not certain whether he admitted it [O]. We ſhall relate in another place the long diſputes which have reigned in Italy upon that point. The celebrated Capuchin Valerian Magni publiſhed a book of the Atheiſm of Ariſtotle in the year 1647. It was then a hundred and thirty years ſince Mark Anthony Venerius had publiſhed a Philoſophy, which ſhews many contradictions between the precepts of Ariſtotle, and the truth of religion. Campanella maintained the ſame thing in his book de Reductione ad Religionem, which was approved at Rome, in the year 1630. It has been maintained in Holland lately, in the Prefaces of ſome books, that the doctrine of this Philoſopher does not differ much from Spinoziſm (k). However if we will believe ſome Peripateticks, he was not ignorant of the myſtery of the Trinity [P], he made a good end [Q], and enjoys everlaſting felicity [R].

(k) Haſſel, in the Preface to the Anti-Spinoza of Wittichius, printed in 1690, and the Preface of the Inveſtigatio Epiſtolæ ad Hebræos, of the ſame author, printed in 1691.

ter, and gave them names never before heard of, affirming or ſuppoſing things of which he had no clear and diſtinct idea. Now to pretend to philoſophize truly without ſuch evidence of ideas, is as abſurd as to think of ſteering a ſhip exactly without ſeeing the polar ſtar, or without a compaſs. It is like ſtriving to ſail without the wind, or travelling in a ſtrange country without a guide; 'tis like roaming in the dark in a houſe, wherein we do not know a ſingle apartment. Every one knows what an infinite number of forms and qualities diſtinct from ſubſtance the followers of Ariſtotle have introduced, bewildring themſelves in that intricate maze, into which he firſt ſhewed them the way; and if in the XVIIth Century Natural Philoſophy appeared again with new luſtre, it was only owing to a re-eſtabliſhment of thoſe ancient principles which he firſt deſerted, to the cultivating of evidence, and in a word, to the excluding from the doctrine of generation, that great number of entities of which our minds have not any idea, to their adhering to figure, motion, and the ſituation of the particles of matter, all which things we have a clear and diſtinct conception of.

[N] This juſtice muſt be done his blindeſt followers, that they have forſaken him where he has claſhed with Chriſtianity.] However, I will not take up the argument againſt Luther in defence of the Divines of Cologne. He reproaches both them, and alſo thoſe of Louvain for patronizing, or at leaſt qualifying with forc'd interpretations the moſt groſs and impious abſurdities of Ariſtotle. Ariſtotelem ipſis in ſummo eſſe pretio, & nihil ab eo dictum eſſe tam abſurde vel alienè à noſtrâ religione quod non defendant, quod non aliquâ interpretatione quantumvis longè petitâ circumveſtiant, quo ſuus illi conſtet bonos atque nominis exiſtimatio (84). [O] It is not certain whether he admitted the immortality of the ſoul.] Pomponatius and Niphus engaged in a very warm diſpute upon this ſubject. The former inſiſted that the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, was inconſiſtent with the principles of Ariſtotle; the latter as vigorouſly maintained the contrary. [P] According to ſome Peripateticks, he was not ignorant of the myſtery of the Trinity.] Emanuel de Moura diſputing with thoſe, who accuſed Ariſtotle of Atheiſm, ſays, I, that a certain woman wheedled him ſo artfully, that ſhe prevailed with him to conſult the Oracle of Apollo (86): II, that he ordered in his will, that the images of certain animals, which he had vowed for the ſafety of Nicanor (87), ſhould be dedicated to Jupiter and Minerva: III, that he confeſſes in his firſt Book de Cælo & Mundo (88), ſe cum aliis obtuliſſe Diis trina ſacrificia in recognitionem trinæ perfectionis in iis inventæ (89). i. e. "That he together "with others offered a threefold ſacrifice to the Gods, "in acknowledgment of the threefold perfection diſ"covered in them." From theſe paſſages they conclude, that he not only believed the exiſtence of Dæmons, and was ſcrupulouſly religious, but alſo that he acknowledged the Trinity of perſons in the unity of eſſence, according to the opinion of Salmeron (90), and of George of Trapezonde before him (91), who wrote an entire book of the Conformity of Ariſtotle's Doctrine, with that of the Holy Scripture. Naudé, from whom I have taken this, remarks, that Emanuel de Moura manifeſtly miſrepreſented Philoponus, who, following the Greek text and the old tranſlation, which is conformable to that of Nunneſius, only ſays that Ariſtotle, having attained to the age of ſixteen years (92), was counſelled by the Pythian Oracle to apply himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy.... As for the three ſacrifices which he offered to the Gods, theſe are the words of Naudé, or the acknowledging the Trinity, which ſeveral Catholick Doctors have aſcribed to him, "they are all chimera's, which "were originally founded on what he ſays in his firſt "Book of the Heavens, ſpeaking of the number three, "Διὸ πάντα τῆς φύσεως ἐληφότις ὥσπερ νόμους ἔκλινε καὶ "πρὸς τὰς ἀγιστείας τῶν Θεῶν χρώμενα τῷ ἀριθμῷ τούτῳ, i. e. "Therefore we make uſe of this number in celebrat"ing the ſacrifices of the Gods, nature itſelf ſeem"ing to have pointed it out to us as the moſt per"fect of all. From which paſſage no other con"cluſion can be drawn, than that Ariſtotle aſſerts it to "have been the cuſtom in his time to make uſe of the "number Three in their ſacrifices; which is alſo at"teſted by Theocritus." After this, Naudé obſerves, that Cardinal Beſſarion (93) ridicules George of Trapezonde for having taken ſo much pains to prove from this paſſage, that Ariſtotle was fully perſuaded of the Trinity; nor do the modern School-men abate any thing of this ſuppoſition. [Q] He made a good end.] Finding himſelf drawing near his latter end, he burſt out into a flood of tears, and betwixt anguiſh and hope implored the mercy of the ſovereign Being and firſt Cauſe of all things: and alſo very much approved of a ſaying in Homer's Odyſſey, in which it is ſaid, that it is not any ways unbecoming the dignity of the immortal Gods to take upon them the nature of man, thereby to enlighten and improve them. Which by ſome that are devoted to him is interpreted as a foreſight he had of the coming of Chriſt in the fleſh. Proditum & illud monumentis eſt, quum Philoſophus hic extrema ſibi ingruere præſenſiſſet, dolore ac ſpe in lachrymas amplius profuſum primæ cauſæ miſericordiam intentius imploraſſe. Quâ in re CHRISTI præſenſiſſe adventum augurantur nonnulli ejus viri gloriæ in primis addicti. Theſe are the words of Cælius Rhodiginus (94), whoſe authority in a matter of this nature is little or nothing to be depended upon. Others ſpeak differently of the laſt hours of Ariſtotle. They ſay that "he died of grief for not "being able to comprehend the cauſe of the flux and "reflux of the Euripus. We ſhall ſpeak of the adventures of theſe books in the notes upon the article TYRANNIO (l). He was extreamly honoured in his own country [S]; and there have been ſome Hereticks who adored his image jointly with that of Jeſus Chriſt. I have not found that the Antinomians bore more reſpect towards this Heathen than to the uncreated Wiſdom [T], nor that the Aetians were excommunicated, becauſe they gave to their diſciples the Categories of Ariſtotle for a Catechiſm (m); but I have read ſomewhere, that before the Reformation, there were ſome churches in Germany, where they read every Sunday the Ethicks of Ariſtotle inſtead of the Goſpel [U]. There are hardly any marks of zeal for religion that have not been ſhewn for Peripateticiſm. Paul de Foix celebrated for his Embaſſies and his Learning, would not ſee Francis Patricius at Ferrara, becauſe he heard that this learned Man taught another Philoſophy

[R] . . . . He enjoys everlaſting felicity.] Sepulveda, one of the moſt learned men of the 16th Century, has made no ſcruple of ranking him amongſt the Bleſſed, and has even defended his opinion publickly, and in print (98). The Jeſuit Gretſerus reprimands him for his too great confidence, but nevertheleſs confeſſes, that he is inclined in favour of Ariſtotle as well as Sepulveda, whom he only finds fault with for expreſſing himſelf in ſuch poſitive terms (99). Add to this my citation from Cælius Rhodiginus (100), and what ſome perſons of credit have remarked touching the reaſons which obliged Ariſtotle to quit Athens. Albertus Magnus has affirmed, that he was driven thence for the goodneſs of his morals, propter morum rectitudinem pulſus Athenis (101). Gretſerus in his Diſpute with Sepulveda relating to the ſalvation of Ariſtotle, makes no queſtion but that Ariſtotle underwent this voluntary exile in order to avoid that compulſion, which they intended to lay on him of paying worſhip to Idols, which he look'd upon as due to God alone (102). What a noble Refugee have we here for the ſake of the true Religion! Origen has put a very favourable conſtruction on this flight of Ariſtotle (103), who, explaining that precept our Lord gave his Diſciples, to flee from one city, when they were perſecuted, to another (104), tells Celſus, who ridiculed this according to his uſual profaneneſs, that the abſconding of Ariſtotle, whom we are ſpeaking of, was agreeable to the moral rule of the Goſpel, and that being perſecuted wrongfully, he took the ſame method that Jeſus Chriſt recommended to his Diſciples (105). I quoted a paſſage of Agrippa (106), where mention is made of a Book de Salute Ariſtotelis. Voetius, who was ſo largely acquainted with books, had never ſeen this, but knew almoſt the very year it was printed in: he ſays in a Theſis held December 15, 1638, that 140 years before it was printed at Oppenheim, and that Francis Junius had ſeen a copy of it (107). He adds, that one Lambertus de Monte, Author of a Commentary on Ariſtotle's Phyſicks, in which book he was ſtiled Doctor of Divinity, had written of the Salvation of this Philoſopher: Quæſtionem magiſtralem ſatis acutam ſcripſiſſe, oſtendentem per autoritates Scripturæ divinæ, quid juxta ſaniorem doctorum ſententiam probabilius dici poſſit de ſalvatione Ariſtotelis Stagiritæ (108). i. e. "That he "wrote on a ſcholaſtic and nice queſtion, ſhew- "ing by authorities from the Holy Scriptures, what, "according to the beſt opinion of the learned, might "probably be determined concerning the Salvation of "Ariſtotle the Stagyrite." You will find in a work, de Pietate Ariſtotelis erga Deum & hominem, which Fortunius Licetus dedicated to Innocent X, and which was approved of by two Inquiſitors General, ſeveral reaſons, by which he endeavours to evince that Ariſtotle is not damn'd.

[S] He was extremely honoured in his own country.] It had been laid waſte by King Philip, but Alexander, at the requeſt of Ariſtotle, cauſed its towns to be rebuilt. The inhabitants out of gratitude for this kindneſs, dedicated a holy-day to this Philoſopher; and after he was dead at Chalcis in the Iſland Eubœa, they fetched away his bones, built an altar upon his tomb, call'd the place by the name of Ariſtotle, and held their aſſemblies there afterwards (109). Mandeville in his fabulous Account of his Voyages, ſays, that this was ſtill in being in his time (110), that is, in the 14th Century.

[T] There have been hereticks who adored his image jointly with that of Jeſus Chriſt. I have not found, that the Antinomians bore more reſpect to him than to the uncreated wiſdom.] See the following paſſage of Father Rapin (111). "The Carpocratians were con- "demn'd for having plac'd the image of this Philo- "ſopher with that of Jeſus Chriſt, and for having "paid adoration to it, out of an extravagant zeal "they bore to his doctrine †. The Aetians were ex- "communicated by the Church, and even by the "Arians, from whom they took their original, be- "cauſe they gave to their ſcholars the Categories of "Ariſtotle inſtead of Catechiſms *. The Antino- "mians run even into that exceſs of impiety, as to "pay more reſpect to this wiſe Heathen than to the "uncreated Wiſdom ‡." I never diſcovered ſo much as by this place, that this agreeable Writer did not give himſelf the trouble of conſulting the originals. I allow that Baronius, under the year which Father Rapin refers to, ſays, that the Carpocratians had images, and among others that of Jeſus Chriſt (which they ſaid was made by Pilate,) as alſo that of Pythagoras, that of Plato and that of Ariſtotle, and that they paid them the ſame adoration that the Pagans paid to their Idols: but to alledge this was of no ſervice to him; for beſides that Baronius does not ſay a word of this being the reaſon why they condemned theſe hereticks, it does not appear that they were one jot more zealous for the doctrine of Ariſtotle than for that of any other of the Philoſophers, whoſe images they worſhip'd. My edition of Baronius (112) does not mention a ſingle word under the year 208, of what Father Rapin ſpeaks of; nor is it poſſible that any Sect, which ſprang from the Arians, could be excluded from the communion of the Church in the beginning of the third Century. It is under the year 356, that Baronius ſpeaks of Aetius; and he gives us a long paſſage out of Suidas, which informs us, not that this heretick gave his followers the Categories of Ariſtotle inſtead of a Catechiſm, but that he expounded things to them according to the method of Ariſtotle's Categories; which ſhews that he was well verſed in logical ſubtilties and diſputes. Juſt in the ſame manner a modern Spaniſh School-Divine, who undertook to explain a point of faith, formed it upon the plan of the ſchools: ſhall we therefore ſay that he ſubſtituted the works of Ariſtotle in the room of our Books of Religion? And then again to quote Euſebius in the 27th chapter of his Hiſtory, is a moſt unwarrantable way of proceeding, which Author, it is my opinion, does not ſay one word concerning the Antinomians.

Philoſophy than the Peripatetic (n). This was practiſing towards the enemies of Ariſtotle what the Zealots would have one do towards Hereticks. After all, it is no wonder that Peripateticiſm, as they taught it many ages ago, finds ſo many protectors]X], and the intereſts of it are thought inſeparable from thoſe of Divinity (o), for it accuſtoms the mind to acquieſce without evidence. This reunion of intereſts ought to be to the Peripaticks, a pledge of the immortality of their Sect, and to the new Philoſophers a ſubject of diminiſhing their hopes. Beſides, there are ſome Doctrines of Ariſtotle which the Moderns have rejected, but muſt at laſt receive (p). The Proteſtant Divines have thoroughly changed their maxims, if it is true that the firſt reformers cried ſo much againſt Peripateticiſm [Y]. That manner of death, which may in ſome reſpect do moſt honour to the memory of Ariſtotle, is, that the concern for not being able to diſcover the cauſe of the ebbing and flowing of the Euripus was the occaſion of his death [Z]. Some ſay that having taken refuge in the Iſland of Eubœa, on account of a proceſs of irreligion that was carried on againſt him at Athens, he poiſoned himſelf (q). But he need only have gone out of the city, to deliver himſelf from that perſecution by that means. [X] It is no wonder that Peripateticiſm . . . . has found ſo many protectors.] If all thoſe, who have embraced the Philoſophy of Mr. Des Cartes, had ſhewn that prudence and modeſty, as to ſtop when they were come to a certain length, if they had rightly judged what was proper to ſpeak and what to ſuppreſs (117), they would not have raiſed ſuch an outcry againſt the Sect in general. The method of the ancient maſters was founded upon good reaſons; they had doctrines for the world, and doctrines for the diſciples initiated into their myſteries: however it is certain that the application they endeavoured to make of the Carteſian principles to thoſe of Religion was very prejudicial to that Sect, and greatly hinder'd the progreſs of it; and indeed this is almoſt a neceſſary conſequence. The ancient Fathers complained heavily of the Sect of Ariſtotle (118), and it is almoſt a general complaint that Philoſophy is injurious to Theology; but on the other ſide, it is alſo as certain that Theology is as injurious to Philoſophy: they are two faculties, which could never juſtly ſettle their limits, did not the ballance of authority, which is always intereſted on the ſide of the former, make the regulation.

[Y] The firſt Reformers cried out ſtrongly againſt Peripateticiſm.] See the following paſſage from Father Rapin (119). "Nothing did more honour to the "doctrine of this great man (120) in the laſt Age, "than the bitter invectives of Luther, Melancthon, "Bucer, Calvin, Poſtel, Paul Sarpi (121), and of all "thoſe who wrote againſt the Romiſh Church at "that time; for they only cry down Ariſtotle, be- "cauſe the ſolidity of his method gives the Catho- "licks a great advantage in diſcovering the tricks "and artifices of falſe reaſoning, which hereſy uſes "to diſguiſe falſhood and deſtroy the truth." In another Book this Author talks with more ſolidity and judgment. "St. Thomas, ſays he (122), purſued Ari- "ſtotle's method ſo ſucceſsfully in explaining the "doctrine of the Romiſh Church, that Bucer, one of "the greateſt enemies that our Religion ever had, "uſed to ſay, Let the works of St. Thomas be ſup- "preſſed, and I will overthrow the Church of Rome *. It was this method of diſputing, taken from Ariſtotle, "which rendered the doctrine of our Religion ſo "formidable to all the innovators of the laſt ages, "which they being unable to withſtand endeavoured "to decry it, by declaiming againſt the School-men, "and particularly againſt Ariſtotle, from whom they "firſt borrowed this method, which has been eſtabliſh- "ed in the Schools ſince the times of St. Thomas. "The Anabaptiſts were the firſt who began to make "the univerſal ſtudy of this Philoſophy ſuſpected by "thoſe of their Sect, thro' all the Northern King- "doms, where they had any authority, and they "preached up the words of St. Paul to the Coloſſians, "to forbid it in their Schools †. Luther declared "himſelf ſo zealous an enemy to the Philoſophy of "Ariſtotle, that he publickly maintained in ſome "Theſes, at Heidelberg in 1518, that to reaſon agree- "ably to the principles of this Pagan, was to abandon "the maxims of the wiſdom of Jeſus Chriſt ‡; and he "never ſlipt any occaſion of furiouſly inveighing againſt "this Philoſopher in his writings; in which he was "imitated by Zuinglius, Peter Martyr, Zanchius, "Melancthon (123), and in ſhort by all thoſe who "oppoſed the doctrine of the Roman Church; which "made Melchior Canus, Biſhop of the Canaries, and "the moſt eloquent of all the School-men, ſay, that "the Lutherans had a great contempt for the Philo- "ſophy, taught at that time in the Schools ‡. Cal- "vin never mentions the name of Ariſtotle, but with "all the ſharpneſs and bitterneſs of ſtyle, that a tem- "per ſo waſpiſh and ill-natured as his could inſpire "him with. And in this manner was he treated by "all thoſe, who in the laſt Ages employed their pens "againſt the Church of Rome."

Would not this be truly to die in the bed of honour? Would not this look like ſetting to his work with a firm reſolution either to compaſs his enterprize or periſh in the attempt? Thoſe who have ſaid, that the genius of Ariſtotle knew no other bounds than thoſe of Nature, or that he was admitted to her moſt privy counſels, and to be her Secretary (124), ought to allow of no other account touching his death than this I am ſpeaking of; for a confident who ſees himſelf diſgraced, and excluded in his old age from the participation of a ſecret, ought not to ſurvive ſuch a degradation as this. But to ſpeak ſeriouſly, I cannot be of opinion that Ariſtotle could be ſo weak as to die with grief for ſuch a diſappointment. What likelihood that ſo wiſe a man as he was could ever take it in his head . . . . to give himſelf up to melancholy and deſpair, becauſe he was not able to conceive the reaſon of the ebb and flow of the Euripus, one who found his underſtanding limited by ſo many other things, of which he could be ignorant without any uneaſineſs (125)?

Juſtin Martyr and Gregory Nazianzen are often charged with things they never ſaid, relating to the death of Ariſtotle: they have no where ſaid that he caſt himſelf into the Euripus: Juſtin Martyr only ſays, that the ſhame of not being able to diſcover the cauſe of that Phænomenon made him die with grief. Οὐδὲ τὴν τῆ Εὐρίπυ φύσιν τῆ ὄντος ἐν Χαλκίδι γνῶναι δυνηθὶς διὰ πολλὴν ἀδοξίαν ᾗ αἰχύνῃ λυπηθὶς μετέτη τῆ βίυ (126). St. Gregory Nazianzen, ſtrictly ſpeaking, does not ſay ſo much; he contents himſelf with not contradicting Julian, who inſtanced Ariſtotle as an example of ſo great thirſt after knowledge as to die a martyr to it. Ἢ δ' τὴν Ὁμήρυ φιλομάθειαν περὶ τὰ Ἀρκαδικὸν ζήτημα· δ' τὴν Ἀριστοτέλυς φιλοσοφίαν δ' προσιδρίαν ἐπὶ ταῖς τῆ Εὐρίπυ μεταβολαῖς· ὑφ' ὧν τεθνήκασι (127). i. e. The number of ancient and modern writers, which have laboured upon Ariſtotle, either to comment upon him, or to tranſlate him, is infinite. There is a liſt of them, but not a compleat one, in ſome of the editions of all his works (s). See alſo a treatiſe of Father Labbe which is intitled, Ariſtotelis & Platonis Græcorum interpretum typis hactenus editorum brevis Conſpectus, printed at Paris in 1657, in 4to. Mr. Teiſſier names four Authors who have compoſed the life of Ariſtotle, namely Ammonius, Guarini of Verona, John James Beurerus, and Leonard Aretin (t). " and of which the Arcadian queſtion is a memora" ble proof; as alſo Ariſtotle's love of wiſdom, and
" his aſſiduous watching the ebb and flow of the Eu-
" ripus, which two things occaſioned the death of
" both theſe great men." This is ſomewhat remarkable, and perhaps what never any body took notice of. It is notorious that ſeveral perſons who have not that due regard for the Fathers of the Church they ought to have, take a pleaſure in charging them with a blind credulity; and expreſly accuſe them of having ſcandalized Ariſtotle on account of the Euripus; tho' there is ſome probability that Julian the Apoſtate himſelf allowed the fact which Juſtin Martyr ſpeaks of; for it appears by the anſwer of Gregory Nazianzen, that this Emperor joined Homer with Ariſtotle as two examples, where an eager thirſt after knowledge had occaſioned even the loſs of life; for they uſed to tell an old ſtory, how that Homer died for vexation, becauſe he was not able to anſwer a queſtion which ſome Fiſher-men put to him: now it is not incredible that Julian took up with ſome ſuch like tradition concerning Ariſtotle and the Euripus. I allow however, that he would ſcarce have mentioned it, if Ariſtotle had not ſo diligently watched the motions of the Euripus, and ſtudied ſo intenſely the reaſon of that Phænomenon, as by ſuch an application both of mind and body to deſtroy his health, and by that means bring upon himſelf that illneſs which proved mortal to him; and this ſeems to me more probable than any thing elſe. Euſtathius ſeems to have meant no more, when he ſpoke of the Euripus in the following manner: Ἐπτάκις τὸ ὅλον νυχθήμερον μεταβάλλει ὁ περὶ Εὔβοιαν Εὔριπος, περὶ ὃν φασὶ διατρίψαντα τὸν Ἀριστοτέλην καταλῦσαι τὸν Βίον. i. e. Giraldus had before laid the ſame thing to the charge of theſe Fathers, and from theſe facts has drawn a very pious concluſion. He ſays, I, that Juſtin Martyr aſſures us that Ariſtotle died for grief, becauſe he could not diſcover the flux and reflux of the Euripus: II, that Procopius has ſaid the ſame in the fourth Book of his Hiſtory: III, that Gregory Nazianzen having remarked, that it was a misfortune of Homer not to have been able to reſolve a queſtion, immediately deſpiſes the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle, with regard to the viciſſitudes of the Euripus, which occaſioned his death: IV, that the Greek Commentator on this Father ſays that this Philoſopher caſt himſelf into an arm of the ſea, ſaying theſe words, Ἐπειδὴ Ἀριστοτέλης οὐκ εἶλε τὸν Εὔριπον, Εὔριπος ἑλέτω τὸν Ἀριστοτέλην. i. e. The Author at that time thought he had compleated his catalogue of them, and had left nothing unſaid on that ſubject (4); but he proved by his own example that knowledge increaſes with age, for he had eleven more to produce, when he publiſhed his treatiſe de Scriptoribus Hiſtoriæ Philoſophiæ; and had alſo ſome new additions to make to what he had before related of ſome of the one and twenty. The preceding remark is one of theſe additions.

ARIUS, the head and founder of ARIANISM, a Sect which denied the eternal Divinity and Conſubſtantiality of the Word, lived in the fourth Century. He was born in Lybia near Egypt. Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, a great favourite of Conſtantia, ſiſter of the Emperor Conſtantine and wife of Licinius, contributed extreamly to the propagating this hereſy (a). He was of a ſubtle genius, a true court Biſhop, in a word, the moſt capable man in the world of making a new doctrine received. He took ARIUS under his protection, and introduced him into the favour of Conſtantia; for it is always imagined that unleſs the women engage in the intereſts of a Sect, the progreſs of it cannot be very conſiderable. Arius's party immediately grew ſtrong, and ſeveral Biſhops embraced it openly. There was nothing but diſputes in the cities: ſometimes they went from words to blows; ſo that it became abſolutely neceſſary for the Emperor to remedy theſe diſorders, which he did, in aſſembling the Council of Nice, which condemned the doctrine of Arius, in the year 325. This Hereſiarch was baniſhed by the Emperor; who commanded moreover that all his books ſhould be burnt, and that whoever dared to keep them, ſhould be puniſhed with death [A]. Some pretend that Arius, having abjured his hereſy in preſence of the Council, eſcaped baniſhment [B]; but others maintain that he was baniſhed [C], and that the Emperor did not recal him till ten years were expired (b) [D]. They ſay the Prince was made to believe that Arius was Orthodox at the bottom: and add, that Conſtantine being confirmed in this belief by the profeſſion of faith which this man preſented to him, wrote in his favour to the Biſhops who were aſſembled at Jeruſalem for the dedication of the Temple; that the Biſhops who remained in that city, when Arius arrived there with Conſtantine's letter, were for the moſt part concealed Arians, who therefore

[A] Conſtantine commanded that all the Books of Arius ſhould be burnt, and that whoſoever dar'd to keep them ſhould be puniſhed with death.] Socrates gives us the very letter in which Conſtantine gave orders that all thoſe who found any Book compos'd by Arius, and did not burn it, ſhould inevitably be puniſhed with death, as ſoon as ever they were diſcovered. Ἐκεῖνο μέντοι προαγορέυω, ὡς εἴ τις σύγγραμμα ὑπὸ Ἀρείου συνταγὲν φαρμακείῃ κρύψας, μὴ εὐθέως προσανεγκὼν πυρὶ καταναλώσῃ, τοῦτο θάνατος ἔσαι ἡ ζημία. παραχρῆμα γὰρ ἁλοὺς ἐπὶ τούτῳ κεφαλικὴν ὑποσήσεται τιμωρίαν (1). I don't remember to have read any author who has taken notice of this unaccountable and extravagant piece of conduct of Conſtantine. He was pleaſed only to baniſh the Hereſiarch, without denouncing death on his followers, and at the ſame time threatened to inflict it on ſuch as ſhould conceal any work of Arius. Who ever heard of a more enormous diſproportion betwixt faults and puniſhments? Might not a man be very orthodox, and yet have a curioſity to ſee what theſe Hereticks had to ſay for themſelves, and to keep their Books as a rarity, as ſuch commonly come to be that are comdemned to the flames? If therefore it had happened that ſome orthodox perſon ſhould have kept a Book of Arius, with ſome ſuch innocent deſign as this, and had been catched with it in his poſſeſſion, he muſt have been hang'd upon the ſpot, while a man that made a profeſſion of Arianiſm was ſuffered to live. What can be more fantaſtical, not to ſay abſurd, than to let Hereticks live, and at the ſame time to forbid them on pain of death to have in their keeping any of their founder's Books? We may alſo remark this, that tho' Arius, and ſome Biſhops his adherents were baniſhed, yet their converſation was ſtill more dangerous than the reading of their Books. Why then were not all ſuch, as ſhould reſort to theſe exiles, menaced with the ſevereſt puniſhment?

(1) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 9. pag. 32.

[B] Some pretend that Arius ... eſcaped baniſhment.] Baronius affirms upon the credit of St. Jerom, that Arius pretended to repent, and that after having ſubſcribed to the council of Nice, he was received by that council into the peace of the church, and his baniſhment remitted. It is not to be denied that St. Jerom ſays, that Arius made his peace with the council of Nice (2); but we ought to give infinitely more credit to the letter of that very council, than to the private opinion of a ſingle man who lived after that time. In this letter it is ſhewn how the opinions of Arius were canvaſſed and condemned; but as to what was determined againſt his perſon, and what became of him they forbear to mention, that they might not ſeem to take a pleaſure in inſulting over his diſgrace. Now is it likely they would ſpeak in this manner of a man, in whoſe recantation they had acquieſced? The learned Henry Valeſius reaſoning on the ſubject of this letter, takes occaſion to extol the moderation of this council, for not having expreſly thundered out its anathema's againſt the perſon of Arius, but only againſt thoſe in general, who ſhould teach ſuch and ſuch hereſies, and becauſe that, inſtead of ſolliciting the Emperor to baniſh the Hereticks, they ſhewed a concern at their baniſhment (3).

(3) Valeſius in Sozomenum, lib. 2. cap. 16. pag. 108.

[C] Others maintain that he was baniſhed.] It appears that Sozomen was one of this number, ſince he aſſures us that Arius was recalled a little after the ſeſſion of this Synod. Οὐ πολλῷ ὕ ὕςερον τῆς ἐν Νικαίᾳ Συνόδου, Ἄρειος ἐπὶ τὴν ἐξορίαν ἀπαγόμενος, ἀνεκλήθη (4). The ſubmiſſion of the two Biſhops, who were expelled their Churches, and ſent into baniſhment, afford us a proof of the baniſhment of Arius. I mean thoſe two prelates Euſebius and Theognis, who were exiled by Conſtantine three months after the breaking up of the council, as Philoſtorgius informs us (5), and obtained a repeal three years after the council, according to the ſame Author, which they obtained by ſigning their ſubmiſſion in writing to its deciſions, which they ſent to the Biſhops; in which they obſerved, that he who was the chief cauſe of theſe diſputes, had been recalled from his baniſhment; and that it would be unreaſonable, after his being admitted to terms of reconciliation, that they ſhould be debarred the privilege of making their innocency appear (6). We ſee here two facts proved, one that Arius was baniſhed, the other that he made his peace with the Biſhops, and obtained his liberty before Euſebius and Theognis obtained theirs: They obtained it in 328, according to Philoſtorgius, whoſe opinion exactly tallies with the Hiſtory of that time; whence it is manifeſt that the opinion of Arius's, not being recalled till 335, is falſe.

(4) Sozomenus, lib. 2. cap. 16. Valeſius obſerves that from the ſenſe of theſe words ἐπὶ τὴν ἐξορίαν, we are to underſtand that Arius was recalled as he was going to the place of his exile.

[D] .... that the Emperor did not recall him till ten years were expired.] Father Maimbourg has followed this falſe Chronology, the error of which has been clearly proved in the foregoing Remark.

therefore made no difficulty to pronounce his doctrine orthodox, and receive him into the communion of the church, that to gain a compleat triumph, they imagined that Arius muſt be re-eſtabliſhed in Alexandria, where he had received the firſt ſhock of excommunication; and that, as St. Athanaſius, who was Patriarch there, and was the grand adverſary of Arius, had been baniſhed, they thought that in his abſence it would be eaſy to re-eſtabliſh Arius in the communion of the church of Alexandria; but in that they were miſtaken; that the people would never admit him to it; that Conſtantine being informed of the continuation of the troubles, ſent for Arius to Conſtantinople, and obtained of him, without any difficulty, to ſubſcribe to the Council of Nice; that afterwards he ſent him to the Biſhops, which were then aſſembled at Conſtantinople, in order to have him received into the communion of this Imperial city; that he who was at that time Biſhop of it would never conſent to it, although it was repreſented to him that Arius had ſigned all was deſired of him; that Euſebius had notwithſtanding gotten the Eccleſiaſtical Communion to be given him in the great church of Conſtantinople; that he brought him thither as in triumph, accompanied with a great troop of his Partizans; but as they approach'd near the great ſquare, Arius being preſſed with a natural neceſſity, retired in haſte to a publick houſe of office, and died there upon the ſpot, all his entrails burſting out with his liver and ſpleen, in the year 336 (c). Some very learned men reject this Chronology [E]. Arius's Sect did not die with him, it has ſubſiſted a long while, and had reputation in ſeveral parts of the world. It cannot be enough admired at, that a Miniſter, who paſſes for a very learned man, was ignorant of ſo notorious a fact [F]. He was alſo ignorant of another, which is no leſs evident; for he has ſaid, that penal Laws were not put in execution

[E] . . . . And that he died in the year 336. Some very learned men reject this Chronology.] Henry Valeſius proves that Arius was not alive at the time of the Synod of Jeruſalem, which received letters from Conſtantine touching the reconciliation of ſome principal members of the Arian Sect. Arius Hereſiarches diu ante Synodum Hieroſolymitanam è vivis exceſſerat, ut certiſſimis argumentis probavi in libro ſecundo obſervationum Eccleſiaſticarum, Capite II (7). i. e. "Arius "the Hereſiarch died long before the Synod of Je- "ruſalem, as I have proved by undeniable arguments "in the ſecond book of my Eccleſiaſtical Obſervati- "ons, Chap. II." So that it could not be Arius the Hereſiarch, who was recommended to his Council by Conſtantine, and who found the Biſhops aſſembled at Jeruſalem. But notwithſtanding this, Socrates ſays in expreſs words, that the Council tranſlated from Tyre to Jeruſalem for the dedication of the temple, received Arius and his adherents into the communion of the Church in obedience to the letters of Conſtantine, in which he certified, that he was perſuaded both of the orthodoxy of Arius and Euzoius. Ἄρειον μὲν καὶ τοὺς περὶ αὐτὸν ἐδέξατο, τοῖς βασιλέως γράμμασι πειθαρχεῖν λέγοντας, δι' ὧν δεδήλωκει αὐτοῖς πεπεῖσθαι περὶ τῆς πίστεως Ἀρείου καὶ Εὐζοΐου (8). Conſtantine had ſent to the Biſhops aſſembled at Jeruſalem the profeſſion of their faith, which Arius and Euzoius had preſented to him (9), and St. Athanaſius ſays poſitively, that the Synod of Jeruſalem received Arius and his followers into its communion. Γράφοντες δεῖν δέχεσθαι Ἄρειον καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ (10). i. e. "Writing that Arius and his com- "panions ought to be received." Valeſius clears up this difficulty by ſaying, that there were two Arius's, one the hereſiarch, the other his follower; and that they were both excommunicated by Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria. He that preſented a profeſſion of his faith to Conſtantine, along with Euzoius, and who was reconciled to the Church by the Synod of Jeruſalem, was not the Hereſiarch but another Arius. Valeſius proves it not only by the reaſons, which he has produced to ſhew that the Hereſiarch died long before the year 335; but alſo by the petition of the two Biſhops, Euſebius and Theognis, who ſued for an Act of Grace, and made a proteſtation of their innocency in 328, alledging that the firſt cauſe and author of theſe controverſies had been reconciled and reſtored; which could not be meant of this Arius, who was re-united to the Church in the Synod of Jeruſalem; for the petition or profeſſion of their faith, which he and Euzoius preſented to Conſtantine a little before this Synod, that is to ſay about the year 335, ſhews that they were ſtill under a ſtate of baniſhment and excommunication. This ſudden death of Arius, in which the orthodox have diſcovered ſo many myſteries, happened after the Council of Jeruſalem. We muſt conclude threfore, that the Arius who died in this manner, was not the Hereſiarch, and that they have dated at one time what happened at another. It is ſurprizing that there ſhould be ſo little exactneſs and regularity in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that one cannot be poſitive of the baniſhment of Arius, the duration of that baniſhment, and things of the like nature, without arguing from different facts as atteſted by different Authors. One good Hiſtorian, tho' all the others were loſt, would be ſufficient to direct us in the order and ſeries of the moſt remarkable events.

[F] The Sect of Arius . . . . ſubſiſted a long while . . . . a Miniſter who paſſes for a very learned man, was ignorant of ſo notorious a fact.] Take his own words: I am alſo perſuaded, that the Arian Sect never formed any conſiderable body in the world. It is true that there have been ſeveral Biſhops, who were of this profeſſion; but the groſs of the people were never infected with this hereſy (11). What he ſays in another place is much more ſtrong; for he aſſures us, that Arianiſm run off like a torrent. We can't ſay in excuſe for him, that this was an error proceeding from careleſsneſs and want of attention, ſince he advances this fact as an eſſential and fundamental remark, on which he builds his Syſtem. His opinion on one hand is, that hereſies againſt the Trinity are fundamental and mortal; and on the other, that God has never ſuffered the Sects, which have fallen into this kind of hereſies, to be of any long continuance, or to make any figure in the world. God cannot permit, ſays he (12), that GREAT Societies of Chriſtians ſhould be immerſed in mortal errors, or that they ſhould perſevere any LONG TIME in them: at leaſt to judge by experience we ought not to think this poſſible, ſince it never yet happened. Mr. Nicolle was the firſt that reprimanded him for what he ſays in page 142; which he has done without any ſeverity or inſolence in the following manner: "What Mr. Jurieu ſays is very "true, if underſtood of the progreſs of Arianiſm, "which darted out all at once like a flaſh of lightning; "but not ſo exact as to the times, which ſucceed- "ed; for tho' the Church had recovered her full "luſtre in the greateſt part of the world, yet there "were ſome conſiderable bodies, as the Vandals in "Africa, the Goths in Aſia, in Italy, and a great "part of France and Spain, which entirely profeſ- "ſed Arianiſm, and where things were carried on "too openly for the common people not to bear a "part (13)." Some time after Mr. Peliſſon takes him to taſk, in theſe words: "The Arians were "nevertheleſs a thorn in his ſide, as well as the mo- "dern fanaticks, the Socinians, and thoſe whom he "ſtyles the Photinians of Poland and Tranſilvania. "A ſpark of modeſty would not let him aſſociate "himſelf with theſe in the ſame Church; however "he found out a way to get rid of them, without "entring into the diſpute, or applying himſelf to the "learned for information whether or no the founda- "dation they went upon was overthrown; and if "ſo,

" ſo, whether totally or partially. His meaning is, " ſays he, that he admits into the pale of the Church, " which is one and catholick, but ſuch Societies as " make a body. As for the Arians they have not " formed a body, at leaſt not any conſiderable one; " (this contradicts the evidence of all Hiſtory, which " in many places tells us of their Communion, their " Aſſemblies, and their Baſilica's or Churches, en- " tirely diſtinct from thoſe of the orthodox.) As " for the modern Fanaticks, the Socinians and Pho- " tinians, they have neither regular aſſemblies, po- " lity, nor union, and therefore ought to be look'd " upon as out of the queſtion. But if, according to " his own principles, God, to puniſh our faults and " unhappy diviſions, ſhould permit theſe common " enemies to multiply, and to form themſelves into " one regular body, then they are to be conſidered in " the ſame rank with others: ſo that take it which way " you pleaſe, he has a ſpecifick againſt all difficulties " (14)." The Author in his Reply to Mr. Nicolle, allows that the Arians compoſed a GREAT Body, but he inſiſted, that they enjoyed but a very ſhort reign in the world, and that God deſtroyed their Communion, becauſe it was not founded upon fundamental truths (15). A third Critick alſo ſtarted up againſt him, who maintained, as the two others had done, that Arianiſm had not only ſpread its infection to a very great extent, but alſo had been of a very long continuance, and that this hereſy had inſtilled its poiſon into the common people. See the Book intitled Janua Cælorum reſerata (16). There you will find (17), that Arianiſm kept its ground with great glory for above the ſpace of three hundred years; that for almoſt two Ages it was the prevailing Religion in Spain; that it even aſcended the throne both in the Eaſt and in the Weſt, and that it reigned in Italy, France, Pannonia, and Africa. Sure never Author was ſo banded about, and driven from one unlucky conſequence to another ſtill worſe, as was the Author of the Syſtem by the feigned Carus Larebonius (18). They have proved to him, that if God never permitted any great Societies of Chriſtians to be immers'd in mortal errors, or to continue in them any long time; and that if God has occaſioned the deſtruction of Arianiſm, becauſe it did not adhere to the fundamental truths; then it neceſſarily follows, I, that the errors of the Roman Church are not mortal; II, that Mahometaniſm has adhered to the fundamental truths. The Author of the Syſtem, to evade his conſequence, pretends that Mahometaniſm is a Sect, that took its growth from Chriſtianity, and can diſpute neither the extent nor duration of it. Theſe are objections which the moſt ſubtil caviller cannot anſwer with all his ſophiſtry. The Synods could not any ways pretend ignorance of this Book; and notwithſtanding they never paſſed cenſure on this doctrine of the Syſtem, tho' the ſcope of it is a full juſtification of the Roman Church, and conſequently to convict the Reformed of ſchiſm.

[G] . . . . He has ſaid that penal laws were not put in execution againſt this Sect.] We ſhall here give the reader a famous paſſage out of his Preſervative againſt change of Religion. The Miniſter I am ſpeaking of publiſhed this Book during his abode in France (19), in oppoſition to the Catholick Expoſition of the Biſhop of Condom. Take his own words in page 11 (20): The Church has ſuffered perſecutions, but never exerciſed any. It has got the aſcendant over Paganiſm, as Paganiſm had over it; but never tyrannized in the ſame manner. It never made uſe of the authority of the Conſtantines and Theodoſius's to bath the Temples of their falſe Gods with the blood of their worſhippers, as the Pagans employed the ſwords of their Nero's, Maximinus's, Decius's, and Dioclefian's, to ſpill the blood of the Chriſtians. A man muſt be very little vers'd in the Hiſtory of the Church not to know that in the war, wherein it was engaged with the Arians, Eutychians, and other Hereticks, it never armed itſelf with any other weapons than Exhortations, Arguments, Councils and the like. The Author of the Philoſophical Commentary had juſt reaſon to be amazed, that a Profeſſor in Divinity, and one who was look'd upon in France as a man very knowing in Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, ſhould betray ſuch a piece of ignorance as this (21). But he was ſtill more amazed that, after this thing had been ſet in ſo clear a light by Father Thomaſſin, another French Writer, in his addreſs to the Biſhop of Meaux, ſhould have theſe words: I muſt beg leave, my Lord, to obſerve to you, that whatever acts of violence we read of, either in ancient or modern Hiſtory, to have been exerciſed by Princes on account of Religion, have always been look'd upon as ſpectacles of the utmoſt horror, and the very names of thoſe Princes are never mentioned but with infamy and deteſtation. See the reflection which the Commentator makes upon this paſſage: What! the Conſtantines, the Theodoſius's, the Honorius's, the Marcianus's, and the Juſtinians, who put ſo many penal laws in execution againſt the Sectaries, who condemned to death thoſe who perſevered in the Pagan idolatry, in Manicheiſm, &c.; and even ſuch as read or kept any heretical Books; as theſe names which are never mentioned but with infamy and deteſtation? How will he go about to prove this (22)? The Divine which publiſhed the Preſervative, has made a greater improvement in the ſtudy of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory ſince his tranſlation into Holland. He has learned to refute the doctrine of Toleration by the authority of the Conſtantines, the Theodoſius's, and the Charlemagne's. Paganiſm, ſays he (23), would ſtill have kept its ground, and three quarters of Europe have been Pagans at this day, if Conſtantine and his ſucceſſors had not employed their authority in the extirpation of it. In France he thought it unlawful to have recourſe to the ſecular arm; and in Holland he looks upon it as impious to ſay, that the ſecular authority ought not to interpoſe. Now who will be perſuaded to believe that maxim, that a change of climates does not cauſe a change of ſentiments?

[H] . . . . Great advantage has been taken of what he has ſaid of the belief of the Fathers who preceded Arianiſm.] He has aſſerted in his Paſtoral Letters, that theſe Fathers did not believe an equality of perſons in the Trinity, and that they admitted a temporal generation of the world, which conferred upon the ſecond Perſon his compleat and perfect exiſtence. It is plain, that this opinion is very near the ſame with that of Arius, and entirely overthrows the eternal Trinity of Perſons. The Biſhop of Meaux has purſued Mr. Jurieu ſo cloſe (25) on this head, that he made him break ſilence, which he had all along obſerved with regard to other articles, and provoked him to a reply, which however did him more diſkindneſs than his former ſilence; for he was forced to contradict himſelf, and diſown ſeveral things, and after all made no advantage by it. The Biſhop of Meaux took him to taſk again, and handled his antagoniſt ſo dextrouſly, that he never durſt enter the liſts with him again: ſo that amongſt the higheſt encomiums, that were paid this Prelate, they did not forget to mention his having put to ſilence the moſt formidable of Criticks (26). Mr. Jurieu was no ſooner out of the hands of the Biſhop of Meaux, but he fell into thoſe of Carus Larebonius, who demonſtrated to him, that if the Fathers of the three firſt Centuries had entertained ſuch a notion of the Trinity, and of the generation of the Word, as he charges them with, then it neceſſarily followed, that neither the hereſies of the Arians, nor that of the Socinians were mortal and fundamental (27). By the way we muſt take care that the victories gained over this Miniſter do not ſeem any ways to affect the doctrine of his Church, but only his private opinions. This is a caution, which the Hiſtory of the works of the learned (28) has given to

I find hardly any Author, who does not impute it as a crime to Arius, that he put his ſentiments in verſe, that they might be ſung by his diſciples. They condemn both the matter and form of the Poem, which he entitled Thalia [L]. There might be ſome prejudice in all this. A modern Author, who agreed in ſentiments with this Heretick, to the publick. Nor is this uſurping a Province, that does not belong to me, ſince it has a juſt title to a place in my Critical Dictionary, as it is falſly alledged to be a matter of fact, that the hereſy of Arius was implicitly taught by the Fathers of the three firſt Centuries. It is very ſtrange that Mr. Jurieu, after having conſidered Arianiſm in ſo many different lights, ſhould always happen to be of the wrong ſide. This one would think ſhould be more difficult than to find a Gladiator, who could never hit a bull. Taurum toties non ferire difficile eſt (29). i. e. "It is a hard matter not to be able to hit the mark once in ſo many "trials." I muſt not omit obſerving by the way, that in the diſpute of the matter of fact relating to the penal laws of Conſtantine, and the duration and extent of Arianiſm, the Authors I have ſpoken of above, pointed out to him his error in a very candid manner, and without having recourſe to inſult and invective, as is too often uſed againſt an adverſary in a caſe of the like nature.

(29) See Trebellius Pollio in the Life of Gallienus.

[I] This Sect has by turns been perſecuting and perſecuted.] It is not to be denied that the Orthodox were the firſt aggreſſors; for we have ſeen above, that Conſtantine inflicted baniſhment on ſome of the principal leaders of Arianiſm; and that he threatened with death all thoſe, who did not commit to the flames the writings of this Hereſiarch: but it is alſo certain, that Conſtantius his ſon, and Valens, who advanced Arianiſm to the Throne, treated the Orthodox with more rigour aud ſeverity than ever Conſtantine did the Arians. Tho' generally ſpeaking, the latter ſeem to have indulged toleration and liberty of conſcience more than the former; and this is a poſition, that the Philoſophical Commentator has undertaken to prove in the Supplement of his Work (30). Among other arguments he makes uſe of this, that at the time when Recaredus exſtirpated Arianiſm out of Spain, the number of Catholick Biſhops was far ſuperior to that of the Arian Biſhops, notwithſtanding that the Arian religion had prevailed in that Kingdom near the ſpace of two hundred years. This affords a very ſtrong preſumption, that they gave the Catholicks very little moleſtation.

[K] It periſhed by the means of ſecular authority.] Mariana paſſes very gently over the rigours which Recaredus was obliged to exerciſe, and excuſes them from the neceſſity there was for them, and becauſe they were not diſpleaſing to the people. Contigit autem Recaredo, quod haud ſcio an regum ulli, ut religione permutanda, quod propemodum neceſſe erat, motus exiſterent, ſed neque diuturni admodum neque graves; & ſeveritas animadverſionis non modo invidioſa non eſſet, quia neceſſario ſuſcipiebatur, ſed etiam popularis & cum bonis omnibus, tum infimo cuique gratiſſima (31). i. e. "Recaredus "was more fortunate in this reſpect, than perhaps "any other Monarch whatever, that thoſe commo- "tions, which are almoſt the neceſſary effect of in- "troducing a general change of religion, were nei- "ther laſting nor grievous; and the ſeverity of his "laws not only unattended with any odium, ſeeing "there was a neceſſity which enforced the making "and execution of them, but even popular and grate- "ful to perſons of all ranks." The Author referred to above, remarks, that if we did but know all the complaints, which the Arians had to make, we ſhould probably ſee a very long catalogue of acts of violence and oppreſſion; and that at beſt it was owing to accident, if Arianiſm happened to be ſuppreſſed without rigorous perſecutions; for altho', according to Mariana, ſeverities never were exerciſed, but when neceſſity required, yet we muſt conclude, 1, that if they were not exerciſed oftner, it was becauſe the Arians were not refractory: 2, that if they had been obſtinate and ſtubborn, they would have reduced them to the limits of obedience, either by fair means or foul (32). This Author ſhews us by the way (33) a very groſs contradiction, which thoſe writers, that make it their buſineſs to diſcourſe of converſions, generally fall into. They lay it down for a general maxim that obſtinacy is the characteriſtick of Hereſy; and nevertheleſs, the better to draw a veil over thoſe acts of violence committed by the proſelyte-makers, they give out that theſe converſions were brought about with a great deal of eaſe; and then from the eaſineſs of effecting them, they draw an argument to prove the Hereſy of the converted. True believers, ſay they, would never have ſo tamely deſerted their church; but the reſiſtance which the Arians made againſt King Recaredus was ſo feeble and ſhort, that one might very truly judge from thence, that it was the cauſe of falſehood which they fought in, not of truth, which is of itſelf capable to animate reaſonable ſouls, and inſpire them with bravery and reſolution (34).

[L] They condemn both the matter and form of the Poem that he had intitled Thalia.] We have a great deal of reaſon to condemn Hereſies, to pity thoſe who are ſincere profeſſors of them, and to hold in abomination ſuch as teach them to others, without believing them themſelves; for ſuch teachers are monſters of ambition and wickedneſs. But I cannot conceive how it comes to be our duty to accuſe Heretical Teachers, as of particular crimes for their obſerving a method adapted to the underſtanding of the ſimple, and for inſtructing them in a manner ſuitable to their groſs conceptions. After Arius left the boſom of the Church, he took it into his head to compoſe various ſongs for Mariners, Travellers, Millers &c. and he alſo ſet to muſick ſome others, which he looked upon as proper to affect his followers, according to their different diſpoſitions; endeavouring to infuſe the venom of his impiety into the moſt rude and ignorant by the ſweetneſs of his ſongs. . . . . But his Thalia was by far the moſt famous of all his compoſitions. He had borrowed the name and model of it from an ancient Poet named Sotades. . . . . This burleſque Poet affected ſo much ſoftneſs in the ſtyle of his ſong, and the cadence of it was ſo effeminate, that even the Pagans themſelves treated him with the utmoſt contempt and ridicule: nor is there any exaggeration of this in St. Athanaſius's account of it, ſince the very leaſt of the Poets and ſuch as wrote with the greateſt ſpirit of libertiniſm, even bluſhed at the immodeſty of the ſongs of this infamous Poet of antiquity. It was in imitation of this Author, that Arius gave his work the name of Thalia, which properly ſignifies a feaſt and aſſembly of young people, or a ſong made on purpoſe to be ſung at ſuch ſort of feaſts (35). After this Mr. Hermant tranſcribes a very long paſſage from St. Athanaſius (36), in which Arius is called a ſort of Sotades which would be thought ridiculous even by Pagans . . . . and a Heretick who had no other emulation but that of excelling in ſuch ridiculous diſcourſes as were thoſe of Sotades. In the ſame paſſage we have the beginning of the Thalia, and another fragment, which contains the heretical notion of Arius touching Jeſus Chriſt. One cannot forbear condemning the ridiculous and inſupportable pride, which appears in this exordium of the Thalia. But once more let us blame Arius for having been a Heretick, and not when this is ſuppoſed, for having drawn up a form of his belief in verſe, for then we ſhould give a handle to Hereticks and Infidels to condemn true Chriſtians, not only becauſe they profeſs their belief of the true Goſpel, but alſo becauſe they ſing, not only the Pſalms of David, but alſo ſeveral hymns and ſongs, the meaſure and tunes of which may be very like thoſe of the moſt profane and wanton ſongs of an Opera. Generally ſpeaking it is more commendable for any one, whatever his particular profeſſion be, to chant pious and religious Poems, than to ſing wanton ſonnets and lampoons; and the Sailor and Miller in their unhappy ſtate of Arianiſm, ſhewed a better diſpoſition in chanting their Catechiſm than in ſinging their amours. It is a very weak argument to alledge that the ſongs of the Arians were held in contempt by the very Heathens; for I do not ſuppoſe that they made any great difference betwixt the Arians and orthodox Chriſtians, but equally hated them both; nor were were the former more favourably diſpoſed to the worſhip of the Pagan Idols than the latter. But neither am I of opinion that Mr. Hermant had any good grounds to ſay, that even the very Pagans looked upon Arius as a very contemptible and ridiculous man; for the words which he ſets down a little afterwards make it plainly appear that it was Sotades and not Arius, whom St. Athanaſius ſpoke of as a perſon, that was ridiculed by the very Pagans. I have ſaid it before, and I ſay it again, that very pious and religious verſes may be ſet to the ſame ſort of rhimes, and meaſure with the Opera-ſongs; and conſequently why not alſo to the ſame with the verſes of Sotades? For the harm does not conſiſt in the ſimilitude they bear to them in theſe reſpects, but rather in the handle they give to cavillers to ſpeak contemptibly of ſuch verſes. It is not my deſign to be thought to have ſaid any thing in this obſervation, which may any ways juſtify or extenuate, what is contained in the ſubſtance and matter of the Poem. Now to let Proteſtants in particular ſee, what judgment they ought to form of the invectives againſt the Thalia of Arius, it will be proper to acquaint them with what Father Maimbourg publiſhed againſt the Pſalms tranſlated by Clement Marot, which he does not treat with leſs ſeverity than he does the Thalia of Arius. What he ſays of the Thalia may be ſeen in his Hiſtory of Arianiſm (37); and what he ſays of the Pſalms in that of his Calviniſm (38). Theſe are the Pſalms which were ſung at that time; to which Beza afterwards added the remainder of the Pſalter, which were ſet to muſick and ſung to the moſt ſoft and effeminate tunes, and without any thing of that devout and ſolemn air, which is in the muſick of the Catholic Church. What Varillas ſays is not altogether falſe, that the tunes were choſen and from among the fineſt ſongs of that time (39). See the divine Melody of Jeremy de Pours (40). It was not without deſign, that I inſtanced the example of Opera-ſongs, ſince I would intimate thereby, that we ought to be more cautious how we imitate common ſongs in ſpiritual hymns, otherwiſe we ſhall but too much expoſe religion to contempt and ridicule, as appears by the Book which the Author of the Evêque de Cour has ſo bantered (41). It is a collection of ſpiritual ſongs compoſed by a Jeſuit and F. Martial de Brive, a Capuchin, which were ſet to the moſt burleſque tunes that were ever ſung in the ſtreet; as for example to the tune of Daye d'en Daye, and Vous y perdez vos pas Nicolas, &c. I very much queſtion whether the Thalia of Arius could equal the impertinence of this collection, tho' printed with the approbation of two Doctors in Divinity.

ARMINIUS (JAMES) Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden was born at Oude-Water (a) in Holland, in 1560 [A]. He was an infant when his father died, and he was beholden for his firſt inſtructions to an honeſt Prieſt, who had entertained ſome liking of the opinions of the reformed, and to avoid being obliged to ſay Maſs, often changed his habitation. Arminius was a Student at Utrecht, when death deprived him of this Patron. This loſs would have troubled him greatly, if he had not had the happineſs to be aſſiſted by Rodolphus Snellius his countryman, who carried him with him to Marpurg, in 1575. He was hardly arrived there, when he heard that his country had been ſacked by the Spaniards. This news plunged him into a dreadful affliction, and he could not forbear returning to Holland to be an eye-witneſs of the ſtate that things were reduced to; but having found that his mother, his ſiſter, his brothers, his relations, and almoſt all the inhabitants of Oude-Water had been murdered, he returned to Marpurg, and went this whole journey on foot. He did not ſtay long before he returned to Holland, being acquainted with the foundation of the Univerſity of Leyden, and he ſtudied in this new Academy, with ſo much application and ſucceſs, that he acquired a very particular eſteem. He was ſent to Geneva in 1582 at the expence of the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam, that he might perfect his ſtudies; and he applied himſelf chiefly to the Lectures of Theodore Beza, who at that time was explaining the Epiſtle to the Romans. He had the misfortune to diſpleaſe ſome leading men of the Univerſity, becauſe he maintained the Philoſophy of Ramus in publick with much heat, and taught it in private: He was obliged therefore to retire, and ſo went to Baſil, where he was received with applauſe. He read publick Lectures there [B], and gained ſo great a reputation, that the faculty of Divinity was pleaſed

(a) This word ſignifies in Dutch Old Water, whence it comes that Arminius is intitled in his book, Veteraquinas.

[A] He was born . . . . in the year 1560.] Bertius takes a great deal of pains to ſhew, that this year in which Arminius was born, was famous for two remarkable circumſtances, from which, no doubt, he would have us draw ſome reflexions. He obſerves, that Melanchthon died this year, as alſo that it was the ſame in which was held the conference of Poiſſi, where the Proteſtant deputies pleaded the cauſe of two thouſand one hundred and ninety Churches, which humbly requeſted of the King to be indulged in liberty of conſcience (1). We ſhall paſs over this calculation of his, which perhaps is not very exact, but miſtaken in the year; for the conference of Poiſſi began in the month of September 1561; but begin the year either at Eaſter, or the firſt of January, you will never acquit Bertius.

[B] He read publick lectures at Baſil.] Profeſſor James Grynæus, was ſometimes preſent at them, and paid him very handſome compliments: and when he was engaged in diſputing on any queſtion, he made no ſcruple of deputing him to anſwer for him ſuch objections as appeared difficult: Let my Dutchman, ſaid he, anſwer for me. Solent Baſiliæ feriis vindemialibus doctiores ſtudioſi publicè interdum in Academiâ exercitii gratiâ aliquid extra ordinem docere. Eum laborem Arminius noſter haud invitus ſuſcepit, laudatus ob id à Reverendo viro D. Jacobo Grynæo, qui etiam lectiones ipſius præſentiâ ſuâ aliquoties cohoneſtavit: idem quoque in diſputationibus publicis, ſi quid gravius proponeretur, aut dignus vindice nodus occurreret, non eſt veritus honoris causâ, Arminium noſtrum mediâ in ſtudioſorum turbâ ſedentem citare, & (ut Grynæi candorem agnoſcas) dicere, "Reſpondeat pro me Hollandus meus (2)." i. e. He excuſed himſelf modeſtly from receiving this honour, and returned to Geneva, where having found the adverſaries of Ramiſm leſs hot, he alſo moderated his ardour. He was deſirous to ſee Italy, and above all to hear at Padua the Philoſophical Lectures of the famous James Zabarella. He ſatisfied this curioſity, and ſpent ſix or ſeven months in this journey; after which, he came back to Geneva, and afterwards to Amſterdam, where he found himſelf much calumniated on account of his journey to Italy [C]; which had a little cooled the affection of the Magiſtrates, his patrons and favourers. He eaſily juſtified himſelf among men of ſenſe, but there were ſome weak and ſuperſtitious ſpirits who ſtumbled at this ſtone (b), till he made the whole church ſenſible of his fine talents for preaching. By this means he gained the love and eſteem of every body. His own Collegues paid homage to his learning, and owned that his Sermons were uſeful to them. Martin Lydius, Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker, judged him a fit perſon to refute a writing, wherein the doctrine of Theodore Beza upon Predeſtination had been attacked by ſome Miniſters of Delft. Arminius

I had this circumſtance, not from Bertius, but Philip Pareus. He tells us that Theodore Beza adviſed one of his friends to curb the ſubtilty of his genius, as being an engine, which Satan very often made uſe of, and not without ſucceſs to lead aſtray and deceive very great men. " Take care you do not, adds Beza, entangle and en" ſnare yourſelf in vain ſubtilties; and when any " new notions ariſe in your mind, however they may " pleaſe and flatter you at firſt, yet do not give your" ſelf up to them, till you have thoroughly weighed " and ſifted them. In a word, moderate and reſtrain " the vivacity and over-forwardneſs of your genius. I " myſelf, who, I thank God, am not quite deſtitute " of all natural endowments have endeavoured all " along to follow this advice, which was given me by " that great man of bleſſed memory JOHN CALVIN, " when I firſt gave myſelf up to the ſacred ſtudies, " nor have I ever yet repented taking his advice, nor, " I hope, ever ſhall." Sicut magnopere te hortor, ut " Dei dona in te collata omni ſtudio excolas; ita cum te αὐχμὸν non vulgari donatum eſſe videam, quâ ſæpe ad maximos decipiendos viros non irrito conatu Satanas eſt abuſus, velim te diligenter cavere, ut nullis inanibus argutiis te ipſum irretias; & quoties nova quædam tibi in mentem veniant, diligenter illa, quantumlibet in initio tibi illa arriſerunt, excutere, priuſquam approbes. Neque me hujus conſilii unquam pœnituit, nec, ut ſpero, pœnitebit (3). Philip Pareus had the original of this letter of Theodore Beza; and he ſubjoins, that James Grynæus gave the like admonition to Arminius. In quam ſententiam clariſſimum & ſagaciſſimum JACOBUM ARMINIUM, novi Pelagianiſmi inſtauratorem in Belgio, cum juvenis operam daret S. Theologiæ in Academiâ Baſilienſi, graviter quoque admonitum fuiſſe a venerando ſene D. JACOBO GRYNEO, cujus memoria ſit in benedictione! ipſemet mihi, quando ad pedes ejus in Raurica diſcentium Synagoga ſederem, narravit (4). i. e. " To which purpoſe alſo the moſt celebrated and " moſt ingenious JAMES ARMINIUS, the reſtorer of the " modern Pelagianiſm in Holland, while he was yet a " young man and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Di" vinity in the Univerſity of Baſil, was very earneſtly " admoniſhed by that venerable Old-man JAMES GRY" NEUS, whoſe memory be ever bleſſed! He himſelf " told me this, when I ſat at his feet, in the circle " of his ſcholars at Baſil." If any one ſhould except againſt me for having ſet down thoſe two paſſages at full length only with a deſign to ſwell the volume of my Book, he will at the ſame time give a proof of his want of judgment; for they are not only very proper for a great many, but even neceſſary to ſome readers to furniſh them with uſeful and profitable reflections. Let us remember the maxim of St. Paul, Learning puffeth up (5); but let us alſo beware of another talent which puffeth up ſtill more. A man of ſtrong memory, and vaſt reading, is apt to value himſelf upon his knowledge, and be proud; but he values and prides himſelf ſtill more, when he thinks he has found out a new method of explaining or treating any ſubject; he does not then look upon himſelf ſo much the maſter of a ſtock of learning, for which he ſtands indebted to Books, as the Author and firſt inventor of a new light or doctrine; it is his own inventions that he is in love with, and which have for him the moſt bewitching charms; it is this that blinds him and flings him off the biaſs of his judgment. This is the rock which many young people of fire and ſprightly wit ſplit upon, and which they can't be too often or too much cautioned to beware of.

[C] He was very much calumniated on account of his journey into Italy.] Of all the epidemical diſtempers the human mind is ſubject to, I don't know any more culpable and more fruitful of ill conſequences, than that cuſtom of giving ourſelves up to ſuſpicions. It is a ſlippery way which carries us inſenſibly away from the point we ſet out from; we eaſily ſlide from the firſt ſuſpicion to a ſecond; from poſſibility we immediately paſs on to likelihood, from thence to ſtrong probability, and ſo what was juſt now but a reaſonable preſumption is preſently become certain and undeniable; and this pretended truth is immediately propagated thro' a whole city; and it is obſervable, that great cities are more ſubject to this contagion than others. It was given out at Amſterdam, that Arminius had kiſſed the Pope's toe, that he had a great intimacy with the Jeſuits, that he had procured an acquaintance with Bellarmine, and that he had abjured the Reformed Religion. Tho' all this was falſe, yet theſe calumnies did not fail to make an impreſſion on the minds of the Magiſtrates, who maintained this young man. Let us hear what the Author of his funeral Oration ſays. Inter damna (itineris Italici ponebat) quod in ampliſſimi Senatûs Amſterdamenſis offenſiunculam ob id factum tunc temporis incurriſſet, ſuffundentibus frigidam quibuſdam, quos omnino præſtitiſſet judicia in ipſius reditum ſuſpendere. Hinc ergo, ſumptâ occaſione, ſpargebatur in vulgus illum Pontificis ſoleam deoſculatum, quem non niſi in confertâ turbâ, ut reliqui ſpectatores, vidiſſet; nec ſoleat bellua honorem iſtum niſi Regibus ac Principibus deferre (6): Jeſuitis adſueviſſe, quos nunquam audiviſſet: Bellarmino innotuiſſe, quem nunquam conſpexiſſet: Religionem orthodoxam abjuraſſe, pro quâ paratus eſſet ad ſanguinis uſque profuſionem decertare (7). i. e. " Among his " misfortunes (occaſioned by his journey into Italy) he " reckoned up the following: that he had thereby in" curred the diſpleaſure of the moſt auguſt Senate of " Amſterdam, ſome people having inſinuated ſuſpi" cions, whom it would have become better to ſuſ" pend their judgment till his return. Hence a han" dle was taken to ſpread it publickly abroad that he " had kiſſed the Pope's ſlipper, whom he had never " ſeen but in a crowd with other ſpectators; nor is " it the cuſtom of that beaſt to admit any to that " honour but Kings and Princes: that he frequent" ed the ſchools of the Jeſuits, whom he had never " heard: that he was known to Bellarmine, whom " he had never ſeen: that he had abjured the ortho" dox Religion, in defence of which he was ready " to lay down his life."

minius complying with his intreaties undertook to refute this work; but upon examining it and balancing the reaſons on both ſides, he came into the opinions that he propoſed to deſtroy, and went afterwards ſtill further than theſe Miniſters of Delft. He joined with them in condemning Beza the Supralapſarian, and acknowledged no other election, than that which was founded in the obedience of ſinners, to the vocation of God by Jeſus Chriſt. They gave him trouble about this at Amſterdam: they accuſed him from departing from the common doctrine, but the authority of the Magiſtrates ſtopped the diſſenſion. He was called to the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity at Leyden in 1603, and he was obliged to ſet all his engines at work, to gain his diſmiſſion from Amſterdam. He compaſſed it at laſt; and after he had diſſipated the bad impreſſions which had been made with regard to his doctrines, he was created Doctor of Divinity at Leyden (c), and inſtalled in the place of the Profeſſor Francis Junius. He had exerciſed his Miniſtry in the church of Amſterdam for fifteen years. The diſputes upon Grace ſoon after kindled in the Univerſity, and the States of the Province were forced to appoint conferences between him and his adverſaries. He was ſent for to the Hague ſeveral times, and went thither to give an account of his doctrine. This conteſt, his continual labour, and the concern of ſeeing his reputation blaſted by a multitude of ſlanders (d), impaired his health ſo much that it threw him into a fit of ſickneſs of which he died October 19, 1609 [D], with ſtrong ſentiments of piety and reſignation (e). It were to be wiſhed that he had made a better uſe of his parts [E]; for although it is very probable that his intentions were good, one may ſay he made innovations without any neceſſity, and in ſuch circumſtances

[D] The concern of ſeeing his reputation blaſted . . . impaired his health . . . threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, of which he died 1609.] It is very probable, that this anxiety contributed more than any thing elſe to his untimely death. This was a ſort of bad leaven, which fermented the peccant humours, and heaped upon him a complication of a thouſand diſtempers. Quum indomita mali pertinacia ipſi quoque arti (Medicinæ) faceret opprobrium: altius enim defixa quam ut evelli poſſet, nova indies excitabat ſymptomata, febres, tuſſim, hypocondriorum extenſionem, expirandi difficultatem, oppreſſionem à cibo, laborioſos ſomnos, atrophiam, arthritidem; nullamque ægro pauſam vel requiem concedebat: acceſſere poſtea dolores in inteſtinis, ilio, & colo, cum obſtructione nervi optici ſiniſtri, & ejuſdem oculi obfuſcatione (8). i. e. "Whilſt the obſtinate malignity of the diſtemper even baffled all the "ſkill of the Phyſicians, it being fixed too deep to be "rooted out, raiſed every day in new ſymptoms, "fevers, a cough, a ſwelling of the hypochondria, "difficulty of breathing, oppreſſion after eating, trou-"bled ſleep, atrophy, gout; and allowed him no "reſpit: to theſe ſucceeded pains in his bowels, and "an obſtruction of the left optic nerve, and a blind-"neſs in the ſame eye." He was often heard to groan, and to cry out, as a Prophet did formerly, Wretch that I am, O my mother, why did you bring me into the world? &c. The following paſſage is taken from Bertius. Quid mirum ſi commotus fuerit famæ ſuæ, ſalutis & laborum diſpendio; quum ne viro bono quicquam famâ ſuâ ſit antiquius, neque Chriſtiano ſalute, neque S. Theologiæ doctori petitis ex ſcriptura demonſtrationibus? Oppreſſio, inquit Siracides, inſanire facit ſapientem. Eadem huic dolorem, ex dolore morbum conciliavit, ex morbo mortem. O tetrum & viperinum, exque imo tartaro excitatum malum! Quoties illum ex Prepheta privatim etiam cum gemitu exclamantem audivimus! Væ mihi, mater mea, quare genuiſti me, virum diſcordiæ in univerſâ terrâ? Nec fœneravi, nec fœneravit mihi quiſquam; & tamen omnes maledicunt mihi. Revocavit tamen ſeipſum ad rationis & tranquillitatis ſepta (9). i. e. "What wonder if he "ſeemed ſo much diſturbed at ſeeing his reputation "aſperſed, his ſalvation called in queſtion, and all his "labours loſt, ſince to a good man nothing can be "dearer than his good name, to a Chriſtian than his "ſalvation, to a Doctor in Divinity than ſcriptural "proofs? Oppreſſion, ſays the ſon of Syrac, makes a "wiſe man go mad. This was what brought upon "him that grief which was the occaſion of his diſ-"temper, which effected his death. O dreadful and "tormenting anguiſh! How often have we heard "him in bitter groans crying out, when by him-"ſelf, as the Prophet did! Oh me! O mother, why "did you bear me, a man at enmity with all the "world? I have neither put out to uſury nor taken in "upon uſury from any one, and yet every one curſeth "me. Then he would recover his reaſon again, and "be calm and ſedate." One cannot reflect upon this without lamenting the vanity of human affairs. We are apt to look upon ſtupidity as a great misfortune; and thoſe fathers who are clear-ſighted enough to diſcern the dullneſs of their ſons, make it a matter of great affliction to themſelves; they wiſh to ſee them have a great genius and deep learning; and if they find them ſuch, then their joy is inexpreſſible: but alas! this too often proceeds from not knowing what they do or what they wiſh for. It had been a hundred times better for Arminius to have been a dunce than a man of ſuch parts and learning; for the glory of having a Sect to take its riſe and name from him, which has made no mean figure in the world, and produced ſome great genius's, is but a very chimerical happineſs, if compared to the more ſubſtantial evils, the ſorrows, vexations and bitter ſufferings he underwent in his life-time, and ſhortened his days; which he had never known had he been only a Divine of the common ſtamp, a blockhead, and in ſhort of that claſs of men to whom they apply that prediction, they will never make Hereſiarchs (10). Juvenal would not have failed to inſtance ſuch an example in his tenth Satyr, had there been any religious diſputes at that time, which had proved fatal to one of the Advocates.

[E] It were to be wiſhed that he had made a better uſe of his parts.] I mean that he had walked by the ſame rule which St. Paul did. This great Apoſtle, inſpired of God, and guided by the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit in all his writings, ſtarted to himſelf the objection, which natural reaſon might raiſe againſt the doctrine of abſolute Predeſtination: he was ſenſible of all the force of the objection, and ſtated it in the ſtrongeſt light, without diminiſhing the leaſt from it. God hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardneth (11). This is St. Paul's maxim; now ſee the difficulty which he propoſes to himſelf from it. But thou wilt ſay unto me then, why doth he yet find fault, for who is he that can reſiſt his will (12)? It is impoſſible to urge this objection farther, nor could the moſt ſubtle Moliniſts have ſaid more to the purpoſe in twenty whole pages; for what is the moſt they could have concluded from it, but that, according to the hypotheſis of Calvin, it is agreeable to God's will that men ſhould ſin? Now this is exactly the objection as St. Paul has ſtated it. But how does he anſwer it? Does he call to his aid any nice diſtinctions, or endeavour to qualify it by forc'd interpretations? Does he deny the conſequence, or ſtrive to evade any part of it? Does he enter into any ſeries of arguments, or take away the equivocation of the words? No, he does nothing at all of this; he only has recourſe to the ſovereign power of God, and the ſupreme right the Creator has to diſpoſe of his creatures as ſeemed good unto him. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliеſt againſt God? Shall the thing formed ſay unto him that formed it, why haſt thou made me thus (13)? He acknowledges here an incomprehenſibility which ought to put an end to our diſputes, ſtances where innovation was a ſource of diſorders, which ended in ſchiſm. He left ſeven ſons, and ſome daughters, and a great number of diſciples who continued the diſpute with ſo much vehemence, that it was neceſſary to have recourſe to a national Synod. They were there condemned, but would not ſubmit, and formed a Sect apart, which ſtill ſubſiſts, and fell by degrees into many other more conſiderable errors. The Amſterdam edition of Moreri points out ſome Authors who may give a light into this famous diſpute. I add the Hiſtory of Triglandius and Boxhornius, and a late work of a Profeſſor of Tubingen (f). This great diſpute was very fruitful in writings on both ſides. diſputes, and impoſe a profound ſilence on our reaſon. He breaks out (14), O the depth of the riches both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God! how unſearchable are his judgments, and his ways paſt finding out? All Chriſtians ought to look upon this as an irreverſible decree, as the dernier reſort from which there can be no appeal touching Diſputes upon Grace; or rather they ought to learn from this conduct of St. Paul never to diſpute at all upon Predeſtination, but at firſt to oppoſe this as a barrier againſt all the ſubtleties of human wiſdom, whether they ariſe in our minds while we meditate on this great ſubject, or are propoſed to us by others. The ſhorteſt and beſt way is to oppoſe at firſt this ſtrong bank againſt the inundations of our reaſonings, and to look upon this definitive ſentence of St. Paul as an unſhaken rock ſtanding in the midſt of the waves, againſt which the tow'ring billows ſpend their rage in vain, they foam, they beat againſt it with fruitleſs violence, and after all but daſh themſelves in pieces. Thus ought this diſpute to be conducted betwixt Chriſtian and Chriſtian, but if at any time it ſhould be thought requiſite to exerciſe the underſtanding and to take the point into conſideration, we ought however to ſound a retreat in good time, and to withdraw behind the fence I am ſpeaking of. Had Arminius done this every time his reaſon ſuggeſted to him any difficulties againſt the hypotheſis of the Reformers, or whenever he ſaw himſelf called upon to anſwer his antagoniſts, his conduct then would have been truly ſage and apoſtolical, and he would have made a proper uſe of his intellectual faculties. If he met with any knotty points, which his reaſon could not untie in the ordinary doctrine, or if he found himſelf better diſpoſed to cheriſh a leſs rigorous opinion, he was at liberty to give private ſentiments their full ſcope, but then he ought at leaſt to ſtop here, and to have enjoyed the benefit of them in ſilence, I mean without attacking the rights of poſſeſſion, ſeeing it was not poſſible for him to do that without raiſing terrible tempeſts and hurricanes in the Church. His ſilence on this ſubject would have prevented a world of miſchief which befel him; and it may juſtly be ſaid that it would have been well for him had he remember'd the old moral,

But, it may be ſaid, was it not acting the part of a prevaricator, and beneath the dignity of a Miniſter to be guilty of any neglect of informing his hearers, and ſetting them to rights when under any error in point of doctrine? To which we anſwer, that two capital reaſons diſpenſed with his doing this, the one, becauſe he did not believe that the hypotheſis he diſapproved of was prejudicial to ſalvation; the other, becauſe his new method could be of no ſervice in clearing up the principal difficulties, which occurred on the ſubject of Predeſtination. It muſt be allowed, that the ſmalleſt truth is worthy to be propoſed and made manifeſt, and that there is no error however trifling and inconſiderable, which is not better rectified than retained; but when circumſtances of time and place do not ſuffer us to propoſe novelties, tho' never ſo true, without at the ſame time introducing a thouſand diſorders in the Univerſities, in private families, and in ſhort in all the State, it is much better to let things remain as they are, than to ſet about a Reformation of them, ſince the remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe. We ought in this caſe to imitate the practice of Phyſicians with regard to certain patients, whom they do not allow to take phyſick, by reaſon it would inevitably ſtir up a thouſand ill humours in the body which are leſs dangerous in a ſtate of coagulation than of agitation (17). I except all thoſe caſes, where the ſalvation of ſouls is concerned, and where we are obliged to deliver them from the jaws of hell; there charity does not permit us to be inactive, how great ſoever the diſturbances may be which happen in the concluſion, but we muſt refer the iſſues to the care and direction of Providence. Arminius had no motive of this kind, which put him upon oppoſing the common and received doctrine, nor was it his opinion, that to follow the hypotheſis of Calvin, was riſquing one's ſalvation. We will alſo ſhew why he was inexcuſable upon another account. He ſubſtituted in the room of one hypotheſis, which abounded with great difficulties, another which at the bottom was attended with no leſs. One may very well ſay of his hypotheſis, what I have before ſaid of the Innovations of Saumur (18): it is more compact and leſs intricate than that of Monſr. Amiraut; but after all it is but a palliative remedy; for the Arminians have no ſooner anſwered certain objections, which, as they pretend, cannot be refuted by the Syſtem of Calvin, but they find themſelves expoſed to others, which they cannot extricate themſelves out of, but by ingeniouſly confeſſing the weakneſs of our underſtanding, or by paying an humble ſubmiſſion to the infinite incomprehenſibility of God. Was it worth his while to enter into a diſpute with Calvin for this? or did it become him to be ſo ſanguine at firſt, when he was forced at laſt to take ſhelter in this aſylum? Why did you not, it may be aſked, begin there, ſince ſooner or later you will be obliged to have recourſe to it at laſt? You are not to imagine, that after having entered the liſts with a potent adverſary, he will quit the field to you, becauſe you have gained ſome advantage over him at the beginning of the combat. The racer who gets before his adverſary the firſt third part or half of the courſe, is not upon that account entitled to the prize, but that is to be reſerved for his reward only, in caſe he gets the advantage at the latter end. It is exactly the ſame in caſes of controverſy: it is not enough to parry the firſt thruſts, we muſt ſtand our ground, anſwer objections, back our queſtion with proofs, till all difficulties are cleared up. Now this is what neither the hypotheſis of Arminius, nor that of the Moliniſts, nor yet that of the Socinians is capable of doing (19). The Arminian Scheme is only calculated to gain ſome ſmall advantage in the prelude to the combat, as Generals are wont to order out detachments of what they call the forlorn Hope, to begin a ſkirmiſh; but when they come to a deciſive battle, they are forced to retire behind the intrenchments of an incomprehenſible myſtery.

☞ Since Mr. Bayle's death there has been publiſhed in 1724 a very accurate and compleat Life of Arminius, written in Latin by Gaſpar Brandt, formerly Miniſter of the Remonſtrants at Amſterdam, and Author of the Hiſtory of the Reformation in the Low Countries. We ſhall therefore extract ſome particulars from his Hiſtoria Vitæ Jacobi Arminii relating to our Divine. He obſerves, that Arminius was not the firſt even among the modern Divines, who oppoſed the doctrine of abſolute Predeſtination, and other points of that nature [A], though he was unhappily expoſed to the perſecution of his brethren upon that

[A] Was not the firſt even among the modern Divines, who oppoſed the Doctrine of abſolute predeſtination.] Among the Ancients, St. Auſtin and his followers, Proſper, Hilary, Fulgentius, and others, aſſerted this doctrine in very ſtrong terms; but St. Chryſoſtom, St. Ambroſe, and other Fathers, both of the Greek and Latin Church, were of very different ſentiments in that point, as appears evidently from their writings. But when the ſchools became devoted to St. Auſtin, and he was conſidered as the ſtandard of Orthodoxy preferably to all other ancient writers, there was a very zealous conteſt between the Franciſcans and Dominicans, in what ſenſe that Father was to be underſtood, with regard to that doctrine. When the Proteſtant religion began firſt to be publiſhed, there was a variety of opinions among the Reformers upon this ſubject; for Luther, Calvin, and Beza maintained one ſyſtem, while Eraſmus, Melanchthon, Bullinger, Sarcerius, Latimer, and many other eminent Divines were of contrary ſentiments; and they were followed in the Univerſity of Heidelberg by George Sohnius, at Cambridge by Peter Baro, in the United Provinces by John Holman, Anaſtaſius Veluanus, Hubert Duiſhuſius, Snecanus, and other conſiderable men. But notwithſtanding theſe differences, a brotherly charity and harmony was preſerved between them. But when ſeveral Miniſters, eſpecially thoſe, who had ſtudied at Geneva, or in the Univerſities of the Palatinate and Naſſau, began to enforce their rigid notions concerning the divine Decrees upon others, and refuſed to admit thoſe into the Miniſtry, who were of different ſentiments, and endeavoured to exclude thoſe, who had been already admitted; diſputes aroſe upon this account, and our Arminius particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by oppoſing their arbitrary impoſitions. This is the repreſentation of Brandt in his life of Arminius (1). We have a more ample account of the riſe and progreſs of the controverſies concerning predeſtination in Dr. Heylin's Hiſtoria Quinq-Articularis, or a declaration of the Judgment of the Weſtern Churches, and more particularly of the Church of England in the controverted points reproached in theſe laſt times by the name of ARMINIANISM. He obſerves in his preface, that if Tertullian's rule be good, that thoſe opinions have moſt truth, which have moſt authentic Antiquity, (id verum eſt, quod primum, as his own words are,) the truth muſt certainly run moſt clearly in that part of the controverſy, which hath leaſt in it of the ZUINGLIAN or CALVINIAN Doctrines: About the year 180 Florinus, and ſome others at home had expreſly affirmed, that God was the Author of ſin; which aſſertion was immediately attacked by St. Irenæus, who publiſhed a diſcourſe intitled (2), περὶ τοῦ μὴ εἶναι τὸν Θεὸν ποιητὴν κακῶν, i. e. "That "God was not the Author of ſin." This doctrine was afterwards propoſed in another form by the Manichees, and always conſidered by the Ancients as the moſt dangerous Hereſy. Nay St. Auſtin himſelf, notwithſtanding all his zeal againſt Pelagius, aſks this Queſtion (3); Quis noſtrum dicit, quod primi hominis peccato perierit Arbitrium de humano genere. i. e. "Who of us af-"firms that Free Will is periſhed utterly from man-"kind by the fall of the firſt man." He replies to this: Libertas quidem periit per peccatum; ſed illa, quæ in Paradiſo fuit habendi plenam cum immortalitate juſtitiam: i. e. "Freedom indeed is deſtroyed by ſin; "but it is that freedom only, which we had in pa-"radiſe, of having perfect righteouſneſs with immor-"tality." For otherwiſe, as Dr. Heylin obſerves (4), it appears to be his opinion, that man was not merely paſſive under all the influences of Grace, according to that celebrated expreſſion of his, Qui creavit te ſine te, non ſalvabit te ſine te; i. e. "that he, who firſt "made thee without thy help, will not ſave thee at laſt "without thy concurrence." But if any harſher expreſſions have eſcaped his pen, as it commonly happens in the heat of diſpute, they are to be qualified by this laſt rule, and another of his, in which it is affirmed, that God could not with juſtice judge and condemn the world, if all men's ſins proceeded not from their own Free Will, but from ſome over-ruling Providence, which enforced them (5). In the Council of Trent there was a conteſt between the Dominicans and Franciſcans upon the ſubject of the Decrees. The moſt conſiderable Divines there inclined to the opinion of the great School Divines, St. Thomas Aquinas, Scatus, and others, who affirm'd that God before the creation, out of the maſs of mankind, hath elected out of mere mercy ſome for Glory, for whom he hath prepared effectually the means to obtain it; that their number is certain and determined, and none can be added to them. And that others, who are not predeſtinated to ſalvation cannot complain ſince God hath prepared for them ſufficient aſſiſtance for this purpoſe, tho' none but the elect ſhall be ſaved. This doctrine they endeavoured to prove from St. Paul's Epiſtles and St. Auſtin. But the Franciſcans repreſented it as injurious to the attributes of the Deity, ſince he would act partially, if without any cauſe he ſhould elect one, and reject another, and unjuſtly, if he ſhould damn men for his own will, and not for their faults, and create ſo great a multitude of men to condemn them. Catarinus, who was for a middle way between the two opinions, obſerved, that St. Auſtin's doctrine was not heard of before his time; and himſelf confeſſed, that it cannot be found in the works of any writer before him. He added, that his heat againſt Pelagius had tranſported him too far (6). It appears upon a general view, that the Franciſcans among the Papiſts, and the followers of Melanchthon and the Arminians among the Proteſtants, were on one ſide with regard to the Divine Decrees; and the Dominicans, the rigid Lutherans, who followed Flacius Illyricus, and the Sublapſarian Calviniſts on the other; while Catarinus took the middle way, in which he was afterwards followed by Dr. Overal, Profeſſor of Divinity at Cambridge, and ſucceſſively Biſhop of Litchfield and Norwich (7). Calvin found out a way by himſelf, which neither the Dominicans, nor any other of the Followers of St. Auſtin's Rigors, as Dr. Heylin expreſſes it (8), had found out before, by making God lay on Adam an unavoidable neceſſity of falling into ſin and miſery, in order that he might ſhew his mercy in electing ſome few of his poſterity, and his juſtice in the abſolute rejecting of all the reſt. This ſcheme appeared very ſhocking to many of the Papiſts, and ſo offenſive to the Lutherans in general, that they have profeſſed a greater readineſs to return to Popery, than to give their aſſent to it (9). But by Calvin's intereſt it was received almoſt univerſally in all Churches of his platform, tho' ſtrongly oppoſed by Sebaſtian Caſtalio in Geneva itſelf, who met with that account. His real name in Low-Dutch was James Hermanni (a), or Jacob Van Harmine, according to Dr. Heylin in his Hiſtoria Quinq-Articularis (b). He was very fond of Poetry all his life, and wrote ſeveral Poems in all kinds, which Brandt had in his poſſeſſion among Arminius's papers (c). He was ordained Miniſter at Amſterdam the 11th of Auguſt 1588, when he was twenty eight years of age, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Sermons, which were remarkable for their ſolidity and learning; ſo that he was extremely followed upon that account, and univerſally applauded. In order to confine himſelf to a regular method in his preaching, he undertook to explain alternately the Prophet Malachi, and the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Romans. He began the explication of the latter on the ſixth of November the ſame year, and endeavoured principally to ſhew the deſign of the Apoſtle with regard to the juſtification of the Jews and Gentiles, and the neceſſity of the Goſpel-Faith, with the inſufficiency of the works of the Law. He reſolved to diveſt himſelf, at his firſt entrance into his function, of all prejudices; and, whatever regard he might retain for thoſe perſons, who were of the higheſt diſtinction in the church, and to whom he had been moſt particularly obliged, he determined to follow alone what he thought himſelf to be the doctrine of Chriſt (d). This reſolution of his he ſhewed very remarkably the year following by his conduct in the diſpute concerning Predeſtination [B]. Sept. 16, 1690, he married Elizabeth Real, daughter of Laurence Real, with ſevere treatment from Calvin and Beza upon that account. The terror of this example, and the great reputation, which Calvin had gained by his preaching and writing, not only confirmed his power at home, but alſo made his doctrines the more eaſily admitted abroad. His ſyſtem therefore was zealouſly adhered to in all thoſe Churches, which either had received the diſcipline of Geneva, or whoſe Divines endeavoured to advance it. By this means; as Mr. Hooker obſerves (10) in the Preface to his Eccleſiaſtical Polity, that of what account the Maſter of the Sentences was in the Church of Rome, the ſame and more amongſt the Preachers of the reformed Churches Calvin had purchaſed, ſo that the perfecteſt Divines were judged, they who were ſkillfulleſt in Calvin's Writings. His Books almoſt the very Canon, to judge doctrine and diſcipline by. The French Churches both under others abroad or at home in their own country, all caſt according to that mold, which Calvin had made. The Church of Scotland in erecting the fabrick of their reformation took the ſelf-ſame pattern. This was received not long after in the Palatine Churches and in thoſe of the Netherlands; in all which as his doctrine made way to bring in the diſcipline, ſo it was no difficult matter for the diſcipline to ſupport the doctrine, and oppreſs all thoſe, who durſt oppoſe it (11). We may obſerve however, that Beza and his followers proceeded to a much greater exceſs of rigor in fixing the decree of Predeſtination before the Fall, which Calvin himſelf had placed in Maſsâ corruptâ, the corrupted maſs of mankind; and which was maintained by the more moderate Calviniſts. But as they agreed with the reſt with regard to perſonal election and reprobation, in reſtraining the benefit of our Saviour's ſufferings to the elect, and aſſerting the irreſiſtible efficacy of Grace, with the impoſſibility of falling from it, there was hardly any notice taken of their deviation, tho' they differed in the very foundation; and they paſſed under the general name of Calviniſts. Thoſe Divines of the Low-Countries, who were of the old Lutheran ſtock, were more inclined to Melancthon's ſentiments concerning Predeſtination, than to thoſe of Calvin; yet knowing the prodigious eſteem, in which the latter was held amongſt them, or being unwilling to engage in any diſputes, they ſuffered his opinions to prevail without oppoſition. In this manner affairs ſtood till the year 1592, when Mr. William Perkins, an eminent Divine of Cambridge, publiſhed his Book, called Armilla Aurea, &c. containing the doctrine of Predeſtination as it had been repreſented by Beza, but digeſted into a more diſtinct and methodical form. This induced our Arminius to oppoſe the current of thoſe opinions, which appeared to him extremely ſhocking and injurious to all our natural notions of the Deity (12). But in order to ſhew that the doctrine of the Remonſtrants was more ancient than Calviniſm in the Churches of the Low-Countries, we may obſerve, that thoſe Provinces embraced the reformation at firſt, according to the Lutheran model. About the year 1530, the reformed religion was admitted into Eaſt-Frieſland, under Enno the firſt, upon the preaching of Hardingbergius, a learned man, and one of the principal reformers of the Church of Embden, a town of the greateſt eminence in that Earldom. From him Clemens Martini received thoſe principles, which he afterwards propagated in the Low-Countries, where the ſame doctrine, concerning Predeſtination had been publickly maintained in a Book intitled Hodegus Laicorum or the Layman's Guide, publiſhed by Anaſtaſius Velluanus in 1554, and highly commended by Henry Antonides, Divinity-Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Francka. But on the other hand, the French Miniſters having ſettled themſelves in thoſe parts, which either uſed the French language, or anciently belonged to the Crown of France, and exerting themſelves with more vigour than the other party, prevailed ſo far with William of Naſſau, Prince of Orange, that a Confeſſion of their own drawing up was preſented to the Lady Regent, ratified; Dr. Heylin tells us (13), in a forcible and tumultuous way, and afterwards by degrees obtruded upon all the Churches in the Low-Countries. However, the Miniſters ſucceſſively in the whole Province of Utretcht adhered to their former doctrines, and were not conſider'd upon that account as leſs reformed; nor were there wanting ſome perſons of great diſtinction among them, who oppoſed the doctrine of Predeſtination contained in that confeſſion, which was firſt publiſhed in the year 1567. Joannes Isbrandi, one of the Preachers of Rotterdam, openly profeſſed himſelf an Anti-Calviniſt, as well as Gellius Snecanus in Weſt-Frieſland, who eſteemed thoſe of Calvin's judgment as innovators in the doctrine which had been firſt received among them. And we find the ſame account of Holman, one of the profeſſors at Leyden, of Cornelius Meinardi, and Cornelius Wiggeri, two perſons of great reputation, before the name of Arminius was ever mentioned *.

[B] By his conduct in the diſpute concerning Predeſtination.] There was a man of great character at Amſterdam, whoſe name was Theodore Coornhert, whom Hadrian Junius in his Deſcription of Holland, ſtiles, virum divini ingenii, a perſon of a divine genius. He had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his vigorous efforts in defence of the liberty of his country and that of conſcience, in oppoſition to the tyranny of the Church of Rome. But he was of opinion, that the reformed Church was not yet ſufficiently purged from ſome errors, which appeared to him very inconſiſtent with the true genius of Chriſtianity. Above all, he was particularly diſpleaſed, that the greateſt part of the Miniſters maintained the abſolute decrees of election and Predeſtination with the ſame rigour, with which that doctrine was taught by the moſt famous Divines of Geneva. *Is etenim etſi pro patriæ conſcientiæque libertate ſtrenuam navâſſet operam, Romanæ Eccleſiæ tyrannide fortiter oppugnatâ, eam tamen, quæ titulo reformatæ gaudebat, uſque adeo haud repurgatam cenſebat, quin nonnullis adhuc etiamnum laboraret erroribus, veritati, pietatique Chriſtianæ adverſantibus. The year following he was appointed to reform the ſchools, for which purpoſe he drew up a ſcheme of Laws to be obſerved by the maſters as well as ſcholars, which were highly approved of (e). In 1596 he diſcovered, that Gellius Snecanus, a Miniſter of great learning in Frieſland, was for the moſt part of the ſame ſentiments with himſelf, by reading his Iſagoge in ix Caput ad Romanos; which induced him to ſend that Miniſter in a letter an Analyſis of the ſame chapter. that means he began to open a large field of controverſy to the Miniſters in the Low-Countries, who maintained that ſcheme. There had likewiſe been a warm diſpute held about ten years before upon this and other ſubjects of that nature, between him and Arnoldus Cornelii and Reiner Donteklok, Miniſters of Delft, which diſpute was appointed by the States of Holland themſelves. This conduct of Coornhert expoſed him to the ſevereſt imputations of Hereſy, Libertiniſm, and many other crimes of that kind, and he became the object of the reſentments of all thoſe, who pretended a zeal for the reformed religion. The Synod of Amſterdam therefore, that they might not be thought wanting in their duty, deſired Arminius to engage in the confutation of Coornhert, and to write an anſwer to his Books. But he was prevented from executing this deſire of theirs, not ſo much by want of inclination in himſelf, as by an incident, which happened at that very time. For the Miniſters of Delft, who were to attack Coornhert, that they might the better defend their own opinion concerning the abſolute decrees againſt the grand objection of their antagoniſt, who aſſerted that ſuch decrees made ſin as well as miſery neceſſary and inevitable, and conſequently that God muſt certainly be the Author of ſin, thought proper to recede a little from the uſual track of the Divines of Geneva, and to remove the difficulty by fixing upon another method. For tho' they agreed with thoſe Divines in affirming, that divine Predeſtination was the antecedent, abſolute, and inevitable decree of God concerning the ſalvation or damnation of mankind without any regard to their obedience or diſobedience; yet they differed in this, that while Beza and others repreſented man, not conſidered as fallen or even as created, as the object of the divine decrees; the Miniſters of Delft on the other hand made this peremptory decree ſubordinate to the creation and fall of mankind. They ſubmitted their opinion therefore to the judgment of the learned in a Book, intitled, An Anſwer to certain arguments of Beza and Calvin in the treatiſe concerning Predeſtination upon the IXth Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans. This piece, which contained ſeveral difficulties, with which the rigid doctrine of the Divines of Geneva ſeemed to be embarraſſed, was tranſmitted by the Miniſters of Delft to Martin Lydius, profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker. He, notwithſtanding his inclination, and even promiſe to return an anſwer to the Authors of this piece, yet choſe rather to apply himſelf to Arminius, and deſired him by letters to undertake the vindication of Beza's doctrine, and to clear the way to a proper anſwer to Coornhert. At firſt, Arminius ſeemed inclined to agree to his requeſt; but when he came to examine the ſubject, and had conſidered the arguments on both ſides, he found ſuch inextricable difficulties attending both the Hypotheſes concerning the abſolute decrees of Predeſtination, that he began to doubt what ſcheme to determine upon. In ſhort, the more he reflected upon the objections urged againſt the doctrine of Calvin and Beza, the more he was inclined to that ſide of the queſtion, which he before had undertaken to confute. He thought it his duty therefore to break off his former deſign of a confutation, and to apply all the time, which he had remaining from the diſcharge of his function, to an accurate enquiry into this doctrine by reading the holy ſcriptures, and the writings of the ancient and modern Divines upon that ſubject. Imo vero, quo magis hoc ſaxum volveret, momentaque rationum, quæ contra Calvini Bezæque ſententiam proferrentur, perpenderet eo plus ſibi difficultatis obortum ſenſit ad eas ſolidè reſpondendi, inque eam ſe maximè opinionem deferri, quam primâ fronte oppugnandam ſuſceperat. Quocirca ne bonæ conſcientiæ litare ſolitus, quidquam ageret præter officium legitimi divinæ veritatis alumni, aut temerè ſeſe huic aut illi de hoc ſententiæ opponeret, ante omnia in animum induxit cæptæ hujus refutationis filium abrumpere, & quicquid ipſi ab ordinariâ functione & publicis concionibus temporis, id omne penitiori hujus doctrinæ ſcrutationi legendiſque, juxta ſacra volumina, veterum pariter ac recentiorum Doctorum de hoc argumento ſcriptis impendere (15).

(15) Idem, pag. 43, 44, 45.

[C] His Expoſition of the 7th Chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans expoſed him to very ſevere reproaches from his brethren.] Having accurately examined the Apoſtle's manner of reaſoning in that chapter, and confirmed his own ſenſe of it by the Commentaries of Martin Bucer and others, he publickly taught, that St. Paul did not ſpeak in that paſſage of himſelf, as he then was, nor of man as under the Goſpel Grace, but that he aſſumed the perſon of a man under the Law, in whom the Moſaic Law had done its part; who therefore being brought to a ſtate of contrition by the Holy Spirit becauſe of ſin, and convinced of the inſufficiency of the Law to obtain ſalvation, ſought for a Redeemer, and was not yet regenerate, but in the next degree to regeneration. Having explained the paſſage of St. Paul in this manner, tho' without combating the oppoſite opinion in the leaſt, he fell under the ſevereſt cenſures. He was accuſed of Pelagianiſm, becauſe he aſcribed too much goodneſs to an unregenerate man; and was particularly charged with hereſy, becauſe Fauſtus Socinus under the name of Proſper Dyſidæus had given almoſt the ſame explication of that place of St. Paul. He was exclaimed againſt for advancing many things in the pulpit contrary to the Confeſſion of the Belgic Churches and the Palatine Catechiſm, and for raſhly introducing the Doctors of the ancient Church and ſeveral modern Divines as patrons of his opinion. Upon this account he was cited before the Synod, and had ſeveral diſputes with the Miniſters, who endeavoured to reclaim him from his ſuppoſed hereſies (16).

(16) Idem, pag. 48, 49, 50.

[D] Engaged in a new controverſy on account of his Explication of the 9th chapter of the ſame epiſtle.] He obſerv'd, that this chapter was generally conſider'd by the reformed Divines, as the grand foundation of their opinion concerning abſolute Predeſtination; and being unwilling either to confirm or contradict that opinion, he only aſſerted, that the Apoſtle in that chapter proſecuted the ſubject, which he had laid down in the preceding chapters, and vindicated his own doctrine of the Juſtification of man by Faith from ſeveral objections of the Jews. Theſe objections therefore Arminius confuted in a very ſtrong manner in ſeveral Sermons; but tho' he had advocated the cauſe of Chriſtianity to the ſatisfaction of the beſt Judges, yet he fell under the cenſures of others. For as he took a method a little different from the common one, and entirely omitted ſeveral of the crude notions, which ſome perſons have drawn from that chapter, the greateſt part of the Miniſters began to murmur againſt him, eſpecially as they found that his reputation encreaſed among the Lutherans, Mennonites, and others, who were averſe to the rigid doctrine of abſolute Decrees. This occaſioned a conteſt between him and the Members of the Synod, wherein the latter behaved in a manner very unſuitable to the principles of Chriſtian Charity (17).

(17) Idem, pag. 75—82.

[E] Had a converſation with Francis Junius concerning the Fall and other points, which are connected with it.] He paid a viſit to that Profeſſor at Leyden, and engaged in a free converſation with him about the Cauſe of the Fall of our firſt Parents, and the Manner, Contingency, and Neceſſity of it. He took occaſion examining theſe difficult queſtions [F]. In 1598 he wrote his Examen of Perkins's Armilla Aurea, which he deſigned to ſend over to that Divine, but was prevented by the death of the latter, and therefore ſuſpended the publication of it (f). The year following, in his Letters to his friend Utenbogard, he lamented the wretched ſituation of the church at that time, as well as that of himſelf [G]. In 1600 he oppoſed thoſe, who urged, that occaſion to diſcourſe upon this ſubject from a Book, which Junius had juſt before publiſhed, in which he treated of that argument. Arminius propoſed to him ſeveral doubts and difficulties with regard to the Providence and infinite Preſcience of the Deity; and this queſtion was particularly moved, how, upon the ſuppoſition of the immutable Decree, which the followers of Calvin and Beza aſcribe to God, man could nevertheleſs voluntarily fall, and be ſaid to have been maſter of his own actions: Quo pacto, ſtante immobili fixoque illo, quod Calvini Bezæque ſectatores Deo attribuunt, decreto, homo nihilominus voluntariè lapſus, dominuſque ſuarum actionum fuiſſe prædicari queat (18). Junius anſwered theſe difficulties and many others of that kind in ſuch a manner, and explained the nature of things contingent and neceſſary with ſo much ingenuity, that Arminius aſſured Utenbogard in a letter, which he wrote not long after, that he was as highly ſatisfied with Junius's anſwers, as if he had found a treaſure, and that he deſpiſed all the riches of Crœſus and Midas in compariſon of the full and ſatisfactory lights, which he had obtained with regard to the articles of Providence and Predeſtination, about which he had been in the moſt anxious doubt for ſeven years before. Finding therefore, that this celebrated Divine was of the ſame opinion with himſelf concerning thoſe points, and that this converſation had ſucceeded agreeably to his wiſhes, he took the opportunity to diſcourſe upon Predeſtination, not ſo much with a view to be informed about it, (which the ſhortneſs of the time would not permit,) as to ſhew that he was in great ſuſpence in that point, and that he hoped by his means to be eaſily extricated out of his doubts. Junius readily agreed to ſatisfy him by letters. They promiſed each other ſecrecy, leſt they might be ſubject to ſome inconvenience, if the affair became known. Arminius therefore a few months after ſent him an epiſtolary enquiry into the various ſchemes relating to Predeſtination, and propoſed ſome arguments to ſhew the difficulties, which attend ſeveral of them. And as Junius was ſaid by ſome perſons to embrace the hypotheſis of the followers of St. Thomas Aquinas, and not ſo much to abandon the rigid ſcheme of Calvin and Beza, as to palliate it in ſome meaſure, by aſſerting, that the object of Predeſtination was not man before God had determined to create him, nor as he was created, and as it was fore-known that he would fall, but as he was furniſhed with ſupernatural gifts, and invited to a ſupernatural Good; Arminius endeavoured to prove, that both theſe opinions laboured under this inconvenience among others, that they introduced a Neceſſity of ſinning; and therefore it was proper to have recourſe to a third hypotheſis, which preſuppoſes the Creation and the Fall. Having gained this point, he reſolved to proceed farther, and at laſt to draw this inference from the premiſes, that God's Decree was to ſave thoſe, who believe, and to reject thoſe, who do not believe. Junius returned an anſwer to this piece of his, which, Arminius obſerves, was full of piety, learning, and brotherly charity. However it did not ſatisfy our Divine, when he had examined it with attention; for he found, that Junius had endeavoured by his own explanation of the words of the Authors in queſtion to form one hypotheſis from ſeveral others, tho' contrary to the real ſentiments of thoſe, who maintained each of them. Arminius determined therefore to break off this conference, and to write no more upon that ſubject for the preſent. But finding afterwards, that this Epiſtolary Diſpute between them had been ſhewn by Junius himſelf to one of the Students, who lodged at his houſe, and that it had been tranſcribed by him, and was become common among the other Students, ſo that Plancius his collegue upbraided him very ſmartly with being ſilenced by Junius, he was induced to proſecute this Diſpute. He drew up therefore a Reply, at the end of which he declared, that he had objected theſe conſiderations to Junius, not ſo much with a deſign of confuting him, as of obtaining a full explication of his meaning, by which he might receive ſatisfaction in this ſubject, and his mind might be cleared from its doubts. He added, that he prayed to God, that if he had written any thing contrary to truth, that he would pardon it, and ſhew him the truth; but if he had advanced any thing agreeable to truth, that he would confirm him in it, and influence Junius to aſſent to it, that by his means the truth might receive the greater ſanction, and be propagated every day more. Se Deum orare, ſi quid ſcripſiſſet veritati contrarium, ut ipſi condonaret, & veritatem commonſtraret; ſin verò aliquid veritati conſentaneum protuliſſet, ut in eo ipſum confirmaret, Juniumque ipſi adſentientem redderet, quo per ipſum veritati eò major auctoritas indies conciliari, eaque magis ac magis propagari poſſet. But Junius never replied to theſe conſiderations of Arminius, who enlarged them very much after the death of the former (19).

(19) Idem, pag. 98-105.

[F] Deſired likewiſe the aſſiſtance of Utenbogard in examining theſe difficult queſtions.] He tells him in a letter, which he wrote to him the 19th of October 1597, that he ought to endeavour to find out ſuch arguments in defence of the truth, as are ſolid, in order to confirm it, and plain, in order that it may be diſcovered by thoſe, who oppoſe it out of a ſimplicity of mind and from the dictates of their conſcience; among whom, ſays he, I profeſs myſelf to be one wherever I deviate from the truth. But I cannot but wonder, continues he, at the preſumption of ſome men, who ſtigmatize whatever does not ſuit their own way of thinking with the name of Hereſy, while they themſelves will ſcarce take the trouble of examining the controverted points, and tho' they were willing, yet have not the proper abilities for it, becauſe they are not maſters of the learning neceſſary to judge of queſtions of ſuch great moment. Truth, even that of Divinity, as far as it relates to the accurate knowledge of controverſies of this kind, is ſunk into a deep well, from whence it cannot be drawn up without prodigious labour. This obſervation is ſo true in that point, which we are treating of, that he, who denies it, declares immediately by it, that he never reflected ſeriouſly upon that ſubject. I wiſh, that God would at laſt vouchſafe to grant me the knowledge of the truth, for the eaſe and ſatisfaction of my mind! I ſhould greatly exult upon the diſcovery of it, as if I had found the moſt valuable treaſure, and I ſhall own myſelf highly obliged to every perſon, who ſhall afford me any aſſiſtance. "Demerſa eſt veritas, etiam theologi-

[G] Laments the wretched ſituation of the Church at that time, as well as that of himſelf.] This letter was dated the firſt of Auguſt 1599. He obſerves in it, what melancholy reflections poſſeſſed his mind, when he viewed the general impiety and wickedneſs prevailing over the whole world, the great diverſity of opinions concerning Religion in the Chriſtian Church, the licentiouſneſs of all ranks of men in oppoſing the truth, and the confidence and furious zeal of moſt of thoſe, who were in authority, in impoſing their own peculiar notions upon the Church of Chriſt, as if they were articles of faith neceſſary to ſalvation. In his letter to the ſame friend dated 8th of September following, he tells him, that he does as much as lay that the Miniſters ſhould ſubſcribe the confeſſion and catechiſm every year. In 1602 a peſtilential diſeaſe raged at Amſterdam, during which he acted with the greateſt reſolution imaginable in aſſiſting the poor, and comforting the ſick under the moſt formidable apprehenſions (g). Lucas Trelcatius and Francis Junius dying of this diſeaſe at Leyden, the Curators of that Univerſity determined upon our Divine for the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity, which at laſt with great difficulty he obtained. He began is Lectures with three elegant Orations, the firſt of the Object of Divinity, the ſecond of the Author and End of it, and the third of the Certainty of it; and then proceeded to an expoſition of the Prophet Jonah (h). He endeavoured to reform the method of teaching Divinity [H]. Gomarus, the other Profeſſor of Divinity, ſoon began his perſecutions of him, which continued till Arminius's death. But the reputation of the latter was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that he was conſtantly attended by a very large audience, who admired the ſtrength of argument and ſolid learning, which he ſhewed in all his Lectures. This expoſed him to the envy of his brethren, who treated him with all the outrage, that a contracted bigotted ſpirit could prompt them to. When he laid down the office of Rector Magnificus of the Univerſity, he pronounced an Oration de diſſidio Religionis, in which he examined into the nature and effects of diſagreement in religion, and propoſed the remedies neceſſary to prevent the ill conſequences of it (i). The ſame year he was involved in a new conteſt by a diſputation of his concerning the Divinity of the Son [I]. In 1607 the publiſhing of the Catechiſm of Gouda lay in his power, by teaching the truth as far as it was known to him, by enquiring after what was yet concealed from him, and by engaging in a more accurate examination of what he had already diſcovered, and confirming it by ſolid reaſons. This, ſays he, I do in ſilence and hope; tho' I am in the mean while expoſed to the unſeaſonable zeal and almoſt intolerable paſſion of ſome perſons, till God ſhall reſcue me from this uneaſineſs, or give them the ſpirit of diſcretion and prudence, which may temper and moderate their zeal. I think I have the greateſt reaſon imaginable to aſcribe to them a zeal without knowledge. "For I perceive, "that they are ſollicitous about nothing leſs than that "which their duty obliges them to, the greateſt part "of which conſiſts in the enquiry after truth. This "is occaſioned by their opinion and perſuaſion, that "they are already maſters of the truth; which pre"judice is ſo ſtrong in ſome of them, that they will "not ſcruple to paſs the moſt peremptory judgment "immediately upon the moſt difficult points, which "they never thought of before, to the great in"convenience of the Church of Chriſt, and the cer"tain injury of truth." Quod autem zelum illis tribuo abſque ſcientiâ, cauſam mihi habere videor juſtiſſimam. Video enim illos nihil minus agere, quam quod ex officio tenentur, cujus pars vel potiſſima in inquiſitione veritatis eſt poſita. Hujus autem rei cauſa illis eſt opinio & perſuaſio de veritate acquiſitâ, quæ in nonnullis ita eſt potens, ut ex tempore de quavis re, etiam difficillimâ & nunquam illis antea perpensâ, ſententiam dicere peremptoriam auſint, magno ſane Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ malo & veritatis certo detrimento (21).

(21) Idem, pag. 114, 115, 116, 117.

[H] He endeavoured to reform the method of teaching Divinity.] As ſoon as he was ſettled in his Profeſſorſhip, he found that the minds of the young Students had been perplexed with a multitude of uſeleſs and impertinent queſtions; and that while the genuine doctrines of Chriſtianity were neglected, they were put upon hunting after a variety of knotty and abſtruſe theorems and problems. He therefore conſulted with his collegues, what method was proper to be taken to ſtop this growing evil, and to recover the ancient and ſolid way of ſtudying Divinity. His chief taſk was to remove as much as poſſible that prodigious load of ſcholaſtick queſtions and aſſertions, which before clogged their ſtudies, and to inculcate upon his Scholars that divine ſcheme of doctrines, which is to be drawn out of the Scriptures themſelves, and which is abſolutely and ſolely deſigned to inſtruct men in the way to true happineſs. Cæterùm cum in ipſis initii muneris veſtibulis ſatis perſpicuè animadverteret, juveniles animos inutilium multarum quæſtionum dumetis ſeſe implicare, & neglectâ cœleſtis veritatis normâ, ſpinoſa quædam theoremata & problemata ſectari, communicato cum collegis conſilio, gliſcenti huic malo obſtandum cenſuit, priſcumque illud & maſculum ſtudendi genus revocandum. Quapropter nihil prius habuit, quam ut, reſectis (quantum in ipſo) ſpinoſis quæſtionibus & ingenti ſcholaſticarum aſſertionum pondere, divinam illam diſcipulis ſapientiam inculcaret, quæ ex puriſſimis ſacri codicis fontibus petita, uniceque comparata eſſet ad vitam bene beateque tranſigendam. The principal aim of all his publick and private labours was to gain this uſeful point; but he met with great difficulties in the execution of it on account of the envy, which he was expoſed to from ſome perſons, and the ſuſpicion of heterodoxy, which ſeveral of the Miniſters raiſed againſt him among his collegues (22).

(22) Idem, pag. 203, 204.

[I] A Diſputation concerning the Divinity of the Son.] Happening to preſide at a Diſputation upon this ſubject, and undertaking himſelf the defence of the common and orthodox opinion upon this important queſtion, one of the Students maintained in oppoſition to the propoſitions, which were to be publickly diſcuſſed, that the Son of God was αὐτόθεος or God of himſelf, and that he did not receive his Eſſence from the Father, but from himſelf: Filium Dei αὐτόθεον eſſe, ſuumque adeo eſſentiam non a Patre, ſed à ſeipſo habere. Upon this Arminius obſerved, that the word αὐτόθεος was not to be found in the Scriptures; however as it was made uſe of by Epiphanius, and other orthodox Divines both ancient and modern, it was not abſolutely to be rejected if it was rightly underſtood. That it might be taken according to the etymology of it in a double ſenſe, either to ſignify that he was real and true God, or that he was God of himſelf. In the former ſenſe it might be admitted; but in the latter it was contrary to the Scripture and orthodox Antiquity. The Student defended his opinion very reſolutely, and boldly aſſerted, that this word in the latter ſenſe was very applicable to the ſon of God, and that the Eſſence of the Father, could only be ſaid improperly to be communicated to the Son and Holy Ghoſt; but that rightly and properly the Eſſence of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt was common to them all. He was the more confident in this aſſertion, becauſe he was ſupported by Luke Trelcatius, who in his Common Places juſt before publiſhed, had advanced this hypotheſis concerning the Trinity. Arminius replied to this, that this opinion was a novel one, and unknown to the ancient Greek and Latin Churches. That the ancients always affirmed, that the Divinity of the Son was derived from the Father by an eternal generation. That this notion laboured under very great difficulties. That not only Sabellianiſm would follow from it, ſince the Son was ſubſtituted in the place of the Father, as his Eſſence was underived from any other; but a way would be opened for Tritheiſm, and as many Gods muſt be ſuppoſed, as there were collateral perſons. In ſhort, that to be poſſeſſed of an underived Divinity was contrary to the definition of the Son, and that no attribute could be aſcribed to any Being, which is contrary to the definition of it. Arminius was the more ſanguine in oppoſing theſe innovations in doctrines, becauſe he obſerved, that Gomarus himſelf had attacked Trelcatius's notions both in publick and private. However this expoſed our Divine to the moſt malicious ſuggeſtions, that he was heterodox with regard to the Trinity and the Divinity of the Son. And theſe calumnies were encreaſed by a diſputation, which he held concerning the Gouda gave occaſion to another warm diſpute [K]. The year following he wrote an excellent letter to the Embaſſador of the Elector Palatine, to vindicate his conduct with regard to the conteſts about religion, in which he was engaged [L]. He found himſelf likewiſe obliged to juſtify himſelf againſt the imputation of endeavouring to advance the cauſe of Popery [M]. The ſame year he gave a full account to the States of Holland of his

the Perſon of Chriſt, and by his explaining ſometimes in a different manner thoſe paſſages of the Old and New Teſtament, which were commonly applied to prove the Conſubſtantiality or Coeſſentiality of the Trinity (23). He defended himſelf extremely well againſt theſe imputations; and he declares himſelf, that almoſt every perſon, who knew him, knew with what caution and ſcrupuloſity of conſcience he treated of the ſublime Doctrine of the Trinity of Perſons. How little fond I am, ſays he, of inventing new phraſes and expreſſions unknown to the Scriptures and orthodox Antiquity, or of uſing thoſe, which have been invented by others, appears from my whole method of teaching. And my auditors will teſtify how ready I am to bear with thoſe who expreſs themſelves in a different manner, if their meaning be but good (24). With regard to the ſuſpicion of Socinianiſm, he declared, that he was ſo far from being guilty of it, that he was confident, that if the Synod would give him a favourable hearing, he could propoſe ſome arguments, which would have a great effect in confuting the Socinians, or at leaſt in ſolving their objections (25). It appears likewiſe from a letter of Janus Narſius, who was his ſcholar, to J. Sandius (26), that not long after this he undertook a publick and elaborate confutation of ſeveral of the chief opinions of Socinus, and eſpecially of his Book de Servatore.

[K] The publiſhing of the Catechiſm of Gouda gave occaſion to another warm diſpute.] This Catechiſm was drawn up by the Miniſters of Gouda, in order to ſee whether the Magiſtrates would introduce it into the common ſchools in the room of the Palatine Catechiſm, which they thought contained queſtions too abſtruſe, and expreſſed in very ambiguous terms. As ſoon as this Catechiſm of Gouda was publiſhed, it met with very different judgments. Arminius's friends recommended it, partly becauſe the Authors of it, tho' in the general diſpoſition of it, they had followed that of the Palatinate, yet had introduced nothing contrary to the Chriſtian doctrine; and partly becauſe it cut off all occaſion for difficult and diſputable opinions, and ſhewed every where a true, primitive, Chriſtian ſimplicity, and repreſented the points of faith in a few words, and thoſe taken exactly from ſcripture: Quod ſcriptum hoc ſpinoſis quibuſvis & diſputabilibus digmatibus anſam præſcindens, ſpiranſque primævam Chriſtianitatis ſimplicitatem, credenda paucis, nec aliis vocibus, quam quas divina pagina præſcriberet, complecteretur. But the oppoſite party immediately condemn'd it, and urged, that there was no opinion ſo monſtrous and ſhocking, but might be concealed under ſuch general terms. That the ſimplicity of the forms of faith was proper for the primitive ages, when the evils then unknown wanted no remedies; but afterwards, when errors encreaſed, ſuch forms and expreſſions were to be made uſe of, as would force the latent Heretics out of their receſſes and ſubterfuges. At vero exorti ſtatim ex altero agmine, qui id ipſum publicè damnarent ac deteſtarentur, nec ullum dicerent tam horrendæ opinionis portentum, quod verbis tam generalibus non velaretur. Conveniſſe primis temporibus ſimplicitatem, cum ignota adhuc mala remediis non indigerunt; poſtea autem, increſcentibus erroribus, concipiendas fuiſſe loquendi formulas, quæ devios latebris ſuis excuterent. They objected that in this Catechiſm the chief articles of the Chriſtian faith were ſuppreſſed or omitted; that it gave an opportunity to every one, who would affect innovations; and that Servetus himſelf would readily ſubſcribe to it. So that what one party affirmed to be agreeable to truth, the other exclaimed againſt as the covert for Heretics; and what one called liberty, the other repreſented as the means of confuſion. Arminius was accuſed by Reiner Danteklok of having a ſhare in this Catechiſm; but tho' he did not very much oppoſe the publiſhing of it, and afterwards confeſſed, that the Miniſters of Gouda had conſulted him before, and that he had agreed to their reaſons for printing it, yet he had no manner of ſhare in the compoſition of it (27).

[L] Wrote an excellent letter to the Embaſſador of the Elector Palatine to vindicate his conduct with regard to the conteſts about religion, in which he was engaged.] At the cloſe of this letter, he tells the Embaſſador, that he wiſhes he could obtain this favour of his brethren, that they would at leaſt believe him to be actuated by ſome conſcience towards God, which Chriſtian charity would certainly oblige them to, if they would conſider the nature of it. For what intereſt could he propoſe to himſelf, by beginning a diſpute out of mere wantonneſs of mind, and by raiſing a ſchiſm in the Church of Chriſt, of which he profeſſed himſelf, by the Grace of God and Chriſt, a member? If they ſuppoſed him influenced to it by ambition and avarice, they were ſtrangers to his character. The latter he declares himſelf averſe to, tho' he might have ſome pretext to excuſe or palliate it. As for ambition, he had no other, than to ſeek after truth in the ſcriptures, and when he had found it, to defend it calmly, and without contention, or endeavouring to preſcribe to others. His only view was to be inſtrumental in the ſalvation of ſouls, and to obtain a good character in the Church; which he hoped by long patience at laſt to gain, tho' at preſent he was treated with the utmoſt ſeverity by his brethren. He wiſhes, that they would agree with him upon a ſerious and pacific conference upon religion; in which he promiſes to ſhew that moderation and love for truth and peace, which becomes a ſervant of Chriſt. In the mean while he deſires, that his brethren would let him reſt undiſturbed, as he does them. He demands only a fair and equitable trial, without prejudice or partiality. He refuſes not to preſent himſelf to the examination of any aſſembly of Miniſters, whether great or ſmall, whether natives or foreigners, ſo that the civil Magiſtrate would but take care to regulate the conduct of it, and put them under the ſame conditions as himſelf, ſince he was weary of anſwering particularly all the new calumnies ſuggeſted againſt him. "In this reſpect, ſays he, I act very differently from Heretics, who have either avoided all Eccleſiaſtical Aſſemblies, or endeavoured to obtain the victory by the number of their followers." Hâc ſanè parte hæreticorum ſum diſſimilis, qui aut conventus Eccleſiaſticos refugerunt, aut hoc effecerunt, ut aſſeclarum numero fidere, & certam victoriam expectare poſſent (28).

[M] To juſtify himſelf againſt the imputation of endeavouring to advance the cauſe of Popery.] There had been a rumour propagated, that the Pope had written kind letters to our Divine and Utenbogard, and deſired them upon the promiſe of a conſiderable penſion to advocate the cauſe of the Church of Rome (29). To obviate theſe calumnies Arminius publiſhed ſeveral learned Theſes concerning Idolatry, to which he added this corollary, that "the Pope of Rome was an Idol, and that thoſe, who regard him for what he pretends to be, are in fact Idolaters." Pontificem Romanum eſſe Idolum, & qui illum pro eo habent, quem ſe venditat, eo ipſo Idololatras eſſe. He publiſhed likewiſe other propoſitions, in which he maintained that the Reformed Churches had not made a ſchiſm from the Church of Rome, but that they had acted rightly in refuſing to have any communion with it; Eccleſias Reformatas à Romanenſi ſeceſſionem non feciſſe, eaſque rectè facere, quod fidei cultuſque Divini communionem cum eâ habere & profiteri detrectant. Not long after this, he diſputed publickly concerning the Pope, and fixed upon him the ſtrongeſt terms of infamy. Publicè quoque diſputavit de Pontifice Romano, defendens illum eſſe adulterum & lenonem Eccleſiæ, Pſeudo-Prophetam & caudam Draconis, Dei & Chriſti adverſarium, Antichriſtum, ſervum malum, qui conſervos ſuos verberat, Epiſcopi nomine indignum, Eccleſiæ deſtructorem & vaſtatorem. But all theſe declarations of his could not ſuppreſs the ſuſpicions, which were raiſed againſt him by ſome perſons. A certain perſon wrote a letter into Germany, wherein he mentioned in an imperfect manner the title of his Theſes concerning the diviſion of the Proteſtants from the his ſentiments with reſpect to the controverted points, which he concluded in a manner exactly conformable to the principles of Chriſtian charity and moderation [N]. He died with the Church of Rome, that foreigners might imagine Arminius to be inclined to that Church. And one of the Preachers at Amſterdam abuſed him publickly as a man who held many groſs errors, and eſteemed the Pope a member of the body of Chriſt, which doctrine he exclaimed, was ſo hateful to God, that ſeveral perſons of reflection had obſerved, that ever ſince ſome men had begun to defend it, the publick affairs declined, and ſeveral of the beſt fortified cities were taken by the enemy. This calumny was followed by another, that he had perſuaded a great many perſons to turn Papiſts, and given occaſion to ſome Politicians of ſhewing leſs zeal than before, in their refuſing the Roman Catholics the exerciſe of their religion. He was obliged therefore to declare in writing his innocence with reſpect to thoſe charges; as appears particularly from a letter of his to Sebaſtian Egbert upon this ſubject; wherein he declares, that he did not eſteem the Pope a member of the body of Chriſt; but conſidered him as an obſtinate enemy, a ſacrilegious perſon, a blaſphemer, a tyrant, and a moſt violent uſurper of an unjuſt dominion over the Church, as the man of ſin, the ſon of perdition, &c. " I mean, ſays he, ſuch " a Pope, as acts in the uſual manner. But if an " Hadrian of Utretcht, who is raiſed to that See without any intrigue or ſollicitation, endeavours a reformation of the Church, and begins it with the Pope " himſelf, and the Roman See and Court, and aſſumes " to himſelf nothing but the name and authority of " a Biſhop, tho' he challenges the principal place among the other Biſhops agreeably to the ancient " conſtitutions of the Church; I would not venture " to call him by thoſe names; ſince I cannot perſuade myſelf that he is an ill man, whom the defenders of Antichriſtianiſm and the court of Rome " hated ſo extremely as to take his life away. For " it is thought, that he was poiſoned by thoſe who " were jealous leſt he ſhould attempt a Reformation " of the Church, and eſpecially of the Court of Rome." At ſi quis Adrianus Ultrajectinus, ad Pontificatum citra Ambitum evectus, reformationem moliatur Eccleſiæ, & ab ipſo Pontifice & Pontificatu, Curiâque Romanâ exordium faciat, ſibique nihil aliud quam Epiſcopi nomen & authoritatem uſurpet, quamquam inter reliquos principem locum obtinentis ex ſtatutis antiquis Eccleſiæ, illum ego iſtis nominibus adpellare non audiam; quia quem Satellites Antichriſtianiſmi, & Curia Romana inviſum habet adeò, ut & vitam ipſi eripiat, hunc ego peſſimum eſſe mihi perſuadere non poſſum. Creditur autem veneno ſublatus eſſe ab iis, qui Reformationem Eccleſiæ & præſertim Curiæ Romanæ ab illo futuram metuebant. " But I ſuppoſe, continues he, and I think it can be " proved with great probability from ſcripture, that " a Reformation is not to be expected from a perſon, " who is raiſed to the See of Rome; and that if any one " ſuffer himſelf to be raiſed to it with that hope, he " will certainly incur the danger of death or baniſhment, " God himſelf even ordering affairs in that manner. " However this will be aboliſhed at the glorious coming of Chriſt, and the Reformation foretold will " come to paſs by means of the ſeparation of the nations from Babylon, which Babylon ſhall not be deſtitute of its head. But if that Preacher imagines, " that becauſe I believe, that God has not given a " bill of divorce to the Church, over which the Pope " preſides, it therefore follows, that I acknowledge " the Pope as a member of the Church, he ſhews, that " he cannot diſtinguiſh between thoſe, who are ſeduc'd " and ſuffer the tyranny, and the falſe Prophet and " Tyrant himſelf, who deprives himſelf of the character of a member of the Church, when he preſumes to call himſelf the head of it, and excommunicates or conſiders as excommunicated all thoſe, " who will not acknowledge him for the head." By this anſwer he thought he had ſufficiently juſtified himſelf, and at the ſame time anſwered the calumnies of thoſe, who had accuſed him of ſaying, that the fourth volume of Bellarmin's works was unanſwerable. But tho' he never ſpoke thoſe words, yet he owned, that he had often wiſhed to ſee a more ſolid confutation than had appeared, of the arguments which the Cardinal had drawn from the opinion of ſome of the Reformed Writers, to ſhew, that they made God the Author of all the ſins, which were committed. Beſides, he thought that even Conrade Vorſtius, who had gained a great reputation by his writings againſt Popery, had not done ſufficient juſtice to the Proteſtant cauſe, by his anſwer to the Theſes of the Jeſuits concerning the faith of the Followers of Calvin. He was of opinion therefore, that it is much more expedient, to reject the authority of ſome Divines of the Reformed Church, and to declare expreſly, that the notions of particular men were not to be imputed to the Proteſtant Churches in general; and that it might eaſily be recriminated upon Bellarmin, that there were many of the School Divines and others among the Roman Catholics, from whoſe writings the ſame conſequences might be drawn (30).

[N] Concluded in a manner exactly conformable to the principles of Chriſtian charity and moderation.] He returns the States his acknowledgments for their favourable attention to him; and aſſures them, that he was ready to agree to a friendly conference with his brethren upon theſe and all other points of controverſy, which might ariſe, at any time or in any place that their High Mightineſſes might think proper. " And I promiſe, " ſays he, in all theſe conferences to ſhew myſelf " gentle and tractable, equally prepared to learn myſelf as to dictate to others. Beſides as in all points, " which are to be diſcuſſed, it is neceſſary to enquire " firſt, whether the queſtion in debate be true or not, " and then whether it be neceſſary to be believed in " order to ſalvation, I proteſt in the moſt ſolemn " manner, that I will not urge upon my brethren, " who are of a different opinion, the belief of any " article, tho' I can prove it to be agreeable to the " Word of God by the moſt ſolid arguments, unleſs " I can clearly prove from the Scriptures, with the " ſame evidence with which I have ſhewn the truth of " it, that it is likewiſe neceſſary to ſalvation, that every " Chriſtian ſhould believe it in that manner. If my " brethren are ready to do the ſame, I am of opi- " nion, that no controverſy or ſchiſm will eaſily riſe " between us." Præterea cum de omnibus, quæ diſcutienda ſint, dogmatibus primum inquirendum veniat an illud, de quo quæſtio inſtituitur, verum ſit, deinde an neceſſarium ad ſalutem creditu cenſeri debeat, equidem ſanctè pollicetor voveoque, nullum me articulum, ut ut eum ſolidiſſimis argumentis verbo divino conſentaneum eſſe probaverim, fratribus meis aliter ſentientibus obtruſurum ad credendum, niſi clarè ex verbo Dei probem, ac quidem æquè clarè ac veritatem adſtruxi; ſimul etiam neceſſarium eſſe ad ſalutem, ut quiſque Chriſtianus id ita credat. Idem ſi parati erunt fratres mei facere, haud facile, meo quidem arbitratu, controverſia aut ſchiſma aliquod inter nos exiſturum eſt. " I add to " this, continues he, in order to remove all ſuſpicion " concerning myſelf from this honourable Aſſembly, " now employed about affairs of the utmoſt importance, upon which the ſafety of our Country and " the Reformed Churches depend, that they muſt be " numerous and grievous errors, which I will not " bear with in my brethren, ſince I have no right to " claim an authority over the faith of another perſon, but am only a ſervant to thoſe, who believe, " in order that the knowledge of the truth, and piety, " peace, and joy in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt may grow " in them. If my brethren are of a different opi- " nion, and think that I ought not to be tolerated, " or to enjoy any place among them, I hope notwithſtanding, that no ſchiſm will be raiſed by me; " ſince there are too many ſchiſms already among " Chriſtians, which is a melancholy conſideration; " and therefore every one ought rather to endeavour " to the utmoſt of his power, that they may be leſſen'd " and extinguiſhed. In this caſe I will ſupport my " mind with patience, and readily quit my function, " (tho' I ſhall endeavour to promote the intereſt of " common Chriſtianity, as long as God ſhall prolong my life;) being mindful of that ſaying, " ENOUGH HAS BEEN GIVEN TO THE CHURCH, " AND ENOUGH TO MY COUNTRY." Quod ſi ſymmyſtis meis aliter videatur, ipſique me non ferendum, ullumve inter eos locum tribuendum cenſeant, per me tamen with the ſtrongeſt ſentiments of piety and reſignation [O]. Dominic Baudius and Hugo Grotius wrote each of them a Poem upon his death; and Daniel Heinſius did the ſame, but his Poem was afterwards ſuppreſſed in the edition of his works (k). His voice was low, but very agreeable, and his pronunciation was admirable (l). He was eaſy and affable to perſons of all ranks, and facetious in his converſation among his friends. He had the greateſt reverence for the Deity, and was conſtant and regular in all the offices of devotion. He faſted frequently. He choſe rather to be religious in reality than in appearance, and preferred the approbation of his own mind to the opinion of the world. His motto was Bona Conſcientia Paradiſus; i. e. "A good Conſcience is a Paradiſe." The great object of his wiſhes and endeavours was, that Chriſtians would bear with one another in all controverſies, which did not affect the fundamentals of their religion; and the contrary behaviour of people in perſecuting each other for points of indifference, gave him the moſt exquiſite diſſatisfaction. He very ſeldom affected an oratorical turn in his diſcourſes, either becauſe he had no talent for it, or becauſe he thought that the divine truths had no occaſion for ſuch adventitious ornaments. He thought that the knowledge of the Hebrew and other Oriental Tongues, and of the Jewiſh Antiquities was of great importance in Divinity. He was a ſharp diſputant in all points relating to religion, and knew how to make uſe of the ſubtleties of his antagoniſts againſt themſelves; but in all other caſes where there was no occaſion for them, he ſtudiouſly avoided them. He was very modeſt and diffident of himſelf [P]. His enemies endeavoured to repreſent him in a very diſadvantageous light [Q]; but his memory has been ſufficiently vindicated

[O] He died with the ſtrongeſt ſentiments of piety and reſignation.] His ſickneſs was attended with the moſt painful circumſtances imaginable; and he almoſt loſt the ſight of his right eye. When this misfortune was known, ſeveral of his enemies, who had not yet remitted the leaſt of their former reſentments againſt him, immediately interpreted it as an inſtance of God's judgment upon him. And in order to countenance this preſumption of theirs, they applied to him the 12th verſe of the 14th chapter of the Prophet Zechariah; And this ſhall be the plague, wherewith the Lord will ſmite all the people, that have fought againſt Jeruſalem: Their fleſh ſhall conſume away while they ſtand upon their feet, and their eyes ſhall conſume away in their holes, and their tongue ſhall conſume away in their mouth. And likewiſe the 17th verſe of the 11th chapter; Woe to the idle Shepherd, that leaveth the Flock: the ſword ſhall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye: his arm ſhall be clean dried up, and his right eye ſhall be utterly darkened. Others likewiſe invented anagrams from his name Jacobus Arminius, which they found, when tranſpoſed, produced theſe words: Vani Orbis Amicum, i. e. "The "Friend of the vain World." But others on the contrary by the addition of one letter, form'd this anagram, Habui curam Sionis, i. e. "I had the care of "Sion." However our Divine, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the diſtemper, preſerved his uſual ſerenity and chearfulneſs, and exhorted his wife to bear her affliction patiently, and to truſt in Providence. He was very importunate in his prayers for the ſafety and peace of the Church; and he placed all his hopes and confidence in Chriſt. The famous Epiſcopius came from Franeker to viſit him, and had frequent and long converſations with him upon the ſubject of Religion, the ſtate of the Church, the knowledge of Chriſt, and the efficacy of his Death and Reſurrection. When our Author found, that death approached, he made his will, in which are the following words: "Above all "things I recommend my ſoul, when it ſhall depart out "of this body, into the hands of God the Creator of "it and my faithful Saviour, before whom I de"clare that I have diſcharged my function and cal"ling with a good conſcience, and with ſimplicity "and ſincerity; always avoiding with the utmoſt "caution, to propoſe or teach any thing, which I "had not before upon the moſt careful examination "of the Scriptures found to be agreeable to them; "and have ſtudied to inculcate every thing, which "might tend to the promotion and enlargement of "the truth of Chriſtianity, the true worſhip of God, "the common intereſts of piety, and virtuous con"verſation among men; and in ſhort to that "ſtate of peace and tranquillity according to the Word "of God, which becomes the Chriſtian name; ex"cluding Popery, with which no unity of faith, no "bond of religion or Chriſtian peace can be main"tained." Ante omnia commendo animam meam, quando ea ex corpore emigrabit, in manus Dei Creatoris ſui & fidelis Servatoris, coram quo teſtor, me bonâ conſcientiâ in munere meo & vocatione ſimpliciter & ſincerè ambulaſſe; ſollicitè admodum & curioſè hoc cavens, ne quid proponerem aut docerem, quod non adhibita ante diligentia ex S. Scripturis diſquirendis comperiſſem cum iiſdem Scripturis ad amuſſim convenire: quæcunque ad propagationem amplificationemque veritatis, Religionis Chriſtianæ, veri Dei cultûs, communis pietatis, & ſanctæ inter homines converſationis, denique ad convenientem Chriſtiano nomini tranquillitatem & pacem ſecundum verbum Dei poſſent conferre, excludens Papatum, cum quo nulla unitas fidei, nullum pietatis aut Chriſtianæ pacis vinculum ſervari poteſt (32).

(32) Idem, pag. 426-433.

[P] He was very modeſt and diffident of himſelf.] He was very far from ſuperciliouſneſs in his manner of teaching, and ſo little confident of his own abilities, that he was with great difficulty prevailed upon by the importunities of his friends to publiſh any of his writings. In docendo nullius ſupercilii . . . . tam parum ſibi confidens, ut amicorum flagitantium, ut opus aliquod à ſe ſcripto conſignatum typis publicandum daret, deſideriis ſatisfacere gravaretur (33).

(33) Idem, pag. 441.

[Q] His enemies endeavoured to repreſent his character in a very diſadvantageous light.] We are told in the Preface to the Decrees of the Synod of Dort, that he was a man of a lively and acute genius indeed, but of ſuch a diſpoſition, that he was never pleaſed with any thing, but what came recommended to him under ſome ſhew of novelty, ſo that he ſeemed to diſlike the received doctrines of the Church upon this very account, becauſe they were received. Virum ingenii quidem exercitatioris, verum cui nihil arrideret, niſi quod aliqua novitatis ſpecie ſe commendaret; adeo ut pleraque in Eccleſiis recepta dogmata, vel hoc ipſo nomine, quod eſſent recepta, faſtidire videretur. Several foreigners likewiſe, as Mr. Brandt obſerves (34), being too eaſily influenced by the prejudices and clamours of bigots, ſpoke of him as an enemy to God, a man of an artful and diſhoneſt mind, who acted in all reſpects in a crafty manner; who like Ham diſcovered the nakedneſs of his fathers and predeceſſors, and wounded the Reformation itſelf in a ſcandalous way thro' the ſides of the firſt Reformers. Inimicum Dei, virumque veteratorii ingenii eum appellarent, qui callide omnia egiſſet, Chami inſtar verenda patrum ſuorum revelaſſet, & qui per ſanctiſſimorum Reformationis Principum latus ipſum Eccleſiæ repurgatæ corpus fœdum in modum confodiiſſet. King James I in his letter to the States of the United Provinces upon the affair of Conrade Vorſtius in the year 1611, falls very ſeverely upon cated by men of the greateſt diſtinction [R]. He left behind him ſome children, the eldeſt of which was not above ſeventeen years old. Among theſe were ſeven ſons, whoſe names were Herman, Peter, John, Laurence, James, William, and Daniel, who became afterwards an eminent Phyſician, and Laurence was a Merchant. upon the memory of Arminius, and calls him the Enemy of God, charges him with direct hereſy, and puts the States in mind, that the diſputes raiſed by him, had embroiled their country, and broke them into factions (35). Arthur Wilſon in his Hiſtory of the Life and Reign of that King (36) tells us, that Arminius left behind him the ſeeds of the Pelagian Hereſy. . . . The Myſteries of Predeſtination, continues he, and the ineffable Eſſence of God (quæ tremenda & admiranda ſunt, ſed non ſcrutanda, (to uſe our King's own words) which are to be trembled at, and admired, not pried into,) are the great theme. Such intuitions are too high for fleſh and blood. Yet what will not pragmatical ſpirits do, when they proudly look into divine things with the eye of reaſon, not humbly with the eye of faith? He obſerves then, that the King told the States, that by the unhappy ſucceſſion of two ſuch prodigies in one ſphere as Arminius & Vorſtius, ſome dreadful miſchief would ſucceed. Hoornbeck repreſents him as a man fond of his own notions and ſpeculations, and ſtrongly inclined to oppoſe the ſentiments of others; and he calls him a Covenant-Breaker, who having abjured the faith, which he owed to God and to the Church, began to deſtroy the faith of the Churches and the doctrine of Chriſt, at firſt ſecretly, and afterwards openly, by his own efforts, and thoſe of his diſciples and friends, and attempted to diſturb not only the Churches, but even the civil Government itſelf; which he would have executed, if God had not interpoſed to prevent the danger. Violatorem fœderis vocat, qui, ejurata quam Deo, quam Eccleſiæ dederat, fide, fidem Eccleſiarum & doctrinam Chriſti clam primum, inde palam, cum per ſe, tum per diſcipulos & ſocios, & Eccleſias non modo, ſed & politias nefario auſu turbare cæperit, ac pervertere: feciſſet etiam, niſi Deus laborantibus rebus ſuccurriſſet (37).

[R] But his memory has been ſufficiently vindicated by men of the greateſt diſtinction.] Brandt obſerves (38), that Arminius himſelf had fully confuted moſt of the imputations caſt upon him; but after his death his conduct was fully juſtified by Peter Bertius, Utenbogard, Simon Epiſcopius, Corvinus, Narſius, Curcellæus, Poelenburgius, and others. Poelenburgius in particular anſwered the accuſations urged againſt Arminius by Hoornbeck, which we mentioned in the preceding note. The Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden had ſo great a regard for him, that they ſettled an annual allowance upon his widow and children, and the Academical Senate gave a very honourable teſtimony to his merit (39). Joſ. Scaliger, who was by no means liberal of his praiſes to others, calls him a very great Man, virum maximum (40). Meurſius in his Athenæ Batavæ (41) tells us, that he was a man of a very acute wit and ſharp judgment; and Druſius ranks him among thoſe learned and candid men, to whoſe judgment he willingly ſubmitted his writings. Dominic Baudius, in the Dedication of his Epicedium upon Arminius to the States of the United Provinces, calls him his reverend Collegue, a Man of great merit, whom he had a ſincere regard for while he was living, and eſteemed now he was dead, as a perſon endowed with all the valuable qualifications of genius and learning. And in his Letter to Utenbogard (42) after Arminius's death, he obſerves, that he never was lawfully convicted or condemn'd for any hereſies; but that to the laſt moments of his life, he diſcharged in the beſt manner the office, which the Curators and Burgomaſters had aſſigned him; and died in the poſſeſſion of his poſt; ſo that his memory deſerves the regard of all good men. He obſerves likewiſe, that he regretted the loſs of him, and that he had no greater wiſh, than to ſee the day, in which Arminius might have defended his innocence from the rumours, which were maliciouſly ſpread againſt him, and raſhly believed. Nunquam legitimè ullius erroris convictus aut condemnatus eſt. Imo ad ultimum vitæ ſpiritum exornavit Spartam, quam ex decreto Curatorum & Conſulum noſtrorum adeptus erat, obiitque in poſſeſſione legitimi muneris, ut merito ejus memoriam boni omnes fauſta recordatione proſequi debeant. Mihi triſte ſui deſiderium reliquit, nec quicquam æque in votis habui, quam ut viderem diem illum, quo ſuam innocentiam ab invidioſè ſparſis & temerè creditis rumoribus tutari poſſet. Anthony Thyſius, who had been very intimate with him, uſed frequently to ſay, that he never ſaw a man of more and greater virtues than him, or ſubject to fewer and leſſer faults. Mr. Richard Thomſon, a very learned man of the Univerſity of Cambridge, in a Letter to Baudius dated in Auguſt 1605, obſerves, that the fame of Arminius was not ſo little known among them, as Baudius ſeemed to imagine. "For, "ſays he, I knew him very well, before he was made "Profeſſor at Leyden; and ſince he gained that Pro"feſſorſhip, he is become known to many others "here. And therefore whenever any Students come "hither from your Univerſity, our Profeſſors enquire "very particularly about Arminius. I am extremely "glad for the ſake of your Univerſity, that ſhe has "ſo great men there." De Arminio quod ſcribis, benignè. Quanquam viri illius fama non tam ignobilis apud nos eſt, atque tu videris exiſtimare. Nam & mihi olim notiſſimus, antequam apud vos profiteretur, & ex quo profitetur, multis aliis quoque hic innoteſcere cæpit. Itaque quoties iſtinc ſtudioſi aliqui ad nos veniunt, diligenter de Arminio inquirunt profeſſores noſtri. Itaque Academiæ veſtræ nomine ſanè lætor, quæ tantum virum tenet. John Buxtorf, Profeſſor at Baſil, upon the news of Arminius's death, wrote a letter to Utenbogard, wherein he tells him, that he had great reaſon to be extremely ſorry at the unexpected deceaſe of that bright Luminary of Holland, as well on account of the common loſs to the Church of Chriſt, as that the acquaintance, which he had lately contracted with him, ſhould be ſo unfortunately interrupted; ſince he was in hopes of ſubſtituting him in the room of Scaliger, whoſe life was alſo cut off very early. Tanti certe luminis Belgii inclyti, D. Jacobi Arminii inopinata extinctio juſtum animo meo mœrorem attulit, tum ob commune Eccleſiæ Chriſti incommodum, tum quod primus meus in tanti viri notitiam acceſſus tam luctuosè fuerit interruptus. Subſtituere enim hunc ſperabam in illuſtris heroïs D. Scaligeri P. M. locum, qui mihi quoque citius nimio ex his humanis fuit abreptus. To theſe we ſhall add the teſtimony of the great Iſaac Caſaubon, who in his Letter to Samuel Næranus dated from Paris in Auguſt 1610, ſays, that he does not doubt, but that Arminius, then deceaſed, was a great man; tho' he had not yet met with any one of their Miniſters, who did not conſider him as an infamous heretick, being entirely of opinion, that Calvin's doctrine is the ſtandard of truth; and that tho' himſelf had a great regard for that Divine, yet he could not bear thoſe perſons, who hate all, who differ from him. Arminium τὸν μακαρίτην, cujus ipſe mentionem facis, virum magnum fuiſſe non dubito; etſi noſtrorum paſtorum nullum adhuc inveni, qui pro infami hæretico illum non haberet, ut quibus ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας ſit ſententia Calvini; quem ego virum vehementer ſuſpiciens, eos tamen ferre non poſſum, qui omnes ab eo diſſentientes malè oderunt. M. Martinius likewiſe, who was afterwards an eminent Member of the Synod of Dort, and to whom our Divine a few weeks before his death complained very pathetically of the calumnies ſuggeſted againſt him, gave him this candid and unprejudiced character, that he thought he was a man, who had a real reverence for God, a Maſter of a great ſhare of learning, very converſant in theological controverſies and the Scriptures, and very cautious in applying philoſophical terms to points of Divinity. Mihi vir viſus eſt verè Dei timens, eruditiſſimus, & in controverſiis theologicis exercitatiſſimus, & in ſcripturis potens, & valdè circumſpectus, & ἀκριβὴς in philoſophicis terminis ad res theologicas accommodandis (43). Dr. Heylin in the 11th Book of his Aerius Redivivus or Hiſtory of the Preſbyterians (44) tells us, that he was a man of equal learning with Francis Junius, and no leſs piety, and that during the ſhort time of his ſitting in the Chair of Leyden, he drew unto him a great part of that Univerſity; who by the piety of the man, his powerful arguments, his extreme diligence in that place, and the clear light of reaſon, which appeared in all his diſcourſes, became ſo wedded at the laſt unto his opinions, that no time or trouble could divorce them from him. T.

☞ARNAUD DE COUTIGNAC, a Gentleman of Provence in the XIV Century, diſtinguiſhed for his excellent talent in Poetry, which introduced him into the acquaintance of perſons of the greateſt quality in his country. He was very ſucceſsful in all his deſigns, ſo that Lewis King of Naples and Sicily, Earl of Provence, and his Queen Joan, gave him a commiſſion together with Guy Flote, Lieutenant of the County of Vintimiglia, to oblige the Tendians, who had revolted at that time, to do them homage. He performed this commiſſion in ſuch a manner, as raiſed him a prodigious reputation; and the King and Queen rewarded his ſervices with ſettling upon him an eſtate, which they had at Coutignac. He was in love with a Lady, whoſe name was Yſnarde, of the family of Agoult, daughter to Monſieur Entravenes. He wrote a great many Sonnets in her praiſe; but not being able to procure any opportunity of ſpeaking to her, he went to travel into divers parts of the world, as he tells us in his works. He endeavoured as much as poſſible to baniſh this Lady out of his memory, who, as he imagined, was inſenſible to all his pain. While he was in the Eaſt, he met with a very learned Jewiſh Magician and Aſtrologer, who foretold to him, that his poſterity ſhould prove illuſtrious for their virtues, and be highly eſteemed in Provence. S. Cezari calls this Arnaud, Guilhen, and tells us, that he was a long time in the ſervice of Queen Joan, and died during the war between the Tendians and the people of Vintimiglia, which happened in the year 1354. He obſerves likewiſe, that he wrote in his voyage to the Eaſt, a Treatiſe, intitled, Las Suffrenſas d'Amours, i. e. "The Sufferings of Love", which he addreſſed to Yſnarde (a).

☞ARNAUD DE MEYRVEILH, was a Poet of Provence in the beginning of the XIIIth Century. His father had an eſtate and Lordſhip at Meyrveilh near Aix in Provence, but was obliged by his misfortunes to ſell it. Arnaud, who had made ſome progreſs in learning, thought it neceſſary to travel, in order to enjoy the converſation of the Poets of that time; from whom he learned to write in the Provencal language, which was at that time the moſt in requeſt with thoſe, who were fond of Poetry and Romances [A]. He entered into the ſervice of the Viſcount of Beziers, whoſe name was Taillefer, and who

[A] The Provencal language, which was at that time the moſt in requeſt of all others, with thoſe, who were fond of Poetry and Romances.] Monſieur Huet, Biſhop of Avranches, in his Origin of Romances, has given us ſeveral very curious obſervations with regard to the Romances and Poetry of Provence. He tells us, that when the Latin tongue fell into neglect, the verſifiers, compoſers, jeſters, inventors of tales, and in ſhort, all who ſtudied what they called the Gay Science, began about the time of Hugh Capet to run into the humour of writing Romances, which they diſperſed over all France. Theſe Fables were compoſed in the Roman tongue; for formerly the people of Provence had a greater ſhare of learning and Poetry than all the reſt of France. This Roman tongue was that, which the Romans introduced into Gaul with their conqueſts. It was corrupted by time, and by mixing the Gauliſh language amongſt it; ſo that the French or Tudeſque, which followed, was neither Latin, Gauliſh, nor French, but a medley of them all. However, the Latin was predominant in it; and for that reaſon it continued to be called Roman, to diſtinguiſh it from the particular and natural language of each country, as the French, Gauliſh or Celtic-Aquitanic, and Belgic. For Cæſar obſerves, that theſe three languages were different among themſelves; which Strabo explains as different dialects of the ſame language. The Spaniards uſe the word Romance in the ſame ſenſe with us, and call their ordinary language by the ſame name. The Roman being then underſtood, thoſe of Provence, who applied themſelves to fictions, made uſe of it in their writings, which from thence were called Romances. The Verſifiers travelled about the country, and were well rewarded for their labours, and nobly entertained by perſons of quality, whom they viſited. Some of them would be ſo tranſported with hearing their performances repeated, that they would diveſt themſelves of their robes, to adorn the Poets with them. The Provencals were not the only perſons, who delighted in theſe amuſements; for almoſt every County in France had their Romancers, even as far as Picardy, which produc'd their Servantois, pieces treating of Love in a ſatyrical way. Monſieur Huet afterwards obſerves, that it is very probable, that the Italians were firſt induced to compoſe Romances by the examples of thoſe in Provence, who were famous for them at the time when the Popes ſat at Avignon, and perhaps by that of the other diviſions of the French, when the Normans and Charles Earl of Anjou, brother to St. Lewis, a Prince of great merit, and a Poet himſelf, made war in Italy; ſince the Normans themſelves cultivated the Gay Science. The Provencal Poets were called Troubadours or Trouverres, and were the moſt eminent of all the French in Poetry and Romance. But their art was ſo generally admired, that all parts of that country had perſons of that profeſſion. The eleventh and following Centuries produce a prodigious number of them both in proſe and verſe; and the Preſident Fauchet mentions one hundred and twenty ſeven Poets, who lived before the year 1300. Mr. Rymer in his Short View of Tragedy (1), tells us, that the Italian Authors, as Bembo, Speron Sperone, and others, acknowledge that the beſt part of their language and of their Poetry is derived from that of Provence; which is the caſe likewiſe of the Spaniſh and other modern languages. It is certain, that Petrarch, one of the moſt eſteemed Writers among the Italians, would appear very empty, if the Provencal Poets were to demand back from him what he has borrowed of them. In ſhort, all our modern Poetry comes from them. There never was known ſo great an application in the Princes and people, as there was at that time every where to the Provencal Poetry, which occaſioned the fancy of Philip de Mouſks, one of their Romancers, that Charlemagne made a donation of Provence to be the Poet's patrimony. Mr. Rymer tells us, that he was more particular upon this ſubject, in order to prevent an impreſſion, which the Monks of that time might otherwiſe make upon his Readers; eſpecially Roger Hoveden, who informs us, that King Richard I, (who with his brother Jeffrey had formerly lived who was deſcended of the Earls of Toulouſe; and he fell in love with the Counteſs of Burlas named Alearde, wife to Taillefer. Our Poet had a very advantageous perſon, and ſung well, and was extremely converſant in Romances. The Counteſs ſhewed him great civilities; but he durſt not declare to her, that the Sonnets, which he made, were of his own compoſition, but aſcribed the honour of them to others. However his paſſion induced him at laſt to write one, in which he declared openly his love for her; and this Sonnet made ſo great an impreſſion upon her, that ſhe received his chaſte deſires, as Du Verdier Vau-privas tells us (a), with the utmoſt humanity, and made him ſeveral noble preſents. He wrote a Book intitled Las recaſtenas de ſa Comteſſa, and a collection of Poems and Sonnets. He died in the year 1220. Petrarch mentions him in the 4th Chapter of his Triumph of Love (b).

lived at the Courts of ſeveral Princes in and about Provence, and ſo came to take delight in their language and Poetry,) "in order to raiſe himſelf a name, went "about begging and buying verſes and flattering "rhymes; and by rewards enticed over from France "Singers and Jeſters, to ſing of him in the ſtreets. "And it was every where given out, that he had none "equal to him in the whole world." Hic ad augmentum & famam ſui nominis emendicata Carmina, & rithmos adulatorios comparabat, & de regno Francorum Cantores & Joculatores allexerat, ut de illo canerent in Plateis, & dicebatur ubique quod non erat talis in orbe. It is a miſtake, that theſe Songſters and Jeſters were brought from France; for theſe countries were fiefs of the Empire. Frederic I. had infeoffed Ramond Berenger of the County of Provence, Forcalquiers, and other places adjacent. Ramond Count of Toulouſe was the grand patron of thoſe Poets, and at the ſame time the Protector of the Albigenſes, who ſo much alarmed the Popiſh world, and coſt ſo many Cruſades to ſuppreſs them. Guilhem of Agoult, Albert of Siſteron, Rambald of Orange, (names ſince revived by the Duke of Savoy,) were principal Poets. All the Princes, who were in league together to ſupport the Albigenſes againſt France and the Pope, encouraged and patronized theſe Poets. Hence we may conclude the reaſon, why the Monks were ſo angry at theſe Singers and Jeſters; and uneaſy, that they ſhould enjoy any degree of familiarity with the King. The ſame Critic afterwards obſerves (a), that the Provencal was the firſt of the modern languages, that was adapted to the muſick and ſweetneſs of Rhyme: which paſſing by Savoy to Monferat, the Italians thence began to poliſh the volgare, and to imitate the Provencals in their verſes. The intermarriages of the Engliſh, and the dominions, which they held about that country, brought them much ſooner acquainted with the Provencal language and Poetry. And thoſe perſons amongſt the Engliſh, who wrote verſe, as King Richard, Savary de Mauleon, and Robert Groſtead, finding their own tongue too ſtubborn and inflexible, fell readily upon that of Provence, as more ſmooth and pliable. Chaucer ſeized upon all the Provencal, French, or Latin words, which he met with, and mixed them with the Engliſh, after he had modelled them according to the genius of his own language. The Provencal Poets were called Troubadours, Jeongleors, and Chanterres; the laſt word is not foreign to our Cathedrals; the ſecond Roger Hoveden renders JOCULATORES or Jeſters; as we may tranſlate the firſt Trumpeters. But the Troubadours were likewiſe called Troverres from their invention, as we ſay treſor, troue. The Italians call them Trovatore. And the name of Jeongleors was given them from ſome muſical inſtrument then in uſe, as the Greek and Latin were called Lyric Poets. This inſtrument was very probably the harp. T.

ARNAUD, a noble and ancient family of Auvergne. It is above two hundred years ago, that a daughter of this houſe was married to a Lord de la Fayette, grandſon to him who was Marechal of France under Charles VI. HENRY ARNAUD married, about the year 1480, Catherine Bariot, a relation of him who was Counſellor to the Parliament of Paris, and Maſter of Requeſts, under Lewis XI (a). Soon after this marriage, he came to ſettle at Riom, whither he was invited with many other perſons of merit, by Peter de Bourbon, Count de Beaujeu [A], who there made his uſual reſidence. This Prince was married to Madame Anne of France, daughter of Lewis XI, who intirely governed Charles VIII her brother, and was Regent during his minority. Henry Arnaud got the eſteem of the Count and Counteſs de Beaujeu. He became Gentleman of the Horſe to the Count, and Governor of the City and Caſtle of Hermant, which was the place of his birth, being eight leagues from Riom, upon the frontiers of the Marche Limoſin, near Uſſel. This government was continued to him by the Conſtable of Bourbon, ſon-in-law to the Count de Beaujeu. He retained alſo the office of Maſter of the Horſe. He did a great piece of ſervice to this Conſtable by making his horſes be ſhod the wrong way (b), when Francis I, who treated him as a rebel, ſent out people to take him. They judging by the track of the horſes that he was gone from the place where he was hid, were diſappointed by going to the place where he was not. Henry Arnaud had contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with Florimond de Robertet, Secretary of the Count of Beaujeu, and afterwards Secretary of State under Francis I, and it depended only upon him to procure his ſon a very advantageous match by the generoſity of this friend; but he requited this generoſity with another [B]. He left two ſons, John and Anthony. The firſt

(a) From him deſcended Mr. Bariot, Marquis of Mouſſy, and Meſſieurs Bariot, Counts of Honneuil and Mazy.

(b) We find in the Galanteries des Rois de France, printed at Holland in 1694. p. 189. tom. 1. that Arnaud's houſe was plundered on account of this ſtratagem.

[A] He, with ſeveral other perſons of merit, was invited to come and live at Riom, by Peter of Bourbon, Count of Beaujeu.] They ſhew at this day in Riom the houſes of Montboiſſier, Montmorin, Chazeron, Florat, Chaſteaugay, Mariliac, Dubourg, Duprat, Forget, and Robertet, which were all principal Officers and Favourites of the Count and Counteſs of Beaujeu, and of the Conſtable of Bourbon their ſon-in-law, by whom they were advanced in the end to the firſt poſts of the Army and the Long-Robe (1). See here how accidentally it fell out, that ſo many perſons from Auvergne have appeared in the Court of France in the higheſt poſts under Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I. The Counteſs of Beaujeu firſt brought them from their own Province, and then put fortune into their hands; had it not been for her they would have died in obſcurity, and their great talents had never been known in the world. Hence we may conclude, that the particular glory of any Province, at certain times, entirely depends on ſuch patronages. You will find a Supplement of this at the end of the Menagiana, pages 304 and 305 of the Holland Edition.

[B] He was an intimate friend of Robertet . . . and requited one generoſity with another.] The ſtory is as follows: Florimond de Robertet quitted Montbriſon, his

firſt died and left no children; he gives himſelf in the Church Regiſters of the city of Riom in 1542, the title of Commander of Hermant. ANTHONY ARNAUD his younger brother kept up the family. He firſt married Margarite Moſnier-Dubourg, a near relation to the Chancellor of that name, ſiſter of the famous Anne Dubourg Counſellor of the Parliament, and of John Dubourg Lieutenant Criminel of Riom. He had but one ſon by this marriage, JOHN DE LA MOTTE ARNAUD, whom Thuanus in his hiſtory mentions with ſo much praiſe. This Gentleman, at the head of a company of horſe of which he was Captain, ſhut himſelf up in the city of Yſſoire, which declared on the King's ſide againſt the League, and maintained the ſiege a long time with the Lords de Chabanes and de Chazeron: after which, he made a vigorous ſally, at the head of thirty Troopers, and with his own hand killed the Count of Randam (c), chief of the League in Auvergne. His death cauſed the ſiege to be raiſed, and was the occaſion of gaining the battle, which was afterwards fought, and confirmed all Auvergne to Henry IV, the ſame day and the ſame year, that he won the battle of Yvri. The father of this John Arnaud at firſt followed arms. He raiſed a company of light horſe, and was in ſeveral engagements: but Catherine de Medicis, knowing his capacity and fidelity, made him her Attorney General, and the King's Attorney in the Preſidial of Riom, which at that time was above forty leagues in extent (d). He very much diſtinguiſhed himſelf in theſe two offices. He takes in all the acts which remain of him, the title of Seigneur de la Motte, de Chantegrenelle, de Fontainebleau, de Peſſac, and de Bonnefilles, which are fiefs and caſtles half a league from Riom. He had for his ſecond wife Anne Forget, daughter to the firſt Maitre d' Hotel to the Conſtable of Bourbon (e). He lived to be an hundred and one years old, and died at Paris, whither Queen Catherine de Medicis had invited him. He was buried in St. Sulpice's Church, at the firſt Chapel which was ever built there, of which he was the founder. The title of the foundation imports, that he had the office of Corrector of Accounts, and Comptroller General of the Reſtes [C], and that he was Lord of Corbeville, near Paris. By his ſecond marriage he had twelve ſons (f), and among others ANTHONY ARNAUD, of whom I ſhall ſpeak particularly; ISAAC ARNAUD, who was Comptroller of the Finances: DAVID ARNAUD a Captain, killed at the ſiege of Jerzeau; LEWIS ARNAUD, General of the Finances at Riom: another LEWIS ARNAUD, Secretary to the King at Paris, and PETER ARNAUD the youngeſt of the twelve brothers, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf the moſt in the profeſſion of arms. He was Marechal of the camps and armies to King Lewis XIII, Governor of Port Lewis and Colonel of the regiment of Champaigne. It is of him that the Sieur de Pontis makes ſuch honourable mention. He made no difficulty to compare him with the moſt famous Captains that ever were among the Greeks and Romans. He ſaid he was better acquainted than any man with the ancient military diſcipline, made it be beſt obſerved by the ſoldiers, and that they loved him to adoration. ISAAC ARNAUD, who has been mentioned above, was father to another ISAAC ARNAUD who was Governor of Philipſbourg, and Maitre de Camp of the Carrabins, one of the braveſt men, and fineſt genius's of his age. He is celebrated in the writings of Voiture: his ſiſter was married to Manaſſes de Feuquieres, who commanded the King's army before Thionville in 1639 (g).

(c) Madame de Seneccy Governeſs of the King, was his daughter.

(d) The Preſidials of Gueret, Clermont, and Aurillac had not yet been diſmembred from it.

(e) Monſ. Forget, Secretary of State under Henry IV, and Preſident au Mortier, was of the ſame family.

(f) In the Diſcours Hiſtorique de la Vie de Monſ. Arnaud Docteur de Sorbonne, pag. 2. Liege edition, in 1702, there are but eight ſons allowed to Anthony Arnaud, by the two marriages.

his native place, and went to ſettle at Riom, where he was advanced to the place of Secretary to the Count of Beaujeu. He got the entire aſcendant over the Count, as he afterwards did over Charles VIII, to whoſe care the Queen Regent committed him, as alſo over Louis XII, after the death of Cardinal d'Amboiſe, and laſt of all over Francis I, to whom he was Secretary of State. He had ſo great a friendſhip for Henry Arnaud, that when he left Riom, to fix himſelf at the Court of Charles VIII, he carried with him thither all his children except Jane de Robertet his eldeſt daughter, whom he left at Riom under the care of Henry Arnaud's wife, on purpoſe that they ſhould marry her to John Arnaud their eldeſt ſon, when he ſhould be of age: but her guardians not thinking their ſon a match good enough for her, they married her to the wealthieſt young Gentleman in Riom, named Amable de Ceriers, ſon of a daughter of one Mariliac (2).

[C] He was Corrector of Accounts, and Comptroller General of the Reſtes.] Since the firſt edition of this work I received a little Memoir written by one of the greateſt Genealogiſts of Europe, in which I found the following account: "Anthony Arnaud, Sieur de la "Mothe and de Villeneuve, the King's Attorney in "the Juriſdiction of Auvergne at Riom, Sollicitor "General of the Reſtes of the Parliament in 1568, "and 1570, afterwards Auditor of the Accounts at "Paris, and laſt of all Attorney General to Catherine "de Medicis, was ennobled in December 1577, in "quality of Auditor of the Accounts. He was ſon "to Henry Arnaud, Bailiff of the place of Herman in "Auvergne, and of N. Colonges. He eſpouſed Anne "Forget, daughter of John Forget, Sieur de Bidoigne, "the King's Attorney General in Auvergne, and of "Jane Godinet, and died aged 101, about the year "1591. See the Memoirs of Sulli, Tom. IV, fo-"lio 71." But on the other hand read alſo the Sequel of the Menagiana, page 305 of the Holland Edition.

(a) Konig calls him Mark Anthony. The letter M, which he and others have ſeen before Anthony, in ſome French book, where it ſignified Maître or Monſieur, was probably the cauſe of this miſtake.

ARNAUD (ANTHONY) (a), Advocate of the Parliament of Paris, ſon of another Anthony of whom I have ſpoken in the preceding Article, acquired a prodigious reputation by his eloquence. Henry IV, having a mind to carry the Duke of Savoy to the Parliament, made choice of a day when Arnaud was to plead a fine cauſe [a] (b). He gave

This is not true in fact: Peter Mathieu, whom Bayle quotes, relates it after this manner: "Preſident de Harley, ſays "he, knowing that the King would come to the "Parliament, choſe a cauſe to be pleaded on that "day, the ſubject of which was very tragical, &c." 2. gave this able man a Writ for Counſellor of State [β]. Queen Mary de Medicis made him her Attorney General [γ], and would have made him Secretary of State; but he refuſed that office, and told the Queen, that he ſhould ſerve her Majeſty better by being Advocate, than by being Secretary of State: This has been hinted at in his Epitaph [A] [δ]. The Advocate General Marion (c) was one day ſo well pleaſed with hearing him plead, that he took him into his coach, carried him to dinner, and placed his eldeſt daughter Catherine Marion next him. After dinner he took him aſide, and aſked him what he thought of his daughter; and underſtanding that he ſeemed to think her a very deſerving Lady, he gave her to him in marriage (d) [ε]. error by the Memoirs, which he follows (1), and which make him ſtumble at every ſtep, he thought, that this cauſe had been pleaded in a very ſolemn manner, which is falſe; the King accompanied by the Duke of Savoy, was at the Parliament only incognito. They were, ſays P. Matthieu, (Hiſt. d'Henry IV, p. 134. of the fol. Ed.) in the gilt chamber, whence they could hear, without being ſeen. The Pleas of Anne Robert, Ant. (3) Critical Remark at the end of the French edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

[β] He gave this able man a Writ for Counſellor of State.] The Memoirs mentioned above, and which contain a continual elogium, even contrary to truth, inſinuate, that this Writ was granted to Arnaud, as a reward for his pleading; but all this is mere romancing. Counſellor Arnaud never had ſuch a Writ, as appears plainly by the titles he gives himſelf in the Certificate taken from the Pariſh-Regiſters, dated Feb. the 6th, 1612, relating to the chriſtening of his ſon. We find there only theſe words: M. Ant. Arnaud, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, and Counſellor of the ſame City, Lord of Andilli. Is it probable, that a man who ſtiles himſelf Counſellor of the City, would omit the title of Counſellor of State, if it had belonged to him? It is true, that M. de Sainte Marthe ſays, Anthony choſe to continue in the Hall as a Lawyer, rather than to accept the place of Attorney General, which Marion his father-in-law would have reſign'd to him, and a ſeat in the King's Council. This fact, whether true or falſe, proves that this Lawyer never was Counſellor of State. Let it be obſerved, that at that time a Writ for the place of Counſellor of State did not hinder a Lawyer from continuing to plead at the Bar as uſual, ſeveral inſtances of it might be produced (4). CRIT. REM.]

(4) Ibid.

[γ] Queen Mary de Medicis made him her Attorney General.] This fact is not true. Mr. de Sainte Marthe, who does not forget to tell us, that Arnaud had been Attorney General to Catherine de Medicis after his father, does not ſay a word of what Mr. Bayle affirms; nay the abſtract from the Pariſh-Regiſters, related above, ſufficiently proves the falſity of it; nor does Father Queſnel in the leaſt mention it (5). CRIT. REM.]

(5) Ibid.

[A] He declined being Secretary of State. . . . . This has been hinted at in his Epitaph.] Monſr. le Maitre, grandſon and godſon to Anthony Arnaud the Lawyer, was Author of this Epitaph. Thoſe who have a deſire to read it need not take the trouble of ſeeking it elſewhere; thoſe who are not curious about it may paſs it over: tho' this piece of advice may perhaps be thought unneceſſary.

[δ] And would have made him Secretary of State, but he refuſed that office, &c. This has been hinted at in his Epitaph.] 1. The fact related here is ſufficiently confuted by the teſtimony of Mr. de Sainte Marthe, and by the ſilence of Father Queſnel; who relates two ſuch facts, not of Anthony, but of John and Claude his brothers. 2. In order to praiſe, right or wrong, this Lawyer, who indeed was a worthy man, our Author makes him ſay, in my opinion, a downright impertinence. For can a man of ſenſe think or ſay, that he will be more capable to ſerve a Queen-Regent, by continuing to plead cauſes at the Bar, than if he were a Secretary of State? 3. His Epitaph is mere bombaſt; whence it can be only concluded that Mr. Arnaud had refuſed very honourable poſts, but not that of Secretary of State, rather than that of Firſt-Preſident, or Chancellor. See the three laſt verſes, and you will find, that they don't directly inſinuate, either that any thing had ever been offered to him, or that he refuſed it. Nay the very thought of theſe verſes ſeem to me falſe and ill grounded. For ſuppoſing the truth of the fact related by Mr. de Sainte Marthe, which I only believe out of courteſy, I mean, that Mr. Arnaud refuſed to be made Attorney General in the room of his father-in-law; if he had accepted that poſt, it might then have been ſaid, that he preferred the honour of being the Oracle of France, to ſome higher poſt, to which he might have aſpired. But to ſay that of a Lawyer, who never was a Demoſthenes, or a Cicero, is very ridiculous. Theſe words Titres empruntez (borrowed titles) is only put into the verſe to rhime with Dignitez (dignities). For if Mr. Arnaud had been Attorney General, or Secretary of State, or in any poſt of that nature, theſe titles would not have been borrowed, but real (6). CRIT. REM.]

(6) Ibid.

[ε] The Attorney-General Marion — gave him his daughter in marriage.] Who would not imagine, from Mr. Bayle's account, that Mr. Marion was already Attorney General, when he did Mr. Arnaud the honour to give him his daughter? Yet the truth of the matter is, that this marriage was celebrated in the year 1587, when Mr. Marion and Mr. Arnaud were both but common Lawyers. Mr. Marion continued ſuch till the year 1596, when in the month of Auguſt he was made Counſellor of Parliament; afterwards he was raiſed to the poſt of Preſident, in what the French call the firſt of the Courts of Inqueſt (7), and to that of Attorney General in 1597, ten years after his daughter's marriage (8). mous cauſes [ζ] that Anthony Arnaud has pleaded, is that of the Univerſity againſt the Jeſuits, in the year 1594. We ſhall ſee underneath what was the recompence of it [B]. Some ſay that he publiſhed a book in 1602, to hinder the reſtoring of them [C], but that having well foreſeen that they would return, and become formidable, he endeavoured to ſuppreſs it. He had been Counſellor and Attorney General to Queen Mary de Medicis. Thoſe who have ſaid that he was of the Reformed Religion, have uttered a very great falſhood [D]. He had twenty two children by his marriage with Catherine Marion (e)

[ζ] One of the moſt famous cauſes &c.] Mr. Arnaud had compoſed his Plea with all the fire of imagination, and ſtrength of eloquence, that lay in his power; and was extremely deſirous to deliver it in a ſolemn manner before a numerous audience; but he had the mortification to plead his cauſe privately, the doors of the court being ſhut. He was alſo diſappointed in his hopes of ſucceſs; his motion was, that the Court would be pleaſed to order, that the Jeſuits ſhould retire out of the Kingdom in a fortnight after the ſentence had been pronounced againſt them, — and that if after this term any Jeſuit be found in France, he ſhould be immediately condemned as guilty of high-treaſon, without any further trial. But the Court only ordered, that Arnaud's Plea, with the others made at the ſame time for or againſt the Jeſuits, ſhould be tacked to the other writings belonging to the law-ſuit commenced againſt them by the Univerſity within thirty years paſt, and depending ever ſince the year 1564, that is to ſay, ever ſince Paſquier's Plea againſt thoſe Fathers. So that, properly ſpeaking, the Jeſuits gained their cauſe, and Arnaud was caſt, or more properly nonſuited (9). CRIT. REM.]

[C] He publiſhed a Book to hinder the reſtoring of the Jeſuits . . . . he endeavoured to ſuppreſs it.] It is a little book containing 144 pages in 12*mo*, intitled, A frank and true Diſcourſe to the King, concerning the Re-eſtabliſhment of the Jeſuits as requeſted of him. Father Richeome confutes it in his apologetical complaint, wherein he alſo confutes the Catechiſm of the Jeſuits, which came out at the ſame time and was wrote by Stephen Paſquier. I have read in the remarks upon the Catholick Confeſſion of Sancy (2) a circumſtance which I ſhall barely tranſcribe. "The "Lawyer Arnaud made no reply to this; not that "the Livre de la Verité défendue (3) made him give "out, but becauſe he foreſaw that the favour which "the Jeſuits were in with Henry IV, would prevail "with him more than all the reaſons that could be "offered for continuing in force the ſentence of their "baniſhment. In ſhort the poor man was ſo much "afraid that he had ſaid too much in his little "book, that I have ſeen a copy of it, wherein a very "ingenious man of that time made the following ob"ſervation with his own hand: This Book (Le franc "& veritable Diſcours) [ν], was compoſed by Mr. An"thony Arnaud their good friend; and underneath, "the Copies were called in by the Author."

(2) Book 2. chap. 6. pag. 535.

(3) The Author of the Remarks has ſaid, p. 534, that Richeome, in 1594, had anſwered the Plaidoier de Pâquier, under the name of Francis de la Montagne, in a book intitled, La Verité défendue.

[ν] This book Le Franc & veritable Diſcours, &c.] I don't believe him to be the Author of that Book. The ſtyle of it is a great deal leſs violent and ſharp than that of his Plea. Beſides, the Author ſays (p. 37), that he had loved the Jeſuits perhaps more than he ought to have done, &c. This book was printed at Rochelle, according to Father Richeome, who confuted it, without knowing the Author of it. Let us obſerve here, that there are two errors in Bayle's marginal quotation (3); inſtead of Pâquier's Plea, it ſhould be A. Arnaud's; and inſtead of de la Montagne read dez Montagnes. Let us alſo take notice, that theſe words in the remark [C], not that the Livre de la Verité défendue made him give out, ſuppoſe, that this book was an anſwer to the Franc Diſcours, which is falſe. Laſtly, as long as we don't know who is the Author of that Remark upon Sanci's Catholick Confeſſion, we cannot rely upon his evidence (12). CRIT. REM.] (12) Ibid.

[D] Thoſe who have ſaid that he was of the Reformed Religion have uttered a groſs falſhood.] The Author of the Amphitheatrum honoris, concealed under the name of Clarus Bonarſcius, which is the anagram of Carolus Scribanius, his true name, calls him in plain terms a Calviniſt, and the Imago primi ſæculi Soc. Jeſu does the ſame. The Author of the Apology of John Chatel ſays, page 205, that the word Arnaud comes from ἀρνῆμαι, which ſignifies to renounce or apoſtatize, and that it comes near to that of Antichriſt, which is the name of the beaſt; and page 206, ſtyles him a Servant worthy him, to whom was given a mouth uttering great things and blaſphemies, Revel. 13 (4). Du Pleix was the author of the falſehood we are ſpeaking of, which he afterwards publickly retracted. He had ſaid in the firſt Edition of his Hiſtory of Henry IV, ſpeaking of the Law-ſuit that the Jeſuits had with the Univerſity of Paris, in 1594, that by reaſon of Anthony Arnaud's being a profeſſed Calviniſt, the choice which the agents for the Univerſity had made of him, was looked upon as highly ſcandalous and odious. But ſee in what manner he retracted his words. Anthony Arnaud, a man of great eloquence, was employed as council for the Plaintiffs (5). Formerly I was led by wrong information to think him a Proteſtant, but it is certain that he never was; and has left behind him children of great virtue, and zeal to the Catholick Religion. It is ſomething ſurprizing that an Hiſtorian, who was not of an inferior rank, could be ſo miſtaken as to what religion ſo celebrated a Lawyer profeſſed; and who had even appealed to the whole Parliament to bear witneſs of his Catholiciſm in that very pleading, from which Du Pleix takes occaſion to ſpeak of him. Let us hear what he himſelf ſays in this pleading. If by

by chance, they and their abettors are not ſo impudent as to dare to aſſert, that the Sorbonne was heretical when it made a Decree againſt them in 1554, however, they are ſo barefaced and void of ſhame as to publiſh among the women of their Congregation, that all thoſe who proſecute this Law-ſuit are Heretics, who come from Geneva and England. As for me, who am council in it, were it not well known that from my infancy I was educated in the Royal College of Navarre, and that my Profeſſion which was ſo remarkable, and my admiſſion into ſuch publick and honourable employments ſince the year 80 and 85, did too openly place me above the reach of their vile aſperſions, they would not ſcruple to ſay that I was ſent from thence to plead againſt them. But he found by experience as well as we do now, that he was deceived when he thought himſelf beyond the reach of calumny; for beſides the writers I have already inſtanc'd, there ſhortly after ſtarted up againſt him two new accuſers. The firſt is Father Hazart; the ſecond maſks himſelf under a fictitious name (6), but has produced a letter from a Gentleman named Mr. de Heucourt (7), who teſtifies that the father of Mr. Arnaud, Doctor of the Sorbonne, was born and died a Huguenot. I am of opinion, and not without reaſon, that Father Hazart only revived the former accuſation; his words are theſe. I am not at all diſturb'd at the retractation of Mr. Du Pleix, nor leſs at my liberty to look upon his firſt opinion as the legitimate offspring of his beſt knowledge, and the ſecond only that of his complaiſance to the family of the Sieur Arnaud, which was of ſufficient credit at that time of day to engage, if not oblige an Author to pay a courteſy of this nature (8). In anſwer to him it has been ſaid, that it is a certain mark of great obſtinacy and prepoſſeſſion, "to depend "upon what an Hiſtorian confeſſes he related from falſe "informations, rather than what he aſſerts from bet"ter information to be certain and indubitable; and "that if moſt people were of ſo bad a diſpoſition, the "injury which an Hiſtorian might do ignorantly, by "publiſhing from erroneous memoirs, falſities preju"dicial to the honour of a neighbour, would be ir"reparable, foraſmuch as a recantation could not give "any ſatisfaction (9)." They fortified themſelves ſtill farther out of the anſwer of Father Hazart. Do but ſee, ſay they, in the mean time how gratefully Mr. Du Pleix is rewarded for his partiality to the Jeſuits in his Hiſtory! It is without doubt, doing him a great deal of honour to pretend that he was a man of ſo little conſcience as to give the lie to his knowledge, and to retract his words, after he had ſaid nothing but the truth, when he aſſured us that the Lawyer who pleaded againſt them was a Proteſtant. I do not know (10) that the challenge [9] he received of him, who publiſhed that Letter of Monſieur d'Heucourt, was ever anſwer'd; however, it was written in very preſſing terms: he addreſſes Mr. Arnaud in the following manner: This Letter, Sir, the original of which was ſent to me to tranſmit to you, abſolutely inſiſts upon your producing a certificate of your baptiſm; for it is no longer your enemies the Jeſuits, that reproach you with being born a Huguenot. However, he that printed the Letter was confuted, for the publick was aſſured (11) that Mr. d'Heucourt diſowned it.

The publick received this piece of information from the Journal of Mr. Baſnage (12), as alſo from a Book which came out ſince the firſt impreſſion of this Article; I mean from the ſhort Hiſtory of the life and works of Mr. Arnaud. See with what haughtineſs the Author has treated this point in pages 17 and 18. We ſhall not here take up our time in confuting the impertinent Author of an Avis important to Mr. Arnaud, &c. in which is exhibited the extract of a pretended letter from the Marquis of Heucourt, in order to prove that Mr. Arnaud was born a Calviniſt as well as his father. All this is nothing but impoſture, for we are ready to ſhew, not only a certificate of his baptiſm copied from the regiſter, which this Author of the advice calls upon him to produce, but alſo a formal declaration under the hand of the ſaid Marquis, dated from Brompton near London, May $\frac{1}{2}\frac{3}{3}$, 1692, in which he abſolutely denies that he either wrote or knew any thing of the Letter, and that it was nothing but a piece of malice and forgery. It appears to me very probable that one of the brothers of our Arnaud the Lawyer, turned Huguenot [1] (13); for a perſon who was very capable of knowing the truth of this matter, wrote to me, that Madam de Feuquieres (14) and Madam d'Heucourt her ſiſter, who were both nieces to this Lawyer by the father's ſide, were of the Reformed Religion to the laſt. The ſame perſon informed me by letter, that ISAAC ARNAUD, Miniſter of Rochelle, and Author of a Book intitled, Mépris du Monde, was of the ſame family with Mr. Arnaud. This piece was printed more than once, for the Roan Edition, in 1637, implies, that it had been reviſed, corrected and augmented with three additional treatiſes by the Author; namely, Réſolutions Virtueuſes; de l'Obeiſſance deue au Roi; Méditation ſur la Vieilleſſe.

(13) Rem. β.

[1] One of the brothers of our Arnaud the Lawyer, turned Huguenot.] We ſhall ſhew, that ſeveral of his brothers and ſiſters were Proteſtants, and give ſome account of them. Father Queſnel mentions (14) eight of Arnaud's brothers, but he does not confeſs that ſome of them lived in the Reformed Religion: in which he is to be blamed. It is true, that the Author he confutes is miſtaken, when he aſſerts, that the Arnauds were but four brothers, and that they all died Proteſtants; but this laſt aſſertion is true with regard to two of theſe brothers. Here follows Father Queſnel's account, with ſome obſervations (15).

(14) Juſtification de Mr. Arnaud, pag. 7.

(15) What is in Italic, is F. Queſnel's.

The eldeſt of the eight brothers was he, whom Henry III would make Secretary of State; but he preferred a poſt in the Army, and was killed in the ſervice of that King. His name was John; F. de Sainte Marthe, who calls him Anthony, (I think he is miſtaken) tells us, that he died in Auvergne, in the ſervice of Henry IV againſt the Leaguers, but does not mention the place of Secretary of State. Father Queſnel ſays nothing concerning his Religion, which makes me ſuſpect, that he had no proofs of this John's having been a Roman Catholick. I am not able to decide whether he was or no. D'Aubigné in his Hiſtory (16) mentions one Captain Arnaud, who in the year 1573 did a very brave action at the ſiege of Rochelle, in defence of that city; but I cannot tell who he was, nor even whether he belonged to the family of the Arnaud, who is the ſubject of this article.

(16) Look for Arnaud in the Index.

The ſecond was the father of Arnaud Doctor of the Sorbonne; it is the Lawyer Anthony Arnaud; he was a Roman Catholick.

The third was Intendant of the Finances (17) . . . . , and father-in-law to the Marquis of Feuquieres. His name was Iſaac, and he was certainly a Proteſtant, which father Queſnel ought to have obſerved. Iſaac had at leaſt one daughter of a firſt marriage. After the year 1600 he married the widow of Mr. de Feuquieres, and afterwards gave his daughter to the ſon of that Lady. He had another daughter, but I don't know whether by his firſt or ſecond wife. He married this daughter to the Marquis d'Heucourt, who was a Proteſtant as well as the Marquis de Feuquieres. Iſaac Arnaud had been a Lawyer, and it was not before the year 1602 that he was made Intendant of the Finances, but I don't know exactly when; nor can I tell whether he be the ſame, who is mentioned in the Biblioth. Baluziana (18), where we find a Decree of the Parliament, dated March the 9th, which mentions Iſaac Arnaud Comptroller General of the Arrears of the Court of Accounts.

(17) Or, Comptroller of the Exchequer.

(18) Pag. 926.

The fourth was, as they then called it, Comptroller General of the Arrears. (19). I knew nothing of him. Perhaps he is the ſame who is mentioned in the foregoing Decree. I ſuſpect that he was there only called Arnaud, and that the perſon, who made the Catalogue of Mr. Baluze's books, added of his own accord the name of Iſaac, becauſe he knew, that one Iſaac Arnaud had had a place in the Finances. I could eaſily be perſuaded, that their fourth brother was one of the two Arnauds, who had been a good while Clerk to Mr. de Sulli Superintendant of the Finances; in this caſe he muſt have been a Proteſtant, for it is certain that the two brothers, who were in that Lord's ſervice, were of the Reformed Religion. Father Queſnel is entirely ſilent with regard to this Arnaud's Religion.

(19) Controlleur General des Reſtes.

The fifth was killed at the ſiege of Gergeau at the feet of Henry III.] His name was Benjamin; but inſtead of Henry III, I think we ſhould read Henry IV. Here again Father Queſnel does not ſay of what Religion this Arnaud was; which may make us ſuſpect that he was a Proteſtant.

The ſixth died in 1602, juſt as he was upon the point of being made Secretary of State. His name was Claude:

[E] He had in marriage .... twenty two children.] The eldeſt was named ROBERT. This was he who made himſelf ſo famous under the name of ARNAUD D'ANDILLI: See the following Article. The ſecond died Biſhop of Angers, in the month of June 1692: His name was HENRY ARNAUD [λ], and raiſed himſelf a great eſteem while he was Abbot of St. Nicholas, before he was advanced to the Mitre. When he was at Rome he, by his great addreſs and courage, preſerved the honour and the effects of the Barberini [μ] againſt the attacks of the creatures and relations of Innocent X. The Prince of Paleſtrina, and the Cardinals, Francis, Anthony and Charles Barberini, to ſhew their ſenſe of gratitude, did not only cauſe his medal to be ſtruck, and his picture to be drawn, which they plac'd in all their houſes; but alſo erected a ſtatue to him in their Palace at Rome, with a verſe underwritten, which Fortunatus [›] had compoſed

F. Queſnel does not ſpeak of his religion, but it is certain that he was a Proteſtant. He died the 21ſt of May 1603, and not before, as may be ſeen in the Journal d' Henry IV (20), where we alſo find that he was then twenty nine years wanting nine days: whence it follows that he was born May the 30th, 1574. Mr. De St. Marthe, who made his Elogium, ſays expreſly, that he was the brother of Anthony, Iſaac, &c. In his epitaph, which was in the burying place belonging to the Proteſtants, behind St. Sulpicius's Church, were found the following words. "Noble Claude Arnaud, "in his life-time Counſellor, Notary and Secretary to "the King, ... Treaſurer General of France in the "diſtrict of Paris, and placed by the King under the "Marquis de Roſni, to adminiſter his Majeſty's finances "under the inſpection of that Lord (21)."

(20) Tom. 1. p. 240.

(21) See Journal d'Henry IV. tom. 2. p. 16.

The ſeventh was Secretary to the King, and Comptroller General of the Arrears; and acquired in the management of the finances, the reputation of a diſintereſtedneſs which was proof againſt all manner of temptations. His name was Lewis, he was a Proteſtant very zealous for his religion. Bayle mentions him in the Article of SAMUEL DURANT, without knowing that he was Anthony's brother. Seven Sermons of this Durant were dedicated by the Miniſter Spanheim to one Arnaud, and F. Queſnel's words do not leave us any room to doubt but it is this Lewis Arnaud. We find another proof of it in the Biblioth. Baluz. (22), where we find theſe words. "A petition preſented to the Parliament, by "Anthony Arnaud, Advocate, and Iſaac Arnaud In"tendant of the Finances, BROTHERS, againſt Ceſar "de Plaiſ. .... who had publiſhed a Libel againſt "them .... under pretence of a law-ſuit which he "had againſt Lewis Arnaud Secretary to the King, "AND ONE OF THEIR BROTHERS. (This petition "was preſented after the death of Henry IV.")

(22) Pag. 927.

The eighth was the famous Colonel of Horſe, &c. F. Queſnel proves very well that he was a Roman Catholic. He died September the 14th, 1624, and was buried in the great Church of Fontenay-le-Comte. I thought it neceſſary, adds F. Queſnel, to enter into theſe particulars .... to prevent the publick from being impoſed upon by the ſpurious letter, in which it was affirmed, that the four brothers were Proteſtants. But could he be ignorant, that the publick would ſoon perceive, that his account is defective; and beſides, the zeal with which he juſtifies Anthony and Peter, compared with the ſilence he keeps concerning the religion of the others, may very well be conſidered as a tacit confeſſion, that they were not Roman Catholics.

That Father does not mention any of the Arnauds ſiſters, but in his Hiſtoire abregée de la vie & des Ouvrages de Mr. Arnaud, in the Edition printed in the year 1697, he owns that they had four ſiſters. It is very probable that they were all Proteſtants; this is certain of at leaſt two of them: for the Miniſter Spanheim ſpeaks to Lewis their brother after this manner. "I "can ſpeak as a domeſtic witneſs of the particular ſer"vices you and the Ladies your ſiſters have done him" (the Miniſter Durant.) 'Tis this Lewis, that Father Veron means, when he ſays (23), "Is there not even "at this preſent time at Charenton (24) a houſe ad"joining the Temple (or Church of the Proteſtants) "where Arnaud, the maſter of that houſe, entertained "the Miniſters at dinner every ſunday."

(24) He was ſtill, and had been for thirty years Rector of that pariſh.

We find then that of theſe Arnauds, brothers and ſiſters, three brothers, and two ſiſters at leaſt were Proteſtants; and with regard to the others, F. Queſnel proves of two only, that they were Roman Catholics, viz. Anthony and Peter. But whence proceeded this diverſity of religion in that family? I own that I cannot account for it. If one reads Spanheim's dedication, it ſeems that the whole family were originally Proteſtants, and that it was only by accident, if I may ſay ſo, that ſome of them were Catholics. Thus Mr. Bayle ſeems to have underſtood Spanheim's words. For ſpeaking of Lewis Arnaud, in the Article of DURANT (25), he ſays, "Some of his relations having turned "Papiſts, he openly ſhewed his concern for it." Spanheim's words are, "Some of your relations have in"creaſed the number (of the converted Calviniſts) to "your great ſorrow. .... The grief you have felt and "ſhewn on this occaſion is a proof of your zeal &c." It ſeems to me certain, that the Father of theſe twelve children died a Roman Catholic. But had he always been of that religion? Were his two wives Catholics? The four daughters being Proteſtants make me doubt of it. However, I cannot affirm any thing poſitively on this ſubject. F. Queſnel does not ſay any thing that can clear up this matter. After all, his ſilence cannot but ſeem a little ſuſpected; for he had a fair opportunity to prove that the father and the mothers were Roman Catholics, if it had been in his power to do it (26). (26) From the French edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

[x] He died about the year 1618.] Mr. Bayle tells us neither at what age Arnaud died, nor where he was born. Moreri and others ſay he was a 103 years of age when he died: But I have proved, in my Bibliotheque de Richelet, as I had done before in my Remarks upon Moreri, in the article GAMBARA, that Arnaud could be but ſeventy years old when he died. Mr. de Sainte Marthe ſays, he was not ſixty then. It is very probable, that he was born in the year 1560. With regard to his native place, I have ſaid formerly upon du Boulay's authority, that he was born at Paris; but now I can hardly doubt but he was born at Riom (27), whence his father did not go to ſettle at Paris till the year 1570, or thereabouts. We meet in the Biblioth. Baluz. p. 126, a convincing proof, that Arnaud was ſtill at Riom in 1566 (28). CRIT. REM.]

[μ] The honour of the Barberini, &c.] This fact is extremely canvaſſed. Meſſrs. de Ste. Marthe, in their Elogium of this Prelate (30), don't ſay a word of it; they only tell us, that Henry Arnaud managed very dexterouſly at the Court of Pope Innocent X the reſtoration of Cardinal d'Eſt. And indeed Henry then Abbot of St. Nicholas of Angiers managed in the affairs of France during three years at the Court of Rome, whence he returned into France in January 1648; and the Barberini were not reſtored to the favour of Innocent X, by the interceſſion of France, till the year 1653. Whence it appears that the Abbot of St. Nicholas had not much forwarded their affairs, which is the true reaſon why Meſſieurs de St. Marthe don't ſpeak of this (31). See the Remark (›). CRIT. REM.]

[›] A verſe of Fortunatus, &c.] Here follows a proof of the falſhood of this fact; whence we may alſo conclude that the pretended medal and pictures mentioned by Mr. Bayle, are mere inventions. Mr. Arnaud de Pompone having been made Secretary of State in the year 1671, Mr. Faydit compoſed a congratulary Poem which he addreſſed to him. He cauſed the coat of arms of this Lord to be engraved at the head of the Poem, with the verſe of Fortunatus, which he altered after the following manner.

He acquitted himſelf at the bar with ſo much honour, and in ſo ſublime a manner, that ſince him there has been no body except "Mr. le Maiſtre his grandſon, who has followed "it poſed for St. Gregory of Tours (15). He died in great reputation for his ſanctity, at Angers, in his dioceſe, from which he had not been once abſent during almoſt four and forty years, that he had been Biſhop of it [ξ]. CATHARINE ARNAUD, eldeſt of the daughters of Anthony, was married to Monſieur le Maitre, Counſellor to the King, and Maſter of the Accompts at Paris, by whom ſhe had Anthony le Maitre, a famous Lawyer, and Iſaac le Maitre de Sacy, famous for his tranſlation of the Bible, for that of the imitation of Jeſus Chriſt, for the life of Dom. Barthelemi des Martyrs, and for his ſacred Poems. ANGELICA ARNAUD, another daughter of Anthony, was perpetual Abbeſs of Port-Royal des Champs, and reformed this Abby according to the model of Clairvaux, and made it elective and triennial. Five of her ſiſters with their mother, took the veil upon them in this Convent, and lived their whole lives in it with great auſterity (16).

The Barberini's alluded here to the arms and country of the Arnauds; for this family came from Auvergn, and bore for their arms a mountain. Memoir of the Mercure Gallant, Dec. 1693.

(16) Extracted from the ſame Memoir.

Note, in the abridgment of the life of Mr. Arnaud, page 20, we are told for certain, I, that he was the twentieth, and laſt of the children of Anthony Arnaud, and of Catharine Marion; but this does not agree with the memoir before cited (17), which makes them to have had two and twenty. II, That at the time that the father of ſo many children died, there remained but ten of them living, four ſons and ſix daughters.

(17) Viz. That which was inſerted in the Mercure Gallant, for the month of Dec. 1693.

[F] One of his daughters reformed the Abby of Port-Royal.] The name of Port-Royal makes ſo great a noiſe in the world, and the Hiſtory of the Arnauds is ſo intermixed with that of it, and this known only from general accounts, that I don't in the leaſt doubt but the curious will be very glad to be informed of any particulars relating to this ſubject; I therefore thought I could not entertain my Reader better than by tranſcribing here what I have read in a Factum (18), this being a kind of writing which very few people are in the leaſt acquainted with (19). "Port-Royal was "originally a Monaſtery of Religious Bernardine Nuns, "ſix leagues diſtant from Paris. One of the ſiſters "of Monſieur d'Andilly was made Abbeſs thereof, "about the beginning of this Century, when ſhe was "but eleven years old. There was at this time, "a general irregularity and remiſſneſs of diſcipline, "which by the Providence of God, was converted to "a great good; for when ſhe was 17 years of age, "ſhe found herſelf ſo ſtrongly diſpoſed, by a divine "influence upon her will, to reform her Abbey (tho' "there had not been ſo much as one, either of men or "women in the whole Order of the Ciſtercians, which "had undergone a reformation) that ſhe undertook "and accompliſhed the work with a great deal of "courage and expedition, ſo great ſucceſs, by the "bleſſing of God, did attend her pious reſolutions. "She baniſhed out of the houſe all property, all her "Nuns after her example, having united in one com-"mon ſtock all that they poſſeſſed before in private. "She alſo enjoined cloſe confinement, perpetual abſti-"nence, nocturnal devotions, faſting, work, and ſi-"lence, according to the rule of diſcipline eſtabliſhed "by Saint Bennet. And this was that ſweet ſavour of "holineſs, which like the perfume of the bridegroom "brought to this houſe, one after another, her ſiſters, "her neices, and even her own mother. The deſign "of ſo thorow a reformation, ſo vigorouſly undertaken, "and ſo happily executed, raiſed her to ſo high eſ-"teem in the Order, that ſhe was made choice of, "tho' not above 27 or 28 years of age, to reform "the famous Abby of Maubuiſſon: ſhe ſpent there 4 "or 5 years, and was therefore obliged, during her "abſence, to leave the government of her houſe of "Port-Royal to her ſiſter who acted in the capacity of "aſſiſtant, and who was afterwards called Mother "Agnes. It was at this time, during her abode at "Maubuiſſon, that ſhe ſaw St. Francis de Sales, who "was come to Paris, to erect there a houſe of the "Viſitation; ſhe ſent to deſire him to come and ſee "her, and placed herſelf under his governance. The "Letters of this Saint ſufficiently manifeſt the "eſteem he had for his dear daughter the Abbeſs of "Port-Royal."

(18) The fourth in defence of the Grand-Nephews of Janſenius, againſt Father Hazart.

(19) Since the firſt impreſſion of this Article, the Factums in defence of the Grand-Nephews of Janſenius have been inſerted in Vol. 8. of the Morale Pratique des Jeſuites.

The Author of the Factum adds, that the widow of Anthony Arnaud, and mother to this Abbeſs, was inſpired with a ſtrong deſire to take the veil upon her, under the conduct of her daughter, and that as God inſtilled into her mind this good deſire at the ſame time, that the Abbeſs was adviſed to remove her Monaſtery from the Country to Paris, "She "purchaſed a houſe and a very fine large garden in "the Faubourg Saint Jacques, which ſhe gave to the "Abbeſs, the Convent, and Nuns of Port Royal "to ſettle there, which they afterwards did, having "at a very great expence fitted up their houſe at Paris "in the condition in which it is at preſent, it pleaſ-"ing God to beſtow a bleſſing on their charitable "and diſintereſted undertakings. There it was that "this happy mother of ſo many pious children, "made choice of her own daughter to be her mo-"ther, dedicating herſelf to the ſervice of God in "leading a religious life under her government and "diſcipline; which having done for the ſpace of four-"teen or fifteen years, with a fervent zeal and an ex-"plary humility, ſhe had the conſolation before ſhe "died to give her bleſſing to her ſix daughters, and "her ſix grand-daughters, who were all in the ſame "Monaſtery, and took the veil in it, except one "who died young, being a penſioner in the ſame "houſe." In a word, we learn from this Factum, that the Abbeſs of Port Royal was perpetual titular Abbeſs, and one of her ſiſters Co-adjutrix; but that both the one and the other having nothing in view but the good and advantage of their houſe, were content to quit their titles, in order to eſtabliſh a triennial election. Mr. d'Andilly obtained of the King the grant neceſſary thereto, altho' he thereby incapacitated himſelf from preſerving this Abbey for ever in his family. Add to this what we ſhall ſay of him under his article.

Menage (32), is ſo much the more happy, that as this Lord's family is originally come from Auvergne, ſo he bears a Mountain in his Coat of Arms. The Abbot was perſuaded that no body had made ſuch an application before him. Menage himſelf, and the men of letters, who uſed to meet at his houſe every Wedneſday, looked upon it as a thought entirely new: nor did any one, in Mr. de Pompone's family, where the Abbot Faydit was very well known, ever imagine that the applying this verſe to an Arnaud, was only an old hint newly revived. All this proves that this verſe had not been applied to Mr. de Pompone's uncle by the Barberini ſeventeen or eighteen years before. Beſides, Mr. Linage de Vanciennes publiſhed in 1678 (33), The diſpute of the Barberini with Pope Innocent X. He relates there all that paſſed in the audiences, which the Abbot of St. Nicholas had of the Pope with regard to the affair of the Barberini, by which it appears that the Abbot acted with a great deal of prudence and courage. But Mr. de Vanciennes obſerves (34) having oppoſed a ſtep which the Barberini would take in 1641, they were diſpleaſed with his conduct. After that time he had but two Audiences more of the Pope; and the Hiſtorian obſerves, that the affairs of the Barberini were not yet adjuſted, when the Abbot of St. Nicholas left Rome in January 1648, the Marquis the Fontenay being then already arrived in that city with the character of an Embaſſador. It was Mr. de Valencey, this Marquis's ſucceſſor in his Embaſſy, who terminated that affair in June 1653. Whence appears how inaccurate, or rather falſe the account was, which Mr. Bayle followed (35). CRIT. REM.]

Further it is not true that he never went out of his dioceſe, after he enter'd it the 15th of November 1650. For in an Elogium upon this Prelate, in which his praiſes are not ſpared, it is ſaid (36) that he left his dioceſe once, and went to Thouars, in order to endeavour the converſion of the Prince of Tarente to the Church of Rome (37). This is an egregious over-ſight, for he who wrote the Diſcourſe in defence of Phalaris, was one Arnaud Provencal. See the note [M] of the article EPICURUS.

ARNAUD D'ANDILLI (ROBERT) eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was a perſon of great merit. See his Elogium in Moreri's Dictionary, and in the Hommes Illuſtres of Monſieur Perrault. He married Madam de la Bodrerie, daughter of him who was ſo long Ambaſſador to England, and grand-daughter of a ſiſter of the Chancellor de Silleri. By this marriage he had five daughters, all Nuns at Port Royal, (of which the eldeſt ſiſter, Angelica of St. John, was eſteemed a prodigy of wit, of knowledge, and of virtue,) and three ſons. The eldeſt is M. L'Abbé ARNAUD, Commendatary Abbé of Chomes (a), who having born arms a great while for the ſervice of the King, in the regiment of Iſaac Arnaud his couſin, Quarter Maſter of the Carabins, retired to the Biſhop of Angers his uncle. The ſecond is HENRY ARNAUD Sieur of Luzancy, who ſpent his life in ſolitude. The third is SIMON ARNAUD Marquis of Pompone, formerly Miniſter and Secretary of State, and at preſent Miniſter of State, known by his Embaſſies to Holland and Sweden (b). M. Arnaud d'Andilly went out early into the world. He had divers employments, which attached him to the court, and to the attendance of the late King, and he did not ſuffer himſelf to be corrupted by the infectious air that is breathed in ſuch places [A]. One may ſee in the collection of his Letters the difference that he had with the Preſident de Grammond, who had ſpoken of him in his Latin Hiſtory otherwiſe than he ought. Thoſe who forged the Romance of the Aſſembly of Bourg-Fontaine, deſigned by the letters A. A. one of the pretended accomplices of the deſign, that they ſuppoſe was taken there to introduce Deiſm; and when they ſaw that theſe letters could not agree with Monſieur Arnaud the Doctor, they pointed out another perſon, Arnaud d'Andilly, as they have very clearly explained ſince (c). But the Author of the Factums of the great nephews of Janſenius, has ſhewn by ſolid reaſons, that this ſecond application of the two A. A. was abſurd [B]. Monſieur d'Andilly retired to the Convent of Port-Royal in 1644 [C], and there paſſed the reſt of his days in a continual

He knew as much of Religion as a man of wit can learn from the Catechiſm, from books of piety, from the converſation of very devout perſons, from reading the Word of God and hearing it preached; but the leſs he knew of it as it is taught in the ſchools, the more incapable was he of raiſing doubts concerning the truth of our myſteries* (7), for he early accuſtomed himſelf to bring his mind under ſubjection to that Divine authority which is manifeſted to us by the Church, and never was any perſon more averſe to expoſtulating or cavilling with God, or ſtriving to comprehend by impotent though inſolent reaſon what ought to be the object of an humble modeſt faith.

He had left his wife in 1637; the reflection of Balzac upon this loſs is worth knowing [D].

" it was not till 1648, that the Houſe of Paris ob" tained leave of the Archbiſhop to ſend a part " of their Nuns to their houſe des Champs." I leave it to my reader to decide the difference betwixt the Author of this Factum, and Mr. Richelet (8) [a], whomakes Mr. Arnaud d'Andilli to have retreated to no place but his houſe at Pompone. I content myſelf with confronting theſe two different authorities, and ſhall go on in my following relation, which I ſhall do with ſo much the more pleaſure, as it will furniſh us with ſome particulars relating to the lives of ſome great perſonages, which ſo many people are curious of.
" Arnaud d'Andilli . . . . ſerved his King and Coun" try twenty years; in recompence of which ſervices
" he was allowed a penſion of eight thouſand livres,
" which were afterwards reduced to ſix: with this he " retired to Pompone, a village about ſeven or eight
" leagues diſtant from Paris; where, entirely diſen" gaging himſelf from the vanities of the world,
" and leading a thorow Chriſtian life, he compoſed
" ſeveral works. His Letters, the Poem upon the Life of " Jeſus Chriſt (9), . . . His tranſlations of Joſephus of the " Hiſtory of the Jews, the Works of Saint Tereſa, and thoſe
" of Davila, are the productions of his ſolitude. . . The " beſt of his tranſlations is that of Joſephus (10).
" One day when Richelet went to ſee him at Pom-
" pone, not long after it was publiſhed, the conver" ſation, after ſome other diſcourſe, turned upon the " manner in which Authors wrote; and as he knew " that Richelet was intimately acquainted with the " celebrated d'Ablancourt, he aſked him how many " times that famous man reviſed every work that he " gave the publick: Six times, anſwered Richelet;
" and I, replied Mr. Arnaud, have reviſed the Hi-
" ſtory of Joſephus ten times; corrected the ſtyle of it " with great care, and made it much more exact and
" conciſe than that of any other of my works. . . . .
" Arnaud d'Andilli . . . . . in his retreat, after ſeven
" or eight hours ſtudy every day, uſed to divert himſelf
" with rural amuſements, and in particular with
" cultivating his trees, which he brought to ſuch
" perfection, and had ſuch excellent fruit from them,
" that he uſed to ſend ſome of it every year to Queen
" Anne of Auſtria, which this Princeſs liked ſo well, " that ſhe always deſired to be ſerved with it in the
" ſeaſon." This application to gardening, and to make philoſophical diſquiſitions into the nature of trees, is atteſted by Mr. Perrault in his Lives of famous Men, pag. 143, of the Holland Edition.

(8) See his opinion of Mr. Arnaud d'Andilly at the beginning of the Collection of Letters which he publiſhed: edit. Amſterd. 1694, pag. 10.

(9) This contradicts what was ſaid above in the note [A], citation (3).

(10) The Critics find a great many faults in it. See the Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande. I have heard it ſaid that Mr. le Moyne was deſired by the friends of Mr. d'Andilly to mark the places where he thought the Tranſlator had committed any errors, and that he excuſed himſelf, for fear he ſhou'd mark too many.

(11) Balzac, Letter XIX of Book II. to Chapelain, dated Auguſt 14, 1637, pag. 82.

[D] He loſt his wife in 1637: See Balzac's Reflection upon this loſs.] What he has written thereupon does a great deal of honour to our Robert Arnaud and his family. " I am ſenſibly afflicted at the news of " the death of Madam d'Andilli. I cannot help
" having an intereſt in all the good and bad for" tune of a family which ought to be ever dear to " France, and which ſeems to have been born for " the glory of the French name. But I am particu" larly ſorry for the ſake of our friend, who having " never indulged any inordinate paſſion, has in his " wife loſt all his miſtreſſes and all his pleaſures.
" However he is ſo well verſed in the doctrines of " Chriſtianity, and is ſurrounded with ſo many learn" ed men of his own family, that he ſtands in no " need of Stoiciſm or any other foreign aſſiſtance to " fortify himſelf againſt the attacks of fortune; in " his houſe all is reaſoning, all is preaching, all is " perſuaſion, and one Arnaud is worth a dozen Epic-
" tetus's (11)."

[a] I leave it to my Reader to decide the difference betwixt the Author of this Factum, and Mr. Richelet.] This matter can be cleared up in a few words. Mr. d'Andilly retired to Port-Royal in 1644, and lived there about twenty years; but he was obliged to leave it in or about the year 1664; he then went to his ſeat of Pompone, where Richelet ſaw him in 1667. After what was called the Peace of Clement IX, d'Andilly returned to Port-Royal, but I cannot tell exactly in what year, and died there in 1674. See the Bibliotheque de Richelet (*). CRIT. REM.]

ARNAUD (ANTHONY) Doctor of the Sorbonne, ſon of Anthony Arnaud the Advocate [A], was born at Paris the 6th of Feb. 1612, being the twentieth child by the marriage of his father with Catherine Marion. He ſtudied polite Literature and Philoſophy in the College of Calvi (a), and afterwards he began to ſtudy the Law; but he was ſoon withdrawn from this ſtudy, and determined to that of Divinity by the care of his mother, ſeconded by the Abbot of St. Cyran. [A] He was ſon of Anthony Arnaud the Advocate.] This deſcent did without doubt give occaſion to the Jeſuits to bear a great hatred to Mr. Arnaud, as it did on the other hand create a ſtrong averſion in Mr. Arnaud to the Jeſuits. The Author of the Queſtion curieuſe (1) will not altogether deny me this ſuppoſition, ſeeing he ſpeaks of him in the following manner (2). Mr. Arnaud was born the ſixth of February in 1612, and his father was Mr. Anthony Arnaud, who was ſo famous at the Bar, and well known in the Hiſtory of the Jeſuits, by that famous pleading of his againſt them on the ſide of the Univerſity, in 1594. . . For the reaſon juſt mentioned Mr. Arnaud was born as it were under a ſecond original ſin, which no Sacrament can waſh away, and the guilt of the pleading having in the eyes of the Jeſuits (3) rendered the father a Calviniſt and miniſter of Antichriſt, tho' always and by every body elſe eſteemed a good Catholick and pious Chriſtian, the ſon could not fail, in their opinion, being born a child of wrath, of being an heretick, and ſomething ſtill worſe, before he became a Chriſtian. One of the Proteſtants, who wrote againſt Monſr. Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, was of opinion, that Mr. Arnaud's hatred to the Jeſuits was owing to a prejudice of education. Take his own words (4): I have in a former work compared him to Hannibal, who was perſecuted with too inveterate a hatred by the Romans (5); and I don't know whether I might not compare him to the ſame Hannibal in that circumſtance of his life, when in his youth he promiſed his father, that as ſoon as he ſhould be of age to bear arms, he would wage war againſt thoſe mortal enemies of his country. Every one knows that Mr. Arnaud was ſon of the famous Anthony Arnaud, who was Council for the Parliament of Paris, who pleaded with ſo much eloquence the cauſe of the Univerſity againſt the Jeſuits, in the year 1594, and who forgot no argument to perſuade the Judges how dangerous it would be to ſuffer them to remain in the Kingdom. This action made him as much, if not more, deteſted by that Society, than that Society was by him. It is very probable, that he inſtilled into his ſons his own ſentiments in relation to the Jeſuits; at leaſt it is very certain that they have not at all degenerated from their father's principles in this reſpect.

[B] He cauſed theſes to be maintained, wherein he ſhewed, in a very extraordinary manner, his ſincerity, his eaſy temper, and his humility.] "At the end of "the courſe of Philoſophy, which he taught in the "College of Mans in the Univerſity of Paris, he "made ſeveral of his ſcholars hold diſputations, amongſt "whom were the Sieur Barbey, afterwards a celebrated Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the ſame Univerſity, "and Mr. Wallon of Beaupuis, a Clergyman of Beauvais, a man of great piety, who is ſtill living, and "has recorded this fact in writing. This laſt being "to defend his queſtions July 25, 1641, Mr. de la "Barde, a learned Prieſt of the Oratory, then Canon "of the Cathedral Church of Paris, was his opponent, "and urged his objections ſo home, that the Profeſſor was obliged to come to the aſſiſtance of his "ſcholar, but he himſelf was ſo warmly attacked "and ſo cloſely followed by this famous diſputant, "that he found there was no way left of rightly "anſwering his argument. It would have been no "difficult thing for him to have extricated himſelf by one ſubtle diſtinction or another, as is "the uſual cuſtom of Profeſſors, but this no ways "ſuited with his ſincerity and love of truth; he "therefore publickly told him without any more ado, "that he believed him to be in the right; that his "opinion appeared to him the more probable; and "that he ſhould be of the ſame himſelf for the future: nor did he prove worſe than his word; for "about three years afterwards this ſame diſciple of "his being to hold his act of probation in the Sorbonne for his Batchelor's Degree, he deſired Mr. "Arnaud to compoſe his Theſes for him, which he "accordingly did, and therein ſupported an opinion "contrary to that he had before maintained in his "Philoſophical Theſes (6)." This account is defective in a very eſſential circumſtance, ſince as it does not inform us what the opinion was which Mr. Arnaud maintained, and of which he found the falſity by the ſtrong objections of the opponent; we ſhall therefore ſupply this defect by acquainting the reader, that the poſition which Mr. de la Barde attacked was this: Ens ſynonymè convenit Deo & creaturæ (7). i. e. "Being is applied in the ſame ſenſe both to God and the "creature" The Author of this narrative ſpeaks very judiciouſly, when he ſays that this action of Mr. Arnaud was great in the ſight of God, and uncommon amongſt men, and that what proceeds from an integrity of heart, from a conſtant and uniform love of truth, from a greatneſs of ſoul which is above the ambition of conquering, and the fear of leſſening a reputation .... is at all times truly noble (8); but then he ſeems to me to make too light of the ſolutions which may be made of the arguments of ſuch as maintain that the idea of Being is not univocally the ſame in God and the creatures. I have formerly examined this diſpute, which is ſo famous in the ſchools, and it appeared to me that thoſe who deny the univocation of Being have indeed the majority of their ſide (9), but not the moſt ſolid reaſons; therefore I cloſed with the oppoſite party; and have often ventured to defend the contrary opinion in publick diſputations, and never found any difficulty in anſwering ſuch objections as were propoſed to me on that head; not but that it was preſently urged, that God is called the Being by way of eminence, the neceſſary Being, infinite and perfect in the ſuperlative degree: whereas that of the creatures is but precarious and dependent. I never could find any weight in this objection; for the very rudiments of the doctrine of Univerſals teach us, that the ideas of the genus are entirely to be diſtinguiſhed from any qualities or properties in the ſpecies by an abſtract conſideration of the mind: wherefore if I was ſure that Mr. Arnaud, after having maintained this hypotheſis, was determined by objections to change his opinion, I ſhould be inclined to ſuſpect that there were ſome certain difficulties attending it, which I never yet met with in any of the Spaniſh School-men which I have peruſed. Let us not forget that it has been remarked, that he was not reduced to any neceſſity of giving up his point, which implies that he did not think his former opinion untenable; but only looked upon analogical Being as a better doctrine than univocal Being. Erudito diſcipulo ſub validiſſimorum argumentorum mole fatiſcente (10) ſuppetias venit magiſter, diuque conflictatus, non cedendi neceſſitate coactus, ſed veritate & veritatis amore victus, victum ſe ultrò profeſſus eſt, & à ſententia ſua diſceſſurum publicè ſpoſpondit. Promiſſis ſtetit, &c. (11). "i. e. "While "his learned Scholar was labouring under the weight "of very powerful objections, his maſter came to "his relief, and having long ſtood the conflict he at "laſt, not compelled by any neceſſity there was of "giving up the victory, but prevailed upon by truth "and the love of truth, confeſſed himſelf over-pow"ered, and publickly promiſed that he would recede "from his former opinion. He performed his pro"miſe, &c."

[C] Mr. l'Eſcot hindred Mr. Arnaud from being admitted into the Society of the Sorbonne [β].] There were but two Doctors, who did not concur in favour of Mr. Arnaud's requeſt. They contrary to the opinion of the reſt ſtood by the law and the cuſtom, which required that the courſe of Philoſophy ſhould be performed before the Licence, and upon this difference, which ought to have been decided by the plurality of voices, they gave it as their opinion, that the Cardinal de Richelieu, who was Patron of the Sorbonne, ought to be the conſtituted Judge, which was both contrary to the laws and liberty of the Houſe; but at that time of day it would have been a crime to have refuſed admitting ſuch a Judge as he; accordingly they deputed as meſſengers to him Mr. Hardiviliers Archbiſhop of Bourges, and Mr. Habert Prebend of the Cathedral Church of Paris . . . . . (12). The Cardinal judged it by no means proper for the Society to act any thing contrary to its eſtabliſh'd laws and cuſtoms; tho' at the bottom it was leſs out of zeal for the order or the rules of its conſtitution that he paſſed ſuch a judgment, than in regard to the knowledge he had of the near intimacy there was betwixt Mr. Arnaud and Mr. de St. Cyran; to the reſentment this Miniſter conceived againſt Mr. Arnaud, becauſe he had not fled to him for protection during his Licence; and in a word to the influence which Mr. l'Eſcot had over the mind of the Cardinal his penitent; for this Doctor was one of the two which oppoſed his admiſſion, and had entertained a great averſion to Mr. Arnaud, as I obſerved before, thro' a ſpirit of jealouſy and revenge. It was certainly more honour for Mr. Arnaud to be excluded from the Society after this manner, than to be received into it after the way as moſt others are. Notwithſtanding he was admitted after the death of the Cardinal, the Sorbonne then recovering its liberty as well as a great many other Societies (13). Mr. l'Eſcot "ſatisfied his revenge on him at laſt by cauſing him to "be excluded, both from the College of the Sorbonne, "and alſo from the Faculty, by the cenſure of 1656, "of which he was the chief promoter together with "Mr. le Maine, who ſucceeded him as well in his "Profeſſorſhip as in his ſentiments (14)."

[β] Mr. l'Eſcot hindred Mr. Arnaud from being admitted into the Society of the Sorbonne.] It muſt be obſerved in vindication of Mr. L'Eſcot, and of Cardinal Richelieu, that they both acted according to the laws and uſages of the Univerſity, and conſiſtently with their former conduct. For in the year 1629, when there was no talk yet of Janſenius, nor of the Abbot of St. Cyran, nor of the friends or diſciples of either, one Hiſette a Franciſcan Friar petitioned the Faculty for a diſpenſation to be admitted a Licentiate againſt their Laws and Statutes. The Queen herſelf had promoted that petition, becauſe the Friar was an aſſiſtant to her Confeſſor. Yet Mr. L'Eſcot was one of thoſe, who oppoſed the petition; and he was ſent with two others to the Queen, to deſire her not to permit, that their Statutes be infringed. The Queen gave them a favourable audience, and the favour was refuſed. (See p. 3, of the Memoire pour les Doyens & Batcheliers en Théologie de la Faculté de Paris, ... contre les Prieurs, Docteurs, & Batcheliers de la Maiſon de Sorbonne. i. e. "A Defence of the Deacons and Batchelors of Divinity of the Faculty of "Paris, ... againſt the Priors, Doctors, and Batchelors of the Houſe of Sorbonne." Printed at Paris in 1721, 4to.

When Cardinal de Richelieu and Mr. L'Eſcot oppoſed Mr. Arnaud's requeſt in 1641, the Mendicant Friars petitioned for a favour of much the ſame nature: viz. that they might be permitted to preſent at every Licence or Commencement a greater number of Batchelors, than they were allowed by the Statutes. But Cardinal de Richelieu, who was not leſs acquainted with what conduced to the ſupport of the Faculty than clear-ſighted in State-affairs, ſhewed how much he was diſpleaſed at theſe diſorders, and eaſily prevailed upon the Faculty to promiſe, that they would ſtrictly adhere to their Statutes. This is, what a friend of Mr. Arnaud, Doctor Lewis de Saint-Amour, tells us, in a Collection which he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1649, with the following title, Eclairciſſemens ſur les differens mûs en la Faculté de Théologie &c. i. e. "An Explana-"tion of the Diſputes raiſed in the Faculty of Di-"vinity (2)."

(2) See Part 2, pag. 55.

Mr. de Saint-Amour relates (3) a fact of later date, and of the ſame nature: and he gives us a Letter written by Mr. L'Eſcot from Ruel January the 14th, 1642, by the Cardinal's command. We read there, that Mr. L'Eſcot was one of thoſe who had been deputed in the foregoing affair by the Faculty, to acquaint the Cardinal with the reſolution they had taken, never to grant ſuch favours for the future, and to obſerve their Statutes with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs. We alſo read there, that his eminence was perſuaded this was the beſt method to ſupport the Faculty in its ancient ſplendour. That therefore, ... they muſt not ſpeak any more of this favour, nay they muſt take care that no favours be ever granted hereafter by the Faculty. Theſe facts entirely clear the Cardinal and Mr. L'Eſcot from the raſh imputations laid upon them.

(3) Pag. 156.

But that the reader may have a juſt notion of this ſtory, we ſhall give an account of it free from thoſe falſe and invidious gloſſes, with which Father Queſnel has diſguiſed it. Mr. Arnaud preſented himſelf to the Society of the Sorbonne at a time, when, according to their Laws and Statutes, he could not be admitted. Bayle himſelf confeſſes it. Arnaud's petition being preſented: the Aſſembly took it into conſideration; we are not told how many perſons were preſent, but it it is certain, that all agreed to grant a diſpenſation, except two, of whom Mr. L'Eſcot was one. Theſe two having heard the arguments of the others, offered their own againſt them; and then, that they might proceed in a regular manner, they propoſed to acquaint the Cardinal with this affair, and to adhere to his determination. Nothing was more reaſonable, in a caſe in which the Statutes of the Houſe were to be infringed, than to lay it before the perſon, who was their particular ſuperior and benefactor. Therefore the Aſſembly agreed to it and ſent Mr. Hardivilliers and Mr. Iſaac Habert to his Eminence, to acquaint him with the reaſons that have been alledged on both ſides; they told him, that thoſe, who were for the diſpenſation, grounded their opinion on the great merit and abilities of the petitioner; and thoſe who oppoſed it, on the neceſſity they were under to obſerve their Laws in order to keep up the reputation and ſplendor of the Society: they added, that there was not one perſon in the whole Aſſembly, who did not agree that Mr. Arnaud deſerved the eſteem the Houſe had for him. The Cardinal, who till that time did not know Mr. Arnaud perſonally, heard his commendation with pleaſure; and ſaid, that he had a great eſteem for him, not only becauſe he loved the family to which he belonged, but alſo becauſe he had heard that he was a man of great virtue and learning: that he would give him proofs of his eſteem when opportunity offered, but that on the preſent occaſion he could not but be of the opinion of t'oſe, who thought that in order to obſerve their Statutes, they ought not to admit him. The whole Aſſembly came into the Cardinal's opinion, which was thought very reaſonable even by thoſe, who had been for the diſpenſation; and thus Mr. Arnaud was unanimouſly refuſed on the 14th of Auguſt 1641.

He did not make any further motion during the life of the Cardinal, but after his death, which happened the fourth of December 1642, Mr. Arnaud renewed his ſuit; and two weeks after he preſented himſelf to the ſociety, and was unanimouſly refuſed: which ſhews that the Sorbonniſts had not voted againſt him out of fear, as Mr. Bayle inſinuates after F. Queſnel, but with a full liberty, and according to reaſon. F. Queſnel himſelf has given us (4) the reſolution of the Sorbonne, taken from their Regiſters, which is as follows. In Comitiis ordinariis . . . . in pervigilio Natalis Dom. An. 1642. decretum eſt; ſtandum eſſe graviſſimo Judicio Emin. Proviſoris, in Negotio Domini Arnauldi: atque adeo illum deinceps ad ſocietatem Sorbonicam aſpirare NON POSSE. i. e. endeavour to exclude him from it, as ſoon as an occaſion offered itſelf. The book of the Frequent Communion, publiſhed by Mr. Arnaud [γ] in 1643, extremely diſpleaſed the Jeſuits. They refuted it, both in their Sermons, and in printed books, as being filled with a very pernicious doctrine. The diſputes upon Grace, which broke out at that time in the Univerſity of Paris, ſerved only to foment the reciprocal animoſity between the Jeſuits and Mr. Arnaud. This Doctor ſupported the party of Janſenius by writings of great ſtrength, both by refuting the three Sermons of Mr. Habert, and the Apology that Preacher made for it, and by refuting M. le Moine a Profeſſor of the Sorbonne (g), and ſome others. They found no room to cenſure him legally, but when he had publiſhed two Letters upon an adventure of the Duke of Liancour, a great friend of Port-Royal [D], they found in the ſecond of theſe Letters two propoſitions, that the Faculty of Divinity condemned in 1656. M. Arnaud was at the ſame time declared excluded from the Faculty. There were many irregularities in the proceedings [E]. For many years he did not ſhew himſelf; for after he found himſelf cited to Rome on account of the troubles of his book concerning frequent communion, and that it was only by mere dint of remonſtrances that they got the Queen-Mother to recal the orders ſhe had given him to depart immediately, he remained either hid in divers places, or in a manner ſolitary at Port-Royal des Champs. This retired life laſted near twenty five years till the peace was concluded with Janſeniſm in 1668. Mr. Arnaud was comprehended in this peace: he went to attend the King and the Nuncio, and appeared as much as he would in public till 1679, when he voluntarily departed out of the Kingdom, becauſe he knew his enemies made the King ſuſpect him (b). It is not queſtioned but from that time he lived in the Low-Countries; but he never made himſelf known but to a few of his faithful friends. He was diſturbed at Liege in 1690 [F]. The reflection that has been made upon this enterpriſe is worthy the

" of Mr. Arnaud, and that therefore he CANNOT for " the future aſpire to be a member of this Society." How is it poſſible, that Mr. Bayle, who ſo often quotes this Preface, ſhould either not have read, or not have obſerved this paſſage? For he imagined, from Father Queſnel's falſe account, that after the Cardinal's death, Mr. Arnaud carried his point without oppoſition. It is true that he was finally received the laſt day of October 1643; but Mr. Bayle is guilty of a fault of omiſſion for not having told us how the whole affair was paſſed. For it was only by intrigues and cabals, that Mr. Arnaud was admitted; his friends having ſent from diſtant countries (ex longinquis provinciis) for a great many Doctors, who at laſt were more numerous than the reſt, and made the majority of the votes be for Mr. Arnaud's diſpenſation; tho' thoſe, who would ſtand by Richelieu's deciſion oppoſed it with all their might; nequicquam reluctante adverſariorum parte, quæ pro Actis Richelii pugnabat. Theſe are facts related by Father Queſnel himſelf (5), who did not, or perhaps would not ſee, that they clearly prove, that thoſe Doctors, who oppoſed Mr. Arnaud either during the Cardinal's life, or after his death, did not act out of fear of his Eminence; and that Mr. Arnaud's admiſſion was much more irregular, than his excluſion had been (6). In this Convocation they ſtiled him one Arnaud; though with ſubmiſſion to their great judgment this appellation does no great honour to their communities; but ſhews either an ignorance not to be pardoned in men of learning, or elſe an affectation of a diſdainful air, which is no ways becoming perſons who are dedicated to the ſervice of God, and who ſat to decide about points of faith. Nothing can appear more ridiculous in the eyes of the learned, than for a man of letters to ſay, one Scaliger, one Sirmond, one Petavius, one Salmaſius, one Grotius, one Selden, and (if we are ſpeaking of a Doctor of the Sorbonne) to ſay one Arnaud. The diſputes in which this laſt was engaged, have made ſo much noiſe in the world, and have been attended with ſo many remarkable circumſtances both on the one and the other ſide of the queſtion, that were any man of reading but to be ſuſpected of being unacquainted with theſe controverſies, he might with reaſon, to wipe off from himſelf ſuch injurious ſuſpicions, apply theſe four lines of Virgil to the preſent caſe:

[G] I mean the Author of a Book intitled l'ESPRIT DE M. ARNAUD.] There is room to make a hundred remarks upon this work; but as we ſhall take occaſion probably to ſpeak of it in another place, we ſhall confine ourſelves here to a ſmall number of obſervations. The Author of this Book had before publiſhed a Piece which met with great ſucceſs; and which was, by thoſe who had the care of the impreſſion of it at the Hague, intitled, La Politique du Clergè de France. Theſe were dialogues in which was ſomething very entertaining and polite, but little of ſolid reaſoning, and leſs prudence in relating ſeveral facts notoriouſly falſe. Mr. Arnaud confuted this Book (23), with ſomewhat too much haughtineſs, and after a manner ſo much the more diſobliging, as he plainly proved his adverſary guilty of ill reaſoning, and of having advanced ſeveral falſities. He fell upon another work of the ſame Author's (24), and made it appear, that he had a deſign to anſwer a Book called the Apology for the Morality of the Reformed, touching the impoſſibility of falling from Grace; in ſhort, the Author of the Politicks of the Clergy, plainly foreſaw that he was like to find in the perſon of Mr. Arnaud, an adverſary that would never let him be at reſt, or give him the leaſt quarter whenever he found him in any contradiction, falſe reaſoning, or untruth. This was no way grateful to a man who was poſſeſſed with a ſpirit of writing a great deal, and who ſcarce ever gave himſelf the trouble to reviſe what he had once written; giving himſelf entirely up to the ſuggeſtions of a warm and active fancy, without attending to the dictates of a cool and ſober judgment, which gave occaſion to an almoſt inexhauſtible fund of falſe reaſonings and groſs contradictions: he therefore began to think of ſome expedient to rid himſelf of ſo troubleſome an antagoniſt, and to prevent Mr. Arnaud's following him ſo cloſe at his heels; and none appeared to him more uſeful for this purpoſe, than to attack him in perſon, I mean, to load him with all the perſonal ill qualities he could think of. This deſign he executed with all the heat and fury imaginable, and having got into this train of ſcandal, he gave no quarter to any body, but laid about him ſo unmercifully on all ſides, that what was ſaid of Voiture upon the ſubject of love, may very well be applied to him on the ſcore of ſcandal; he ſpared none from the Sceptre to the Crook, from the King to the Cobler. Mr. Arnaud not thinking it adviſeable to engage with a man that fought with ſuch ſort of weapons, choſe to forbear writing any longer againſt the Reformed, and by this means, what the whole ſociety of the Jeſuits could never invent, one ſingle Miniſter found out and put in execution with ſucceſs; I mean the art of putting this Doctor to ſilence. Nor is this the only advantage, that the Author of the Book, intitled, L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, reaped from this ſatyr; but he alſo ſtruck ſuch a terror upon a hundred other Authors, who had a mind to fall upon him, and upon a vaſt number of others, to whom he might have made himſelf obnoxious, that they had not courage to riſque the danger of his reſentment: nor ought one to wonder at this, ſeeing there are very few families that are not liable to reproach on ſome ſcore or other (25), or that have not enemies ſpiteful enough to blacken them by ſome malicious ſtory, when they can have a Printer at command, and do it with impunity; and the Book called, L'Eſprit de M. Arnaud, ſeemed to threaten a publication of all the little ſcandalous tales that any one ſhould ſend by the poſt, whether relating to a private perſon, as the Prieſt Soulier, or to a Secretary of State, as the deceaſed Mr. Colbert.

[H] They have made him one of the meeting at Bourg-Fontaine.] The miſtake committed by Du Pleix with regard to the Father, is nothing, if compared to the falſhood which Mr. Filleau, Counſellor to the King in the Parliament of Poitiers, publiſhed in relation to the ſon in the year 1654; for there is no room to doubt but that he placed Mr. Arnaud among the ſeven Doctors who conſtituted the aſſembly of Bourg-Fontaine (28). Take the whole ſtory in a few words. Mr. Filleau, in a juridical relation, which he publiſhed in 1654, of what paſſed paſſed at Poitiers upon the ſubject of the new doctrine of Janſenius, openly declared that an Eccleſiaſtick had told him, that in a conference held by ſeven perſons at Bourg-Fontaine 1621, it was deliberated of ways and means to aboliſh Chriſtianity ; that this Eccleſiaſtick was one of the ſeven perſons ; and that ſome time after he broke off with the other ſix, of which there only remained one living, and who were (J. D. V. D. H.) (C. J.) (P. C.) (P. C.) (A. A.) (S. V.). By certain circumſtances attending this relation, and by the character of certain Books which they hint at to have been only printed in execution of ſome engagements entered into at Bourg-Fontaine, every body was of opinion that by the letters of the firſt name was meant John du Verger de Hauranne, Abbot of St. Cyran ; by thoſe of the ſecond, Cornelius Janſenius, Biſhop of Ipres ; by thoſe of the third, Philip Coſpean, Doctor of the Sorbonne, Biſhop of Nantes, and afterwards of Liſieux, by thoſe of the fourth, Peter Camus, Biſhop of Belley ; by thoſe of the fifth, Anthony Arnaud, who is the ſubject of the preſent Article ; and by thoſe of the ſixth, Simon Vigor, Counſellor in the Grand Council. Mr. Filleau aſſures us, that they came to a reſolution in this aſſembly to attack the two Sacraments moſt frequented by adult perſons, which were thoſe of Penance, and the Euchariſt ; and the way in order to effect this was to be, by inſpiring people with a fear of the frequent receiving of them, not by betraying any deſign of making them leſs frequented, but by rendring the practice of them ſo difficult, and attended with circumſtances ſo incompatible with the condition of men of this age, as to make them in a manner inacceſſible ; and ſo by this diſuſe of them, founded on ſuch plauſible pretences, to undermine, and by degrees deſtroy the faith. The publick was of opinion that this alluded to Mr. Arnaud, by reaſon of his Book on frequent Communion ; and that Mr. Filleau could only mean him by the letters (A. A.) (29), for the fifth of theſe dangerous conſpirators againſt the Chriſtian Religion.

(29) IVth Factum in defence of the Relations of Janſenius, p. 11, 12. ſhews that it was he who was meant in the Juridical Relation.

As it is not my buſineſs here to examine into the truth or falſhood of this combination, I will content myſelf here, with ſaying that Mr. Arnaud looked upon this as the moſt virulent piece of calumny that ever was heard of, and that in particular, he unanſwerably vindicated himſelf from this accuſation laid to his charge, of making one at the conference of theſe Deiſts (30), for he made it appear that being born in 1612, he was but nine years old at the time when they pretended it was held. This juſtification of himſelf is ſo ſtrong, that not only the ſilence of his accuſer, but alſo the formal confeſſion of one of the friends of the latter was an undeniable proof that they had nothing to alledge againſt it. Moreover, Father Meynier pretending that the relation of Mr. Filleau contained nothing but the truth, confeſſed that Mr. Arnaud had given convincing proofs of his not belonging to this aſſembly ; but he is miſtaken, adds he, in ſuppoſing that by theſe letters A. A. is meant Anthony Arnaud ; for let me tell him from this Author, that another perſon is deſigned by theſe letters, who is ſtill living, and is too intimate a friend of Mr. Arnaud's to be unknown to him (31). Mr. Paſcal, who was then writing the Provincial Letters, preſſed the Jeſuits in a very ſtrong manner to name the private betrayer of the conference, the ſix Doctors who were preſent at it, and in particular him who was deſigned by the letters A. A., who tho' it was not Mr. Arnaud, yet was too nearly allyed to him in friendſhip to be unknown to him ; but this challenge was ſuffered to drop ; and it was not till a few years ago, that a celebrated Jeſuit of Antwerp declared to the publick, that this friend of Mr. Arnaud was his own brother Arnaud d'Andilli (32) : this has been refuted. See the Note [B] of the Article ARNAUD D'ANDILLI.

(33) This probably was the late Ducheſs of Longueville.

[I] They have made him go to the Witches Aſſembly.] It is difficult to ſay, which of theſe two Aſſemblies Mr. Arnaud would chooſe to be thought a member of, whether that of Bourg-Fontaine, or that which Mr. Maupas Biſhop of Evreux has now and then made mention of. It is certain that he aſſured ſeveral perſons, that a converted Sorcerer informed him that he had ſeen Mr. Arnaud and a Princeſs of the Blood (33) at the Witches Aſſembly, and that Mr. Arnaud made there a very fine harangue to the Devils (34). If he was to have his choice of theſe two extremes, and if the harangue ſpoken of, only tended to perſuade the Devils to ſome better courſe of life, I make no doubt but the Doctor would rather be thought to have harangued at the Witches Aſſembly, than be ſuſpected to have been a member of the Aſſembly of Bourg-Fontaine with a deſign to aboliſh Chriſtianity, and to propagate Deiſm.

(34) IVth Factum of the Relations of Janſenius, pag. 2.

I ſhould treſpaſs on the patience of my Readers, were I to tell them how ridiculous this ſtory which the above-named Prelate related to ſeveral perſons is, and it was one of thoſe falſhoods which Mr. Arnaud thought unworthy the pains of confuting. Take his own words (35). Honour may be conſidered as concerned in a two-fold reſpect, either in relation to the calumny in itſelf, which may be of a heinous nature, or with relation to thoſe who being prejudiced thereby, may for the future conceive an ill opinion of the perſon calumniated ; now it is the latter of theſe two, which obliges us to vindicate ourſelves from it, for, however enormous any ſcandal may be in itſelf, yet if it be of ſuch a nature that no man in his right ſenſes can give any credit to it, it ought to be diſregarded. For example, what the late Mr. de Maupas, Biſhop of Evreux formerly ſaid, how that he was informed by a converted Sorcerer, that Mr. Arnaud had been at the Witches Aſſembly, and that the Devils were charmed with the harangue which he there made to them, was in itſelf a horrible piece of calumny ; nevertheleſs, if any inventor of ſcandal was pleaſed to inſert this in a libel, would any man deſire this Doctor to take the trouble of refuting it ; or that for not doing ſo, would one have reaſon to ſuppoſe that ſuch a ſilence proceeded from being incapable to anſwer it, and was in effect pleading guilty to the charge ?

(35) Extracted from tom. 3. of Moral Pratique, cap. 11. p. 257.

[K] They have ſent him to command the Troops of the Vaudois.] This falſhood is no leſs improbable than the foregoing. There have been manuſcript News-papers handed about, affirming for certain, that this Arnaud, who is at the head of the Vaudois, is Mr. Arnaud Doctor of the Sorbonne ; that he has at laſt openly declared for them ; and that he does wonders in Savoy at the head of the troops of the party (36).] This would be a ſurprizing metamorphoſis with a witneſs, that a Doctor of the Sorbonne at the age of ſeventy eight years, who had never followed any thing but his ſtudies, and who had written ſo much againſt the Reformed Miniſters, ſhould from a militant in the Church become one in the Army, that he ſhould lay aſide his pen to handle a muſquet and a broad ſword, and ſhould take more pains to make the Carabins of Arnaud famous in ſtory, than one of his uncles, well known to the Rochellers, did to make them ſo in the reign of Louis XIII (37). The late Biſhop of Liege heard it ſaid at his own table, that Mr. Arnaud had abjured the Catholick Faith at Boſleduc, and that he was married there (38). The greateſt part of thoſe who are called zealots, fear nothing ſo much as thoſe perſons being orthodox, whom they have once accuſed of hereſy, herein not imitating the Almighty, who wills not the death of a ſinner, but rather that he ſhould be converted and live : as for their part they deſire that the perſon they accuſe ſhould be more corrupted, and are chagrined if he does not go over to the heretical party the better to juſtify their accuſations. In ſhort, they had rather that another perſon ſhould damn himſelf, than that they ſhould incur the imputation of ſcandal. See the words of a modern Author (39).

[L] They have given him the office of Armour-bearer to the Goliah Peter Jurieu.] Thoſe who placed Mr. Arnaud at the head of the Vaudois doubtleſs paid him a greater compliment than they, who have made him Armour-bearer to the Goliah Peter Jurieu, which the Biſhop of Malaga has done in his Catholick Complaint, by applying, as well as he could, a thought of St. Bernard upon Peter Abelard and Arnold of Breſcia (40) to theſe two famous Authors ; from which he takes occaſion to draw this concluſion : Iſti qui modo ſurrexerunt, novus Golias & ejus Armiger, PETRUS ſcilicet & ARNALDUS, facili negotio exterminabuntur.

(40) Father Maimbourg is very witty upon the ſame Equivocation of Arnald of Breſcia in his Decleniſion of the Empire ; and Father Theophilus Raynaud publiſhed a book intitled, Arnaldus de Brixia redivivus in Arnaldo de Lutetia.

that he was baniſhed from France [M], and that he had written the Apology for the Catholicks to recover his benefices [N]: They have imputed to him many books that he

tur. i. e. "That upſtart Goliah and his Armour-"bearer, viz. PETER and ARNAUD, will eaſily "be vanquiſhed." The Letter which Mr. Arnaud wrote to this Prelate has been publiſhed, in which he ſhews him, that his Highneſs (41) muſt have been ſtrangely impoſed upon to take Dr. Arnaud for the Armour-bearer of Jurieu the Goliah of the Proteſtants againſt the Catholick party. For, adds he, if your Highneſs had known this Arnaud, could you poſſibly have been guilty of ſo great an over-ſight as to rank together two perſons that were the moſt profeſſed enemies, and to miſtake him, who zealouſly ſupported the cauſe of the Church againſt this Miniſter, for his aſſociate and abettor in the impious war which he declared againſt the Church? It is certain that theſe two Authors, the one of whom is taken for Goliah, the other for the Armour-bearer of Goliah, are ſo far from being ſo, that it is not a leſs notorious falſhood that Mr. Arnaud bore a part in the Conference of Bourg-Fontaine, or at the Witches Aſſembly, or in the inſurrection of the Vaudois, than that he was Armour-bearer to the Goliah Peter Jurieu. Nothing therefore can be, not only more abſurd, but alſo remote from truth, than the alluſions in this paſſage of St. Bernard.

(41) Hé is honoured with this title by reaſon of his being natural ſon of Philip IV, King of Spain.

This is alſo what the pretended Goliah has reproached the Author of the Catholick Complaint with, no leſs than his pretended Armour-bearer. If this Biſhop, ſays he (42), had had any thing of a true taſte, he would never have founded his bitter invectives on ridiculous alluſions borrowed from the names of Arnold of Breſcia and Peter Abelard, intimating that Mr. Arnaud muſt be the ſucceſſor of Arnold of Breſcia, and the Miniſter Peter Jurieu that of Peter Abelard; nor would he have called this Miniſter the Goliah of the enemies of the Church, and Arnaud his Armour-bearer, ſince theſe two have too bad an underſtanding with each other to be engaged in the ſame intereſt; beſides Mr. Arnaud has age, and abilities ſufficient to be Goliah himſelf rather than his Armour-bearer. This is what he alſo pretends, and I believe no body will diſpute the honour of it with him.

(42) Religion of the Jeſuits, p. 59.

I ſhall juſt take notice here of a little ſlip of memory of Mr. Arnaud. He complains (43), that after making the ſimple compariſon betwixt Arnold of Breſcia and Arnaud of Paris, and betwixt Peter Abelard and Peter Jurieu, they ſhould make the Biſhop of Malaga ſay, that this Doctor was the Goliah of the Party, and the Miniſter his Armour-bearer; whereas we have ſeen that they have made him to ſay quite the contrary.

(43) At the end of tom. 3. of the Morale Pratique, p. 773.

[M] They have ſaid that he was baniſh'd from France.] A Doctor of the Sorbonne, a Savoyard by nation (44), has aſſerted in his Book entitled, Well-grounded Prejudices againſt Janſeniſm, printed at Geneva (45), in 1686, that Mr. Arnaud was driven out of France by order of the King. This is intimated in thoſe words of the Advertiſement to the Reader: I thought it impoſſible for me to ſpeak the truth, and not to cenſure the conduct of this old Tartuffe, WHOM THE JUSTICE OF THE MOST CHRISTIAN KING HAS MADE A FUGITIVE into Holland. Notwithſtanding all this it is certain, that he retired out of the Kingdom of his own accord; nor is there any room left to doubt the truth of it, ſince the Letters which he wrote in 1679 to the Chancellor le Tellier, and to the Archbiſhop of Paris, printed in Tome I of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, 1684. It is very ſtrange therefore that two years after, the Abbé de Ville ſhould betray his ignorance of a truth which had been made ſo publick to the world in a Satyr which had ſo great a run; and it is ſtill ſtranger, that in the year 1690 Mr. Arnaud ſhould be obliged to print theſe two Letters in confutation of thoſe, who publickly gave out, that he was a rebel to his King, and was driven out of France for a raiſer of ſedition (46). Nor was it in my opinion a leſs notorious piece of ſcandal and falſhood, which the Author of l'Eſprit &c. propagated when he aſſerted, that he was driven from Flanders. However this good man, adds he (47), may fancy to himſelf that his adventures are kept ſecret, yet we have not, for all his cunning, wanted a very good hand to inform us that he was driven out of the Low-Countries by an order of the Governor. The word chaſſer, i. e. "to drive out," which the Author of the General Criticiſm on Calviniſm makes uſe of, has an equivocal meaning. They have given out, ſays he (48), that the houſe of Mr. Arnaud was a rendezvous of mal-contents, that factious and ſeditious cabals were held there, and that Memoirs were prepared there for the Court of Rome; in ſhort they obtained all the neceſſary orders to DRIVE him AWAY together with the reſt of the gang. This means no more than that they obtained that certain orders ſhould be given to Mr. Arnaud, which proved the cauſe of his chooſing a retreat in a ſtrange country.

[N] It is ſaid . . . that he made the apology for the Catholicks to recover his benefices.] Mr. Jurieu was guilty of a very great miſtake, when he ſaid that Mr. Arnaud wrote the defence of the Chatholics with a view of being recalled into France, that he might there peaceably enjoy his eſtate and benefices (49), and that the apprehenſions of the confiſcation of his benefices engaged him to take certain meaſures. Geometrical demonſtration is ſcarcely more convincing than the publick declaration, which Mr. Arnaud has made of his having no benefice, was of the falſhood of this aſſertion: for it cannot enter into the thoughts of any man of ſenſe, that a Doctor, ſo jealous of his reputation as he was, and who could not any ways hope to eſcape the moſt ſhameful confutation, in caſe he falſly denied his having a benefice; I ſay, it cannot reaſonably be thought that he had any, when he ſo plainly denied it in print. We need only therefore have recourſe to the following words of Mr. Arnaud to be fully convinced of the falſhood of what his adverſary charges him with. The ſcandalous manner, ſays he (50), in which they have had the impudence to ſpeak of the affairs of this country, has obliged the Ambaſſador from his Britannick Majeſty to obtain of the States to affix a publick ſentence of condemnation upon the moſt virulent of their libels, which they were pleaſed to call that of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, tho' I am perhaps more favourably uſed than a great number of perſons, who are therein fall'n foul upon, and beſpattered without any the leaſt relation to me, but a ridiculous or imaginary one; having ſcarce any thing to reproach me with but ſecret intentions, and thoſe often founded on notorious untruths: as for example, when they ſay that it was not from any motive of Religion that I wrote the defence of the Catholics, but from a view of intereſt and to ſave my benefices, WHOM ALL THE WORLD KNOWS NOT TO HAVE SO MUCH AS ONE. This is what he ſays in a Letter dated October 20, 1684. Nor does he ſpeak leſs poſitively in a piece of his printed in 1689. As for the Book falſly intitled, l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, he (51) never had any thoughts of replying to it; for it having been ſent to him a little time after it came out, opening it in ſeveral places, he chanced to pitch upon ſome paſſages which made him ſee plainly the drift of this Miniſter, ſuch, for inſtance, as this ridiculous piece of calumny, that they ſuffered young perſons of quality about twelve or thirteen years of age, at Port Royal, to read the Books of the Socinians, and that they were inſtructed in polite learning (52); and another full as ridiculous tho' not ſo heinous, viz. that Mr. Arnaud, WHO NEITHER HAS, NOR EVER SOUGHT AFTER ANY BENEFICE, wrote the Defence of the Catholicks in order to keep his Benefices; from thence he concluded that ſo extravagant and unjuſt a ſlanderer, as he was unworthy of credit, ſo was he unworthy of a reply, and from that time he never read any thing in that Book, till your Defence appeared. This is what I have learned from the perſon himſelf (53). We may therefore ſay of the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud, what the Latins expreſſed by the Proverb, Cantherius in Portâ, he made a falſe ſtep at his firſt ſetting out.

PERPETUITY OF FAITH. A Diſpute betwixt Meſſieurs Arnaud and Claude.

I. I ſhall, without paying any regard to the order of time, among the Books which were falſly aſcribed to him, firſt of all conſider, that intitled, the Perpetuity of Faith, foraſmuch as this Piece has occaſioned one of the moſt famous diſputes that ever was ſtarted betwixt the Roman Catholics and the Proteſtants. Mr. Claude, who was the advocate of the latter, has thereby gained the greateſt reputation that ever Miniſter did: and on the other hand Mr. Arnaud, who was the principal advocate of the former, perhaps never diſplayed the force of his genius with greater application than in that diſpute. We are entertained through the whole courſe of this famous conteſt, both on one ſide and the other, with the brighteſt thoughts and the greateſt ſtrength of argument, that wit, eloquence, reading and Logick can furniſh us with; each party laying claim to the victory, notwithſtanding the incredible pains the Port Royal was at, in procuring at a very great expence, a great number of certificates from the Levant, which yet proved of no weight to leſſen the perſuaſion the Reformed were of, concerning the faith of the Chriſtians in thoſe parts with regard to the Euchariſt. The ignorance which reigns amongſt thoſe Chriſtians, the diſcredit the Greek nation has laboured under time immemorial on the ſcore of orthodoxy, the power of money in procuring their hands and ſeals, a charm they were thought not proof againſt (56) &c. very much weakened in the opinion of the Proteſtants, the authenticknes of the certificates produced by the Port Royal. However, this is no reaſon why this diſpute ſhould not be eſteemed, (ſetting aſide party prejudices) as one of the moſt memorable and glorious undertakings that Mr. Arnaud ever engaged in. It was not therefore without reaſon, that I choſe to begin this Remark with the firſt tranſaction of this great combat.

(56) See below the note [S].

It were to be wiſhed that the Author, who has given us a good abridgment of the Life of Mr. Claude (57), had been critically exact in giving us the Epocha of this paper war, ſeeing Mr. Claude has not affixed any date to the Preface of his firſt Book; which default of date may lead a great many People into an error; for example, I have Mr. Claude's firſt anſwer, printed at Paris for Stephen Lucas, in 1672. The title does not inform us whether it is the firſt or ſecond Edition; and from the firſt line of the Preface, I learn that this diſpute had then been on foot about four years, and that the manuſcript at that time communicated to Mr. Claude, had been printed a year before. If I had had no other information, I muſt inevitably have fall'n into this error, that the Perpetuité de la Foi had been firſt printed in 1671. I don't ſay this, without having obſerved that one is often deceived in this manner, by not finding the proper dates affixed to Prefaces. My Edition of the Perpetuité de la Foi is the fourth, and of the year 1666, tho' I have therein diſcovered the date of the firſt, for I there find underneath the copy of the grant of privilege, that the firſt Edition of this Book was printed off July 15, 1664; and the firſt anſwer of Mr. Claude was, I think, publiſhed in 1666 (58). The Author of his Life not thinking an exact account of dates neceſſary in an abrigdment, has given occaſion to thoſe learned perſons who write the Leipſick Journal (ſo much to the advantage of the Republick of Letters, and ſo much to the glory of their city, which may juſty be ſtiled the Athens of Germany) to commit an error with regard to the firſt Piece which this Miniſter wrote. They pretend that his firſt anſwer to the Perpetuité de la Foi was printed before he went to ſerve the Church of Montauban (59), but in reality the firſt and ſecond were both printed at the ſame time, after that the firſt had been handed about four or five years in manuſcript, and after he had left Montauban. But to return to our point.

(57) A. R. R. D. L. D. P. that is to ſay, Abel Rotolp de la Deveze Paſteur. He was heretofore Miniſter at Caſtres, and is ſo at preſent at the Hague.

(58) That is according to the antedate of the bookſeller; for I am of opinion that the book came out in 1665.

(59) Acta Eruditor. Lipſienſ. An. 1687. pag. 659.

Mr. de la Deveze does not aſſure us that Mr. Arnaud was the Author of the Perpetuité de la Foi, but contents himſelf with ſaying that he was the reputed Author of it; and the Journaliſts of Leipſick go no further (60); tho' in the ſupplement of Moreri, in which we are preſented with a very long Article of Mr. Claude, partly taken from the abridgment of his Life, we are told point blank that Mr. Arnaud is the Author of this Book. However, the moſt common as well as the moſt probable opinion is, that it was written by Mr. Nicolle, the three great volumes of the Perpetuity defended by Mr. Arnaud, and the general anſwer to the ſecond Book of Mr. Claude by Mr. Nicolle. The Queſtion Curieuſe determines nothing on this head, by reaſon that in the enumeration which is there made of the writings of Meſſieurs de Port-Royal againſt thoſe of the Reformed Religion, there is no diſtinction made betwixt thoſe of Mr. Nicolle and thoſe of Mr. Arnaud.

(60) Acta Eruditor. Lipſienſ. ibid. but in 1683, pag. 442, they affirm it.

Note, that the firſt Tome of the Perpetuity defended was printed in 1669, and that the Author having demurred a whole year, whether he ſhould reply to Mr. Claude's Books or no, began his work in January 1667, and finiſhed the firſt volume in June 1668 (61). Note alſo, that it is aſcribed to Mr. Arnaud in ſome of the approbations prefixed to the work. This ought to put the matter out of diſpute.

(61) See his Preface.

THE ſecond tome of the Morale Pratique.

II. The Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud makes this Doctor to be the Author of the ſecond volume of the Morale Pratique; but gives no reaſon for his aſſertion; and Mr. Arnaud has contradicted him in a publick manner. It is certain, ſays he (62), that Mr. Arnaud is not the Author of the Morale Pratique, nor do the Jeſuits lay it to him.... but upon the credit of Mr. Jurieu, a man ſo infamous for his lies and fictions, and who aſcribes this Book to Mr. Arnaud only as he does a great many others, which the world knows he had not the leaſt hand in. The accuſer from that time never undertook to juſtify his charge, from which we may equitably judge it to be a falſe imputation. It muſt be allowed to be a hard matter to prove this, ſeeing that the Biſhop of Malaga himſelf mentions it with ſome doubt, and upon the ſingle authority of Mr. Jurieu, Modo ſit ARNALDUS, ſays he (63) ut innuit PETRUS JURIEU in ſuo SPIRITU. i. e. "If ſo "it be ARNAUD's, as PETER JURIEU intimates "in his Book called l'Eſprit &c." The Author of the Defence of the New Chriſtians, who is thought to be Father le Tellier, one of the beſt writers of the Order, has been more peremptory in his deciſions than the forementioned Prelate, tho' he ſeems to have no other warrant for what he ſays, than that of Mr. Jurieu; for which reaſon Mr. Arnaud gives him a very ſevere reprimand, and accuſes him of a raſh judgment, which, upon duly weighing all circumſtances, is deſtructive of charity and juſtice. The ſole reaſon, adds he (64), that induces you to judge him to be the Author of it, is founded upon the teſtimony of a man whom you yourſelf confeſs to be unworthy of all credit, and ſo ſcandalous for his lies as to make one doubt of the moſt evident truths, when advanced by him.

WELL-GROUNDED PREJUDICES.

III. The Leipſick Journal aſcribes the Well-grounded Prejudices againſt the Calviniſts to Mr. Arnaud (65). Notwithſtanding this, according to the general opinion of all thoſe who are beſt ſkilled in particulars of this kind, Mr. Nicolle is the Author of it, and the Abbot de Ville expreſly aſcribes it to him (66) in the Preface to a Book which I have before mentioned, wherein he retorts upon Meſſieurs de Port-Royal the very prejudices they objected againſt the Reformation. As for the proof which the Journaliſts of Leipſick bring, it is very inconcluſive; for altho' the Biſhops of Condom and Grenoble did by the ſame act give the approbation to the Well-grounded Prejudices, and to three other Books, one of which is confeſſedly Mr. Arnaud's, yet they did not thereby acknowledge the other three to be his likewiſe; but they joined them all together, by reaſon that they all four came from Port-Royal about the ſame time. Theſe four Books, are the Well-grounded Prejudices, the general Anſwer to Mr. Claude, the Subverſion of Morality, and the ſecond Tome of the Perpetuity defended.

THE DEFENCE OF THE CHURCH.

IV. The Defence of the Church in anſwer to a Book of Mr. Claude's, intitled the Defence of the Reformation, was printed at Antwerp (67) in 1689. The Journaliſts of Leipſick conjectured that this work was written by Mr. Arnaud (68); but it is the production of another hand, viz. of Father d'Antecourt, a Monk of Sainte Genevieve, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Paris, may be named: a false reason has been assigned for his silence [P]: they have given out

Paris, as another excellent Journalist informs us (69).

I forbear to mention an error of the Jesuit Papebroch: I mean that of fixing upon Mr. Arnaud the Books which came out under the name of Petrus Aurelius. Petrus Aurelius vero nomine est Antonius Arnaldus (70). i. e. "The true name of Peter Aurelius is "Anthony Arnaud." I can't help taking notice here of a fact [b] I met with in a Pamphlet (71), intitled, A Defence of the Order of Monseigneur the Bishop of Arras, of December 30, 1697, against a Libel intitled, The Ancient Heresy of the Jesuits revived, &c. The Author of this Defence pretends to prove that the Jansenists have all along acknowledged the authority of the Church in determining the sense of any Work: See what he says in page, 24. "Of a great number "of instances that I could produce, I will content "myself with only one, which may serve instead of "all the rest; that is Mr. Arnaud the Captain and "Oracle of Jansenism, who after having outdone in his "fourth part of the apology of the Religious of Port-"Royal, all that ever had been said before against "the infallibility of the Church, with regard to the "interpretation of the sense of Books; he is at last "in a new Work, written on purpose to support this "Apology and others of his Writings, reduced to an "impossibility of defending himself any other way "from the consequence he was reproached with, viz. "that his reasonings tended to destroy the certainty "of Tradition, and he found himself necessitated in "spite of all his efforts to the contrary, to make this "important and decisive confession, which in a few "lines destroyed all his labours of so many years. "There are certain facts, says this Writer *, which "necessarily evince the truth of any doctrine, and "such are those which establish the Tradition of "the Church: for example, it follows that what "the Fathers unanimously taught as a doctrine of "faith, is a doctrine of faith . . . . . and so in like "manner it is manifest that the Church being in-"fallible in the decision of opinions, is also infallible "in the decision of such facts as are the necessary con-"sequences of such opinions, and which are the neces-"sary means, by which it attains to the knowledge of "the truth of matters of faith. All this is Mr. Ar-"naud's." How concise and conclusive is he! It is positively affirmed, that the Apology of the Religious, and the confutation of a Book of Father Annat's were both the productions of our Doctor. I will not take upon me to deny this, tho' on one hand the style of the Apology appears to me to be more chast than his, and on the other to have less spirit and briskness. This Apology is one pretty large volume in quarto, divided into IV Parts, printed in the year 1665. Observe by the way the ordinary fate of disputes: it scarce ever happens in the course of defending any opinion, that we are wholly at liberty to make use of maxims which are intirely universal; for we have commonly some other opinions to support, which oblige us to some restrictions, which kind of limitations often prove a great embarrassment; for our adversary will make our exceptions a matter of triumph, they will furnish him with arguments ad hominem, and other great advantages, and it is for the most part by this means that he rallies again after a defeat. The Jansenists are an instance of the truth of this in the defence of the Order of the Bishop of Arras; and I should be glad to see how they will extricate themselves. Both parties are subject to a dilemma in this dispute; for the infallibility of the Church with regard to facts cannot be defended, and yet not to admit it would lay one self open to a thousand difficulties. As to the Book of the two Heads which make but one, I shall speak of it in some other place. This is another Piece which is unjustly laid to Mr. Arnaud, in an anonymous Piece printed in 1688, which passed for Father le Tellier's: it is called, Lettre apologetique pour Mr. Arnaud, &c. It might with more reason be said, that the opinion of the two Heads which make but one, was maintained by this Doctor of the Sorbonne in the Preface to his Book on Frequent Communion, tho' this stands in need of some explanations. See the short History of his Life (72).

[b] I can't help taking notice here of a fact &c.] 1. The book intitled L'ancienne Heresie des Jesuites, &c. i. e. "The ancient History of the Jesuits," is a Satyr, which by a great many persons was ascribed to Father Quesnel, who has publickly disowned it. 2. The Defence was wrote by an Author, whom I don't know. But I believe that both these pieces came from the same person, who assumed the character of a Jansenist in the former, which is the reason why Father Quesnel made such a clamour, when it was ascribed to him. 3. What is asserted in these two books, namely that Mr. Arnaud has admitted and maintained the Infallibility of the Church, in determining the sense of a dogmatical work, is very true. He has maintained it even with regard to the Pope; here follows an undeniable proof of it, which I borrow from the Considerations sur l'entreprize faite par Maitre Nicolas Cornet, &c. i. e. "Some Reflections upon "the attempt of Nicholas Cornet &c." This Pamplet printed in 4to in 1649, is undoubtedly a work of Mr. Arnaud; he tells us there (6), that "to say "that the doctrine of St. Augustin is not safe, and "that by following it one may fall into heresies or "errors, is a DOWNRIGHT HERESY, and long since "condemned." Observe his proof of this assertion: "This, adds he, Pope Celestinus has determined a-"bove twelve hundred years ago. . . . . This shews "manifestly, that one cannot now believe WITH-"OUT HERESY . . . . that there may be in the books "of St. Augustin some errors, and some propositions, "which deserve to be censured." And in another place (7) he says, "The question is not, to know "what has been the opinion of some private per-"sons concerning the Doctrine of St. Augustin; "but what THE CHURCH HAS DETERMINED about "it. 'Tis a question de facto, an affair already "decided. The only thing left, is to know that de-"cision, and to declare it to all the Catholicks, in "order to OBLIGE them to follow it, &c." And even with regard to Jansenius, Mr. Arnaud supposed (8), that if the Church decided this QUESTION de facto, viz. "Whether this learned Bishop "had well understood and explained St. Augustin, "one could not oppose this judgment, without being "an Heretick, and that we ought to say of all those, "who dared to resist it, Sit tibi sicut Ethnicus, i. e. "Let him be unto thee as an Heathen man (9)." 4. The Refutation of Father Annat is certainly Mr. Arnaud's; but the Apology for the Nuns of Port-Royal, of which Mr. Bayle says, he does not pretend to deny Mr. Arnaud's being the author of it, is only partly his; he wrote the fourth part of it, the three first were almost entirely written by Mr. Nicolle (10). CRIT. REM.]

[P] A false reason has been assigned for his silence.] The difficulties proposed to Mr. Steyaert, are a proof that the Author of the voyage thro' the world of Des Cartes did not exactly consult the date of the controversy betwixt Mr. Arnaud and Father Mallebranche, when he said that the former engaged himself in that dispute, on purpose to have a pretence for not replying to two Books which appeared against him, the one composed by a Minister, the other by a Jesuit. It must be confessed that the publick has not yet well recovered the astonishment it was under, at some of the first years silence of this Doctor with regard to these two Books; nevertheless it is certain, whatever the sagacious and polite Author of the voyage thro' this new world may please to say, that the party was engaged with Father Mallebranche before l'Esprit de Mr. Arnaud, and the observations of Father le Tellier made their appearance (73). I must not here dissemble, that the reasons Mr. Arnaud gave for his silence have satisfied some persons, but have been far from giving content to all Readers. I have before set down (74) a passage relating to these reasons (75), to which I will add this other: "And as for Mr. Jurieu, he "has made himself so remarkable all over Europe "for his calumnies and slander, that he is no longer "capable of doing any harm to those whom he takes "in hand. I know that two different persons, both "Protestants, wrote about him to Mr. Arnaud as of "a man who had lost his credit even amongst them "of his own party, and one whose extravagances "they were ashamed of; and that they offered to "send out that he made uſe of ſpectacles, and that he had an unfaithful ſervant [Q]. The principal Books that he wrote after his departure from France concern Father Mallebranche's Syſtem of nature and grace, the philoſophical ſin, the moral practice of the Jeſuits, and ſome propoſitions of Mr. Steyaert. He vigorouſly oppoſed Father Simon in this laſt Book, both with regard to the New Teſtament of Mons, and concerning the Inſpiration of the ſacred Authors, and the Tranſlations of the Scripture into the vulgar tongue [R], and in favour of the atteſtations of the Greeks [S], &c.

He preſently after produced ſome facts which he pretends were nothing elſe than notorious pieces of ſlander publiſhed by that Miniſter. [Q] They have given out that he made uſe of ſpectacles, and that he had an unfaithful ſervant.] The pieces which were publiſhed on the intercourſe of Letters betwixt a ſpurious Arnaud and a Profeſſor of Doway, contain ſome things which might not be thought improper to be inſerted in this work; however I ſhall content myſelf with giving the reader Mr. Arnaud's confutation of a report which was raiſed of him, how that he complained that this ſervant had robbed him, and that by reaſon of his great age he met with great difficulty in reading a ſmall print. How, ſays he (78), could I complain of my ſervant's robbing me and being falſe to me, who never had any but what were very faithful; and who have not kept one theſe twelve years, ſince my leaving Paris? In a note on the Letter of Mr. de Ligni it is ſaid, that Mr. Arnaud never made uſe of ſpectacles, and that he is able to read the ſmalleſt character as well as the largeſt (79). Here are two little particularities, which might deſerve to be communicated to ſuch as are very curious in the Hiſtory of famous Men. As for the intrigue of the fictitious Arnaud, it is one of the moſt ingenious Comedies that ever was acted, and has met with ſucceſs equal to the greateſt expectation of its Authors. There cannot perhaps be given one example of an Academy's loſing more of its Profeſſors in ſo ſhort a time by any ſickneſs or mortality, than the Univerſity of Doway did by this affair, or of the ranks of an army being more thinned after a diſbanding; one can ſcarce help here calling to mind thoſe words of the Pſalmiſt, & renovabis faciem terræ, i. e. " and thou ſhalt renew the face of the earth.

(78) Firſt Complaint, p. 9.

(79) Imperialis relates, that Francis Piccolomini, who lived to the age of 84, never made uſe of ſpectacles. And the Valeſiana, p. 3. tells us, that Hadrian Valeſius, when upwards of 80 years of age, could both read and write the ſmalleſt characters without the help of ſpectacles.

[R] He vigorouſly oppoſed Father Simon, concerning the inſpiration of ſacred Authors, and the tranſlations of the Scripture . . . .] We have ſeen before, under the article of Father Adam (80), two propoſitions of the Jeſuits cenſured by the Faculties of Divinity at Louvain and Doway; theſe were propoſitions which ſeemed to limit or however modify the inſpiration of the Scripture. Monſr. Simon undertook to write againſt the Cenſurers (81), and was himſelf confuted by Mr. Arnaud from page 113 to page 236 of the 6th Part of the Difficulties propoſed to Mr. Steyaert: you will find his defence of himſelf in his New Obſervations on the Text and Verſions of the New Teſtament (82), from page 33 to page 91. An exact compariſon of the reaſons of one with thoſe of the other will afford us ample matter of inſtruction. Every body knows that Mr. Arnaud maintained the uſefulneſs of the Scripture Verſions with the greateſt learning and moſt ſolid reaſoning of all the Catholick Writers. What he hath ſaid with regard to matter of right on this ſubject is admirable, and what he has advanced with regard to matter of fact, in order to prove that it never was the intention of the Church, that the Laity ſhould be debarred from reading the Word of God in the Vulgar Tongue, is excellent and curious; tho' if on the other hand we carefully peruſe the anſwers of Mr. Simon (83), we ſhall be at a loſs what to think was the intention of the Church concerning this matter. The ſentiments of Doctors, the opinions of Univerſities, the Mandates of Prelates, and in ſhort publick Records produced on both ſides, form ſuch a ſtrange variety of contradictions, but more eſpecially when we examine into the particular motives and principles of thoſe who are for, and thoſe who are againſt, the publick uſe of tranſlations, that one can't help concluding from the whole, that the Church both allows and denies the people the liberty of reading the Holy Scripture; and perhaps there is no fact more reſolvable into the doctrine of Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm than this queſtion; Whether the Church has condemn'd or approved of the reading of the Scripture by the Laity in the Vulgar Tongue? What great pity is it that they can come to no certain reſolutions on a queſtion of this importance, neither on the negative nor affirmative ſide! Might one not reaſonably expect that a body, which boaſts of infallibility, ſhould be more unanimous in its proceedings? Mr. Arnaud's great learning and eloquence muſt inevitably have brought over moſt of his readers to look upon the numberleſs reproaches which have been caſt upon the Church for excluding the Laity from reading the Word of God as a ſcandalous aſperſion; I ſay he muſt certainly have gained upon his readers to be of this opinion, if Mr. Simon had not oppoſed his reaſons, and thereby put a ſtop to the ſucceſs of his Rhetorick. We ſee here how in the very ſame communion one Doctor pulls down what another builds up, and leaves the common enemy to profit by their quarrel, and to cry out, Sæpe præmente Deo fert Deus alter opem.

" Mr. Ar- " naud produced ſeveral atteſtations of the Greek Fa- " thers, to ſhew that they were in that caſe in the " Hypotheſis of the Roman Catholicks; but it is alſo " true, that he obtained the greateſt part of them by " money. Sir George Wheeler ſays in his Voyages " to Greece, that he had talked with ſeveral Papa's, " whom Mr. de Nointel, the nephew of Mr. Arnaud, " had endeavoured to corrupt in that manner (86)." Here are two teſtimonies of the fact which I have advanced. Note that Mr. de Nointel is not the nephew of Mr. Arnaud. The Writer evidently called him ſo, becauſe he had read in Mr. Claude's Anſwer (87, that Mr. de Pompone, nephew of Mr. Arnaud, and Ambaſſador at that time in Sweden, had procured him ſome of the materials] (88). However that be, Monſr. Simon has maintained that there are even ſome Catholicks, who do not put the utmoſt confidence in that great number of atteſtations (89); and tells us the grounds of their doubts. Monſr. Arnaud examines it all with great heat, and gives a ſummary account of what he had anſwered to Monſr. Spainheim in the Apology for the Catholicks (90).

sings which befal few men of letters. He wrote a few months before his death four Letters againſt Father Mallebranche (m), and one Letter to Mr. Du Bois, his old friend, full of Reflections on the eloquence of Preachers (n). The publick has ſeen theſe laſt works, and has not perceived any diminution of ſpirit therein. Mr. Du Bois did not live long after his reception into the French Academy nor after the reading of the Reflections [ε]; where he might have learnt, that he underſtood nothing of the doctrine of St. Auſtin touching the eloquence of the Pulpit (o). I don't know whether the publick will ever ſee what Monſr. Arnaud wrote about the ſame time in favour of Mr. Deſpreaux [T]; but I make no doubt that that Letter was an admirable one. There is another happineſs to be conſidered in his life, and which ſurpaſſes what I have pointed out; namely that he was always exact in the practice of thoſe exerciſes of piety which his ſacerdotal function required of him; and what is ſtill more difficult, that even in his youth he kept himſelf from ſenſual pleaſures, and that the purity of his manners never failed (p). It has never been obſerved that his adverſaries have thrown any imputations upon him on that ſcore, whereas with regard to orthodoxy they have endeavoured to defame him to the utmoſt. If the reading of wicked books produced in the minds of young people the ſame effects as in him, it would not be amiſs to recommend them [V]. The profeſſions which he made of his attachment to the true faith, and of his zeal for God, appeared in divers paſſages of his books, and above all in his Spiritual Will [X], which he made the 16th of September 1679, wherein he calls God to bear witneſs of the diſpoſitions, with which he engaged in the compoſing ſuch and ſuch books. [T] I don't know whether the Publick will ever ſee what Monſr. Arnaud wrote —— in favour of Monſr. Deſpreaux *.] The Criticiſm upon the 10th Satyr of Monſr. Deſpreaux (91), having fallen into the hands of Monſ. Arnaud [ζ] occaſioned him to think of writing a Diſſertation in form of a Letter, wherein he undertook the defence of that Satyr with ſuch force of genius and ſtyle as never failed him: the Partizans of the ancients boaſted of it, and that produced thoſe fine verſes of Mr. Deſpreaux to Mr. Arnaud, wherein he prefers to all his advantages, even to his being the King's Hiſtorian, the Apology which this Doctor had made for his Satyr. The rigid Janſeniſts, or Rigoriſts, were not ſatisfied with this laſt piece of Mr. Arnaud. A Doctor that is grown old in grave and ſerious diſputes to talk at above eighty years of age about Verſes and Women and Romances! How inconſiſtent a conduct was it! The party fretted at it, and whiſpered one another that the great man was declined. Poetry, according to their diſcourſe, was a trifling art, which ought not to give a moment's interruption to ſo great a genius. This came to the ears of Monſr. Deſpreaux, and he thereupon ſet about his Poem On the Love of God, to ſhew that Poetry might handle the moſt ſublime ſubjects. Theſe particulars have been communicated to me by a man of very great wit and learning (92), intimately acquainted with Monſr. Deſpreaux. Let us here ſet down a paſſage of the 10th Epiſtle (verſ. 115 & ſeq.) of this great Poet, where he addreſſes himſelf to his verſes, [ζ] Having fallen into the hands of Mr. Arnaud, &c.] This fact is not exactly related; for Mr. Perrault himſelf ſent his Criticiſm to Mr. Arnaud, and deſired his opinion of it; this was the occaſion of Mr. Arnaud's Letter. Let us obſerve here, that the marginal quotation to the eighth verſe of Boileau is not exact. It is ſaid there, that Mr. Arnaud's Diſſertation . . . . . is his laſt work; whereas Mr. Bayle ſhould have obſerved, that the Letter to Mr. Perrault is dated . . . May, 1694, and that the four Letters to Father Mallebranche, the laſt of which is dated July the 24th, were written after that to Mr. Perrault. Arnauld's reflections addreſſed to Mr. Du Bois is alſo poſterior to it (11). CRIT. REM. There are ſeveral other Remarks upon this article, but as they are either trifling, or relate only to the trite diſpute between the Jeſuits and the Janſeniſts, we thought proper to omit them; for it is very plain, that they were inſerted in the Edition publiſhed in France, only to ſerve as a paſs-port for it. In theſe Remarks, the Jeſuits are always in the right, and the Janſeniſts in the wrong. ADD. REM.]

at length acknowledged at the Court of Rome [Y], and it depended only upon himſelf to be made a Cardinal. There is no need to ſay that he oppoſed with all his power a looſeneſs of morals, and that he was always a teacher and director of auſterity. It appears that he ſwerved a little from the right way, in the affair which gave room for a Factum of Monſr. Des Lyons [Z]. We may obſerve that the name of the place where he died is not known: It is thought that it was in a village of the country of Liege. The place where he was buried is ſtill leſs known; and that is one of the agreements, which his friends have obſerved to be betwixt his deſtiny and that of Moſes (q). He deſired that his heart might be carried to Port-Royal (r). His deſire was executed; but Monſr. Santeuil's verſes on that ſubject raiſed a furious paper war [AA], which gave a great deal of diverſion

[Y] His merit was at length acknowledged at the Court of Rome.] Pope Clement X, having read ſome of Mr. Arnaud's works, commended them extremely, and declared that the Author would do him a great deal of pleaſure, if he would ſend him a copy of them, or would give one to his Nuncio (95). The Cardinal Altieri, who had occaſioned the Pope to ſee theſe Letters, could not ſufficiently commend them, and twenty times finiſhed his praiſes with this honourable teſtimony: "Monſr. Arnaud has done the "Church the higheſt ſervices. It were to be wiſhed "that death would never deprive it of ſo great a "man." De Eccleſiâ optimè meritus eſt Arnaldus: optandum eſſet ut talem ac tantum virum mors illi nunquam ereptura eſſet (96). The eſteem and affection of Innocent XI for this Doctor have been made known to the publick. See the Letter which he cauſed Cardinal Cibo to write to him, Jan. 2, 1677: it follows the Letter which Monſr. Arnaud wrote to the Biſhop of Malaga, the 2d of December, 1688. There is a Letter from Mr. Favoriti, this Pope's Secretary, dated from Rome the 3d of April, 1680, in which are high compliments, and ſtrong tokens of the concern which this Pope had for the perſecution which Monſr. Arnaud ſuffered (97). He had a mind to raiſe him to the purple, and it was owing to none but the Doctor that it was not put in execution. De Arnaldo in purpuratorum Procerum Ordinem adlegendo aliquando ſanctitatem ſuam cogitaſſe, etſi certum eſt & pluribus notum, nollem tamen hic commemorare, niſi Eminentiſſimus Cardinalis intimorum Romanæ Aulæ conſiliorum teſtis locuples, id nuper Pariſiis evulgaſſet, aſſeruitque per unum Arnaldum ſtetiſſe quo minus is eminentiſſimâ illâ dignitate ornaretur (98). i. e. "Though it is certain "and well known that his Holineſs had once ſome "thoughts of raiſing Arnaud to the dignity of the "purple, yet I would not mention it here, had not "a moſt Eminent Cardinal, who is thoroughly in-"formed of the ſecret counſels of the Court of Rome "lately made it publick in Paris, and aſſerted that "it was only owing to Arnaud's ſelf that he was not "dignified with that high honour." Alexander VIII, who before he was Pope had had a great friendſhip and eſteem for Mr. Arnaud, did not change his diſpoſitions after he was raiſed to St. Peter's Chair. He granted him ſeveral favours, and would have granted him more had he lived longer, or if Mr. Arnaud had given him opportunities of doing ſo (99).

Note that the Biſhop of Malaga cauſed almoſt all the copies of the firſt edition of his Querimonia Catholica to be burnt as ſoon as he knew that the appellation of Heretick was given therein without his conſent to Mr. Arnaud. The perſon who burnt the copies with his own hand gave an atteſtation thereof in form (100).

[Z] It appears that he ſwerved a little from the right way in the affair which gave room for a Factum of Mr. Des Lyons.] A niece of Monſr. Des Lyons, Doctor of the Sorbonne, and Dean of Senlis, was artful enough to engage Monſr. Arnaud in ſuch proceedings as did him no credit. She pleaded againſt her father: He protected her in this cauſe to his utmoſt. That is not the duty of a rigid Caſuiſt. Beſides ſhe was a girl ſo whimſical in her devotions, and of ſuch an ill turn of mind, that Monſr. Arnaud did not ſhew any great diſcernment of ſpirits, when he ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by that hypocrite. Monſr. Jurieu, who had heard the Factum of Mr. Des Lyons talk'd of, had a vehement deſire to get a copy of it, and made ſeveral requeſts for it to a perſon who could have furniſhed him therewith. He chiefly made uſe of the interceſſion of the Bookſeller who had printed at the Hague, Anno 1685, his Juſtification of the Morals of the Reformed (101). That was a right way of proceeding. For if any body could have obtained it, that Bookſeller undoubtedly could: but he that had the Factum in his poſſeſſion would never part with it in favour of a Writer whom he knew to be diſpoſed to draw from it new matter for inſults and invectives. He knew that Author's way of poiſoning every thing, when he wanted to pull Mr. Arnaud to pieces. But take notice of this little piece of artifice. Monſr. Jurieu, having miſt his aim there, would have perſuaded the publick that he did not want to take hold of that advantage, and that he had been a perſon of ſo much moderation as voluntarily to forego it: And even, theſe are his words (102), to let the publick ſee that we are not induſtrious in ſearching for what might render Monſr. Arnaud odious, we forbear to take notice of all that the Factum of Monſr. Des Lyons could have furniſhed us with againſt him. There are a great many falſhoods in Prefaces, which paſs for venial ſins, not only at the Bar of the Republick of Letters, but likewiſe at the Bar of the Church. But this ought to be excluded from that privilege in both thoſe Tribunals. The Jeſuits have not let this Factum of Mr. Des Lyons drop: they have maliciouſly weighed all the circumſtances thereof and have drawn from it materials for a great many reflections and railleries. See a work which is thought to be done by Father le Tellier, and which appeared in the year 1688. Obſerve the title of it: An Apologetick Letter for Monſr. Arnaud, written to an Abbot his friend, on the three laſt books which have been publiſhed againſt the Doctor: I, L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud: II, Obſervations on the new defence of the French Verſion of the New Teſtament printed at Mons: III, *The Anſwer of Mr. Des Lyons, Doctor of the Sorbonne, Dean and Prebend of Senlis to Monſr. [AA] Monſr. Santeuil's verſes on Mr. Arnaud's Heart raiſed a furious paper war.] The Ladies of Port-Royal des Champs received Monſr. Arnaud's Heart with all the tranſports imaginable, and depoſited it in the moſt honourable place they could. The Heart being placed, a queſtion aroſe about an Epitaph. It was thought that they could not apply themſelves to a perſon more proper for it than Mr. Santeuil. . . . . As it was a delicate affair, the Nuns thought they ought to take Mr. Santeuil at an advantage. For that reaſon they invited him to come and ſpend ſome days at Port-Royal with one of his brethren, who was the Superior thereof (103); and, during the ſtay he made there, he compoſed the following verſes:

As ſoon as theſe two pieces, which were printed together, had been publiſhed, the Jeſuits reproached Monſr. Santeuil for his proceedings. . . . . He took no notice of them, flattering himſelf that all the murmurs which were then raiſed would fall of themſelves inſenſibly (106). But when he ſaw a piece that was ſent from the country levelled at him (107), ... he took ſteps towards making ſatisfaction. " He was as it were thunder-ſtruck " with it, and ran directly to the College of the Je- " ſuits, deſiring mercy, with the moſt humble and " moving terms in the world; entreating all that he " met not to ruin him; that he had been always a " friend to their Society; and that the Epitaph in " queſtion was none of his, but that it had been " laid upon him by his enemies, to make a dif- " ference betwixt him and the Jeſuits. He was told " that it were to be wiſhed, that what he advanced was " true; but that that ſimple diſowning of it was not " ſufficient, and that he ought to diſabuſe the pub- " lick by ſuch an authentick denial of it as might " be demanded for a proof of his ſincerity. He " promiſed all that was aſked of him; but how to " make good his promiſe was the difficulty (108)." The flattery and compliments which he made to their Society ſignified nothing (109). They were aware " of " the artifice which he made uſe of, to get out of the " difficulty: they treated him as a double-minded " man and a perſon of no ſincerity; he found him- " ſelf in an inſtant overwhelmed with Epigrams, " which came pouring upon him from all ſides, and " in which the young Jeſuits of the College, whom " he in one place calls Pubes Jeſuitica ſagittaria, " bore a great ſhare. The Janſeniſts, on their part, " were not leſs ſhocked at his cowardice, than the " Jeſuits were at his double-dealing, and they gave " him ſigns of it by a piece of Burleſque Verſe which " they pointed againſt him, and which begins with

Every thing being well weighed, he reſolved to ſacrifice the Janſeniſts to the Jeſuits: he made to them by letter an humble confeſſion of his fault; but that did not ſatisfie them, they would have a publick recantation (110). He ſaw himſelf preſſed on that head every day by Epigrams upon Epigrams, which he received continually, and which would not let him reſt (111). He wrote a letter to Father la Chaiſe, where he put the beſt interpretation he could upon ſome terms of the Epitaph. The anſwer that he received from that Jeſuit, augmented his inquietude (112); he was obliged to think of a ſecond Apology. The moſt delicate paſſage, and upon which lay the whole difficulty, was this where he ſays of Mr. Arnaud,

But that was ſaying nothing. The Jeſuits would have him make it ſapies, inſtead of ſaperes. (For all this ſtir was about the proof ſheet, before the Copies were ſtruck off.) To make it ſapies, was declaring Mr. Arnaud excommunicated and damned. One of his friends, with whom he adviſed about it, made a propoſal to him to find a mean betwixt ſaperes and ſapies: that was to make it ſapias, which might equally favour the two different ſenſes of the other two words: but he was aware that he could not give up ſaperes without offending the Janſeniſts. At length after much deliberation, he reſolved upon a method of ſerving each party almoſt ſuitably to their own taſte. Therefore he cauſed two ſorts of Copies to be worked off: the one where he had ſapias for the Jeſuits, telling them vivâ voce that he took it in the ſame ſenſe with ſapies; and the other, where he left it ſaperes, to make his Court to the Janſeniſts (113). To this, he added an interpretation of ſome other paſſages of the Epitaph. He neither ſatisfied the Jeſuits nor the Janſeniſts. The latter levelled at him a very ſmart piece (114): the others did not puſh him with leſs vigour. Father Commire entred the liſts. He had kept himſelf out of the fight as a Corps de reſerve; " but at length he " appeared in the field of battle; and to put an end " to a diſpute that was in no likelihood of being fi- " niſhed, and to prevent Mr. Santeuil from ſo often " ſaying and unſaying things, he fell upon him, and " put ſuch a gag in his mouth, as gave him a great " deal of trouble ever afterwards. I am ſpeaking of " the Linguarium, which all the learned attribute to " that great Poet (115)." A Poet of the Univerſity, and not at all in the intereſt of the Jeſuiſts, made one amongſt the Combatants, and publiſhed a Piece, intitled Santolius pendens, that is, Santeuil upon the Gallows. This is one of the beſt that appeared during this long Poetick war. There have appeared, I think, three accounts of this controverſy. The firſt I have never ſeen: that which I have quoted is the ſecond; the third was in the year 1697, after Mr. Santeuil's death. it contains the letters which were written to that Poet by divers Jeſuits, and does not agree with the ſecond in ſome circumſtances.

It is certain that this diſpute made a great noiſe, and it is for that reaſon that the Author of the account of it, thought himſelf obliged to make uſe of this preamble (116). " It is the fate of thoſe who " have cauſed great diſturbances in their life time, " to be the occaſion of ſtill more after their death. " That of Alexander the Great did not extinguiſh " the war in Aſia. On the contrary it made it blaze " out with the greater fury, through the ambition of " his Captains, who for a long time diſputed the crown " amongſt themſelves. Something like this happened " to Monſieur Arnaud, if it be lawful to compare a " Doctor to a Conqueror. His death, which one " would have thought ſhould have put an end to " all the troubles, which he had occaſioned in his life " time, has inſtead thereof created new ones. Every " body knows in how unworthy a manner the Janſe- " niſts have inveighed againſt a holy Abbot (117), " for having expreſſed himſelf too freely on this oc- " caſion, in ſaying, upon the ſubject of the great " head of the party being juſt now fallen in the per- " ſon of Monſr. Arnaud, Happy are they that are en- " gaged in none but that of Jeſus Chriſt. This is what " the firſt news of Monſr. Arnaud's death produced. " But his heart being afterwards carried into France, " it could not enter therein without ſowing there freſh " ſeeds of diſſention, by the ſquabble which it occaſi- " oned betwixt Mr. Santeuil and the Jeſuits." A great many people will call to mind here a complaint of Balzac againſt the Epitaph of Father Goulu (118). But if on the one hand the Jeſuits could ſay, that the very monument of Mr. Arnaud inſulted them, the Janſeniſts had reaſon to cry out on the other hand, that this Divine was not ſuffered to lie quiet even in his Grave:

French Nation [BB]. I will not omit to mention the eſteem which this Doctor of the Sorbonne merited from Mr. Des Cartes [CC]. I have been told by perſons, who had been admitted into his familiar converſation, that he was a man very ſimple in his manners, and that unleſs any one propoſed ſome queſtion to him, or deſired ſome information of him, he [BB] Mr. Perrault was obliged to ſuppreſs the ſheet which he had deſtined to Mr. Arnaud in his .... illuſtrious men of the French nation.] Here follows an extract of a letter which was publiſhed in 1697. "Monſr. "Perrault of the Academy, publiſhed the Elogiums of "the Illuſtrious Men of this Kingdom. Mr. Arnaud "and Mr. Paſcal had juſtly a place there. Baptiſt "and Moliere are there in their proper place as be"ing illuſtrious in their way. The Book was printed "by permiſſion, the Pourtraits engraved. It ought "to have appeared four months ſooner; but the Jeſuits "made ſuch a ſtir amongſt the great people, that "they procured an order to be ſent to the Author "and Bookſeller to ſtrike out Monſ. Arnaud and Paſ"cal, and to ſuppreſs their Elogiums. Monſ. Ar"naud was one of the greateſt men of this age. He "had done ſervice to the Church, by oppoſing Cal"viniſm, and by defending the faith of the Euchariſt. "He lived and died in the Communion of the Church, "and in perfect obedience to the Holy See, which "would have aſſuredly rewarded his great merit, if "the profound humility of this learned perſonage had "not occaſioned him more than once to refuſe the "higheſt dignities of the Church. Moliere lived a "wicked life, and died like a reprobate, and excommu"nicate. Nevertheleſs Monſ. Arnaud is eraſed out "of the number of Illuſtrious Men, and Moliere is "retained there (120)." Theſe kinds of reflections were made all over France, and in other countries; nor was the ſaying of Tacitus forgot, on occaſion that the images of Caſſius and Brutus did not appear at the funeral of Junia. Præfulgebant Caſſius atque Brutus eo ipſo quod effigies eorum non viſebantur (121). i. e. "Caſſius and Brutus ſhone ſo much the brighter, be"cauſe their effigies were not ſeen." This thought was applied to Meſſieurs Arnaud and Paſchal: the Verſes that have been made thereupon have run all the world over, for they have been inſerted in the Nouvelles Hiſtoriques & Politiques which are publiſhed monthly at the Hague. To this may be added, that a great many people thought that the Jeſuits did not act with any kind of prudence in this affair, inaſmuch as the moſt effectual method of drawing the eyes and attention of the publick upon theſe two illuſtrious perſons, was to procure Mr. Perrault to be obliged to ſuppreſs their Elogiums and Portrait. Such a proceeding could only ſerve to render more conſpicuous that merit, which it was intended to obliterate: it led directly to the paſſage of Tacitus; and that could not but be a quick ground for exclamations, and for paſſing judgments in favour of the two perſons ſuppreſſed, and againſt the inſtrumens of their ſuppreſſion. But all the world does not give point blank into this imaginary notion of imprudence. Several perſons well verſed in theſe kinds of affairs, have maintained that the party that was adverſe to Mr. Arnaud, did nothing but what favours of the fineſt and moſt ſure policy. Do you think, ſay they, that Tiberius did not foreſee the reflections that would be made on account, that the effigies of Caſſius and Brutus were not ſeen amongſt ſo many others in a funeral pomp? He knew well enough what would be the conſequence of this abſence: but he found a much greater inconveniency, in ſuffering thoſe two aſſaſſins of Julius Cæſar to appear amongſt the images of their kindred. That would have been in ſome ſort to reſtore their memory; and it was for his intereſt not to take any ſtep that had the leaſt tendency in the world thereto. The Jeſuits likewiſe undoubtedly foreſaw very plainly the conſequence of the ſuppreſſion, which Mr. Perrault made; but all things well conſidered, they thought like wiſe men, that this would be a much leſs diſadvantage than to give room for the other faction, to value themſelves upon Mr. Arnaud and Mr. Paſcal's having places by authority in the Theatre of illuſtrious men. By cauſing them to be retrench'd, a new point was gained, that might be of ſervice in the proceſs; they were continued under the brand of infamy; nobody could alledge the licence obtained by Mr. Perrault as a mark of their being reſtored to favour: and what is a thing of conſiderable importance, the publick was prevented from thinking that they had leſs credit now than heretofore. It is not eaſy to believe that the publick will imagine, that if the Portraits and Elogiums of theſe two Gentlemen, have full liberty to make their appearance in an authoriſed work, that it is becauſe the Jeſuits had no inclination to prevent it: it is more natural to believe that it will be given out, that they want the power to hinder it. But that is a terrible judgment to be paſſed; the reſult of it might be of conſequence: therefore it muſt be prevented: for the influences of a reputation are of the utmoſt efficacy, whether it be to forward or retard events. Who does not know that in affairs of commerce, a Merchant, who is thought to be rich and is not ſo, carries on his affairs better than a Merchant, who ſhould be rich and was thought to be poor? Other conditions of life are like this, as to that point. If it be imprudent to engage ones ſelf in certain things, it is much more ſo, to give them up after having engaged in them. Honour and glory lie at ſtake, and that is ſaying every thing. This principle is not of leſs conſequence in the wars of the long robe, than in the wars properly ſo called (122). In ſhort, all the world knows, that in a debate of great importance, one ſide prepare themſelves againſt all the ſteps that are likely to favour the other. Policy therefore adviſes not tacitly to acquieſce in the proceedings of the Janſeniſts. It is neceſſary to uſe precaution both againſt the Epitaphs, and againſt the Authors of the Elogium, and to multiply the Papers, in order the better to maintain the grand proceſs, and to diſcuſs the problem or Curious Queſtion whether Mr. Arnaud be an Heretick? A ſtrange queſtion, and upon which ſome Roman Catholics take the affirmative ſide, and others the negative every day with impunity. This ſhews that there is in mankind a ſource of Anarchy which cannot be ſtopped up. It chiefly finds its vents in the eccleſiaſtical bodies; for ſince the Church of Rome has not got the ſecret how to fix the liberty of ſaying yes and no with regard to the ſame things, what other Church can do it? Other Churches have not, as that has, Tribunals that are acknowledged to be infallible. They do not govern with ſuch airs of authority and magnificence as it does. One ought therefore to be leſs ſurprized that the Proteſtant Miniſters accuſe one another of Hereſy in their printed Books, than to ſee a great Doctor of the Sorbonne pulled to pieces as an Heretick by the faction of the Moliniſts, at the ſame time that three Popes honour him with their friendſhip, their eſteem, and commendations, and that the moſt illuſtrious Prelates put their ſolemn approbations at the head of his works. This diſpute has laſted near ſixty years (123), and any one is ſtill at his liberty either to affirm or deny. The diviſions of Miniſters do not laſt ſo long; they commonly make up the difference after the third or fourth Libel, and are aſſured of the reputation of Orthodoxy, which they endeavoured to take from one another. But even this does not prevent our obſerving a little, that Anarchy and State of nature, where the perſon who attacks has ſcarcely any thing elſe to fear but the reſiſtance of the perſon attacked, and not the chaſtiſements of a common judge. Bodies Politick are not ſubject to ſuch diſorder. It is not left there to any one's liberty to call others either knaves or honeſt men; thieves, traitors, murderers, proſtitutes, or perſons of good life (124). There the condition and quality of a reputation is a little better ſettled. The ſuppreſſion that was enjoined Perrault, did not prevent thoſe copies of his Book which were publiſhed in Holland, from containing the Elogiums of Mr. Arnaud and Paſcal. It only occaſioned a little diſorder in the figures of the Pages. The Dutch Edition has put thoſe things in order again.

[CC] Mr. Arnaud merited the eſteem of Mr. Des Cartes.] He was the Author of the fourth ſet of objections againſt that Philoſopher's meditations, and every body was of opinion that thoſe are the moſt ſolid that have been propoſed againſt that work. Mr. Des Cartes paſſed that judgment of them: ſee his Hiſtory, compoſed by Mr. Baillet (125). It is obſervable that Monſ. Arnaud had taught in Paris the ſame Philoſophy with that that of Mr. Des Cartes, before the latter had yet publiſhed the firſt Eſſays of his own (126). He is therefore as falſly called a Carteſian as a Janſeniſt. Read what follows: He had drawn from their fountain his ſentiments on Grace; that is to ſay, from St. Auſtin, before Janſenius's Book had made its appearance. He had publickly maintained them in the preſence of the Biſhops, four or five years before that Prelate's Book was publiſhed (127). He had embraced them without ſo much as knowing that Janſenius was at work about Grace. . . . . He hardly knew that there was ſuch a perſon as Janſenius in the world (128).

[DD] He ſaid nothing that was beyond common converſation.] This muſt be underſtood with ſome true reſtriction; for otherwiſe it cannot be reconciled with what we find in the account of his life, concerning the hours of converſation after his meals, in which there was a great deal to be learnt by him, becauſe being a man of reflection, he was continually making ſuch as were very ſolid, whether it were upon human events, on the conduct of life, upon the rules of morality, or even on matters of Science, and publick affairs. Oftentimes the converſations were employed in reading new Books; and he always paſſed ſuch excellent judgments of them, that his judgment though rarely given with a deciſive air, was of itſelf deciſive and without appeal. His memory, on occaſion of things which occurred in reading, or that any body ſaid, always furniſhed him with ſomething beautiful that Authors had on that ſubject; and it was often matter of ſurprize to ſee him recite a great number of Verſes, either Latin or French, which he had only read in his youth, or a great many years before. He was intimately acquainted with the Latin Poets, and he applied the moſt beautiful paſſages in them with the utmoſt juſtneſs, and with great preſence of mind, according to the occaſions, which aroſe in converſation (129). Let us ſay therefore that his diſcourſes were not plain and vulgar, except when he was with ſuch people as he had but ſmall acquaintance withal, and who did not by their queſtions put him upon diſplaying his knowledge.

[EE] It is pretended that he became the Apoſtle of Janſeniſm in Holland.] There appeared in 1698 a little Book (130), wherein we are aſſured (131), that Mr. Arnaud after having wandred ſome time in the Catholic Low-Countries, at laſt came to take refuge in Holland. Mr. de Neerkaſſel, Biſhop of Caſtorie, and Apoſtolic Vicar in the United Provinces, received him as a man of God, and lodged him in his Nunnery of Delft, where Mr. Arnaud dwelt ſeveral years without being known by any except thoſe that were in his confidence. There he governed abſolutely the mind of the Prelate, and he had nothing more at heart than to refer to him all the young Divines in whom he found a genius, in order that he might inſtruct them. The moſt aſſiduous about him were Mr. de Codde, now Arch-biſhop of Sebaſte, and Succeſſor of the Biſhop of Caſtorie in the Apoſtolic Vicarſhip; Mr. Van Huyſſen; . . . It is therefore properly in the Nunnery of Delft, that the Janſeniſm of Holland had its riſe, about the year 1689.

☞ ARNDT (JOHN), a famous Divine among the Proteſtants in Germany, who maintained ſome doctrines, which engaged him in a diſpute with thoſe of his own communion [A]; was born at Ballenſtad in the Duchy of Anhalt in the year 1555. After he had performed his firſt ſtudies, he applied himſelf to that of Phyſick; but falling into a dangerous ſickneſs, he made a ſolemn vow to change his profeſſion, and to turn his thoughts to Divinity, if he ſhould be reſtored to health; which reſolution he executed as ſoon as ever he recovered his health. He was ſucceſſively Miniſter in his own country, at Quedlinbourg, and Brunſwick. He met with great oppoſition in this laſt city. The ſucceſs of his preaching raiſed the envy of his brethren, who became his ſevereſt enemies,

[A] Some doctrines, which engaged him in a diſpute with thoſe of his own Communion.] He was of opinion, that the irregularity of manners too frequent among Proteſtants was occaſioned by their rejecting of good works, and contenting themſelves with a mere ſpeculative barren faith; as if it were ſufficient for ſalvation to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, and to apply his merits to ourſelves. He taught that the true Faith neceſſarily exerted itſelf in charity; that a real unaffected and ſalutary ſorrow preceded it, and that it was followed by a perfect renewal of the mind, and a diſengagement from all irregular and vitious habits and diſpoſitions; in ſhort, that a ſanctifying Faith infallibly produces good works. His adverſaries treated him with the greateſt ſeverity imaginable, and accuſed him of Fanaticiſm and Enthuſiaſm. They maliciouſly endeavoured to repreſent him as ſymbolizing in his opinions with the followers of Weigelius and the Roſicrucian Philoſophers, and they imputed to him a great many of the errors and abſurdities of thoſe Viſionaries; becauſe upon ſome ſubjects he expreſſed himſelf in a manner not very different from them, and becauſe he preferred the method of the myſtical Divines to that of the Scholaſtics, which had been done likewiſe by the Enthuſiaſts abovementioned. Our Author had been very conſtant in reading the Works of Thomas à Kempis, St. Bernard, and other devotional Writers, who recommend a ſpiritual life; and it is confeſſed, that he made ſome uſe of thoſe of Weigelius, ſince he has tranſcribed whole Chapters out of him into his own Writings. There were ſeveral conſiderable perſons, who eſpouſed his cauſe; but among his enemies Lucas Oſiander, a Divine of Tubing, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the moſt particular manner. He publiſhed againſt our Author in the year 1624 a work intitled, Judicium Theologorum, i. e. "The Judgment of the Divines." Arndt wrote his Treatiſe of true Chriſtianity in High Dutch. The firſt Book of it was printed ſeparate in 1605 at Jena by Stegman. He publiſhed the three others in 1608. The firſt was called the Book of Scripture. The Author endeavours in it to ſhew the way of the inward or ſpiritual life, and that Adam ought to die every day more and more in the heart of a Chriſtian, and Chriſt to gain the aſcendant there. The title of the ſecond is the Book of Life. He propoſes in it to direct the Chriſtian to a greater degree of perfection, to give him a reliſh for ſufferings, and to encourage him to reſiſt his enemies after the example and by the virtue of his Saviour. The third is intitled, the Book of Conſcience. In this he recalls the Chriſtian within himſelf, and diſcovers to him the Kingdom of God ſeated in the midſt of his own heart. The laſt Book is intitled, the Book enemies, merely upon this account, that his uncommon zeal in the execution of his function ſeemed to be a tacit condemnation of their indolence and indifference. In order to ruin his character, they aſcribed a variety of errors to him; and their ill uſage of him was carried ſo far, that he was obliged to leave Brunſwick and retire to Iſleb, whither he was invited. He was Miniſter of the Church in that village for three years. In 1611 George Duke of Lunenburg, who had a great opinion of the integrity and ſanctity of his character, gave him the Church of Zell, and appointed him Superintendent of all the Churches in the Duchy of Lunenburg; which office he executed eleven years; and his death, which happened in 1621, was attended with ſeveral very extraordinary circumſtances. It is reported that he foretold his death, having ſaid to his wife upon his return home after his laſt Sermon, that now he had preached his Funeral Sermon. We have an account of his Life and Writings in the Preface to the Latin Tranſlation of his four Books of true Chriſtianity reviſed and publiſhed by Anthony William Boehm at London in 8vo, 1708.

of Nature. The Author proves here, that all the creatures lead men to the knowledge of their Creator. This Work of his has been tranſlated into a great many languages. The Latin tranſlation was publiſhed at Lunenburg in 1625, Francfort in 1628, and Leipſic in 1704. It was printed in Low Dutch in 1642 and 1647; and tranſlated into the Daniſh and Bohemian tongues. The firſt Book was publiſhed in Engliſh in 1646. In the year 1708 the Latin tranſlation was reprinted at London in 8vo. with the following title: Johannis Arndtii Theologi apud Germanos celeberrimi ac Superintendentis quondam in ducatu Lunæburgico meritiſſimi, de vero Chriſtianiſmo Libri quatuor, ob præſtantiam ſuam olim Latinè redditi, nunc autem reviſi ac emendati, curâ & ſtudio Antonii Wilhelmi Boemi. Accedit huic editioni nova præfatio de vitâ & ſcriptis Arndtianis. i. e. "Four Books concerning true Chriſtianity, "written by John Arndt a very celebrated German "Divine, and heretofore Superintendent of the Churches "in the Duchy of Lunenburg, formerly tranſlated in- "to Latin on account of the excellence of them, "and now reviſed and corrected by Anthony William "Boehm. To this Edition is added a new Preface "concerning the Life and Writings of the Author." An Engliſh tranſlation of it was publiſhed at London in 1712, in 8vo, intitled, Of true Chriſtianity, four Books; wherein is contained the whole OEconomy of God towards man, and the whole duty of man towards God. This Edition was dedicated to Queen Anne by Mr. Boehm. We are told in the Preface (1), that our Arndt (1) Pag. 39. was an Ornament of the Lutheran Church in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century endeavouring to awaken people from their lifeleſs formality into an inward ſenſe of true Chriſtianity, by reſtoring the Doctrine of a living Faith to its firſt integrity and practical application. And that Dr. Worthington in the Preface to his tranſlation of The Chriſtian's pattern, introduces him as one of the brighteſt lights of the Reformed Churches; and having compar'd him with Salvian among the Ancients, and Thomas à Kempis among the Moderns, he likens him in the laſt place to the Prophet Micajah, with regard to the hardneſs of his lot, informing us how ſuch a plain and ſincere dealing met with great oppoſitions and cenſurings even among Proteſtants themſelves; but how unjuſtly and undeſervedly hath been obſerved by others. This Work was likewiſe tranſlated into French by Mr. Samuel Baſnage de Beauval.

ARNGRIMUS, a learned man, and native of Iſland. See JONAS.

ARNISÆUS (HENNINGUS) a native of Halberſtad, and Profeſſor of Phyſick in the Univerſity of Helmſtad, was a Philoſopher and Phyſician of great reputation about the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. His political works are much eſteemed, wherein he ſets up a doctrine directly contrary to that of Althuſius [A]. He was invited into Denmark, and went thither, and there had the dignity of Counſellor and Phyſician to the King (a). The Academy of Helmſtad had a great loſs by his departure [B]. It has [A] He ſet up in his political writings a doctrine directly contrary to that of Althuſius (1).] For he maintained that the authority of Princes ought never to be violated by the people. See his book de Autoritate Principum in Populum ſemper inviolabili, printed at Francfort in 1612. See alſo his three books de Jure Majeſtatis, printed at the ſame place, in 1610, and his Reflectiones Politicæ, printed alſo at Francfort, in 1615. He did not finiſh this laſt work, which in other reſpects appeared to be an excellent one. Opus præclarum, ſed imperfectum (2). He has given a Catalogue of thoſe who have maintained that the ſovereignty belongs to the people; a doctrine which, according to Boeclerus's judgment, is highly pernicious, and the hinge of rebellions. A fatali hoc & peſtilenti errore . . . . ſuſpenſa eſt omnis illa rebellandi licentia, quam variis vocabulis præſcribunt (3). i. e. "From "this fatal and peſtilent error . . . . is deduced all that "licence of rebellion which they preſcribe under va- "rious names." Boeclerus adds that it is a deplorable thing, that there are ſome very great men in that liſt; and he points out the different paſſions which have influenced them to be on that ſide. Patronos & præcones nefariæ Philoſophiæ recenſuit Arniſæus principio libri de Auctoritate Principum in Populum ſemper inviolabili. Fuiſſe in illis magnos viros, dolendum: quorum aliquos animus arrogans, elatus, indomitus, ad fingendam & pingendam libertatem Stoico ſupercilio forte impulerit: alios metus oppreſſionis & tyrannidis eo evibraverit, ut poteſtatem civilem bene conſtitutam negarent niſi populo ſubjiciatur: nonnullis commentitiæ ſapientiæ ſpecies placuerit, ut tali tanquam terriculamento reges, ne in tyrannidem elaberentur, retentatos cuperent (4). i. e. "Arniſæus in the begin- (4) Idem, ibid. "ning of his book Of the Authority of Princes over "the People being always inviolable, has reckoned up "the patrons and cryers up of this wicked Philoſophy. "It is to be lamented that there were ſome great "men amongſt them: ſome of whom perhaps an ar- "rogant, haughty and unbending mind has impelled "to feign and paint liberty with a Stoical haughtineſs; "others the fear of oppreſſion and tyranny has driven "ſuch lengths that they denied the civil power to "be well placed, unleſs it were made ſubject to the "people: ſome were ſo far influenced by a kind of ima- "ginary wiſdom, that they were deſirous of keep- "ing their Kings in awe by ſuch a kind of bugbear, "leſt they ſhould fall into tyranny." If ſuch a Catalogue were to be drawn up this preſent year 1699, it would make a very long one; for the doctrine of the ſuperiority of the people has become faſhionable for ſome time. Grotius commends very much a political work of Arniſæus (5).

ARNOBIUS, Profeſſor of Rhetorick at Sicca in Numidia, towards the end of the third Century, was engaged by dreams in the profeſſion of Chriſtianity (a). He made his application to the Biſhops to be admitted into the church; but as they ſtill remembered the vehemence wherewith he had always oppoſed the true faith, they diſtruſted him; and, before they would admit him into the number of the Catechumens, they would have him give them ſome proofs of his good intentions [A]. To ſatisfy them he wrote a work againſt the Gentiles, wherein he very ſtrongly refuted the abſurdities of their religion and ridiculed their falſe Gods. He there employed all the flowers of his Rhetorick, and diſplayed a great deal of Learning therein; but as he had a laudable impatience to be admitted into the body of the Faithful, he made a little too much haſte in compoſing his work [B]; which is the reaſon that there do not appear in it ſuch exact order and juſt œconomy as one could wiſh. The worſt is, that not having a very exact knowledge of the Chriſtian faith, he publiſhed ſome very dangerous errors [C]. It is not known what he did

(a) See the note [A].

[A] Before the Biſhops would admit him into the number of the Catechumens, they would have him give them ſome proofs of his good intentions.] It is from St. Jerom that we learn theſe particulars. Arnobius, ſays he (1), Rhetor clarus in Africa habetur: qui cum in civitate Siccæ ad declamandum juvenes erudiret, & adhuc Ethnicus ad credulitatem ſomniis compelleretur, neque ab Epiſcopo impetraret fidem quam ſemper impugnaverat, elucubravit adverſus priſtinam religionem luculentiſſimos libros, & tandem velut quibuſdam obſidibus pietatis fœdus impetravit. i. e. " Arnobius was eſteemed a famous Rhethorician in Africa, who whilſt he " was teaching the youth in the city of Sicca the art " of declaiming, and being ſtill a Heathen was influenced to embrace the faith by dreams, but could not " obtain to be admitted by the Biſhop into that " faith, which he had always oppoſed, wrote ſome " excellent Books againſt his former Religion, and at " length having as it were given pledges of his piety, obtained that privilege." He was look'd upon as an enemy that made overtures for a treaty of peace; but before it was concluded on, it was thought proper to have ſome pledges for his keeping his word. Hoſtages were demanded of him: he gave them; they were ſeven invectives againſt the Pagans. After that he was look'd upon as a good brother, and was received into the Pale of the Church.

(1) Hieronymus, in Chronico Euſebii, ad annum 2 Olymp. 270.

[B] He made a little too much haſte in compoſing his work.] We ſhall illuſtrate this by a paſſage from Baronius. Quod verò opus illud, ut inter fideles admitteretur, quaſi fidei ſuæ vadem feſtinus abſolvit; hinc planè eſt quod in eo (ut ait Hieronymus) fuiſſe viſus eſt inæqualis & nimius, & abſque operis ſui partitione confuſus. Rurſum verò quòd nondum plenè eſſet ſcientiâ rerum Chriſtianarum imbutus, utpote cùm non ſolùm non fuerit baptiſmate illuſtratus, ſed nec in Eccleſiam inter Catechumenos acceptus (2); veniâ dignus eſt, ſi aliquibus nævis viſus eſt commentarius ille eſſe reſperſus (3). i. e. " But becauſe he finiſhed that " work, the Pledge of his Faith, in a hurry, that he " might be admitted amongſt the faithful; from hence " ariſes the reaſon that he ſeems therein (as Jerome " ſays) to have been inconſiſtent and to ſay too much, " and to be confuſed for want of a proper diſtribution " of his ſubject. But again as he was not as yet " fully informed in the knowledge of the Chriſtian Religion, becauſe he was not only unbaptized, but even " not received into the Church amongſt the Catechumens; he is excuſable, if that Commentary ſeems " to be blemiſhed with ſome errors."

(2) Mr. Du Pin is not of that mind. He compos'd, ſays he, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 203. ſeven books, while he was yet only a Catechumen.
(3) Baron. ad Ann. 302. num. 67. pag. 733.

[C] He gave out ſome very dangerous errors.] We have juſt now obſerved, that Baronius attributes the heterodoxy, which is to be met with in Arnobius's ſeven Books, to the precipitation with which they were written; becauſe the Author had not patience to wait the compoſing them till he had had time to be well inſtructed in all the points of the Chriſtian Faith. The Annaliſt is for having Arnobius's faults excuſed, and he repreſents them as inconſiderable miſtakes; but it is certain that the Inquiſition now-a-days would ſentence to the faggot all thoſe that ſhould vent ſuch doctrines. I am willing that Arnobius ſhould have ſome indulgence granted him: but nevertheleſs it cannot be denied that his notions about the origin of the ſoul, and the cauſe of natural evil, and ſeveral other important points, are highly pernicious. I have remark'd this elſewhere (4). He might have ſaid with reſpect to our myſteries what Perſius declares with regard to Poetry, that he took upon him to talk of them before he underſtood them:

Dryden.

This is Mr. du Pin's judgment of him. " It appears " that he was not as yet throughly inſtructed in the " myſteries of our Religion. He attacks the Pagan " Religion with a great deal more dexterity than he " defends that of the Chriſtians. He is more happy " in diſcovering the folly of Paganiſm, than in clear- " ly demonſtrating the truth of Chriſtianity. But " that is not to be wondred at; for it is com- " monly the caſe of all new converts, who, being as " yet full of their own Religion, are more ſenſible " of the errors and weak parts of it, than of the proofs " and excellence of that which they embrace (6)." I do not know any one, who ſpeaks ſo ſlightly of the errors of Arnobius, as Dr. Cave. He ſays that his doctrines do perhaps a little deviate from the true faith. Dogmata quædam habet FORSAN minus Catholica, quæ homini è Gentilium tenebris recens erumpenti, & nondum Chriſtianæ fidei elementis ſatis inſtructo condonanda ſunt (7). i. e. " He has ſome doc- " trines that are PERHAPS not altogether Catholick, " which are to be excuſed in a man juſt emerging " from the darkneſs of the Gentiles, and not yet ſuf- " ficiently inſtructed in the elements of the Chriſtian " faith." That is carrying toleration a great deal farther than is done in the Preface of the Leyden Edition in 1651, where it is only ſaid, that Arnobius deviated a little from orthodoxy. Aliis in locis à veritate Chriſtianâ NONNIHIL recedit. Sed hoc condonandum illi, qui ex Ethniciſmi tenebris recens ad veritatem Chriſtianam pervenerat. Idem huic Autori evenit, quod iis ſolet, qui ex carcere tenebricoſo in lucem perducti viſum adhuc dubium habent (8). i. e. " In other " places he A LITTLE recedes from the Chri- " ſtian verity. But for this ſome allowance muſt " be made to him, who had juſt come from the " darkneſs of Paganiſm to the truth of Chriſtianity. " It happened to this Writer, as it does generally to " thoſe perſons, who being brought from a dungeon " into the open light, have their ſight dubious for " ſome time." Once more, let us excuſe this father; but let us not be ſo weak as courteouſly to call the doctrines, which he gave out, by the name of ſlight errors. They deſerve, when one conſiders them in themſelves, the very ſame appellations as would be given them at this time of day, if any Divine ſhould advance them. It muſt be granted without diſpute, that a modern Writer has made on this occaſion ſome good remarks concerning the perſon who criticized upon him. Obſerve what he ſays: Mr. Jurieu weighs errors in a falſe ballance. He judges of a doctrine by the perſons, and not of the perſons by the doctrine. The very ſame error changes its nature according to the circumſtances of time and place. It is a monſtrous hereſy, according to the perſon, in whom it is found, and according to the age in which it reigns. Proofs of this partiality may be ſeen in all Mr. Jurieu's diſputes againſt the Sectaries of this time, to whom he gives no quarter, at the ſame time that he carries his indulgence and toleration for the Fathers to a prodigious exceſs. . . . (9). The regard that we have for perſons ſhould not make us reſpect their errors, when they are capital. On ſuch an occaſion, every thing ought to be called by its right name. Mr. Jurieu is very ready to excuſe the errors of Origen on account of his great zeal; but if any body now-a-days gives into the extravagancies of that ancient Writer, Mr. Jurieu would not think himſelf obliged to give him any countenance. If thoſe notions are hereſies and impieties, which change Hell into a Purgatory, and by that means take away the fear of eternal puniſhments, and the fear of God, how can any one countenance them in Origen? . . . (10). The tenderneſs with which Mr. Jurieu mentions the errors of St. Hilary and St. Jerom, is certainly not edifying. He excuſes them, and ſays that they are miſtakes and overſights. But if a Divine of this Age ſhould take it into his head to maintain the ſame opinions, Mr. Jurieu would think himſelf obliged to call them extravagancies and impieties. What a ſad piece of injuſtice is this! The ſame things which are extravagancies and impieties at this time of day, are only miſtakes and pardonable negligences in the fourth Century. How comes this to paſs (11)? This Writer pretends to know from whence this double kind of treatment ſprings. Let us hear him once again. Mr. Jurieu pardons in them, as very trivial and inconſiderable faults, ſuch errors, as, in people of our age, are damnable hereſies. People are commonly fond of ſhewing a profound reſpect and an high eſteem for thoſe who have the happineſs of living ſeveral Ages before us, although there appear in them ſuch foibles and bad qualities as one cannot bear in the moderns. Tho' one cannot thoroughly eſteem the ancients, yet it is thought neceſſary at leaſt to ſhew a fondneſs for them, and from a principle of Chriſtian charity, to put the moſt favourable interpretation that can be upon what they ſay. On the contrary people pride themſelves in, and aſſume to themſelves, the honour of a zeal inflamed againſt their contemporaries: no allowances are made to them; and towards them, they are very liberal of anathema's. It ſhould ſeem nevertheleſs that, as far as is conſiſtent with the intereſt of Religion, charity ought to exert itſelf rather towards the living than the dead, who have been dead ſeveral Ages. The charity which a perſon has for theſe laſt coſts him nothing, becauſe their merit does not excite our jealouſy and envy, and we do not look upon them as claſhing with our ſelves; but in order to judge charitably of an adverſary who ſpeaks and writes againſt us, and whoſe reputation eclipſes our own glory, we ought to mortify our ſelf-love a little: and that is a ſacrifice which is not eaſily made. As Mr. Jurieu has had no quarrel with Origen, and has had perſonal enemies in the Socinian party, it is not to be wonder'd at, that he has more toleration for the one than the other (12).

[D] His work contains ſeven Books, and not eight as was thought for ſome time.] Every body knows that the title of Minucius Felix's little Book was Octavius. It was found joined to Arnobius's Books in ſeveral ancient Manuſcripts. That was the reaſon why it has paſſed for one of Arnobius's Works, and undoubtedly the word Octavius, miſtaken for Octavus, led a good many Readers into the error. Theſe are Mr. Du Pin's words. " This Book (13) has paſſed a long time for " the 8th Book of Arnobius; for having been found " along with the ſeven Books of Arnobius in an an- " cient Manuſcript of the Vatican Library, it was " four times printed under that name *, without any " body's knowing who was the real Author. The " learned Civilian Baudouin was the firſt who took " notice of this vulgar error, and had this little trea- " tiſe printed ſeparate in 1560, at Heidelberg, with " a learned Preface, wherein he reſtores it to its true " Author. But altho' the honour of having firſt made " this diſcovery be owing to this famous Civilian, yet " thirty years afterwards, Urſinus, being about an edi- " tion of Arnobius's Works at Rome, whether he had " not ſeen Baudouin's Edition, or whether he had " a mind to take the honour of that obſervation to " himſelf, ſeparated Minucius's Book from thoſe of " Arnobius, without taking any notice that it had " been done before him, thus aſſuming to him- " ſelf the whole honour of that diſcovery (14)." The ſame thing is ſaid in the Preface of Minucius Felix, printed at Leyden in 1652 (15). One finds there likewiſe, that about the ſame time that Francis Baudouin ſhewed the pretended eighth Book of Arnobius to be the Work of Minucius Felix, another Critic had ſome ſuſpicion of the miſtake. Eodem ferè tempore id ipſum ſuboluit etiam Hadriano Junio (16). i. e. " About that time Hadrianus Junius had likewiſe got " ſome ſcent of the ſame thing." This is not the true State of the caſe: it ſhould be ſaid that Francis Baudouin was not the firſt who made the diſcovery; for he did not publiſh his thoughts on that head till four years after another perſon had communicated this thought to the public. His Minucius came out in 1560. But obſerve a paſſage in a Work which Hadrianus Junius printed in 1556. Arnobio, qui ſeptem duntaxat adverſum gentes libros edidit, octavus accrevit, quum ſit Minucii Felicis, Octavius, ab interlocutorum uno ita vocitatus, nova ratione obliterandi auctoris (17). i. e. " Arnobius who publiſhed only ſeven Books againſt " the Gentiles, has now got an eighth, though it be " the Octavius of Minucius Felix, being called ſo " from one of the interlocutors in the dialogue, a new " way of obliterating an Author." In the following year Baudouin was not aware of the common error; for he cites the treatiſe of Minucius as the VIIIth Books of Arnobius. Sic ille apud Arnobium Cecilius Chriſtianos dictitat, cum coeunt infantis occiſi ſanguinem lambere.... (18), Horribilis profecto eſt oratio Cecilii illius leguleii Romani, qui apud Arnobium libro octavo hæc adhuc Chriſtianis objicit (19). i. e. " Thus Cecilius " in Arnobius, relates that the Chriſtians, when they " come together, drink the blood of a murdered infant. " .... The ſpeech of Cecilius the Roman Lawyer is " truly horrible, who according to Arnobius in his " eighth Book ſtill objects theſe things to the Chri- " ſtians." Lewis Carrion has given to Junius the honour of being the firſt who had reſtored the Octavius to its true owner. Illi (Minucio) Octavum adverſus gentes librum Junius noſter in Animadverſis ſuis princeps jam olim vindicavit (20). i. e. " Junius in his " animadverſions is the firſt who long ago aſſerted " his (Minucius's) right to the eighth Book againſt the " Gentiles." Carrion talks in the ſame ſtrain in a work which he publiſhed at Paris, in 1583. Theſe next are the words of Mr. Joli: Minucii Felicis vetuſtiſſimi Scriptoris Chriſtiani Dialogus elegantiſſimus contra Idolorum vanitatem tam diu pro octavo Arnobii adverſus Gentes Libro habitus eſt, quia Minucius eum ſub nomine Octavii protulerat, donec a Franciſco Balduino Juriſconſulto anno 1560 Arnobio abductus, & genuino Autori redditus eſt, veluti Nicolaus Rigaltius in Præfatione ad eundem Minucium obſervavit (21). i. e. " That " moſt elegant dialogue of Minucius Felix a very " ancient Chriſtian Writer againſt the vanity of Idols, " was ſo long thought to be the eighth Book of Ar- " nobius againſt the Gentiles, becauſe Minutius put it " out under the name of Octavius, till it was taken " away from Arnobius in 1560, by Francis Baudouin " a Civilian, and reſtored to its genuine Author, as " Nicolaus Rigaltius has obſerved in his Preface to " the ſame Minucius." Here are two learned men (22) who do not know that Junius had the ſtart of Baudouin in diſcovering the real Author of the Octavius. I do not think that Mr. Joli is right in placing this Book under the claſs of Pſeudonymes. He pretends, that the Author in publiſhing it, diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Octavius: It would be more proper in my opinion, to ſay that Octavius is the title of the work, and not a fictitious name of him that wrote it. It would not be a juſt way of talking, if any one ſhould ſay that Plato's Dialogues were publiſhed under the fictitious names of thoſe Perſonages, which their titles bear. Minucius Felix imitated Plato. He would have his Dialogue bear for its title the name of the principal interlocutor.

[E] His Work has paſſed through ſeveral Editions.] If I had the neceſſary Books I would undertake to give an exact Hiſtory of the Editions of Arnobius; but I am obliged to give up that deſign, and confine myſelf to ſome critical Notes againſt thoſe who have given us the liſt of thoſe Editions. The Writer of the Preface of Arnobius printed at Leyden, in 1651, relates, I, that the firſt Edition of this Father, was that which Francis Priſcianenſis a Florentine publiſhed at Rome. He does not ſay in what year; which is ſuch a fault of omiſſion as is not to be pardoned: II, that Sigiſmond Gelenius altered ſeveral things in that Edition, not by the aſſiſtance of the Manuſcripts, but relying upon the conjectures of his own genius: III, that Theodore Canterus, publiſhing Arnobius with Notes, complains of the aſſurance of Gelenius: IV, that Godeſcalc Stewechius took a great deal of pains about this Father; V, that Elmenhorſt added to his Commentary the different readings collected as well from the Manuſcripts, and the Edition publiſhed at Rome in 1542, from an ancient Manuſcript of Francis Sabæus (23), as from the Edition of Fulvius Urſinus: VI, that at length, Deſiderius Heraldus publiſhed ſome elegant Notes upon the ſeven Books of Arnobius. I have three things to remark thereupon. Firſt the liſt of the Editions is very imperfect. In the ſecond place, the Edition of Rome, in 1542, is not at all different from the former and yet it is given out here as a different one. In the third place, it is not true that the remarks of Deſiderius Heraldus came out after the Edition of Elmenhorſt. This laſt was in the year 1610, and Heraldus's Work was publiſhed at Geneva in 1597, and at Paris in 1605.

(23) His name was Fauſtus and not Francis.

Let us examine Mr. Du Pin's liſt (24). I. I remark, in the firſt place, that the proper names are there very much diſfigured (25). We ſee there Canrerus, inſtead of Canterus; Hermenhorſtius, inſtead of Helmenhorſtius; Stevuchius, inſtead of Stewechius. II. Beſides this, I remark, that we have one Theodore Priſcianenſis given us as the Printer of the firſt Edition. That is undoubtedly wrong. We have ſeen that Franciſcus Priſcianenſis the Florentine was the firſt, that brought Arnobius's Books to light. But he was no Printer. Poccianti does not give him that title; he only repreſents him as a good polite Scholar and Author of ſome Italian Books (26). I am perſuaded that it was to him that Fauſtus Sabeüs, Library Keeper of the Vatican, communicated the Manuſcript, from which was made the impreſſion of Rome, in 1542. Thus in the Preface of the Leyden Edition, there is made a wrong diſtinction betwixt the Edition of Francis Priſcianenſis, and that which was made from the Manuſcript of Sabeüs. Note, that Lewis Carrion thinks that the Manuſcript of Arnobius, which is in the King of France's Library, is that made uſe of for the firſt Edition (27). He fancies that becauſe the Book was dedicated to Francis I, the Manuſcript was ſent thither too. III. In the third place, I obſerve, that it is not true that the ſeven Books of Arnobius were printed with Heraldus's Notes in 1583, nor that there ought to be a diſtinction made betwixt the Hamburgh Edition of 1610, and that of which we have juſt been ſpeaking, I mean, that which had Elmenhorſt's Commentary along with it. IV. Laſtly, I remark that Stewechius did not give an Edition of Arnobius, at Doway, in 1634: His Edition was of Antwerp, in 1586, and he had been dead a great while, when his Electa in Arnobium were reprinted at Doway in 1634, cum Paratitlis ſeu Summariis Leandri de Sancto Martino. You will find a like miſtake at the citation * of the preceding Page, where Mr. Du Pin ſays, that Eraſmus publiſhed Arnobius in 1560. He died in 1536.

(24) It is the Page 205. Col. 1. of the firſt volume of his Bibliotheque the Holland edition.

Let us ſay ſomething of Father Labbe. He approves of the Leyden Edition extremely; but is aſtoniſhed, that they who publiſhed it have not inſerted the Arnobianus Criticus of Meurſius, printed at Leyden, in 1598, cum Hypocritico Minutiano. He wiſhed that at leaſt they had mentioned thoſe Pieces (28), They who ſhould reproach him, that he himſelf ought to have remembered the Eclogiæ ad Arnobium of Julius Cæſar Bulenger (29), would not have ſufficient grounds for it; for that work is of no uſe, neither to correct Arnobius's text, nor to clear up his literal meaning. It is nothing but a heap of Quotations, which have only ſome very diſtant relation to ſome thought of Arnobius. The ſame Jeſuit cenſures the great Salmaſius, who had promiſed ſome Commentaries upon this Author, and who did not keep his word. Salmaſiani autem illi Commentarii tam diu expectati, tam ſæpè ejus amicorumque literis promiſſi atque jactati, in fumum tandem ventoſque evanuerunt (30). i. e. " But thoſe " Commentaries of Salmaſius, which have been ſo " long expected, and ſo often promiſed and boaſted " of in his own and his friend's Letters, are at length " vaniſhed into ſmoke and air." I fancy that ſuch a Writing of Salmaſius would have furniſhed us with more good things, than his learned Commentary on Tertullian's treatiſe de Pallio.

☞ We ſhall give the reader ſome account of his ſeven books againſt the Gentiles [F]. St. Jerom in his Epiſtle to Paulinus (a), is of opinion, that his ſtyle is unequal and too diffuſe, and that his book is written without any method; but Dr. Cave thinks this judgment is too ſevere; and that Arnobius wants neither elegance nor order in his compoſition. Voſſius ſtiles him the Varro of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers (b). Du Pin obſerves (c), that his work is written in a manner worthy of a Profeſſor of Rhetoric. The turn of his ſentiments is very oratorical, but his ſtyle is a little African, that is, his expreſſions are harſh, diſpoſed in an ill manner, inelegant, and ſometimes not Latin. The Latin Commentary upon the Pſalms, which is publiſhed under the name of Arnobius, is allowed by all the Critics not to have been written by him, but by a much later writer of that name, who is called Arnobius Junior, and who appears to have lived after the Council of Chalcedon, ſince he mentions the Pelagians and Predeſtinarians.

[F] His ſeven Books againſt the Gentiles.] Mr. Du Pin (1) obſerves, that Arnobius begins his firſt Book by confuting the objection, which the Pagans had propagated againſt the Chriſtians, that they were the authors of the misfortunes and calamities, under which the world laboured. He ſhews, that this imagination had no manner of foundation; that before our Saviour's time there were plagues, famines, and wars; that there was no change occaſioned by his coming; and that he was ſo far from being the author of miſeries, that he was of great advantage to the world. That misfortunes have their proper natural cauſes; and that very frequently things, which appear unfortunate to men, are not ſo in reality. That if the Chriſtians had been the cauſe of theſe misfortunes, they would not have ceaſed ſince the time of Chriſt. That if the Heathen Deities inflicted theſe misfortunes upon mankind in order to puniſh the Chriſtians, they were unjuſt and their power very inconſiderable. That if the Chriſtians worſhip'd the true God, they had no reaſon to fear the falſe Gods. That they adored Jeſus Chriſt, but did not conſider him as a man put to death on account of his crimes; but on the contrary as a God, who had aſſumed the form of human nature, in order to appear among mankind, that he might inſtruct them in the truth, and accompliſh all the ends, for which he came into the world; and that he died and roſe again, to ſhew men, that the hope, which they had of ſalvation, was certain. He proves the Divinity of Jeſus Chriſt from the holineſs of his life; the great number of miracles, which he performed; the power, which he gave to others of working wonders; and from the prodigies, which appeared upon the earth at the hour of his death. He ſhews, that the truth of theſe things cannot poſſibly be doubted, ſince the evangeliſts, who have written an account of them, are remarkable for their ſincerity and ſimplicity; that it is extremely improbable, that men ſhould be ſo abſurd and infatuated as to agree together to pretend, that they had ſeen things, which they had not ſeen, eſpecially if we conſider, that they were ſo far from making any advantage of ſuch an impoſture, that they expoſed themſelves to the hatred of the world in general. In the ſecond Book he ſhews, that it was unjuſt to perſecute Jeſus Chriſt, ſince he had done nothing, that deſerved puniſhment; that he was no tyrant, no deſtroyer of people; that he did not acquire riches, nor commit any acts of violence or injuſtice. That the Pagans have no principles to diſtinguiſh between the true and falſe Religion. That they were unreaſonable to reproach the Chriſtians with credulity, ſince in moſt of the concerns of life men act upon confidence in the credit of certain perſons. That Jeſus Chriſt deſerves much greater regard than the Philoſophers of the world, on account of the miracles, which he performed. That the Pagan Philoſophers believed the ſame things, which the Chriſtians believed, particularly the immortality of the ſoul, the reſurrection of the body, and future puniſhments. He takes occaſion here to treat of the Nature of the Soul; he ſays it is of a middle quality between ſpirit and matter; and is mortal in its own nature, but that God renders the ſouls of thoſe immortal, who truſt in him. He confutes the opinion of Plato with regard to the immortality, excellence, and dignity of the ſoul, and its baniſhment or impriſonment in the body. He ſuppoſes, that it is corporeal, and propagated by the parents. That man is but little different from brutes. He obſerves, that we ought not to indulge our curioſity too much in Religion, or preſume to penetrate into the reaſons of God's conduct, or judge according to our imperfect ſenſe of things. Jeſus Chriſt, ſays he, was God; for ſince it is neceſſary to tell you this, tho' you will not underſtand it, he is God, and he ſpeaks to us from God; he commands us not to perplex ourſelves about uſeleſs queſtions; let us therefore leave the knowledge of theſe things to God, and not give ourſelves the trouble of an over-curious enquiry about them. However Arnobius does not omit replying to the queſtions, which the Pagans uſually propoſed concerning Chriſt. They aſked why, ſince his coming was neceſſary to deliver the ſouls of men from death, it was deferred ſo long. Arnobius anſwers: Can you tell in what manner God acted towards the ancients? Who has told you, that he did not aſſiſt them by ſome other method? Do you know how many men there are in the world? Do you know the place, in which the ſouls of the ancients were reſerved? Who inform'd you, that Chriſt did not deliver them by his coming? Ceaſe to perplex your minds about theſe things; leave ſuch queſtions, as you cannot reſolve; believe that God has ſhewn mercy to them; but when and in what manner Chriſt perhaps would have informed you, if this would not have made you vain? But why, continue the Pagans, did not he deliver all mankind in general? He calls upon, and invites the whole world, anſwers Arnobius, he rejects none, he receives all, who come to him. It depends upon men's will; he does not force them, becauſe that would be violence, and not a favour. But are none but Chriſtians delivered from death? No certainly, for none but Jeſus Chriſt has the power of reſcuing them. But this Religion, ſay the Pagans, is a new one; and why ſhould we abandon that of our anceſtors to embrace it? Why not, replies Arnobius, if it is a better Religion? Have not old cuſtoms been diſcontinued? Have not laws been changed? Is there any thing, which has not had its beginning? Is it reaſonable to eſteem a religion on account of its antiquity, rather than out of regard to the Deity, whom we honour? It was but two thouſand years ago, that none of thoſe Deities, whom the Pagans now adore, exiſted; whereas the true God and his Religion are eternal. There were particular reaſons for the coming of Chriſt at the time, in which he appeared. But why does he ſuffer, it will be ſaid, thoſe, who honour him, to continue under perſecution? And why, anſwers Arnobius, do your Gods ſuffer you to be afflicted with war, peſtilence, and famine? With regard to us Chriſtians, it is not at all wonderful, that we ſuffer in this life, ſince we have no promiſes with relation to this world, but on the contrary the evils, which we labour under here, are a deliverance to us. In the three following Books he attacks the Pagan Theology, and ſhews, that the Chriſtians have the greateſt reaſon imaginable to reject a Religion, which is ſo full of abſurdity, extravagance, and impiety. In the ſixth and ſeventh Book, he ſhews that the Chriſtians act very reaſonably in not building temples, nor having among them ſtatues, images, or ſacrifices; and that it is a folly to ſuppoſe, that God dwells in temples, that Images are Gods, or that Deities reſide in them; or that the true God is honoured by offering ſacrifices, burning incenſe, or pouring out libations to him. ☞ ARNOLD of Breſcia, a famous Heretick in the twelfth Century, was born at Breſcia in Italy, from whence he went to France, where he ſtudied under the celebrated Peter

Peter Abelard. Upon his return to his own country, he took upon him the habit of a Monk, and began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by preaching ſeveral new and uncommon doctrines; particularly, that the Pope and all the reſt of the Clergy ought not to enjoy any temporal eſtate. Upon this foundation he maintained in his Sermons, that thoſe Eccleſiaſticks, who had any eſtates of their own, the Biſhops, who poſſeſſed any revenues, and the Monks, who held any lands, were entirely cut off from the leaſt hopes of ſalvation (a). That the Clergy ought to ſubſiſt only upon the alms and voluntary contributions of Chriſtians; and that all other revenues belonged abſolutely to Princes and States, in order to be diſpoſed of among the Laity as they thought proper (b). He was accuſed likewiſe of other Hereſies with regard to Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper (c). Otto Friſingenſis, who knew him perfectly well, and St. Bernard have drawn his character in a very ſtrong light [A], but repreſent him under ſuch colours, as are of no advantage to his reputation. He engaged a great number of perſons in his party [B], who were diſtinguiſhed by his name, and proved very formidable to the Popes. His Doctrines rendered him ſo obnoxious, that he was condemned in the year 1139 in a Council of near a thouſand Prelates, held in the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome under Pope Innocent II (d). Upon this he left Italy, and retired to Swiſſerland (e). After the death of that Pope he returned to Italy, and went to Rome, where he raiſed a ſedition againſt Pope Eugenius III [C], and

He obſerves likewiſe, that he was prodigiouſly fond of peculiar and new opinions, which is the general characteriſtic and diſpoſition of thoſe, who endeavoured to introduce hereſies, and divide the Church into ſchiſms. Singularitatis amator, novitatis cupidus; cujuſmodi hominum ingenia ad fabricandas hæreſes, ſchiſmatumque perturbationes ſunt prona (2). The picture that St. Bernard gives of him, does not at all flatter him. The ſtrokes of it are ſtrong, and the colours lively *. Would to God, ſays he, *that his doctrine was as holy as his life is ſtrict. Would you know what ſort of man this is? [B] Engaged a great number of perſons in his party.] Notwithſtanding he was obliged to leave Italy after the council of the Lateran, yet his doctrine had prodigious ſucceſs among the people of Rome. For the Romans being extremely uneaſy, that Pope Innocent II ſhould become abſolute maſter of the city, revolted openly from him, and maintained agreeably to the maxims of our Arnold, that he had no right to any temporal poſſeſſion. They reſtored the Senate and Tribunes, notwithſtanding all the Pope's efforts to the contrary. They wrote likewiſe a very artful letter to the Emperor Conrade himſelf, in order to engage him to ſupport them, aſſuring him, that what they had done was only with a view to put him again in poſſeſſion of the Capital of his Empire, and of the other cities, which the Popes had uſurped from the Emperors, eſpecially Pope Innocent, who had juſt made a league with Roger King of Sicily, a declared enemy to the Empire, and had granted him the inveſtiture by the Croſs and Ring. This, as Maimbourg informs us (4), was a falſe repreſentation, and deſigned only to render the Pope odious to the Emperor, to whom he had refuſed that favour. But Conrade, who was a Prince of great prudence and moderation, eaſily diſcovered this malicious artifice; and as he was unwilling to have the Pope his enemy, eſpecially during the war, in which he was engaged againſt the Bavarians and other Princes their confederates, he treated their meſſage with great contempt; and on the other hand received the Embaſſadors of Pope Innocent, who came to deſire his protection againſt the Rebels, with the utmoſt civility. However, this ill ſucceſs did not ſtop their fury; for finding themſelves ſlighted by the Emperor, and Pope Innocent dying at this juncture, and Celeſtin II his ſucceſſor five months after him, they created a Patrician, and conferred upon him the ſovereign power and authority in Rome, in the ſame manner as their anceſtors in conjunction with the Pope had given it with the ſame title to Charlemagne, and afterwards to Otho the Great (5). This new Patrician was Jourdan, ſon of Peter de Leone, and brother to Anacletus the Antipope. After they had acknowledged him for their Head and Leader, they went in a body to the new Pope Lucius II, and told him in a very confident manner, that he muſt immediately reſign up to their Patrician, not only the city of Rome, but likewiſe all that his Predeceſſors had ever received of the Emperors and other Princes; and that according to the laws of God, he ought to be contented with the alms of Chriſtians and the tythes, after the examples of the Popes and Biſhops of the primitive Church. In ſhort, they carried things to ſuch exceſs in derogation to the See of Rome, that Lucius died of grief the ſame year in 1144 (6).

[C] He returned to Italy, and went to Rome, where he raiſed a ſedition againſt Pope Eugenius III.] Being informed of the ſucceſs of his followers, who had made themſelves Maſters of Rome, he went thither, and declared publickly, that the time was now come, when the people of Rome ſhould throw off the yoke, which the Pope, who had no right to interpoſe in any but mere Eccleſiaſtical affairs, had endeavoured to impoſe upon them. That they would now ſhew the world, that they were the worthy deſcendants of their great anceſtors, who after they had expelled their tyrants, became the Sovereigns of mankind. Father Maimbourg obſerves upon this occaſion (7), with his uſual bigotry, that as it has been found in all ages, that Heretics being impatient of any Maſters or Superiors are neceſſarily the moſt determined enemies to Monarchy, ſo this Preacher of novel doctrines, who equally attacked the Pope and the Emperor, and even the new Patrician himſelf, called upon the Romans under the pretence of liberty, to reſtore the form of their ancient Commonweal. By his bold ſpeeches likewiſe he exaſperated the people ſo much againſt Eugenius, that the latter was obliged to retire from Rome to and afterwards againſt Hadrian IV [D], who laid the people of Rome under an interdict till they had baniſhed Arnold and his followers. This threatning had its deſired effect. The Romans ſeized upon the houſes which the Arnoldiſts had fortified, and obliged them to retire to Otricoli in Tuſcany, where they were received with the utmoſt affection by the people, who conſidered Arnold as a Prophet. However he was ſeized ſome time after by Cardinal Gerard, and notwithſtanding the efforts of the Vicounts of Campania, who had reſcued him, he was carried to Rome, and condemned by Peter the Prefect of that city to be hanged [E], which was accordingly executed in the year 1155. Thirty of his followers went from France to England about the year 1160, in order to propagate their doctrine there; but they were immediately ſeized and deſtroyed, before they made above one proſelyte, which was a woman. The Author who mentions this particular obſerves, that they were called Publicans. William Neubrigenſis, who lived not long after, tells us, that theſe Heretics condemned Baptiſm, the Euchariſt and Marriage, and deſpiſed the Catholick Unity (f). Dr. Freind ſeems to have confounded Arnoldus de Villâ Novâ with our Arnold, when he tells us in the 2d volume of his Hiſtory of Phyſic, p. 253, that he in a manner founded a Sect, which went by the name of Arnoldiſtæ.

Viterbo, in order to eſcape their fury, while they were plundering and deſtroying the Houſes and Palaces of perſons of the higheſt rank, and the Cardinals, who had refuſed to take the Oath of Fidelity to their Patrician. But at laſt Eugenius, after he had made uſe of his ſpiritual Arms and Anathema's againſt the Patrician Jourdan and his Adherents, had recourſe to others Arms, which ſoon proved more effectual to reduce them. For having raiſed a good body of troops, and joined them to thoſe of the city Tibur, who were enemies to the people of Rome, whom they had defeated three or four years before, he attacked them with ſuch ſucceſs, and reduced them to ſuch extremities in Rome, that they were obliged to deſire peace in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner imaginable, which they obtained upon theſe conditions; that the Rebel Jourdan ſhould be deprived of his dignity of a Patrician, which office ſhould be entirely abrogated; that the Governor, whom the Popes had appointed at home, ſhould be reſtored; and that the Senators ſhould act only according to the Orders, and under the authority of the Pope. Thus Eugenius entered Rome again as it were in triumph; where, notwithſtanding that Arnold was forc'd to leave the city, his party was ſo numerous and formidable, that the Pope for his own ſecurity quitted the Palace of the Lateran, and removed to the other ſide of the Tiber, that he might have the river between him and his enemies, whom he could not well confide in, whatever ſubmiſſion they had made (8).

(8) Otto Friſ. Chronic. lib. 7. cap. 31, 34, and 38. and Maimbourg, pag. 421, 422.

[D] And afterwards againſt Hadrian IV.] This Pope was an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Nicholas Breakſpear (9), and had been educated at the Abbey of St. Albans. At the beginning of his Pontificate he met with great oppoſition from the Arnoldiſts, who imagined, that they had a favourable opportunity under a Pope, who was a Foreigner, to recover the Sovereign Authority at Rome, which they had loſt under Eugenius. The moſt conſiderable therefore of that party, who were Senators, went to Hadrian, and told him that he muſt immediately conſent, that the Senate ſhould have the abſolute government of the State, as it had anciently; and deſired him to agree voluntarily to ſo juſt and equitable a demand; otherwiſe they were reſolved to obtain it by force. In ſhort, when they found that the new Pope, who kept himſelf on this ſide of the Tiber in the Vatican, that he might not be expoſed to their fury, rejected their petition, they ſent again for Arnold into the city, where by his vehement declamations againſt the Biſhops and Cardinals, whom he wanted to reduce to a mere ſubſiſtence upon the Alms of the people, and againſt the power of the Pope, which he endeavoured to aboliſh, he ſoon raiſed an inſurrection, eſpecially among the loweſt rank of people; ſo that every thing was involved in the moſt dreadful confuſion imaginable. Several of them fell upon the Cardinal of St. Pudentiana, who was going to the Pope, and left him upon the ſpot half dead of the wounds, which they gave him with a ſword. Hadrian being aſtoniſhed at this ſhocking attempt of theirs, and having no other arms to recur to but the ſpiritual, laid the whole city under an interdict; ſo that none of the divine offices were celebrated for a conſiderable time. This was conſidered as a dreadful circumſtance at Rome, to be abſolutely deprived of the Sacraments, and all the exerciſes of Religion; and it made a great impreſſion upon the minds of thoſe, who had the leaſt ſentiments of devotion. The moderate part of the Senate therefore, at the deſire of the Clergy, and even of the people, who began now to relent, went and caſt themſelves at the Pope's feet, and deſired him in the moſt humble and moving terms imaginable to take off the interdict, and ſwore to him upon the Holy Goſpels, that they would baniſh Arnold and his moſt reſolute adherents from Rome and its territories, if they would not immediately ſubmit to his Holineſs. Super ſancta quatuor Evangelia juraverunt, quod prædictum Arnaldum hæreticum & alios ipſius ſectatores de totâ urbe Româ & ejus finibus expellerent, niſi, &c. Upon their refuſing this, and abſolutely rejecting the authority of the Pope, they were obliged to leave the city; and Hadrian performed the day following at St. Peter's the Office for Holy Thurſday. He was afterwards carried by the people as it were in triumph to St. John Lateran, where he celebrated Eaſter, and lodged in the Pontifical Palace of that Church according to the cuſtom of his Predeceſſors. However, he did not continue there long; for as he could not truſt the Arnoldiſts, whoſe party was very powerful at Rome, he retired to Viterbo, to wait the arrival of the Emperor, from whom he expected a very conſiderable aſſiſtance againſt their attempts, after the great actions, which that Prince had done in Italy. But the Pope being a little apprehenſive of Frederic's victorious Army, went to Citta di Caſtello, from whence he ſent ſeveral Cardinals to him, to treat with him concerning the conditions of his Coronation, and to obtain ſecurities, which the Emperor gave in writing, that the Pope and Cardinals ſhould enjoy their lives, liberties, and eſtates, and not be expoſed to any inſult. He promiſed likewiſe that Hadrian ſhould have all his rights preſerved to him inviolably. But one of the principal inſtructions given to the Cardinals, was to demand that Arnold ſhould be ſurrendred to him; who having been ſeized in Tuſcany, where he ſtill continued to preach his doctrines, notwithſtanding all the Anathemas iſſued out againſt him, had been carried to the Emperor's camp. Frederic had a great curioſity to examine the man, who had been the occaſion of ſo much conteſt and diſorder in Italy; and finding, as Father Maimbourg tells us, that he was a mere impoſtor, who under pretence of reforming the world, and eſpecially the Eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, endeavoured abſolutely to deſtroy all lawful power and authority, he readily delivered him up to the Pope, who procured him to be put to death ſoon after (10).

ARNOLDUS (GODFREY or GOTHOFREDUS) a famous Miniſter and Writer among the Papiſts, in the latter end of the ſeventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth Century. We have an ample account of his Life and Writings publiſhed in Latin by John Chriſtopher Colerus [A] in the year 1718; but as the Author of that account was a rigid Lutheran, he has every where treated Arnoldus with a peculiar ſeverity and acrimony of ſtyle. However we ſhall endeavour to ſelect ſuch particulars from him, and from another Hiſtory of his Life and Works publiſhed by an anonymous Writer in High-Dutch, relating to our Divine, as may give the reader an idea of him. Arnoldus was born of a good family at Annaberg in the Mountains of Miſnia in Upper Saxony, the fourth of September 1666 (a). His Life written in High German ſays the fifth. His father, who was of the ſame name with him, was born at Schlettaw, and was the ſixth Collegue of the School at Annaberg, and died of a dropſy in 1695 (b). Our Author was three years at the Academy of Gera, from whence, by his father's advice, he went in 1685 to the Univerſity of Wittemberg, and ſtudied under the celebrated Profeſſors Waltherus, Roerenſeus, Daſſovius, Schurzfleiſchius, Quenſted, and other eminent men. Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his exemplary probity, temperance, and modeſty; which virtues he himſelf acknowledged to be owing to his intenſe application to his ſtudies (c). While he continued at this Univerſity he publiſhed ſeveral Diſſertations [B]; but with regard to the Syſtem of Divinity, which he was taught by the Profeſſors there, he afterwards expreſſed the greateſt contempt for it [C]. In the year 1689 he obtained the Academical Degree of Maſter of Philoſophy, which in the following part of his life he

[A] An ample account of his life and writings publiſhed in Latin by John Chriſtopher Colerus.] It was printed at Wittemberg in 1718 under the following title, Jo. Chriſtophor. Coleri Hiſtoria Gothofredi Arnoldi, quâ de vita, ſcriptis, actiſque illius non copioſe magis quam verè atque idoneâ fide exponitur. Præmiſſa eſt Diſſertatio Critica de Corruptoribus Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ. Cum Præfatione Gottlieb Wernſdorfii Theol. D. & P. P. O. Templi OO. SS. Præpoſ. & Senat. Eccl. Aſſeſſoris: i. e. "The Hiſtory of Godfrey Arnoldus "by John Chriſtopher Colerus, in which an ample "and authentick account is given of his Life, Writ-"ings, and Actions. To which is prefixed a critical "Diſſertation concerning the Corrupters of Eccleſia-"ſtical Hiſtory. With a Preface by Gottlieb Wernſ-"dorf Doctor of Divinity, &c." Colerus in his Prolegomena (1) aſſures us, that he was not influenced by any prejudice or partiality in writing his account of Arnoldus, but had paid the utmoſt regard to truth. That he has frequently quoted his own words; and omitted nothing deſignedly, which could be of the leaſt advantage to the defence of his cauſe. That he had taken the utmoſt pains to inſert all that had been urged by him and his friends in his favour. Nolim verò aliquis exiſtimet me quidquam vel odio dediſſe, vel amori. Simpliciter & bonâ fide ſcripſi. Ipſius Arnoldi ſubinde excitavi verba & confeſſionem. Nihil ſtudioſe præterii, quod ad qualemcunque illius defenſionem pertinere poterat. Cumulavi ferè & diligenter attuli, quæ vel Arnoldus vel amici ad cauſam dicendam excogitârunt. However he obſerves on the other hand, that he thought proper to omit nothing, which had been remark'd againſt Arnoldus by men of the beſt reputation and character; much leſs to favour thoſe perſons, who ſeemed to have confederated together to deſtroy the Church, of which he was a member. Verum tamen minimè quoque omittenda cenſui, quæ optimi & integerrimi viri contra Arnoldum monuerunt; multoque minus iis adblandiendum putavi, qui in ruinam cœtus noſtri conſpirâſſe videntur (2). Dr. Gottlieb Wernſdorf in his Preface to this Book of Colerus, tells us, that the Author had the beſt aſſiſtances poſſible in compoſing his account of Arnoldus; and that notwithſtanding all the clamours of the Fanatics, who may complain that he has been injured in it, impartial perſons will be of a different opinion; and find, that Colerus has written without the leaſt prejudice of any kind, and imputed nothing to Arnoldus without the ſureſt grounds, and in ſhort confirmed every thing which he has advanced, by the moſt undoubted teſtimonies. Frement, ſcio, fanatici, multaſque viro injurias per hoc ſcriptum illatas eſſe clamabunt: at æqui rerum æſtimatores multo aliter judicabunt. Nihil enim odio, nihil gratiæ, dediſſe Colerum, & nec finxiſſe quicquam, nec Arnoldo præter meritum imputaſſe, ſed omnia idoneis validiſque, imo & publicis documentis ac teſtimoniis comprobaſſe hi facilè largientur noſtro, qui libellum non obiter inſpicere dignabuntur. But the judicious reader will ſuſpect, that Dr. Wernſdorf is a little too much prejudiced himſelf, when he ſhall obſerve in what terms he ſpeaks of Arnoldus in that Preface. He tells us, that among all the innovators ſince Luther's Reformation there was none appeared to ſo much diſadvantage as Arnoldus, that Pedler in Hiſtory, as he calls him, who is generally contemned, quam infamatus ille à pleriſque hiſtoricaſter Arnoldus. In ſhort, that it will ſeem a prodigy to poſterity, that Saxony, which before was the ſeat of pure doctrine, and produced many excellent perſons, ſhould give birth to a man of ſo fanatical, irregular, and malignant a diſpoſition and conduct. Prodigio ſimile poſteritati videbitur intra Saxoniam, quæ huc dum purioris doctrinæ ſedes, bonorumque ingeniorum ferax eſt habita, hominem uſque adeo fanaticum, diſtortum, & maledicum, naſci potuiſſe. He proceeds then to repreſent him under the moſt odious colours, and in all the ſeverity of language imaginable; which muſt render Dr. Wernſdorf a very improper perſon to give a recommendation of another man's performance with regard to the impartiality of it.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral Diſſertations.] The ſubjects of them were de Lotione manuum, i. e. "con-"cerning the waſhing of the hands;" de Hermunduris, i. e. "concerning the Hermunduri, an ancient "people of Germany;" de locutione Angelorum, i. e. "concerning the ſpeaking of the Angels;" de Hiſtoria Georgii Ducis, &c. i. e. "of the Hiſtory of Duke "George, &c." They were publiſhed at Wittemberg in 1686, and at Gieſſen in 1697. The ſtyle of them is not inelegant (3).

(3) Colerus, Hiſt. Got. Arnold. Sect. 4. pag. 107. and Sect. 3. p. 100.

[C] He afterwards expreſſed the greateſt contempt for it.] Colerus (4) obſerves, that it was the cuſtom not only of Arnoldus, but of all the other Fanatics, as he ſtiles them, of our Age, to treat Syſtematical Divinity as a mere ſcholaſtic Scheme, conſiſting of a ſett of terms not to be found in Scripture. He then proceeds to ſome remarks upon this ſubject, the ſubſtance of which we ſhall give the reader. The term School-Divinity may be conſidered in two ſenſes; the one grammatical and common, and the other more peculiar and determinate. In the former ſenſe, all that Divinity, which is taught in the Schools and Univerſities, of what kind ſoever it is, may be called School-Divinity. But in the other ſenſe, it ſignifies that ſcheme of doctrines, which is not only oppoſed to myſtical Divinity and that of the Fathers, but likewiſe to that, which depends rather upon Revelation, and the Prophets and Apoſtles, than upon human Reaſon and Art. If School-Divinity indeed were to be eſtimated only from the works of Peter Lombard and Thomas Aquinas, and the Commentators upon them, who are full of trifling and impertinent diſquiſitions, it might juſtly be rejected. But School-Divinity is not to be confined within ſuch narrow limits. For there is certainly an uſeful ſcheme of it, which teaches us to diſcourſe properly and ſolidly concerning God and his Attributes, and other points of Religion, out of the Scriptures, and conſiſts in an accu-he opposed so vehemently, and absolutely refused to make use of [D]. From Wittemberg he removed to Dresden Anno 1689, and put himself under the direction of the famous Philip James Spener, who had the greatest regard for him imaginable, and introduced him to the acquaintance of Christopher Ritter, Counsellor of the Elector of Saxony, by whose means he was made Tutor to the children of Goetzius and Bircholzius. In 1693 he went to Quedlinburg, and taught the sons of Mr. Stammius for near four years together (d). He was more than once sollicited to engage in the Ministry, but refused, because he thought the Church of Germany was sunk into many flagrant corruptions [E]. He was employed as a corrector of the press at Francfort upon the Maine (e), according to Colerus; but the Author of his Life in High-Dutch, plainly proves this to be without any grounds. In 1697 he was appointed Professor of History at Giessen, by the Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, without any application on his part; but as he had a very scrupulous conscience, and could not conform himself to all the formalities received in the Universities of Germany, he resigned his Professorship (f), and published a book to explain the reasons of his conduct in that point [F]. He retired therefore to Quedlinburg in rate and methodical explication of them. This is necessary, not indeed with regard to the Scriptures themselves, but on account of the arts of various adversaries, which we are obliged to encounter with in Religion, especially the Papists; which if the Church was not disturbed with, we might easily dispense with the want of School-Divinity, even the more sound and pure part of it. Necessaria quidem est, non propter res ipsas sacras & divinas, earumque interpretationem, sed ob adversariorum, maxime Pontificiorum, artes & technas, quibus nisi infestaretur Ecclesia, facile omni illâ careret, quam dixi, theologiâ scholasticâ, etiam emendatiori & satis sobriâ. Nor does there seem any sufficient reason, why all Philosophy should be excluded from Divinity and the profession of it, if it be but used with proper caution and moderation. Arnoldus and his followers object against the Lutheran Systems of Divinity as scholastic and full of philosophical terms; which Colerus imagines may be confuted, by shewing that their Divinity is not at all like that of the Roman Catholicks, which has no dependence upon Scripture, but upon the Doctrines of the Fathers, and the Canons of Councils, and is almost wholly employed in profane or frivolous enquiries.

[D] Obtained the Academical Degree of Master of Philosophy, which in the following part of his life he opposed so vehemently, and absolutely refused to make use of.] We are told in the Life of him written in High-Dutch, that he himself declared, that the vice of ambition had been greatly inflamed in him by the usual provocations of some of his Superiors, insomuch that they prevailed upon him in the year 1686, to accept of the Academical Degree of Master of Philosophy. But Colerus observes (5), that it was undoubtedly with his consent. His opinion concerning the Academical Degrees appears from the following passage in his Ecclesiastical History (6). It is a scandal and a sin, (Bona verba, quæso, says Colerus) that these weighty Pillars of Anti-Christianity are yet almost every where preserved, by those who value themselves upon a Reformation, as so many Holy Relicks; and as such are in use at our Universities. But what will not the hypocritical world do for money? And particularly with regard to the Degree in Philosophy he tells us (7): That whereas at Wittenberg, in the year 1544, in Luther's time, but three Candidates took at one time their Degree of Master of Arts, no longer afterwards than in the year 1551, forty, and in the year 1602, sixty two were admitted at once. So that between the years 1502 and 1655 the number amounted to 7467, who were sent from that one University, dignified with this Degree, to seek their fortune in the wide world. This abuse gave occasion to the following lines.

Pack. p. 39---40. Colerus tells us, that his reasons were for the greatest part impertinent and trifling; and that one of the chief causes, which he urged for leaving his Professorship, was the great scruples and uneasiness of conscience, which he suffered. Arnoldus's words are as follow (10): Die Haupt-Ursachen, &c. i. e. The chief motives for this my resolution, as far as I am allowed to reveal and express them, from the inward recesses of my heart, were as follow: §. 11. Hence, says he, it is easy to conceive, what a conflict was excited in me, between the flesh and the Spirit.... Insomuch that my heart was frequently in a manner rent asunder, lifeless, overwhelmed with misery and pain, and as it were swimming in tears. He alledges likewise the manner of life among the Asceticks (11). Meines Orths gestehe &c. i. e. For my part, I readily confess, that when I have, at any time, look'd into ancient History, the examples of the primitive Christians, and, among them, of the Hermits, and Asceticks, have made me blush for shame... Especially when several persons of their own accord assured me, they should never believe, that notwithstanding this knowledge, and the testimony I had frequently born of it, I should nevertheless accept of a regular dignity, and submit to the ordinances. I must thereby necessarily be tied down. He urges the example of Abraham (12): And suppose, Abraham was tempted even to the murder of his son, and without doubt at that time, if it had been made known, would have been cruelly censured, yet would his faith have been accounted to him a justification.... However, it is very grievous to observe, that God, in the wonderful ways of his hidden Providence, should hardly deviate a step from the common path, in 1698, and lived privately in the houſe of Mr. John Henry Sproegelius, where he had frequent conteſts with the Divines of that city [G]. In the year 1700 he went to Altſted, where he indeed engaged in the Miniſtry, and was made Chaplain to the Ducheſs Dowager of Eiſenach, but with an abſolute liberty of conſcience. About the ſame time he married Anna Maria, the daughter of Sproegelius, by whom he had one ſon and one daughter, both of whom died in 1709 (g). He met with great difficulties in being admitted into his function at Altſted; and at laſt in 1705 was obliged to leave that city. He took his leave of his Auditors in a ſhort Sermon, which is publiſhed in his Poſtills [H]. It happened very fortunately for him, that he was ſoon after invited to Brandenburg by the late King of Pruſſia to ſucceed his father-in-law as inſpector of the Dioceſs, and appointed the Magiſtracy Paſtor of the church of Werben, which function he diſcharged very peaceably for ſeveral years (h). In 1707, after long ſollicitation of the Magiſtracy and Citizens, his Pruſſian Majeſty appointed him Paſtor and Inſpector of the Churches of Perleberg, and afterwards Hiſtoriographer to that Court (i). He died of a fever [I] the 30th of May 1714 (k), being forty eight years of age. Colerus tells us, that there was a report, that juſt before his death he expreſſed his concern for having publiſhed his Sophia, and written his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory with too little caution and prudence, which fact however other leſs prejudiced writers have very much queſtioned; and the Author of his Life in High-German, who is very particular as to his behaviour in his laſt illneſs, and eſpecially in his laſt hours, takes no manner of notice of it. We have his epitaph in the account of his Life publiſhed in High-Dutch; but Colerus has written one for him, which is the ſtrongeſt Satyr upon him imaginable [K]. We are informed in the Journal Literaire (l), path, or perform a work, which is not conſonant with the hypocritical ways, and falſe appearances of the world, &c. He then proceeds to the example of St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Baſil (13). In ſubſequent times not only many thouſands purſued that manner of life, but even ſome famous Teachers, partly as being weary of ſo frequent diſperſions, and partly with a deſire to avoid falling into the general corruption of the times, continued it. Thus, among many others, Greg. Naz. and Baſil the Great frequently laid down the moſt eminent Eccleſiaſtical Dignities to embrace a retired and ſolitary life, &c. But Colerus ſhews, that he was miſtaken in thoſe two inſtances with regard to Nazianzen and St. Baſil; ſince the latter at laſt returned from the wilderneſs, and undertook the care of the Church of Cæſarea under Euſebius, whom he ſucceeded in that See in the year 370. And St. Gregory was Biſhop of Nazianzum (14). Arnoldus (15) urges the ſaying of our Saviour in Matth. vi. 24; and Thro' this ſuperior and heavenly power all falſe motives, objections, and colours of reaſon and obſtinate ſelf-will, were ſo ſuppreſſed, that, at length, a juſt and certain concluſion followed: "That no man could ſerve "two maſters." He treats the univerſities in general with great ſeverity and particularly in §. 62, where he ſays, To conclude, my earneſt deſire and prayer to God is, that he will direct the hearts and minds of Kings, Princes and Magiſtrates, and excite in them a ſpirit of zeal for his honour, to break down the high places of Baal, to hew down all the groves, and to purge the land of its idolatry, &c. Nay he ſhews the utmoſt contempt for all human learning, as appears by the following paſſages: I make no ſcruple to confeſs, that I have found no more plauſible, and at the ſame time more powerful and conſtant ſuppreſſor of the Spirit, and hinderance of a perfect union with CHRIST, than human learning. . . . . In truth, there is a peculiar peſt predominant with the learned, which ſeizes and bewitches all the faculties of the ſoul with a ſecret but penetrating venom, and without a real apoſtacy renders them unfit for the holy and meek Kingdom of CHRIST. l. c. §. 57. He tells us likewiſe as follows. My natural inclination and capacity drew me to aim at much knowledge, eſpecially in Philoſophy, and therein in Antiquity, Civil and Critical Hiſtory: And in this the Spirit, labouring under great uneaſineſs, was liable to much danger and detriment. From this likewiſe the love of GOD, by a conſtant oppoſition and teſtimony, frequently drew me with great vehemence, and led me to the one only neceſſary knowledge. Inſomuch that I was ſeveral times conſtrained, by the utmoſt anxiety of my own heart, and by the conviction of the extreme vanity (of human learning) not only to lay aſide all unneceſſary ſtudy, but to part with all my Books, ſome few only excepted; &c. Lit. The King of Pruſſia being made ſenſible of the oppreſſion he laboured under, took both him and his father-in-law under his ſpecial protection, and appointed a Commiſſion of Enquiry, enjoining his accuſers to juſtify their charge before this Commiſſion, but they evaded it by calling the competency of it in queſtion, as they were immediately dependant on the Abbey, and ſo the matter reſted.*

[I] He died of a fever.] We are informed in his Life publiſhed in High-Dutch (17), That on the thirtieth of May, 1714, being Whit-ſunday, ſome Officers who were liſting ſoldiers broke into the church during the Communion, and by force ſeized and carried off ſome young men, the fright of which gave ſuch a ſhock to his weak conſtitution already worn out by too great an application to ſtudy, that he never was himſelf afterwards; and tho' he preached a Funeral-Sermon the afternoon of the day following, his ſpirits ſo failed him, that the Burgomaſter perceiving it, ſent the Sexton into the pulpit, to ſtand behind him, leſt he ſhould ſink down in the midſt of his Sermon. This ſurprize and fright threw him into a burning fever, which carried him off ten days afterwards.

[K] Colerus has written an Epitaph for him, which is the ſtrongeſt Satyr upon him imaginable.] It is as follows: M. S. Hic ſitus eſt Gothofredus Arnoldus Theologus non tam ipſe, quam Theologorum inſectator acerrimus, hæreticorum defenſor perpetuus, theologiæ myſticæ inſtaurator, & fanaticiſmi incruſtator æque impudentiſſimus, corruptorum hiſtoriæ ſacræ facile princeps, ſcriptorum mole orbem literatum non tam auxit quam obruit. Qui ut plurimum detrimenti caperet Eccleſia Lutherana curavit diligenter; magnum ſui reliquit deſiderium apud Novatores omnes, infelicem apud orthodoxos memoriam. Religionem coluit miſcellaneam aut nullam. Jam Deo relictus Judici. Ilicet. That is, "Here lies the body "of Godfrey Arnoldus, who was not ſo much a Di- "vine himſelf, as a moſt vehement oppoſer of the Di- "vines; a conſtant defender of Heretics, a reſtorer of "myſtical Divinity, and as weak a reviver of Fanati- "ciſm. He was the Head of all the corruptors of Eccle- "ſiaſtical Hiſtory; and he did not ſo much enrich the "world as overwhelm it with the multitude of his "writings. He took all poſſible pains to injure "the Lutheran Church. His loſs is greatly regret-

Literaire (l), that he was a ſolid Divine, a great lover of peace, and exempt from prejudices, and that though his learning was very extenſive, his piety was ſtill much ſuperior to it. That he was a ſincere Profeſſor of the myſtical Divinity, and practiſed himſelf what he preached to others. And that after Mr. Spener's death he was conſidered as the Patriarch of the Pietiſts. But as that name is generally given to thoſe, who endeavour to reform the abuſes introduced into the church, and condemn a laxneſs of morals, this imputation was a real advantage to his character. The rigid Lutherans repreſent him in a very different manner, and particularly Colerus, who endeavours to ſhew, that Arnoldus was not a Lutheran [L], but deſerved the title of an Indifferentiſt [M], and maintained ſeveral

[L] Endeavours to ſhew, that Arnoldus was not a Lutheran.] He obſerves, that Arnoldus in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory every where repreſents the Lutheran Church in the moſt ſhocking colours imaginable; and he refers us for the proof in what manner he treats the Lutherans to the Index of that Book under the word Lutheran, where we find the following reproachful terms; They are fallen into the uttermoſt Corruption; their Decay is general; their ſcandalous Lives; their Pride and Diſſentions, which he compares to the Confuſion of Babel; the utmoſt Perverſity of the greateſt part; worſe than Papiſts or Heathens; their Security and Preſumption; their Epicuriſm; their Errors and Hereſy; their Heterodoxy; their Fanaticiſm; their Impurity; their Enmity againſt the Calviniſts; their human Traditions, Popery, and ſymbolical Books; their Perſecution of others; their falſe Goſpel, their Paganiſm, Atheiſm, &c. Colerus then remarks, that he ſhewed the utmoſt averſion to all Creeds, Confeſſions of Faiths, and other Forms of Doctrine among the Lutherans, which he repreſented as dangerous, impious, contrary to Chriſtian liberty, or adapted to bring Popery itſelf in again; and that he exploded the oath, which is taken in the Lutheran Church to defend the doctrine contained in theſe Forms and Confeſſions of Faith. Libros autem eccleſiæ noſtræ ſymbolicos, quibus ab aliis demum heterodoxorum cœtibus diſcernimur, non ſolum ſuſque deque habuit, verum etiam noxios, impios, libertati Chriſtianæ contrarios, & ad reducendum poſtliminio ipſum papatum aptos pronunciavit, juſque illud jurandum, quo ad tuendum librorum ſymbolicorum præſcriptam doctrinam obſtringimur, audacter exploſit (18). This he proves from ſeveral paſſages in Arnoldus's Writings, and particularly in the Index of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in which they are ſaid to be unprofitable, erroneous, and unpracticable, unneceſſary, hurtful and reprovable. Wernſdorf in his Diſſertation de Auctoritate Librorum ſymbolicorum, ſubjoined to his Comm. de Indiff. Relig. (19) obſerves, that while Arnoldus upon every occaſion oppoſes and remonſtrates againſt Creeds and other innocent Forms of declaring our ſentiments in Religion, ſeems to regret this only, that the Church is not expoſed to greater danger, and that the truth does not lay open to the attacks of more of its ſecret enemies. Sane dum Arnoldus ſymbola & innocentes loquendi formulas quavis occaſione reprehendit & taxat, nihil aliud dolere & miſereri videtur, quam eccleſiam non majori expoſitam eſſe periculo, aut veritatem pluribus opportunam inſidiis. Colerus infers therefore from Arnoldus's ſentiment upon that ſubject, that upon this very account eſpecially he ought not to be conſidered as a Lutheran, ſince he proceeded in ſo licentious and wicked a manner to oppoſe all Creeds and Forms of Religion, and refuſed his aſſent to them; which being removed, not only the unity of the faith will be deſtroyed, but a new faith will ariſe every year, as St. Hilary writes concerning the Arians, or perhaps every month, and there will neceſſarily follow ſuch an unbounded liberty of conſcience, as has filled Holland, England, and many other countries with a variety of monſtrous opinions: Quibus tamen è medio ſublatis non tantum exſpirabit unitas fidei noſtræ, ſed, quod de Arianis ſcripſit Hilarius, annua ſolum & menſtrua fides exſurget, eaque ſubſequetur credendi libertas, quæ Belgiam, Angliam, plureſque alias Regiones tot peſtibus implevit (20). He ſhews likewiſe, that Arnoldus ſpeaks every where of the Lutheran Divines, as well dead as living, in the ſevereſt terms of reproach (21); and owns expreſly, that the ſtate of the Lutheran Church, as well as others, appeared to him ſo very corrupt, that he ſcrupled to join himſelf to it. The following paſſage in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (22) is directly to this purpoſe: That, whereas as well in this Century, as in the foregoing, no other judgment can be formed of this (the Lutheran) Church; but that it is, juſt as the other mighty and ruling Sects in the world, fallen into the uttermoſt corruption; and that the few (abovementioned) witneſſes, together with the reſt of the myſtical ſervants of the Lord, diſperſed in every viſible Church-Community, have always, and alone, conſtituted the true tho' inviſible Church of God, &c.

[M] Deſerv'd the title of an Indifferentiſt.] Colerus affirms, that he was not only no Lutheran, but even could not be juſtly ranked in any Proteſtant Church; and was conſequently an Indifferentiſt, as he expreſſes it, or a man of all religions, or none, at leaſt of no determinate ſcheme of Doctrines. Wernſdorf in his Brevis & nervoſa de Indifferentiſmo Religionum Commentatio (23) tells us, that Arnoldus was infected above all others with the pernicious doctrine of Indifferency with regard to religion, as appears from his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, wherein there is ſcarce a page, in which he does not deny the exiſtence of any viſible Church; and rejects all the peculiar diſtinctions between the different commotions; he places all the ſects upon the ſame foot with the true Church; repreſents the Socinians, thoſe ſworn enemies of the Divine Majeſty, as true and ſincere Chriſtians; defends thoſe profeſſed Indifferentiſts, Puccius, Werdenhagius, Kainus, Tſcheſchius, Coornhert, and others; ridicules the complaints and judgments, which our Divines make of them; deſpiſes all external obſervances; and maintains only an internal and enthuſiaſtical ſenſe of religion. This is evident from ſeveral paſſages in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and particularly, in P. II. f. 726. n. 4. he writes thus; When we hear it on every ſide loudly proclaimed: Behold, here is Christ, there is Christ! See, he is in this Church, or School; in this or that Sermon or Service, in this College, Chamber or private Aſſembly; in this or that Perſon he is alone; a Soul that has a knowledge of Christ gives no heed to theſe calls, nor ſeeks him any where but in herſelf, &c. Again, in P. IV. And herein (viz. that God ſows his Myſtical Seed every where in private, by an inviſible Communion, and ſpiritual faculties, the growth of which no Tyrant, falſe Zealot or Hypocrite can ſuppreſs, or hinder from bringing forth fruit, in ſome a thouſand times a thouſand fold,) lies the foundation, why the true Church of Christ, muſt, at all times, neceſſarily have ſubſiſted, in every Sect, Nation and Language, inviſible, hidden, oppreſſed and ſolitary; becauſe the Kingdom of God has always been internal, and conſequently not to be diſcerned by human eyes, &c. And again evidently; n. 13. Hence it follows neceſſarily, that indeed (according to the confeſſion of St. Peter) among all theſe multitudes, all thoſe are acceptable to God, who fear him and do Righteouſneſs, and therefore, he every where ſows, nouriſhes and preſerves his Myſtical Seed: But that, nevertheleſs, no one who has otherwiſe an honeſt and upright intention, is to be blamed, if he fixes his happineſs, in depending on God alone, and in following his only Lord and Shepherd, Jesus Christ, without naming or conforming himſelf according to the Name, Tradition, or Model of any other Perſon whatſoever, &c. Colerus likewiſe endeavours to prove him an Indifferentiſt, becauſe Arnoldus, as he informs us, conſidered the Scriptures as a rule of life only, and not as a ſtandard of Doctrine; diſapproved of all Creeds and Confeſſions of Faith, and complained that their authority was too great; rejected all the diſtinguiſhing names among Chriſtians, and exploded all Churches under several groſs errors [N]; and conſequently that his antagoniſts have merited the greateſt honour by defending the Church againſt his attacks. He proceeds then to give his opinion concerning the genius, prejudices, and learning of Arnoldus; and obſerves, that his mind had a great mixture of good and bad diſpoſitions; that he had an uncommon quickneſs and under the title of Sects; affirmed, that no ſcheme of Religion was exactly true, or exempt from all error and guilt; but that all of them have ſo much truth remaining among them, that the Profeſſors may be ſaved, if they make the proper uſe of it. He diſapproved of Polemical Divinity, and condemned all diſputes concerning Religion; and oppoſed all Syſtems, Catechiſms, Confeſſions, and Creeds. He affirmed, that a ſimple, general, and ſuperficial knowledge of Divinity was ſufficient for ſalvation. He extenuated the efficacy of the outward word of God; and plainly objected againſt Infant-Baptiſm. He repreſented the uſe of the Lord's Supper as an indifferent point; and imagined that there was an extraordinary converſion of men to Religion. He denied the reality of a viſible Church, and the neceſſity of embracing it. He profeſſed that he was averſe to all Parties and Sects in general. He affirmed, that the Characteriſtic of the true Church, was not the lawful diſpenſation of the Word and Sacraments, but Charity and the Love of Peace. He aſſerted, that the very worſt deſigns, expreſſions, and actions of Heretics were to be explained in the moſt favourable ſenſe, and that all errors were to be excuſed; and that manifeſt Heretics ought not to be confuted, or even condemned, or baniſhed out of the State. And he rejected all external obſervances, Worſhips, Ceremonies, and Churches. This is the repreſentation, which Colerus has given us of his Doctrine (24); who tells us, that we may properly ſtile Arnoldus the Mareſchal de Camp General of all the Indifferentiſts, who ever appeared: Rectius Arnoldum Indifferentiſtarum omnium, quos ſol vidit unquam, Generalem Campi Mareſchallum vocemus, licet (25).

[N] Maintained ſeveral groſs errors.] We have mentioned in the preceding Note ſeveral of his aſſertions, which render'd him very obnoxious to the Orthodox; and we ſhall now proceed to what Colerus further obſerves concerning his opinions. He acknowledged, according to that Author (26), the authority of the Scripture, but weakened the certainty and perfection of it, and aſſerted, that we ought to wait for the Afflatus or Inſpiration of the Holy Spirit, which is of higher importance to us. His ſentiments upon this ſubject will appear from the following paſſages in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. In the Writings even of the Apoſtles (ſays he) we meet ſometimes with Paſſages, which ſeem to be doubtful, and might not be ſo readily aſſented to by every one, as 1 Cor. XI. 4. ſeq. And for this very reaſon, the Primitive Chriſtians were to form their judgment how to underſtand theſe Writings, by the direction of God; and thereby to prove all things, as it was commanded them, without exception. 1 Theſ. V. 21. Vid. Hæreſiol. L. I. C. V. §. 5. f. 49. id. n. 6. The Theſſalonians alone were taught by God, and ſtood in no need of Apoſtolick Epiſtles..... That God alone might have the Honour of it, and no other God but him be made of any thing, &c. He endeavoured, ſays Colerus (27), to render the Canon of the Scripture doubtful and uncertain, or even to remove it, and complained that too great a regard was paid to its authority. And he was of opinion, that without ſome higher principle, and the immediate and extraordinary Revelation of the Spirit, there could have been no certain grounds for ſettling the Canon of Scripture, becauſe there was no outward teſtimony or command, which was delivered down to the Chriſtians of that age for that purpoſe. Nimirum ita ſenſit Arnoldus, ſine ſublimiori principio & afflatu Spiritus immediato & extraordinario non potuiſſe de libris in Canonem Scripturæ referendis aliâ ratione conſtare, utpote de ipſo externum ad neminem Chriſtianorum illius ætatis vel teſtimonium vel mandatum pervenerit. This aſſertion of his is examined by Godfrey Olearius in the Prolegomena to his Obſervationes Sacræ in Matthæum (28). With regard to the Trinity, Arnoldus affirmed, that the explicit knowledge of that myſtery is not neceſſary to ſalvation; and he objected againſt the Decree of the Council of Nice, and treated the terms of Trinity, Perſon, and Ὁμοουσία or Conſubſtantiality with contempt. Beſides, he contemned all the labours of the ancient Church in defence of this myſtery, as appears from this paſſage in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (29). The Primitive Chriſtians talked in a very different ſtrain of the Godhead, than they began afterwards to diſcourſe of it from Human Tradition. They knew nothing of the words, Trinity, Perſon, ὁμοούσιος, and the like. He calls the ſenſe of the Church concerning the Trinity, ſpurious, inſincere, and idolatrous (30). He ſpeaks of our Saviour in ſuch an ambiguous manner, as makes him very much ſuſpected of Arianiſm (31). He derogates extremely from the Sacraments; and repreſents Baptiſm as a mere ceremony. He ſeems evidently to diſapprove of Infant-Baptiſm, as appears from the following paſſage in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (32). At his very entrance in this life, he (Wenceſlaus) is ſaid by the Prieſts, to have been guilty of a crying ſin, becauſe he bewrayed the Font; tho' the poor child could not help the juggling tricks they were playing with him: which, as well as his Coronation, they ought to have deferred till he had been of riper years. And he expreſſly calls Baptiſm (33), an ancient Cuſtom, which was retained in the firſt Century. With reſpect to the Lord's Supper, he repreſents it in a very low manner, as a mere outward obſervance, which the more perfect Chriſtians have no occaſion for; and conſiders the uſe of it in the Lutheran Church as abſolutely idolatrous. The following paſſages (34) will give light into his ſentiments upon this ſubject. On this foundation, they, (the Primitive Chriſtians) as many of them as were perfect, Phil. iii. 15. ſtood in no need of exteriour remedies, ſuch as were ordained for the weak, in whom Christ, himſelf, was not yet firmly rooted. They, therefore, laid no ſtrict injunction on one another to communicate; neither as a means to ſtrengthen their faith, nor in remembrance of Christ, nor as an union among themſelves. They left every man to his liberty, in this point; becauſe they found no direct command for it, either from Christ or the Apoſtles, who only had admoniſhed them, as often as they did it (without determining the neceſſity or circumſtances of it,) to do it in remembrance of Christ, and that, till he himſelf came. For them, therefore, to whom Christ was come, and, according to his promiſe, had manifeſted himſelf, this practice muſt of courſe ceaſe, the Lord having taken up his conſtant abode in them. And, in ſuch, the marriage of the Lamb took place of it as a fore-runner of a future, manifeſt carrying home (35). And of juſt the ſame ſentiments they were, with regard to other exteriour ſigns with which they no longer amuſed themſelves, after they had attained to the real eſſence of CHRIST, &c. Vid. Hæreſiol. P. I. p. 53. Idem. p. 110. Much leſs did any idolatry or conceit, ſuperſtition and abuſe prevail among them, or induce them to make uſe of it as a Panacea, which abuſe of it afterwards crept in, and has been of long duration. Again, p. 346. The moſt abominable Idolatry and arrant Capernaiſm continue yet to bear ſway among thoſe who pretend to Orthodoxy. They build all their hopes upon it, and think, the Holy Food muſt cleanſe them from all their abominations, which is the ready way to Atheiſm. Laſtly, he bears this teſtimony of himſelf. I, for my part, am ſtrenuouſly for the participation of the Lord's-Supper, according to the plain and evident words of Christ, and the example and practices of the Primitive Apoſtolical Church, in remembrance of him, and for a manifeſtation of his death; and that, frequently and oftener than I could ever have an opportunity of doing it in the Church. And here, I would be underſtood, not alone of the internal and eternal Supper of the Lord; but likewiſe of the external participation of the Bread and Wine, ordained by Christ. However, without the leaſt ceremony and ſhew, in the decent ſimplicity of the Spirit of Christ. Vid. Arnold's Expoſition on Hereſy, and going to Church and the Sacrament, &c. p. 34. and 37. The whole act of the Lutheran Sacrament of the Lord's Supper has retained nothing in it that can be called good, or that does not give offence or ſcandal, &c. His notions of the Church were very peculiar; for he was of opinion, that the inviſible Church of thoſe, who are commonly conſidered as Heretics, is the only true one; that the Church was improperly called a Mother; and vivacity, and an admirable talent at Poetry (m). That he had a ſtrong propenſion to Enthuſiaſm and Fanaticiſm [O], and was actuated by a ſpirit of pride and obſtinacy in defending his paradoxes (n). That his prejudices were very numerous [P]. He then enquires into our Author's character with regard to learning, and remarks, that if learning conſiſts in the general knowledge of a multitude of books, and in being able to form new books from a variety of others, and to repreſent old errors under new colours, Arnoldus has then a juſt claim to the character of a very learned man. But if true learning conſiſts in the ſolid underſtanding of thoſe things, which are uſeful and neceſſary, improved by a ſound judgment, and applied to the beſt purpoſes with reſpect to the good of the perſon that all the Eccleſiaſtical ſolemnities were vain, and the publick buildings appointed for worſhip, uſeleſs; and he exploded all the outward profeſſion of a Church. *Exiſtimat enim ſolam Eccleſiam inviſibilem hominum, qui vulgo præ hæreticis & improbiſſimis habiti fuerunt, veram eſſe; perperam Eccleſiam matrem dici; ſolennia Eccleſiaſtica vana eſſe omnia, ædeſque templorum inutiles ac profanas, ipſamque profeſſionem Eccleſiæ externam exp*lodit (35). His opinion concerning Civil Government, is plainly intimated in ſeveral parts of his Writings; but Dippelius his Diſciple has declared his ſentiments without any diſguiſe or reſerve (36). Let us hear what Dr. Cyprianus ſays of Arnoldus in this point, in his Preface, pag. 18. Sect. 10. Arnoldus, in his Index, has remarked many things to the diſadvantage of the Lutheran Magiſtracy, of whom he thought he ſtood in no need; but of the Magiſtracy of other Religions he makes no particular remarks in his Index. However, in the Hiſtory itſelf, he hardly ever mentions any Orthodox Ruler, without thinking it neceſſary to enumerate his vices, tho' he paſſes by his virtues and good qualities in ſilence. He, indeed, endeavours to conceal his real meaning; but his Diſciple, Dippelius, ſpeaks ſo much the plainer: In the Kingdom of Christ (ſays he) Magiſtrates are unneceſſary. A great Ruler, as a great Ruler, can be no member of the Body of Christ, much leſs a Biſhop of his Church. A true Chriſtian, who is freed from the Bondage of ſin, by the Spirit of Christ, is, like his Maſter, Christ, exempt from all worldly juriſdiction; tho' not to give offence to ſuch as are yet under the law, he does not inſiſt on his right. Arnoldus expreſſed himſelf in very ſevere terms of marriage. He tells us in Myſter. Soph. (37). Marriage is a brutiſh, worldly and polluted State, and conjugal affection an impure affection. Whoever enters (ſays he) into the ſtate of matrimony, bereaves himſelf of the true union with the heavenly Sophia or Wiſdom, and falls into a dangerous and abſurd Apoſtacy. But Colerus obſerves, that he afterwards corrected his opinion in that point, eſpecially when he had married himſelf. We may judge in ſome meaſure of his notion concerning the ſtate of the damned, from ſeveral paſſages in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (38), which, however, are conceived in ſuch abſtruſe, out-of-the-way terms, that many of them are hardly intelligible. They are, nevertheleſs, reducible to this one point: The reſtoration of all things, in the moſt unfathomable ſea of that eternal love, which is inſeparable from the Being of God, that God may be all in all. [O] That he had a ſtrong propenſion to Enthuſiaſm and Fanaticiſm.] Wernſdorf (39) calls him a profeſſed Enthuſiaſt; which Colerus ſays (40) was the juſt character of Arnoldus, ſince he made the ſtrongeſt pretences to immediate revelation, defended all the chief Enthuſiaſts, and was particularly zealous in patronizing the cauſe of Quakeriſm; as we are informed by Dr. Cyprianus (41). "It is a modern and nugatory doctrine of "the Quaker's approved of by Arnoldus. If any one "(ſays he) queſtions this my aſſertion, I will prove it "more plainly. Arnoldus tells us (P. II. p. 62.) that not "long ſince, a Perſon of quality in England, going into "a Quaker's Meeting, with a whip in his hand, with "an intent to put the patience of ſome of them to the "trial, was ſo powerfully inſpired that he immediately "adhered to their confeſſion:" and then adds in the margin: "This was one of the wonderful inligtnings and "ſecret ways of God. What then is plainer than that "Arnoldus declares Quakeriſm to be the true Religion? "God leads no man to a falſe Religion: When it "pleaſes God to lead any man, by the hidden ways "of his Providence to any Religion, it is to the true "Religion. But (ſays Arnold) this man was led by the "immediate inſpiration of God to embrace Quakeriſm, "and conſequently, according to him, the Quaker's Re"ligion is the true religion; &c." He was likewiſe extremely fond of myſtical Divinity, which he wrote an Hiſtory of; and he tells us with regard to Taulerus, the great leader of the myſtical Divines, that "a ſoul, "which is devoted to God, will find in one Page of "a Book written by a perſon taught by God, more "Divine light, life, counſel, comfort and peace, than in "ten Poſtils in folio, with which and with other Fables "of that kind the itching ears of people are filled, "and in which they ſpend their time to no manner of "purpoſe." Jam manifeſtum eſt Dei avidam mentem in una libri hujuſmodi Theodidacti pagina plus divinæ lucis, vitæ, conſilii, ſolatii, & pacis invenire, quam vel in decem Poſtillis in folio, quibus, aliiſque fabulis aures prurientes implent, & horas temere & inutiliter conſumere quærunt (42). With regard to his Fanaticiſm, Colerus tells us (43), that all his Writings and Conduct afford the ſtrongeſt proofs of it; eſpecially the little regard, which he paid to Scripture and the Sacraments; which, ſays that Author, is the very genius and eſſence of Fanaticiſm. He ſuppoſes, that Arnoldus's propenſion to that and to Enthuſiaſm aroſe partly from his ſtrong and exorbitant imagination, and partly from his melancholy temper, not to inſiſt upon the concurrence of the Devil in ſtrengthening his natural diſpoſition to them. Cauſam ſi quæras utriuſque mali, huc advocanda eſt partim vehementior & exorbitans imaginatio, partim vero ipſa melancholia, ne quid de infernalis genii efficacia addam.

[P] That his prejudices were very numerous.] Colerus tells us (44), that his firſt and grand prejudice was, that a good Chriſtian ought to leave all Sects and Communions of Religion, and the outward profeſſion of Faith; that all the ſects are in a dangerous ſtate, and that no pious perſon can ſafely join with them. The reſt of his prejudices may be ſeen in the Preface to his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; wherein he preſſes men to abandon the preſent corrupt Churches, to depend upon immediate inſpiration for the underſtanding of Scripture; to wait for the renovation of all creatures; and to reject the modern Babel-Schemes of Divinity, which do not at all agree in defining what hereſy is, which conſiſts not in the underſtanding but in the will (45). Colerus likewiſe remarks (46), that he was no great friend to the Reformation by Luther, ſince he declared his opinion, that there was no occaſion for ſo vehement a conteſt as was raiſed by him, ſince the parties did not differ in fundamentals, but only in indifferent points, as ceremonies and traditions, which they contended about ſo furiouſly, to the neglect of all peaceable methods, which might have put an end to that great variety of Sects now in the world. This obſervation of Colerus is founded upon the following paſſage in Arnoldus's Hiſtor. & Deſcript. Theolog. Myſtic. (47). Cum D. Jo. Eckius eandem ob cauſam, quod Lutherus Taulerum laudaviſſet, eumque citaſſet, hunc damnare aut reprobare vellet, tanto affectu alii & in primis celeberrimus ille myſticus (inter Romano-Catholicos) Ludovicus Bloyſius, Tauleri authoritatem vindicaverunt, ut ab eo tempore nullus de eo dubitaverit. Sicque partes controvertentes quoad fundamentum unanimes erant, & ſi veram pacem ſectari affectaſſent, in eſſentiali evangelii & ſenſus Jeſu Chriſti fundamento concordes & pacifici manere potuiſſent, ſi modo alius alium in adiaphoris ceremoniis & traditionibus tolerâſſet, nec tot in Chriſtiano orbe ſectas, & proprias eccleſias ædificaviſſet: that is, "When Dr. John Eckius, "merely upon the account that Luther had com"mended and quoted Taulerus, attempted to reject "and condemn him, other Writers, and eſpecially "Lewis Bloyſius, a celebrated myſtical Divine among "the Roman Catholicks, undertook the defence of "Taulerus's Authority with ſo much vigour, that it "has perſon who is poſſeſſed of it, and that of others; we ſhall be at a loſs to find many traces of this kind of learning in his Writings (o). He aſſerts likewiſe, that he was very little ſkilled in the learned Languages, Philoſophy, and Hiſtory [Q]. He wrote a great number of books, moſt of them in the German tongue. In 1700 he publiſhed a Work, in which he gives an account of the doctrines and manners of the Chriſtians from the firſt ages of Chriſtianity, and frequently animadverts upon Dr. Cave's Primitive Chriſtianity [R]. But his grand performance was his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory [S], which expoſed him to

" has remained uncontеſted ever ſince. And thus " the contending parties were agreed with reſpect to " the foundation itſelf; and if they had choſen to " follow a true ſpirit of peace, they might have con- " tinued upon good terms, being of the ſame mind " as to the eſſential foundation of the Goſpel and Doc- " trine of Jeſus Chriſt, provided they had but tole- " rated each other in indifferent points, as ceremo- " nies and traditions. By which means they might " have prevented ſuch a variety of Sects and diſtinct " Churches in the Chriſtian world." Colerus animad- verts with great ſeverity upon this paſſage; and tells us that it is an abſurd prejudice of a man, whom we might be confident knew nothing of the Hiſtory of the Reformation, nor the firſt principles of ſound Divinity. Ineptiſſimum profecto præjudicium hominis, quem jurares, nec Hiſtoriæ Reformationis, nec ſanæ Theologiæ prima principia cognita habuiſſe.

[Q] That he was very little ſkilled in the learned Languages, Philoſophy and Hiſtory.] Colerus affirms (48), that he was but a very indifferent maſter of the Latin tongue, which is the common language among Men of Letters; tho' while he was under the care of Schurtzfleiſch, he wrote in that tongue with elegance and propriety, as appears from his Diſſertations publiſh'd while he was at the Univerſity. He imagines therefore, that he afterwards neglected that language, upon the ſame notion perhaps, which Thomaſius ad- vanced, that it was the language of Antichriſt. His other works in Latin are very remote from the genius of that tongue. With regard to Greek, he was almoſt entirely unacquainted with it; as is evident from his tranſlation of a fragment of Theodorus con- cerning the Hereſy of the Valentinians, which he ſubjoined to his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and which was criticized by an anonymous Author, who detected above an hundred errors in it, and obſerved that he had frequently changed the maſculine for the fœmi- nine, and miſtook the ſenſe of the Greek words. He was likewiſe cenſured on that account by Elias Veiel, a Divine of Ulm, who publiſhed a piece againſt him in the year 1701, in 4to (49). Colerus tells us, that it does not appear, that he was at all converſant in the Hebrew or any other of the Oriental Tongues; but that he was ignorant in Philoſophy, which led him into a variety of egregious miſtakes (50). Nay he proceeds ſo far as to aſſure us, that with regard to Hiſtory Ar- noldus, notwithſtanding the opinion of the world con- cerning his abilities in that reſpect, knew the leaſt of all mankind: Sed hiſtoriarum tamen, inquis, apprimè peritus fuit: immo verò mortalium omnium, meo quidem judicio, ignariſſimus. He tells us, that it would be an infinite labour to give a detail of his miſtakes in point of Hiſtory; which taſk had been already undertaken by ſeveral Authors, whom he mentions. He obſerves likewiſe, that Arnoldus frequently quotes Books, which are not to be found in nature. Illud autem lepidum eſt, quod Arnoldus ſæpe libros excitat teſtimonii cauſa, quos fruſtra in rerum natura requiras (51).

[R] In which he gives an account of the doctrines and manners of the Chriſtians of the firſt Ages of Chriſtianity, and frequently animadverts upon Dr. Cave's Primitive Chriſtianity.] It is intitled Erſte Liebe &c. i. e. Primitive Love, or, A true Image of the primitive Chriſtians. The third Edition is enlarged by the addition of marginal references, and the Author's de- fence of the work. Francfort, 1712. It has like- wiſe been tranſlated into Low-Dutch, and was pub- liſhed at Amſterdam, in 1700, with a great number of Cuts. Since the third Edition in folio, we have had two Editions more of this work, publiſhed at Leipſick, in large quarto. It is a large work divided into VIII Books; the firſt of which treats of the Duties obſerved by the primitive Chriſtians towards God; the ſecond of their public and private manner of worſhip; the third of the Cuſtoms and the Duties practis'd by them towards others of the ſame Religion; the fourth of the Cuſtoms and Duties practiſed towards each other; the fifth of their Behaviour towards the wicked and pro- fane; the ſixth of their private and domeſtick Life; the ſeventh of their Graces and miraculous Gifts; and the eighth of the Degeneracy of Chriſtianity (52). Arnoldus tells us, that he was induced by reading Dr. Cave's Primitive Chriſtianity, or the Religion of the ancient Chriſtians in the firſt Ages of the Goſpel, publiſh'd in Low-Dutch at Utrecht in 1692, in 8vo, to treat that ſubject in a more extenſive and accurate manner; and he urges ſome objections againſt the Doctor's performance, which are as follow: Having (ſays he) diligently peruſed this work of Dr. Cave's, I found ſeveral things in it, which certainly require a more narrow examination. . . . . In general he aſcribes many things to the primitive Chriſtianity, which were the fruits of a ſecret corruption already ſtealing in upon the Chriſtian Religion, to which he was, without doubt, miſled by the following and other the like prejudices. 1. Becauſe he took it for granted that the ſtate of the preſent Church, eſpecially of the Engliſh Church, had a reſemblance to the Primitive Apoſtolical Church. 2. Be- cauſe he had conceived a very wrong idea of the ſtate of the Church in the time of Conſtantine the Great. He ima- gines the Church was at that time, after the perſecu- tions, in a flouriſhing ſtate; and therefore draws the moſt of his arguments from the fourth Century. He approves, nay admires, the external pomp and magnificence, which was then introduced in coſtly building of Churches, Lordly Titles of Biſhops, numerous ceremonies &c. . . . . Beſides this, there ſeem to be ſeveral other things which Dr. Cave relates as belonging to Primitive Chriſtiani- ty, which require ſome animadverſions. Many things are crept in which manifeſtly partake of ſuperſtition, hypocriſy, and an abuſe of Religion; and, on the other hand, many uſeful and neceſſary things, which ap- pertain to Primitive Chriſtianity, are wanting. He ſeldom or never brings any of his evidences from the Word of God, in the New Teſtament, excepting where the matter in queſtion is ſome external ordinance. Se- veral of the moſt material points of Primitive Chriſtia- nity he has either wholly omitted, or elſe only juſt hint- ed at them, and for the reſt referred to certain writ- ings of his countrymen, which are rarely to be met with (ſc. in Germany.) And thus leaves his readers (eſ- pecially foreigners) in the dark. Not to mention, that in moſt things he ſets aſide the internal real eſſence of Religion, and only ſeeks to eſtabliſh the opinions and ceremonies of his own Church, as Beveridge and others have done before him. . . . . I do not (continues Ar- noldus) ſay this to depreciate the honour due to this ex- cellent man; but only out of a pure love to truth, Quæ magis amica eſſe debet. Neither will nor can I pretend to have hit the mark in all things. Many things relating to this ſubject are yet unknown to me, and many I have but known in part; but what enquiries I have been able to make, I have to the beſt of my power communicated. Another Author forms a very different judgment of this Book of Arnoldus. We find (ſays he) in this work an excellent Apparatus of extraordinary inſtances of the piety, devotion and orthodoxy of the Pri- mitive Chriſtians, which may be of excellent uſe in Ho- milies and otherwiſe. This work may likewiſe be re- garded as a proper introduction to an Eccleſiaſtical Hi- ſtory, and reading of the Fathers. Not to mention the principal aim of it, which is rightly to form our wills and manners, and to enable us to conceive a ſound judgment of ſome practices of the modern Church.

[S] But his grand performance was his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.] It is intitled Unpartheiiſche Kirchen- und Ketzer-Hiſtorie von Anfang des Neuen Teſtaments, biſs auf das Jahr; i. e. " An impartial Hiſtory of the " Church and of Hereticks, from the beginning of " the New Teſtament, to the year 1688." It was printed at Francfort, in fol. 1699 and 1700, and in Low- Dutch at Amſterdam in 1701. It has ſince been re- printed three times, with the Supplements, Emenda- tions, to the reſentments of the Divines. In 1701 he publiſhed an Apology for himſelf with relation to the public worſhip of God, and the receiving of the Lord's Supper (p). The ſame

tions, Illuſtrations, &c. at Francfort and Leipſick, in four volumes in 4to, a very large paper and ſmall type *. The ſubject of it is very extenſive; but the three laſt parts of it are much ampler than the firſt (53); for it conſiſts of four parts. The firſt part contains fifteen Books, which include a ſhort Hiſtory of fifteen Centuries. The ſecond part which is much more copious, contains the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth Books; the former of which repreſents the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the ſixteenth Century in the following chapters. 1. Of the German Emperors and Popes of Rome. 2. Of the religious Wars and other events of that kind in that age. 3. Of the War of Smalcald. 4. Of the other Wars of the Proteſtants againſt the Emperor, and among themſelves, and alſo of one or two religious Pacifications. 5. Of the ſtate of the Papacy before Luther, and of the Inſtruments and Authors of the Reformation, and particularly of Luther. 6. Of the manner, deſign, and other circumſtances relating to the Reformation. 7. Of the other circumſtances of times and places. 8. Of the Impediments of the Reformation, eſpecially perſecutions and apoſtaſies. 9. Of the ſtate of the Lutheran Church within itſelf. 10. Of the ſcholaſtic and eccleſiaſtical Affairs of the Lutherans. 11. Of the Manner of catechizing, Sermons, and publick Worſhip of God among the Lutherans. 12. Of the eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, Rights, and Ceremonies. 13. Of Corruptions in general ſince the Reformation. 14. Of the State and Lives of the Miniſters of the Church in particular. 15. Of the other Corruptions of the Doctors of the Church. 16. Of the Corruptions among the Hearers, as well the Civil Magiſtrates as the Subjects. 17. Of Councils. 18. Of the Creeds and Confeſſions of Faith, eſpecially among the Lutherans. 19. Of the other Sects of Chriſtians, and the ſtate of them, and firſt in general of Enthuſiaſts, and particularly Caroloſtadius. 20. Of the Swencfeldian Controverſies. 21. Of the Anabaptiſts. 22. Of Theophraſtus Paracelſus, Poſtellus, Puccius, Ochinus, Agrippa, Staupitius, Guttelius, Vergerius, B. Rhenanus, R. Agricola, Eraſmus, Caſtellio, Jerom Cardan, as they were all of them Indifferentiſts. 23. Of the divine Prophecies, Dreams, Viſions, &c. of Hilten, Mellerſtad, Weller, &c. 24. Of the Diſputes of the Lutherans among themſelves, and firſt of that of Oſiander and Stancarus. 25. Of the Antinomians. 26. Of thoſe, who embraced the Interim, and the maintainers of indifferent points. 27. Of the followers of Major. 28. Of the Synergiſts. 29. Of the followers of Flacius. 30. Of Samuel Huber and ſome others. 31. Of thoſe who are called the Reformed. 32. Of thoſe, who are called Calviniſts. 33. Of the Socinians. 34. Of the other Sects of Papiſts, Greeks, Jews, &c. Book xvii. C. 1. Of the outward ſtate of Chriſtians, and particularly of the Wars raiſed on account of Religion. 2. Of Perſecutions on account of Religion. 3. Of the ſeveral perſons, who changed their Religion, particularly Beſoldus, Hunnius, Bertius, Scioppius, Lipſius, Wowerius, Holſtenius, Lambecius, Kircher, Nihuſius, Frommius, &c. 4. Of the Conferences and Synods at Ratiſbon, Leipſic, &c. 5. Of the State of the Lutherans of that Age in general. 6. Of their Conteſts among themſelves. 7. Of the ſtate of the Reformed in that Age. 8. Of the Arminians. 9. Of the other Schiſms and Diviſions among the Reformed. 10. Of the Carteſians and Cocceians. 11. Of the Syncretiſts. 12. Of the Anabaptiſts. 13. Of the Socinians. 14. Of the Papiſts, Janſeniſts, Followers of Father Arnaud, &c. 15. Of the Religion of the Greeks, the Nations converted, and the State of the Jews. 16. Of the Atheiſts, Naturaliſts, Deiſts, and Latitudinarians. 17. Of thoſe called Enthuſiaſts, and particularly of Val. Weigelius. 18. Of the Roſæcrucians. 19. Of Jacob Behmen. 20. Of the Quakers. 21. Of the Followers of Labadee. The third and fourth parts are a continuation of the ſame work. Part iii. C. 1. Of Giles Guthman, Lautenſack, Barth, Solei, &c. 2. Of H. Cunrade, Julius Sperber, and Matth. Weier. 3. Of Paul Kaim. 4. Of Eſ. Stiefelius, and Ez. Meth. 5. Of Nagelius and Felgenhaver. 6. Of Cornhirt, Coolhaeſen, Kerbert, Stuart, Euſebius Meiſner, Torrentius, Weitſius, Boreel, &c. 7. Of Iſ. Peirerius, the Pre-Adamites, and the Illuminated. 8. Of Helmont, Browne, Campanella, &c. 9. Of J. A. Werdenhagen, Franckenberg, and Tſcheſch. 10. Of Jo. Bannier, Phil. Zeigler, Friedeborn, Giffthеil, Hogeria, Lohman, and Teting. 11. Of Peter Moritz, Kozak, Reger, and other Adepts. 12. Of Rathman, Weida, Neuwald, and Nicholas. 13. Of A. Fuhrman, A. Held, Potinius, Betkius, Howburg, and Seldenbecher. 14. Of Stenger and Amerſbach. 15. Of J. Laubenius, Th. Tant, Raſelius, Fr. Breckling, Blockius, Richter, Granendorf, Barthut, &c. 16. Of Anthoinette Bourignon, Peter Poiret, &c. 17. Of the Quietiſts. 18. Of Franc. Joſeph Borrhi, the Followers of Pajon, the Conſcientiarians, the new Manicheans, &c. 19. Of Quirinus Kuhlman. 20. Of the extraordinary events of this age in general. 21. Of the Revolutions till the year 1620. 22. Continuation of the ſame till 1630. 23. Continuation of them till 1640. 24. Continuation of them till the end of that Century, and particularly of the Prophecies of Nic. Drabitius. 25. Of the Jo. Kothius, & Ulſtadius. 26. Of the Viſions of Joachim Greulichius. 27. Of the Revelations of Anne Vetteria. Then follows the fourth part, which contains two Sections: Sect. 1. Of ſeveral fragments of the ancient Hereſies. Sect. 2. Of Supplements to the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the 16th Century. We meet here with ſeveral pieces, which were never publiſhed before, particularly An Hiſtorical Relation concerning John Frederic the Elector, Maurice, and Auguſtus from the MS. of Ratzeburg. Sect. 3. contains ſeveral pieces of the ſame kind. We find here the Hiſtory of Zeaman. To theſe are ſubjoined ſeveral Additions, among which is an Anſwer to the Wittemberg Diſputation concerning Arnoldus's Errors in Hiſtory &c. with a Letter of Peterſen. Arnoldus mentions the occaſion of his writing this Hiſtory in the following paſſage: Whereupon (ſc. after having publiſhed his True Image of the Primitive Chriſtians) ſeveral other promoters of hiſtorical truth would admit of no denial, till I engaged in the preſent undertaking of A regular and continued Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and this they thought the more neceſſary, as, in the aforementioned treatiſe I had, indeed, given the image of a true Chriſtian; but, for want of time and room, had left the anti-type, or character of a falſe depraved Chriſtian, in ſome meaſure, unfiniſhed and imperfect. I ſhould however not have been perſuaded to engage in ſo large an undertaking, as it had then pleaſed God to direct my mind more and more from ſuch a diverſity of thoughts, to the only neceſſary one, had not the chief materials, which I had been collecting for many years before, lain ready before me. This chiefly induced me to purſue this work, and, to the utmoſt of my power, to bring it to perfection at my leiſure hours; that theſe things might be illuſtrated, in their proper order of time, by a regular hiſtorical narration; and thereby the riſe, progreſs, and higheſt pitch, together with every circumſtance of the myſtery of wickedneſs, as well as of that of piety, become as viſible as evidence can make them. See Præf. p. 1. §. VIII.

* The two laſt editions, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt correct, are of Franckfort 1729, and Leipſick 1732.

(53) Idem, pag. 133, &c.

Cleras obſerves (54), that his method and diviſion of this work are ſo juſt, that ſcarce any objection can be made to it. We ſhall give an account of his deſign, and the execution of it in the Author's own words. As for my method, I have thought it moſt conducive to my main end, in the Hiſtory of each Century (excepting the two laſt, by reaſon of the number and diſparity of them) to introduce firſt of all upon the ſtage all thoſe Authors, Teachers and Perſons themſelves, from whom I have chiefly borrowed my intelligence, and by whom theſe Comedies or Tragedies which follow were, as I may ſay, put in action, that a knowledge of them may give the neceſſary life to all that follows. I next ſhew the actions themſelves, ſo as they ſubſiſt in the œconomical or church-rites, ceremonies, ordinances, and the whole external and internal condition and fate of the Church, according to its encreaſe and decreaſe, perſecution or tranquillity, diſtreſſed or flouriſhing ſtate. I then proceed to the Synods, Councils, and other tranſactions which have had any connection with the affairs of ſame year he publiſhed at Hall the Lives of the Faithful, in which he gives a particular account of Luther, Arndt, and others [T]. The year following he wrote his Göttliche Liebes-Funcken, &c. i. e. "Divine Sparks of Love, proceeding from the great Fire of "the Love of God in Jeſus Chriſt," printed at Francfort in 12mo, which is a myſtical or devotional piece in verſe (q). The ſame year he publiſhed his defence of Clemens Romanus's Recognitions [U]. His Geheimniſs des Göttlichen Sophia, &c. otherwiſe entitled, Sophia, oder Geheimniſs der Göttlichen Weisſheit. i. e. "Sophia, or, the Myſtery of "Godly Wiſdom," was printed at Leipſic in 8vo 1700, and at Amſterdam in Low-Dutch in 1702. This Work has been long out of print. In the ſecond Chapter of this book he endeavours to prove, that the Book of Wiſdom, and that of Jeſus the ſon of Sirach are parts of canonical Scripture (r). In 1702 he publiſhed his Hiſtory of Myſtical Divinity [W]. And the ſame year he wrote a Treatiſe concerning the celibacy and married ſtate of the primitive Chriſtians [X]. of Religion, with the controverſies, which have thereupon enſued, together with the whole Hiſtory of Hereticks. And, laſtly, I have not omitted an account of the ſtate and conduct of thoſe ſecular Rulers, who have had any concern in affairs of the Church, and likewiſe of thoſe of other more remote Nations and Sects, as Jews, Heathens, Turks, &c. who are not reckoned in the external Communion of the Church, as far as they can give any light to Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and the entire harmony and connected paralleliſm of it, with reſpect to times, places and the like. Ibid. §. XI and XII. This work of his alarmed the Divines extremely, who immediately publiſhed a prodigious number of Books and Pamphlets in anſwer to it. Colerus in his fifth Section has given an account of the principal of them, which would be too tedious to inſert here. Arnoldus at firſt ſeemed to treat his adverſaries with contempt, and applied to them only as it were occaſionally; but afterwards he publiſhed a formal defence of himſelf at Francfort in 1703-4, and 1716, intitled, Supplementa, Illuſtrationes, und Emendationes zur Verbeſſerung. i. e. "Supplements, Il-"luſtrations, and Emendations for the improvement "of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, &c." This work is out of print ſeparate, but is reprinted and added to the latter editions of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. There are ſeveral new pieces inſerted in this work, as particularly Theophraſtia, Valentiniana, ſeveral Letters never publiſhed before, the Life of John Labbadie, &c. There are likewiſe ſubjoined, Juſt Remarks upon the Controverſies which have ariſen concerning Arnoldus's Hiſtory of the Church and Hereticks. And likewiſe A Conſideration of Zacharias Gotz's Animadverſions upon Arnoldus's Hiſtory of the Church and Hereticks, in which is ſhewn, that he has but curſorily read over the whole work, and therefore has always miſſed his aim, and ſhot in the dark: and that he has every where ſhewn not only his partiality and want of reading; but has more eſpecially diſcovered, by the weakneſs of his reaſoning, that he is no competent judge of the Hiſtory of the Church and Heretics, and would therefore have done much better to have left that taſk to others, and have employed his time to more advantage otherwiſe. In 1709 he publiſhed at Francfort a general Defence of his Hiſtory intitled Arnoldi Hiſtoriſch-Theologiſche Betrachtungen merkwürdiger Wahrheiten, &c. i. e. "Arnold's Hiſtorical "and Theological Obſervations on ſome memorable "Truths, &c." This work is now ſo ſcarce, that it is not to be had for any price. We have however been ſo fortunate as to procure a copy of it, which gives us a very different idea of Arnoldus from what Colerus would have his readers conceive of him. It is divided into five parts; to theſe the Author had added a VIth and a VIIth, which were found after his death, among his papers in manuſcript, and which (ſays the Author of his Life in High-German) will be made uſe of upon another occaſion.

[T] In which he gives a particular account of Luther, Arndt, and others.] It is intitled, Leben der Glaubigen, &c. i. e. "The Lives of the Faithful, in the two "laſt Centuries." Halle, 1718, and 1732. He gives an account in the piece of the Helvetian Hermit Nicholas, John a Cruce, Thereſia, Peter de Alcantara, Catharine of Genoa, Angela of Foligni, John Franc. de Chantal, Francis Sales, Luther, Arndt, John Janeway, Joſeph Allen, Theodore à Brakel, John Bunyan, Theodore Untereyck, John James Fabricius, John Thamſſen, George Freſen, Cl. Brouſſon, &c (55).

[U] His Defence of Clemens Romanus's Recognitions.] It was publiſhed in a Preface to them, at Berlin, in 8vo. 1702. and intitled, Des heiligen Clementis Hiſtorie, &c. i. e. "The Hiſtory of St. Clement, or, The Travels and Diſcourſes of St. Peter, the Apoſtle. He tranſlated likewiſe all the other Works of that Father, and publiſhed them at Lunenburg in 1695. Chriſtian Thomaſius obſerves, that theſe Recognitions of Clemens are full of ſo many Fables, Abſurdities, and Impieties, that he could not but wonder, that Arnoldus could poſſibly recommend in ſo ſerious a manner the German tranſlation of them. Certe Libri Recognitionum Clementis tot fabulis, ineptiis & impietatibus repleti ſunt, ut ſatis mirari nequeam, qua ratione Arnoldus earum verſionem Germanicam tam ſerio commendare potuerit (36).

performances are to be commended for the pains, which he has taken in collecting and comparing a great variety of arguments and opinions, and furniſhing the publick with ſeveral curious paſſages and fragments, but that we ought to be very cautious in truſting him, whenever his own hypotheſes come in queſtion. That he has introduced a great many excellent obſervations of the higheſt advantage to a religious life, tho' he has frequently taken them from Authors of no great credit, and inſerted ſeveral myſtical expreſſions, which are abſolutely impertinent and unintelligible. That ſome other works of his are full of fables and ſuperſtitions, which his prejudices raſhly led him into. In ſhort that moſt of his Books are ſtrongly tinctured with fanaticiſm (5). for both [Z]. To conclude, ſo various are the opinions concerning Arnoldus in Germany, that nothing is more common than to hear ſome of his own countrymen and profeſſion extol him to the ſkies, as the Saint of the laſt Century, and ſet an ineſtimable value upon his works, while others damn him almoſt beyond the poſſibility of God's mercy, as an Arch-Heretick, and condemn his writings as heterodox (t).

(t) In this article we are extremely obliged to the ingenious Mr. Thomas Lediard, Author of the Hiſtory of the Naval Tranſactions, for ſeveral curious obſervations.

[Z] And profeſſes to have a very great eſteem for both.] What this great man thought of Arnoldus and his works cannot be better expreſſed than in his own words, as we find them in his Notification of two Collegiate Lectures to be publickly read by him upon the Fourth Part of his fundamental Doctrine, p. 7, 8, 9, 10.

" It were to be wiſhed (ſays he) that we had ſo " faithful an account either of the whole, or of the " greater part, of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the New " Covenant, as we have of the Church Hiſtory of the " Old Covenant; but the New Teſtament, as far as " it concerns the Hiſtory of the Church, hardly deſ- " cends in the Acts to the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem. " The tranſactions which enſued, as they are handed " down to us, are ſtuffed with fables, pretended mi- " racles, groundleſs accuſations of hereſy, and other " the like falſe relations. The Centuriatores Magde- " burgenſes and other Hiſtorians of the Proteſtant Re- " ligion, ſince the Reformation, inſtead of purging " theſe relations of all the fabulous ſtories contained " in them, have interſperſed them throughout with " new partialities of their own: every Writer aim- " ing only to juſtify the tenets and actions of his own " ſect or party, and to blacken thoſe of others. In " vain therefore did we long ſigh after an Impartial " Hiſtory of the Church, till a few years ſince, Mr. " Arnold publiſhed his Hiſtory of the Church and of " Hereticks, in two volumes in folio. But as this Au- " thor has written with a great deal of freedom, " and has very evidently diſcovered the Ratio Status, " and intrigues of the Clergy in every Sect, we muſt " not wonder, if it has met with many enemies, who, " ſub ſpecie Zeli divini (which for many Ages has " been a cover for much iniquity) have ſpoken and " diſputed againſt it; tho' hitherto, with ſo little ſuc- " ceſs, as has tended to their own ſhame and confu- " ſion. For my part I ſhall not pretend to be a " judge in the caſe; but as, in the Republick of " Letters, every man is allowed to declare his ſenti- " ments, I hope no man will impute it to an arro- " gancy in me, if upon this occaſion I give mine. " In my opinion then the abovementioned Eccleſiaſtical " Hiſtory of Mr. Arnold's is, next to the Holy Scrip- " ture, the beſt and moſt uſeful book that ever was " penned of this kind, (in hoc ſcribendi genere.) I " make no manner of ſcruple therefore to recommend " the ſerious peruſal of it, in the moſt earneſt manner, " to all my auditors; even tho' their circumſtances " ſhould be ſo ſtreighten'd, that in order to purchaſe it " they ſhould be obliged to deprive themſelves of ſome " part of the neceſſaries of life, or be indebted for it " to the benevolence of ſome well-diſpoſed perſons. And " tho' I do not wholly agree with him, in ſome points, " yet the differences between us are ſo trivial, that " I hardly eſteem them worthy of being mentioned " here, tho' I may perhaps diſcuſs them in my Lec- " tures. In the mean time, I think proper to de- " clare, that I have read whatever his Antagoniſts " have hitherto publiſhed againſt this work, and that " I find nothing in them that has any way weakened " the main deſign and eſſential points of it." On the contrary, I am rather of opinion, that Mr. Arnold has, with great ſtrength of argument, anſwered all the objections hitherto urged againſt it. Nay, I am fully convinced, that the greater number of thoſe perſons, who perhaps at the inſtigation of others have thought this treatiſe dangerous, and tainted with a latent poiſon, will, upon a more candid peruſal of it (if they are not over-whelmed beyond recovery in the prejudice of human authority) conceive a very different and more juſt opinion of it. I deſire, however, that what I have here ſaid, may be look'd upon only as a recital of my private judgment of Mr. Arnold's work, concerning which I ſhall not enter into a diſpute with any one. (De guſtibus non eſt diſputandum.) If the judgment (non ſententiam judicialem, ſed judicium intellectus) I have formed in this particular be agreeable to the taſte of ſober and prudent men, of whatever Religion they may be, whether Clergy or Lay-men, I am ſatisfied: but if not, it will be no uneaſineſs to me; my corrupt taſte can prejudice no body but myſelf, &c.

In another work, entitled Dr. Melchior von Oſſe's Teſtament, &c. reprinted in the year 1717, with Notes and Remarks, for the uſe of Thomaſius's Auditory, p 343; the ſame illuſtrious Author gives his thoughts of Arnold's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory in the following manner: And he who has but ever ſo little inſight into the Arcana Papiſmi Politica, will eaſily conceive why the ſtudy of Hiſtory has been hitherto ſo neglected, till at length, in the laſt Century, it began to break thro' the cloud it had been covered with, particularly in Prophane Hiſtory, in Holland; and towards the concluſion of it, Arnold, in Germany, opened the eyes of the Laity by his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; but, at the ſame time, it raiſed a ſpirit of indignation in ſeveral Nations and Sects againſt him, which is yet kept up amongſt them after his death. During the publication of this work, I had an opportunity of making many obſervations, which convinced me that the particular hand of Providence directed it. The pious Author obliged me with the peruſal of the firſt four Centuries, before they were printed, and, I muſt confeſs, I found ſo many truths hitherto unknown, and ſo many evidences of the politital ſupports and relicks, which remain to this day among us, that I began to be concerned, nay even anxious for the welfare of my friend. They ſeemed to me to be of ſuch a nature, that they would be a ſtumbling-block to the very Proteſtant Profeſſors; and I knew by experience, of what dangerous conſequence it was for a man to have the Odium Theologicum upon his back, of which Melancthon in his time juſtly complained. After he had ſhewn me what he had written of the 16th and 17th Centuries, my anxiety for him encreaſed. I found ſo many bitter, tho' ſalutiferous potions, as well for the Calviniſts as the Lutherans, I believed that they would never be brought to ſwallow them, and I could not be perſuaded but the publiſhing of this work muſt and would bring the Editor, as well as the Author, into trouble. Yet we ſee it has eſcaped, and the Hand of God has powerfully protected it. And tho' I do not pretend to idolize either Arnold or his work; but, on the contrary, am ſenſible they have both been liable to many human frailties; yet I look upon him to be a peculiar inſtrument of God to open our eyes, that thro' him we may evidently ſee very groſs remains of Political Popery amongſt us, and be ſollicitous how to aboliſh them. And thus, I verily believe, that Poſterity towards the concluſion of this Century, will celebrate a Jubilee to the honour of Arnold's memory, as they have already done to the honour of Luther, and other great Reformers of the Church. That we have reaſon to do ſo, is to me very evident, ſince our temporal and eternal welfare, as well as the real intereſt of the ſecular Magiſtrates, depends as much upon the truths diſcovered by Arnold, as upon thoſe brought to light by Luther. T.

ARNOLDUS (NICHOLAS) Profeſſor in Divinity at Franeker, was born at Leſna, a city of Poland, December the 17th 1618. His mother being left a widow when he was but three years old, took all imaginable care of his education and devoted him to letters. He performed his ſtudies of Humanity in the College of Leſna, amongſt other Tutors, under Comenius, who taught at that time to his ſcholars his own Janua Linguarum. He was created Sub-Deacon (a) to the Synod of Oſtrorog, at the age of fifteen years: and, in that quality, he accompanied Orminius (b) for two years in his viſitation of the Churches of Poland; after which, he was ſent to Dantzick, in 1635, and applied applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Eloquence and Philoſophy. He ſometimes raiſed the diſpleaſure of John Botſac, who was concerned that ſo hopeful a young man was a Calviniſt. He returned into Poland in 1638, and applied himſelf to that part of Divinity, which relates to Sermons, under the direction of Orminius; and a year after he was ſent into Podolia to be Rector of the School of Jablonow. Having exerciſed that employment three months, he performed the office of a Miniſter the two following years in a Nobleman's houſe (c). As it was obſerved that his talents might be of great ſervice to the Church, it was thought proper to give him opportunities of cultivating them in the moſt famous Academies. He began his travels in 1641. He firſt went to Franeker, and there made great progreſs under his countryman Maccovius, and under Cocceius. He was at the Univerſities of Groningen, Leyden, and Utrecht, in 1643, and in a little while returned to Franeker, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of French and Engliſh. The next year he took a voyage into England; and not being able to go to Oxford, becauſe all the roads were filled either with the King's Troops, or thoſe of the Parliament, he went on foot to Cambridge. But he could not there hear one Lecture in Divinity, all the Profeſſors being impriſoned in Trinity College. Upon his return to Franeker he applied himſelf to preaching, even in Dutch, and his Sermons were ſo highly approved, that in order to keep him in Frieſland, he was diſſuaded from going to reviſit Poland. He was judged highly capable of the Miniſtry by the claſs of Franeker, who examined him, and the commendations which were given him, readily determined a young Gentlewoman of the country to marry him [A]. He married her in 1645, and a little after he was called to the Church of Beetgum. He ſerved it faithfully and conſtantly till the year 1651, without lending an ear to the invitations which were made to him by other Churches; but in that year he yielded to the inſtances of the eſtates of Frieſland, who made choice of him to ſucceed Cocceius in the office of Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker (d). He diſcharged that office with great ſucceſs until his death, which happened the 15th of October 1680, after a long illneſs, in which he gave a great many inſtances of his piety and reſignation to the Divine Will (e). I ſhall ſpeak of ſome journies which he took after his promotion to the Divinity Profeſſorſhip [B]; and I ſhall not forget the books which he publiſhed [C].

☞ARNULPHUS

[A] The Commendations which were given him readily determined a young Gentlewoman .... to marry him.] This we learn from the Author of his Funeral Oration. Fecit paulo poſt, ſays he (1), tanta omnium laus, ut nobiliſſima in Friſiis virgo Remigia à Nitzen facilis in conjugales ejus rueret amplexus, anno 1645. i. e. "So univerſal a commendation had this effect, "that after a little while a young Lady of a noble fa- "mily in Frieſland, whoſe name was Remigia a Nit- "zen, readily agreed to marry him in the year 1645." This Lady was in the right to prefer merit and a good reputation to riches. There are other inſtances of a choice of that nature; for it is certain that ſeveral Miniſters ſupported merely by the reputation of their eloquence, or learning, have obtained very lucrative matches, and which were on the other hand highly advantageous by the rank of the families, into which they married. What could give more plauſible grounds for hope, that ſuch perſons might be raiſed one time or other, either to Profeſſorſhips of diſtinction, or ſuch as were conſiderable for their annual ſalaries? However that be, our Arnoldus's ſpouſe deſerved to be commended. She died at the beginning of the year 1652, and left him no children. He married again an Advocate of Leeuwarden's widow, whoſe name was Anne Pybinga, the daughter of a Burgomaſter of Franeker, by whom he had nine children, five ſons (2) and four daughters, and ſhe ſurvived him. He had but three ſons and one daughter alive, when he died (3).

[B] He took ſome journeys after his promotion to the Divinity Profeſſorſhip.] He went to ſee his relations at Leſna, in 1652, and ſpent a Month agreeably with his Uncle by the mother's ſide, Martin Gertichius, Miniſter of the place, and famous for ſeveral works. He took another voyage, in 1656, in the retinue of the four Embaſſadors extraordinary, which the States General ſent to the King of Sweden, and the King of Poland. Their Excellencies would have him for their Preacher, and were highly ſatisfied with the Sermons which he preached in Dutch, German, or Poliſh, as occaſions offered. This journey laſted two years. Arnoldus during that time gained to himſelf very great eſteem, from the Chancellor of Poland, Stephen Corycinſki; from the Grand Marſhal of Sweden, John Oxenſtiern; from the General of the Troops, Douglas; and from the Elector of Brandenbourg, who made him an offer of the place of Preacher to the Court. He was ſent to Heidelberg in 1666, to engage Mr. Spanheim to accept of a Profeſſorſhip in Divinity, in the Academy of Franeker, and returned without ſucceſs.

[C] I ſhall not forget the Books which he publiſhed.] I ſhall ſay nothing of the diligence wherewith he collected and put in order Maccovius's Works, which he put to the preſs, nor of the Verſion which he made and publiſhed, of an Engliſh Book of Jeremiah Dyke (4), but I ſhall take notice of his refutation of the Catechiſm of the Socinians, his Anti-Bidellus, his Anti-Echardus, his Book againſt Brevingius, his Apology for Arneſius againſt Erbermann the defender of Bellarmin, his Theological Diſputes on ſelect ſubjects, his Commentary on the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, his Lux in tenebris, and what he publiſhed againſt John Amos Comenius. Read, concerning theſe Works, this paſſage of his Funeral Oration: Quis eſt qui non .... prædicet Raccovianæ Catecheſeos, in qua religionis dicam an impietatis Socinianæ pleniſſimum eſt compendium, curatiſſimam refutationem, quæ ſupra fidem impiis ſeductoribus moleſta, doctis grata eſt? Cujus non laudem meretur tum Anti-Bidellus, quo Pneumatomachi furorem & fatuam Comenii (5) lucem extinxit? tum Anti-Echardus, cujus conquiſitum & male colligatum faſciculum ita diſſolvit, ut diſſolutarum ſcoparum hactenus retinuerit nomen? Imo quem non in mille detorſionum tenebris ineffabiliter delectat doctiſſimarum illa vindiciarum lux, quam publico toties recuſam dedit, & cujus ope tuta Eccleſia errorum evitat devia? ſed ne in hoc quidem labore acquieſcere potuit qui in Eccleſiæ voluit conſumi bonum. Brevingii ab eo tempore feliciter demolitus eſt tribunal, Erbermannum Bellarmino adverſus Ameſium ſuppetias ferentem confodit &c. (6). i. e. "What man is there that does not "extol his moſt accurate refutation of the Raccovian "Catechiſm, in which is contained the fulleſt com- "pendium of the Socinian Religion ſhall I call it, or "impiety; which refutation is prodigiouſly ungrate- "ful to wicked ſeducers, and grateful to men of learn- "ing? Whoſe praiſe does not his Anti-Bidellus deſerve, "in which he has diſtinguiſhed the fury of that re- "ſiſter of the Holy Spirit, and the falſe light of Co- "menius? His Anti-Echardus likewiſe is admired, "written againſt Echardus, whoſe carefully collected "and ill put together bundle of abſurdities he has ſo "taken to pieces, that it ſtill bears the name of Scopæ "diſſolutæ;

ARNULPHUS or ERNULPHUS, Biſhop of Rocheſter in the twelfth Century, was a Monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais, but left his monaſtry on account of the irregular lives which the Monks led there, and went to Lanfranc Archbiſhop, under whom he had ſtudied at the Abbey of Bec. He was for a long time only a private Monk in the monaſtry at Canterbury, but afterwards was made Prior of it by St. Anſelm, and then Abbot of Burck. At laſt in the year 1115 he was made Biſhop of Rocheſter, and held that See nine years. He died in 1124, being eighty four years of age (a). Father Luke Dacheri has publiſhed in the ſecond volume of his Spicilegium, two Treatiſes of this Biſhop written in the form of Letters [A]. There are ſeveral Letters of St. Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury to him ſtill extant, and mentioned by Poſſevinus in his Apparatus Sacer (b), and by Father Dacheri in his Preface to the ſecond volume of his Spicilegium (c). Mr. Wharton in the Preface to the firſt volume of his Anglia Sacra (d) tells us, that Ernulphus,

But this man, " who had wholly devoted himſelf to the ſervice of " the Church, could not reſt ſatisfied with having " done even ſo much, for after he demoliſhed the tri- " bunal of Brevingius, and deſtroyed Erberman, who " was giving aſſiſtance to Bellarmin againſt Ameſius, " &c." Here are ſeveral ANTI's which are not in Mr. Baillet's liſt.

[A] Two Treatiſes of this Biſhop, written in the form of Letters.] The firſt is intitled, Tomellus ſive Epiſtola Ernulfi ex Monacho Benedictino Epiſcopi Roffenſis de inceſtis Conjugiis; i. e. " A little Tract or the Epiſtle of " Ernulfus at firſt a Benedictine Monk, and after- " wards Biſhop of Rocheſter concerning inceſtuous mar- " riages." This letter was addreſſed to Waguelin Bp. of Windſor, in anſwer to a queſtion propoſed to him by that Biſhop in a converſation, which they had at Canterbury, upon this ſubject; Whether a woman, who had committed adultery with her huſband's ſon by a former wife, ought to be ſeparated from her huſband. Arnulphus maintained the affirmative, and the Biſhop to whom he wrote the negative. In this treatiſe he anſwers the objections urged by the Biſhop, by ſhewing, that all the paſſages of Scripture, in which there is a prohibition againſt ſeparating a man from his wife, ought to be underſtood only of a voluntary ſeparation between perſons, who are not guilty of adultery. He then confirms his own opinion by alledging, that the Biſhops in order to prevent diſorders, have frequently condemned adulterers to abſtain for ever after from the uſe of marriage; that this was the cuſtom of the Church; that this puniſhment is appointed in the Penitential Books: and that it is lawful to ſeparate on account of a ſpiritual alliance, tho' it be not excepted in Scripture as adultery is. He aſſerts, that it is by no means unjuſt to ſeparate an husband from his wife, tho' he be innocent of the fault, which ſhe has committed; and that there are ſeveral other cauſes, for which an husband is obliged to ſeparate himſelf from her. The ſecond Letter is addreſſed to one Lambert an Abbot, in anſwer to five queſtions propoſed to him. The firſt was, why the Euchariſt was then given in a different and almoſt contrary manner to that, which Jeſus Chriſt practiſed; ſince it was the cuſtom at that time to give the Hoſt dipt in the wine, whereas our Saviour gave his Body and Blood ſeparately. Arnulphus anſwers this queſtion, by alledging, that when Chriſt came into the world for the ſalvation of mankind, he preſcribed to them what was neceſſary to obtain that end, without mentioning the particular manner and circumſtances of his injunctions. Thus he did not ſay, Baptize in ſuch or ſuch a manner; dip the perſon whom you baptize, three or four times; but only baptize them. That by this means it is eaſy to know the things, which are abſolutely neceſſary, and thoſe, which may be ſometimes omitted or changed. That this is the reaſon why ſeveral practices, which were in uſe in the Primitive Church, had not been obſerved for a long time. That it is certain, for inſtance, that the Apoſtles received the Euchariſt after Supper, tho' now it is received faſting; that it was then celebrated upon a wooden table, tho' now it is offered upon an altar of ſtone; that the Bread then made uſe of was common Bread, but that now employed is formed into little thin cakes. There is no reaſon therefore to wonder, that the Bread is dipt in the Wine, tho' this practice was not formerly in uſe; ſince it is deſigned to prevent any accident in the diſtribution of the Wine alone, leſt any of it ſhould ſtick upon the beards of thoſe who communicate, or the Miniſter ſhould ſpill any of it. The ſecond queſtion is, why a fourth part of the Hoſt is put into the Chalice. He anſwers, that it was not the cuſtom to divide the Hoſt into four parts, but into three; and that the third part, which is put into the Chalice, was about as big as the fourth part of the Hoſt, tho' in ſome Churches they take care to divide the whole exactly into three. He obſerves, that this cuſtom was introduced, becauſe the Prieſt or Biſhop who celebrated, was obliged to communicate of that part, which he put into the Chalice, and to diſtribute the two others to the Deacon and Sub-deacon, who were preſent. He adds a myſtical reaſon for this practice; which is, that the Body of Jeſus Chriſt, which is offered upon the Altar, is the ſacrament or figure of the myſtical Body of Chriſt, which is the Church compoſed of three Orders, Superiors, Virgins, and married Perſons; or becauſe it repreſents the myſtery of the Trinity, or the three Eſtates of our Saviour, that of his mortality, his death, and his reſurrection. The third queſtion is, why the Blood of Chriſt is received ſeparately from his Body, and why it is adminiſtered without the Body. He anſwers, that thoſe, who receive the Sacrament in both kinds ſeparately, do it in imitation of Chriſt; and that tho' the Body of Chriſt is received entire under each ſpecies, yet each ſpecies is received ſeparately; becauſe our Saviour has diſtinguiſhed theſe two things, in order to repreſent to us by his Body, his Fleſh, and his Members, ſuch as they appeared ſolid and entire; and by his Blood that which was to be ſhed upon the Croſs. The fourth queſtion is, whether Jeſus Chriſt is received without a ſoul or animated. He anſwers firſt, that ſuch kind of queſtions are generally propoſed by perſons, who affect to appear learned, and endeavour to lay ſnares for the faith of the ſimple and unlearned, who believe with all proper humility and ſubmiſſion of mind whatever the Holy Ghoſt has taught them. That it is very proper not to engage in ſuch queſtions; that tho' we cannot comprehend how Bread and Wine are made the Body and Blood of Chriſt, yet we ought not to doubt of it, ſince Chriſt himſelf tells us, This is my Body, and this is my Blood. That it is a folly to endeavour to penetrate into the incomprehenſible Myſteries of our religion, eſpecially into that which is a Myſtery of faith. That it is certain, that the ſubſtance of the Bread and Wine is changed into the Body and Blood of Chriſt, tho' it appears to the ſenſe to be only Bread and Wine, and has all the qualities of thoſe ſubſtances. That as the qualities of Bread ſtill ſubſiſt in it, tho' the ſubſtance is deſtroyed, ſo we may affirm, that the qualities of Fleſh are not to be found there, tho' the ſubſtance of fleſh ſubſiſts in it. And therefore it is very improper to aſk, whether the Fleſh of Chriſt in the Euchariſt is dead or immortal; animated, or not animated. The fifth and laſt queſtion is, concerning the ſenſe of theſe words of the Prophet Joel, c. ii. v. 14. Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a bleſſing behind him &c.? He tells us that the change of God's determination conſiſts in the remiſſion of ſin, which he grants to thoſe, who repent and reform themſelves; and that the meaning of the word, leave a bleſſing behind him, is that he will bleſs thoſe, who follow him (1).

Ernulphus, who held the Biſhoprick of Rocheſter from the year 1114 to 1124, compiled a book concerning the foundation, endowment, charters, laws, and other things relating to the Church of Rocheſter, which Manuſcript is known to the Engliſh Antiquaries by the title of Textus Roffenſis. We ſhall give an account of the contents of it in the note [B] from Mr. Wharton, who obſerves, that Bale in his Centuries (e) has committed a very great miſtake in aſcribing ſeveral of the Works of Arnulphus or Arnoul Biſhop of Liſieux, and of Arnoul Abbot of Bonneval to our Arnulphus, and confounding him with Arnulphus the Preſbyter, who, as Platina tells us, was deſtroyed by the treachery of the Roman Clergy in the time of Pope Honorius II, for remonſtrating with great ſeverity againſt the vices and corruptions of the Court of Rome. For the latter was very different from our Biſhop of Rocheſter, who died before Honorius was raiſed to the See of Rome. Mr. Wharton has publiſhed the Manuſcript of Arnulphus in the firſt volume of his Anglia Sacra (f) under the following title; Ernulfi Epiſcopi Roffenſis Collectanea de Rebus Eccleſiæ Roffenſis; that is, "The Collection of Ernulfus Biſhop of Rocheſter concerning the affairs of the Church of Rocheſter." But Caſimir Oudin in his Commentarius de Scriptoribus & Scriptis Eccleſiaſticis (g) is of opinion, that our Arnulphus had no ſhare in this collection.

[B] We ſhall give an account of the contents of it in the note.] It contains ſeveral pieces written both in the Latin and Saxon Tongues, particularly the Laws of the Kings Ethelbert, Alfred, Guthrun, Edward, Edmund, and Ethelred, in Saxon; the Exorciſm of Ordeal; the Laws of King Canute, the Conſtitutions of King William I; Extracts from the Decrees of the Popes; Ordinances made by King Henry I, in the year 1101; the Succeſſion of the Popes and Roman Emperors, Patriarchs of Jeruſalem and the four Patriarchal Sees; the Names of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of England from St. Auguſtin the Monk, ranged according to their particular Sees, in Latin; Judgments of the City of London; the Genealogy of King Edward from Adam; the Genealogies of all the Kings during the Heptarchy in England, in Saxon; the Privileges, Charters, Ordinances, &c. of the Church of Rocheſter, in Latin and Saxon. There is no piece in this MS. later than the time of Arnulphus, except thirteen names in the Catalogue of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, and fifteen names in the Catalogue of the Biſhops of Rocheſter, which were added by other hands in different Ages, as appears from the characters and ink. For ſome perſon has added the names of ſix Biſhops, who ſucceeded Arnulphus; and ſome later hand added to them thoſe of nine other Biſhops, who followed them. To theſe we may add a few paſſages concerning the Actions of John and Aſcelinus Biſhops, which we find after folio 203. All the reſt appear to be coeval with our Arnulphus. T.

ARODON (BENJAMIN D') a German Jew, Author of a book full of precepts for the women. It has been tranſlated out of the German Language into Italian by Rabbi Jacob Alpron. This verſion was reprinted at Venice in 5412, according to the calculation of the Jews (a), after having been carefully corrected by the Rabbi Iſaac Levita. This book is very full of ceremonies to be obſerved not only with regard to the neatneſs of the body, but likewiſe for the practice of prayers and good works. The obſervances of the firſt order often contain little niceties, or ſuperſtitious regularities; and there is ſometimes a great deal of ſeverity in thoſe of the ſecond order [A]. This

(a) I believe that anſwers to our year 1652.

[A] There is a great deal of ſeverity in the rules contained in his Book.] For inſtance, it is ordered that a man and woman ſhall not ſay one word during the conjugal duty, and that they ſhall have none but pious thoughts, without any regard to pleaſure; and it is declared to them, that if they ſhould act in any other manner, their children would be deformed. Ogni perſona deve eſſer auvertita tanto l'huomo, come la donna, nel tempo che ſi congiungono inſieme non devono parlar, ne haver niun cattivo penſiere, ne debbano ſcoprire li luochi occulti e vergognoſi, perche quelli che parlano in quel tempo che ſi congiungono inſieme, quelle creatura che viene conceputa in quell' iſtante, riuſciſſe dal ventre della madre con qualche מקרה ò zoppo, ò muto, ò guercio, ò ſimili mancamenti, ò del tutto diſtrutto, e mal conditionato . . . . non devono haver intentione in quell' iſtante alli piaceri, ma ſolo per adempir il voler divino . . . . (1): ambidoi devono penſar in quelle iſtante, che queſto non lo fanno per il lor giovamento & adempir li lor appetiti carnali, ma ſolo per mantenir il precetto . . . ogn' huomo da bene sà quello, che devepenſare in quell' inſtante, perche ſi deve penſar ſolo à penſieri ſanti e pii (2). This rule is excellent and very rigid at the ſame time. See what is ſaid in the News from the Republick of Letters (3), concerning a Book of Mr. Yvon, Miniſter of the Labadiſtes. So great a degree of purity is one of thoſe kind of bleſſings, that it is eaſier to wiſh than to hope for; but the Caſuiſts are to be commended for inſiſting upon it, and endeavouring to introduce a purity where the rage of luſt and brutal concupiſcence have but too much influence. If our Rabbin had believed, as the Church of Rome does, that Marriage is a Sacrament, he could not have required that thoſe who partake of it ſhould have had more holy diſpoſitions than thoſe which he demands. He always impoſes upon them the Law of favete linguis (4), the obſervation whereof the Pagans recommended in their great myſteries, and that of ſurſum corda, which the primitive Church never forgot to take notice of in her moſt auguſt ceremonies. In one word, it is certain, that if this man had received with an entire faith the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, and had been influenced by the Spirit of Grace, he could not have given advice more worthy of the evangelical purity. This is enough to ſhame thoſe teachers of looſneſs of manners, who are ſo common among Chriſtians.

Note that the doctrine of this Rabbin does not at all agree with the advice of the Doctors in Phyſick. Theſe pretend that a child conceived under diſtractions of mind, I mean under a train of ſerious, grave, and ſpiritual contemplations, is ſimple, ſilly and weak (5); and give quite different directions to thoſe who are deſirous of children (6); but if we conſider ever ſo little, we muſt be of opinion, that they lead mankind to a very indifferent ſchool for chaſtity, their precepts are only calculated for ſuch people as are willing to confine all things to an animal, terreſtrial, ſenſual, Epicurean life. They ſhould go to ſchool to this Rabbin, who are deſirous of learning to behave themſelves in this part of their duty like creatures endowed with an immortal ſoul, and who would not render themſelves worthy of this cenſure,

A perſon

This will appear more plainly in the note which accompanies this Article.

A perſon will the better comprehend how excellent and ſublime the morality of this Jew is, if he does but recollect, that it is directly oppoſite to the maxims of thoſe teachers of corruption, who have crowded their Poems with ſo many luſcious precepts. Theſe dangerous poiſoners take care not to recommend ſilence; and it is that which has occaſioned a certain modern to find ſome proofs of an interpretation, which he has given to the words of a Greek Poet, which contain a deſcription of the Cave of the Nymphs. As for the agreeable murmur of which Homer ſpeaks, ſays he (8), they are undoubtedly thoſe endearing words of lovers, that ohi me cor mio of the Italians, the ζωὴ καὶ ψυχὴ of the Greeks, and that alma de mi alma of the Spaniards, which accompany the moſt familiar privacies, and which occaſioned the moſt knowing of all the Poets in the Art of Love to ſay:

(8) Hexameron Ruſtique, IV Journée, p. 112, & ſeq.

Accedant queſtus, accedat amabile murmur,
Et dulces gemitus, aptaque verba joco *.

* Ovid. lib. 2. ver. 723. de Arte Amandi.

" Her kind complaints, her melting accents hear,
" Whilſt with fond ſighs ſhe wounds the liſt'ning ear.

See how he ſpeaks of it in another place:

Et mihi blanditias dixit, dominumque vocavit;
Et quæ præterea publica verba juvant †.

† Lib. 3. Amorum Eleg. 6. ver. 2.

" The moving blandiſhments of ſound ſhe try'd,
" And my dear life, my ſoul, my all ſhe cry'd.

I need not tell you that the term juvare is throughly amatorial, and conſecrated to thoſe extremeſt delights of love, which the following two verſes of the ſame Author alſo expreſs, as well as the murmur:

Me voces audire juvat ſua gaudia faſſas
Utque morer, me, me, ſuſtineamque roget ‡.

‡ Lib. 2. de arte Amandi.

—— The famous Epithalamium of the Emperor Gallienus, which Trebellius Pollio thinks preferable to the performances of an hundred Poets, who alſo ſet themſelves to work upon the ſame ſubject, gives ſtill a moſt ſurprizing repreſentation of that hollow and endearing murmur, and thoſe careſſes that are inſeparable therefrom. It is ſuppoſed that taking hold of the hands of his brother's children, which he had married, he pronounced to them theſe verſes of his own compoſing:

Ite, ite, o pueri, pariter ſudate medullis.
Omnibus inter vos, non murmura veſtra columbæ,
Brachia non hederæ, non vincant oſcula conchæ.

It is certainly a difficult matter to ſay any thing more pathetick, or more paſſionate on the ſubject. To be diametrically oppoſite to theſe falſe teachers, to theſe peſts of youth, is a great encomium, and a true ſign that the precepts of morality, which are advanced, are of admirable purity. It is proper to add to all this, the judicious anſwer that was made by the famous Mr. Drelincourt to a Biſhop who had made uſe of a remark altogether unworthy, I won't ſay of a perſon of his character, but even of a layman, who had any diſlike of a wanton ſtyle. Inſtead of ſtriking out of his devotions, theſe are Mr. Drelincourt's words (9), theſe ways of ſpeaking, that the Virgin Mary is the Spirit and Life of Chriſtians, he defends them by ſuch railleries, as it would be better to leave to the people on the ſtage. As for you, ſays he, the Paſtors of the Proteſtant Church, who have dear partners; not only as accidents inſeparable from your ſubſtance, but as the bone of your bone and the fleſh of your fleſh; nay that are but one fleſh in two perſons, who are well called in other terms more endearing to thoſe ſouls of your ſouls, to thoſe lives of your lives, to thoſe lives of your hearts and your ſouls, to thoſe ſouls of your lives and your hearts, which the world underſtands not: for you are thoſe ſpiritual Beings, which judge the whole world, even the Angels; more particularly the Romans, without being capable of being judged of any. I don't know who has taught him ſuch fine flouriſhes, nor can I anſwer for what kind of diſcourſe may paſs amongſt thoſe perſons who make uſe of Courtezans. But a grave perſonage, who lives in a chaſte marriage, does not ſtudy ſuch an extravagant kind of Rhetorick. The Prelate replied to him in a manner as burleſque as poſſible (10).

ARRERAC (JEAN D') Counſellor to the Parliament of Bourdeaux, towards the end of the ſixteenth Century was the Author of a book, of which I ſhall ſay ſomething below [A].

[A] He was the Author of a Book, of which I ſhall ſay ſomething below.] The title of it was, La Philoſophie Civile & d'Eſtat, diviſée en l'Irénarchie & la Polémarchie, and was printed at Bourdeaux, by Simon Millanges, in 1598, in 8vo. It was to conſiſt of two volumes, whereof I have only ſeen the firſt (1). See what an idea the Author gives us of it (2). " I have " undertaken my ſubject upon the laws of the firſt " Book of the Pandects, which all the Doctors have " deſpiſed, either becauſe they did not underſtand " them, or becauſe they did not think they would " furniſh them with a great deal of chicanry, to " which they were more ready to ſubmit for the ſake " of the gain, which they expected therefrom, than " they were influenced by the love of virtue and ho- " nour. I find this Book ſo rich and fertile in good " laws, that I am greatly miſtaken if I don't ſhew in " mine that it contains the greateſt part of the laws " of Nature and Moral and Civil Philoſophy, with the " Order of the Roman Magiſtracies and Juriſdictions. " I have added to this firſt Book, the two firſt titles " of the ſecond, under which I have diſcourſed of " the rights of Juriſdiction, both according to the " Roman Government, our French right, and the " right of the Church; and of this law of Nature, " That whatſoever law a man would impoſe upon ano- " ther, he himſelf ſhould walk by the ſame law." This reſpects the firſt volume, or Irenarchy, that is to ſay the ſtate of peace: what follows, relates to his Polemarchy, that is to ſay, the ſtate of war. It was a ſmall Volume which contained in four Books, all the qualities and perfections of a General of an army, the wiles and ſtratagems of the ancient Captains, the methods of making the beſt uſe of occurrences in war, and of remaining conquerors after a victory obtained (3). This Author had read a great deal, and was not ſparing of quotations; but generally, he does not enlarge upon any thing: which is the reaſon that he has had room enough to ſpeak upon a great number of ſubjects. He claſhes pretty often with the greateſt Lawyers, Accurſius, Alciat, Budeus, Cujas, &c; and now and then he makes ſome very ſingular obſervations.

ARRIA, the name of ſeveral Roman Ladies, of which I ſhall ſpeak in the notes of the article PETUS.

☞ As Mr. Bayle has omitted to write the Article of Pætus, which he refers to for that of the celebrated ARRIA, we ſhall inſert the latter here.

☞ ARRIA, a Roman Lady of diſtinguiſhed fortitude, was the wife of Cæcina Pætus, a man of Conſular Dignity [A], with whom ſhe had lived many years in the moſt perfect

[A] A man of Conſular Dignity.] The text of Dion Caſſius (1), as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (2), intimates, that Cæcina, who was the husband of Arria, and who died in the year 42 of the Chriſtian Æra, was Conſul:

perfect union imaginable. Pliny the Younger mentions (a) several instances of her incomparable resolution and greatness of mind, particularly upon the death of her son [B]. Her husband being afterwards engaged in the party of Camillus Scribonianus, who had taken up arms in Illyricum against the Emperor Claudius in the year 42 of the Christian Æra, was seized and put on board a ship in order to be conveyed to Rome. Arria was very importunate with the soldiers, who guarded Pætus, to suffer her to attend him; and told them, that as they could not reasonably refuse a man of his quality the liberty of having his slaves to wait upon him, she would readily undertake all that trouble herself. But the soldiers were inexorable; upon which she hired a little vessel of the fishermen, and followed the ship, in which her husband was. When they came to Rome she reproached Scribonianus's wife in very severe terms, even before Claudius himself, that she could bear to live, when her husband Scribonianus was killed but the day before in her arms. This shewed evidently, that she had formed a resolution herself not to survive Pætus; though, as Mr. Tillemont observes (b), she had interest enough with Messalina to live not only with security, but even in honour and credit. Thrasea her son-in-law endeavoured in the strongest manner to divert her from this design, and among other things asked her, whether she was willing, that if he was to be put to death, her daughter likewise should die with him. She answered, that she was very willing, if her daughter should live as long and with as much harmony and affection with Thrasea, as herself had done with Pætus. This discourse of her's encreased the sollicitude of all the family, and they observed her very carefully to prevent her from attempting any thing against her life. She perceived this, and told them, that their care was in vain, since they could not hinder her from killing herself; upon which she rose from her chair, and run her head with the utmost violence against the wall, and fell down as it were dead. When she had recovered her senses, she said to them, Did not I tell you, that I could find a painful way to kill myself, if you denied me an easier method to do it? Pliny represents this fact in a very beautiful manner [C]. But Καικίνα ὑπάτου. And in reality Largus, who was Consul in 42, was likewise called Cæcina, according to Onuphrius, Lipsius, Goltzius, and Vorburg. And this probably was the reason, which induced Goltzius in his Fasti Consulares (3) to assert, that he died during his Consulship; which is also affirmed by Lipsius upon Tacitus. But Dion Cassius, who tells us that Claudius left him Consul during the whole year, δι' ἔτους, does not give us any ground to imagine, that he died as a criminal before the end of the year. He remarks it as a very extraordinary incident, that a Pretor was put to death after he had been obliged to quit his office. And therefore it is probable, that he would not have omitted to observe the same thing with regard to a Consul, especially as it was in the same affair. However, it is certain, from Pliny and Martial, that Arria's husband was Cæcina Pætus, who was then of consular dignity, tho' not actually Consul, and was brought to Rome from Illyricum; whereas those, who were Consuls, never left the city during their Consulship. For this reason, Mr. Tillemont is of opinion, that we must undoubtedly, instead of ὑπάτου in Dion Cassius, read Παίτου, which is most probable, or ὑπατικοῦ. Lipsius likewise imagines, that in the passage, which follows a little after in that Historian, instead of Παῖ ὦ κακάγαθε, it should be read Παῖτε.

(3) P. 238. edit. Antwerp 1617.

[B] Particularly upon the death of her son.] Pliny tells us, that he was informed of this by Fannia, the grand-daughter of Arria. She related several facts of her grand-mother, which he observes were not less noble than the last act of her life, tho' more obscure, and which he doubted not would appear to his friend Nepos, to whom he wrote this account, no less admirable than they did to him, when he heard them. He introduces this with a fine reflection, that with regard to the actions and sayings of great persons of both sexes, some of them have the good fortune to be more celebrated, while others of equal or greater merit are less known. Adnotâsse videor facta dictaque virorum fœminarumque illustrium alia clariora esse, alia majora. Confirmata est opinio mea hesterno Fanniæ sermone. Neptis hæc Arriæ illius, quæ marito & solatium mortis & exemplum fuit. Multa referebat aviæ suæ non minora hoc, sed obscuriora; quæ tibi existimo tam mirabilia legenti fore, quam mihi audienti fuerunt. Her husband and her son were both dangerously sick at the same time; and the latter who was a very beautiful youth, and of great modesty, and whose virtues endeared him to his parents as much as his relation to them, died of the disease. Arria took care of his funeral in so private a manner, that her husband knew nothing of the matter. Whenever she went into his chamber, she pretended that her son's distemper abated; and that he had rested well, and began to recover his appetite. But at last, when she could restrain the emotion of her grief no longer, and the tears would force themselves from her involuntarily, she left the room, and gave a loose to her sorrow; and having discharged it, she dry'd her eyes, and returned with a composed countenance to her husband, and with the same serenity as if her son had been still living. Ægrotabat Cæcinna Pætus, maritus ejus, ægrotabat & filius, uterque morti ferè, ut videbatur. Filius decessit, eximiâ pulchritudine, pari verecundiâ, & parentibus non minus ob alia charus quam quod filius erat. Huic illa ita funus paravit, ita duxit exequias, ut ignoraret maritus; quinimò quoties cubiculum ejus intraret, vivere filium atque etiam commodiorem esse simulabat. Ac persæpe interroganti quid ageret puer, respondebat, Benè quievit, libenter cibum sumpsit. Deinde quum diu cohibitæ lachrymæ vincerent prorumperentque, egrediebatur; tunc se dolori dabat; satiata, siccis oculis, composito vultu redibat, tanquam orbitatem foris reliquisset. Pliny extols this action of hers prodigiously, and observes, that tho' her resolution in stabbing herself, and then giving the dagger to her husband, with all the circumstances of that action, was very noble; yet she had then glory and immortal fame before her view; but this domestic act of hers, in suppressing the emotions of her sorrow, and acting the part of a mother even after the death of her son, is still greater than the other, as it was done without any prospect of glory. Præclarum quidem illud ejusdem ferrum stringere, & perfodere pectus, extrahere pugionem, porrigere marito, addere vocem immortalem ac pæne divinam, Pæte non dolet. Sed tamen ista facienti dicentique gloria & æternitas ante oculos erat; quo majus est sine præmio æternitatis, sine præmio gloriæ abdere lacrymas, operire luctum, amissoque filio matrem adhuc agere.

[C] Pliny represents this fact in a very beautiful manner.] We shall not deny ourselves or the reader the pleasure of transcribing some part of the passage; from whence we have extracted this account, in the elegant words of that Author. Quinetiam quum Thrasea gener ejus deprecaretur, ne mori pergeret, interque alia dixisset, Tu vis ergo filiam tuam, si mihi pereundum fuerit, mori mecum? respondit; Si tamdiu tantâque concordiâ vixerit tecum quam ego cum Pæto, volo. Auxerat hoc responso curam suorum; attentius custodiebatur; sensit, &, Nihil agitis, inquit, potestis enim efficere at malè moriar; ne moriar, non potestis. Dum hæc dicit, exiluit Cathedram, adversoque parieti caput ingenti impetu impegit, & corruit. Refocillata, Dixeram, inquit, vobis, inventuram me quamlibet duram ad mortem viam, si vos facilem negassetis.

But when Arria found that there was no hope of ſaving her huſband's life, and that he had not courage ſufficient to put an end to it himſelf, ſhe took a dagger and ſtruck it into her breaſt, and having drawn it out again, preſented it to him with theſe words; Pætus, this gives me no pain. Martial (c) has a fine Epigram upon this ſubject [D]. But Mr. Tillemont (d) excepts againſt this action of her's as indefenſible [E]. ARRIA her daughter, who was married to Pætus Thraſea, propoſed to imitate this example of her mother, when her huſband was condemned to death under Nero; but ſhe changed her reſolution, upon his requeſt, who deſired her to live in order to take care of their daughter (e).

[E] Mr. Tillemont excepts againſt this action of hers as indefenſible.] He obſerves, that it has been prodigiouſly celebrated, and that the Pagans have repreſented it as worthy of immortal honour; but he is of opinion, that how glorious it may appear to men, the Deity will conſider it in a very different light. And tho' it may be thought noble and great, yet it cannot poſſibly be ſaid to be prudent or good; ſince it muſt at leaſt be acknowledged, that this Lady was guilty of deſtroying an innocent perſon. Beſides, continues that Author, Pliny, who eſteemed this action as a Roman, yet thought it was by no means preferable to the reſolution, which ſhe exerted in concealing her exquiſite ſorrow upon the death of her ſon, that ſhe might not afflict her husband, who was then ſick; for he remarks, that upon this occaſion ſhe did not the leaſt conſider the immortalizing of her name, as ſhe did in the other. ARRIAGA (RODERIC DE) a Spaniſh Jeſuit, was born at Lucrona the 17th of January 1592. He entered into the Society the 17th of September 1606, and taught Philoſophy with great applauſe at Valladolid, and Divinity at Salamanca; and having been informed by Letters from the General of the Company, that it would be for the greater glory of God if ſome Spaniſh Jeſuits would tranſport themſelves into Bohemia (a), to teach there the more exalted Sciences, he offered himſelf as ready to undertake that employment. He arrived at Prague in 1624. He there taught Scholaſtick Divinity three years, and was the Prefect General of the Studies twenty years following, and Chancellor of the Univerſity the ſpace of twelve years. He took his Doctor in Divinity's Degree in a publick manner, and gained himſelf a great deal of reputation. The Province of Bohemia deputed him thrice to Rome, to aſſiſt there at general congregations of the Order (b). He was exhorted ſeveral times to return into Spain, but it was in vain. He was highly eſteemed by Urban VIII, Innocent X, and the Emperor Ferdinand III. He died at Prague, the 17th of June 1667 (c). He publiſhed ſeveral Books [A], wherein he diſplayed a very ſubtil wit. It is found that he ſucceeded much better in deſtroying what he denied, than in eſtabliſhing what he affirmed, and from thence it is ſuppoſed that he became a favourer of Pyrrhoniſm [B], though he has given us to underſtand that he is no Pyrrhonian. It would without doubt be very

The Courſe of Philoſophy printed in Folio, at Antwerp, in 1632, has been reprinted ſeveral times. The Edition of Lions, in 1669, is enlarged. The firſt and ſecond volumes of his Courſe of Divinity were printed in 1643; the third and fourth, in 1644; the fifth, in 1649; the ſixth, in 1650; the ſeventh and eighth, in 1655. Theſe are all in Folio, printed by Balthaſar Moret at Antwerp (1). He was at work upon the ninth volume when he died: it was that de Jure & Juſtitia (2). Don Nicolas Antonio has aſcribed to Arriaga a Book de Oratore, printed at Cologn, in 1637, and Brevis expoſitio literæ Magiſtri Sententiarum, cum Quæſtionibus quæ circa ipſam moveri poſſunt, & Autoribus qui de illis diſputant, printed at Lyons, in 1636, in 8vo, after the other Editions (3); but as Father Sotuel does not ſpeak of theſe two works, though the former had been preſented to this Jeſuit by Alegambe, there is room to believe that Don Nicholas Antonio was miſtaken.

[B] It is ſuppoſed that he became a favourer of Pyrrhoniſm.] It is the opinion of Mr. de Villemandy: Sunt alii, ſays he (4), qui periculoſius adhuc ſollicitant (ſacratiora fidei dogmata) cujuſmodi Arriaga ſuis in Thomam Diſputationibus Theologicis; nihil enim non moliuntur, ut aliorum quorumcunque placita reflectionibus & objectionibus ſuis deſtruant, ipſi autem nihil ferè adſtruunt. . . . . Celebris eſt inter Romanenſes Scholaſticos Rodericus ille Arriaga. . . . . Is multis Volum. Fol. & Philoſophiam & Theologiam eſt perſecutus; jam autem ſingula quæque ſic tractat, ut aliorum ferè omnium opiniones variis rationibus infirmare ſtudeat, ſuas autem leviſſime ſuffulciat. Si ex hac methodo ingenii conditio dijudicetur, verè Pyrrhonius poteſt haberi; cum tamen placita ſua, quantum poteſt firmet, iiſque conſtanter inhæreat, non poteſt legitime eo nomine donari (5). i. e. " There are others, who attack ſtill more dangerouſly the ſacred doctrines of the faith, as Arriaga " in his Theological Diſputations upon Thomas Aquinas; for they leave no ſtone unturned to pull " down the opinions of others with their reflections " and objections, but build up nothing in the room " of them. . . . . Roderic Arriaga is famous amongſt " the Schoolmen. . . . . He treated of Philoſophy and " Divinity in many volumes in folio, but treats of " every thing in ſuch a manner, as to endeavour to " weaken the opinions of almoſt all others by various arguments, without ſupporting his own. If " his temper may be determined by this, he may be " reckoned a true Pyrrhonian; but when he endeavours to ſtrengthen his own opinions, with a great " deal of poſitiveneſs, he cannot juſtly deſerve that " name." We may affirm, that if the reading of the writings of this Jeſuit makes one think of the character of a Pyrrhonian, it is by accident, and contrary to his intention; for he is as deciſive as another, and as warm in confirming his deciſions: but either thro' the weakneſs of the human mind, or the difficulty of the ſubjects, he is in the ſame circumſtance with a great many Authors, who admirably diſcover the weakneſs of any doctrine, but never diſcover the ſtrong ſide of it. They are like warriors, who bring fire and ſword into the enemies country, but are not able to put their own frontiers into a ſtate of reſiſtance. Mr. Ancillon thought that this Jeſuit was pretty ſingular in his manner of writing, and more free *than the reſt, who, thro' an unworthy ſervitude, dare not forſake the ſentiments of the Writers of the Society, but follow them ſcrupulouſly as infallible. . . . . very unjuſt to ſuſpect him of the leaſt prevarication, and of having been a falſe brother to the Dogmatiſts; for if he makes uſe of his whole ſtrength to confute a great number of opinions; he does the ſame alſo to ſupport thoſe which he embraces; it is eaſily perceived that he proceeds therein in earneſt, and does his beſt; and if his proofs are not inferior to his objections, it is owing to the nature of the things. The application he has uſed to confute all the ſubtilties that have been invented by the ſchoolmen, to convince that two contradictory propoſitions are ſometimes true and ſometimes falſe, is ſufficient to ſhew that he had the intereſt of the Dogmatiſts at heart in oppoſition to the Pyrrhonians. In ſeveral points of natural Philoſophy, he has quitted the moſt general opinions of the ſchool, as upon the compoſition of the continuum, rarefaction, &c. wherefore he has taken upon him (d) to juſtify the innovators in Philoſophy. It is a pity that ſo judicious and penetrating a genius had not more inſight into the true principles, for he might have been able to carry them ſtill farther. A ſmall degree of knowledge in Hydroſtatics would have ſhewn him the reaſon of an experiment [D], in the explication of which he tormented himſelf in vain. His efforts, his application and his dexterity thereupon make one lament, that he has travelled ſo aſſiduouſly out of the right road.

the opinion of Vaſquez he ſays plainly, that upon the whole he does not much rely on the ſolution of Father Vaſquez (6). I have obſerved, adds Mr. Ancillon, in reading Arriaga and Oviedo, that whenever one of theſe Jeſuits maintains the affirmative of any propoſition, the other maintains the negative; which is pretty rare, even amongſt the Doctors of the Roman Religion in general, and what I have hardly ſeen except in Cornelius à Lapide and Eſtius. It is no ſtrange thing, that upon an infinite number of queſtions, both in Philoſophy and School-Divinity, the Jeſuits ſhould confute one another. One may even ſay it is very common. Suarez and Vaſquez are an example of it.

I have ſeen ſome Profeſſors at a great loſs, when theſe objections were made them, which, to ſpeak the truth, ought to be look'd upon as quibbles invented by men who had nothing to do, but did not pretend, with Heraclitus, that in reality the ſame thing was and was not. They deſigned only to exerciſe their parts. Obſerve that Ariſtotle does not believe that Heraclitus thought ſo, if he ſaid it: Ἀδύνατον γὰρ οἰήσεώς τινος τοῦτο ὑπολαμβάνειν εἶναι καὶ μὴ εἶναι, καθάπερ τινὲς οἴονται λέγειν Ἡράκλειτον· οὐ γὰρ ἀναγκαῖον ἃ τις λέγει, ταῦτα καὶ ὑπολαμβάνειν (8). i. e. [D] He could not diſcover the reaſon of an experiment, in the explication of which he tormented himſelf in vain.] The experiment is this, that wood, which is lighter than water, does not float upon the water with regard to its whole thickneſs. A beam, that floats upon a river is part under the water, and part above it. This cannot be explained from the common principles of heavineſs and lightneſs: hence come the vain efforts of Arriaga (9). The new Philoſophers find no difficulty in this. See M. Gadrois's Syſtem.

☞ ARRIAN, a famous Hiſtorian and Philoſopher under the Emperor Hadrian and the two Antoninus's, was born at Nicomedia in Bithynia. His great learning and eloquence procured him the character of the ſecond Xenophon, and raiſed him to the moſt conſiderable dignities at Rome, even the Conſulſhip itſelf (a). Mr. Tillemont is of opinion (b), that he is the ſame perſon with Flavius Arrianus, who was Governor of Cappadocia in the year of Chriſt 134 under the Emperor Hadrian, and ſtopp'd the incurſions of the Alani; and who ſent an account of his voyage round the Euxin Sea to that Prince [A]. Euſebius ſpeaks of him in his Chronicon under the year 146. Themiſtius in his 17th Oration tells us, that Trajan or Hadrian took him from the purſuit of his ſtudies, and employed him as his Miniſter in the adminiſtration of the Empire. He is ſuppoſed to have been one of the Preceptors of Marcus Antoninus Philoſophus the

[A] Sent an account of his voyage round the Euxin Sea to that Prince.] This Periplus Ponti Euxini was publiſhed in Greek at Geneva 1577, and written by way of letter to the Emperor Hadrian by Arrian, who as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (1), was evidently the Governor of Cappadocia, and the ſame with our Hiſtorian. He commanded at Trebizonde and in parts adjacent, either becauſe thoſe countries were then ſubject to the Governor of Cappadocia, or becauſe he had a particular commiſſion to viſit them, or perhaps was likewiſe Governor of that part of Pontus. He begins his account with his arrival at Trebizonde, where Hadrian had ordered a temple of Mercury to be built. He embarked at Trebizonde, in order to ſail round the Eaſtern Coaſt of the Pontus Euxinus. He took care to have the Roman Soldiers, who were garriſon'd upon theſe Coaſts, exerciſed. He viſited every place which was neceſſary, and did not even omit the ſick. He informs the Emperor concerning the State, in which he found things, and gave him ſome advice with regard to thoſe affairs in a letter written in Latin. He paſſed the river Phaſis, and obſerves, that the water of it was ſo very light, that it run for a conſiderable length upon the ſurface of the ſea without mixing with it; and that it kept above ten years without ſtinking. There was a Caſtle upon that river, which was garriſoned by four hundred Roman Soldiers, and a town inhabited by Veterans and Mariners. Arrian ordered a new ditch to be dug for the ſecurity of the town. He finiſhed his voyage at Sebaſtopolis, where the laſt Roman garriſon was placed. He was ſurprized in his voyage with a prodigious ſtorm, which deſtroyed one of his ſhips. Among the barbarous people, whoſe country he coaſted along, the neareſt to Trebizonde as well as the moſt warlike were the Sanni, who are called Drilli by Xenophon. They had no King among them; and they had formerly paid tribute to the Romans; and Arrian promiſed Hadrian to oblige them to it again, or to drive them out of the country. But it is evident, that he did not do the latter; for ſeveral ages after there was mention made of the Tzani, who are undoubtedly the ſame with the Sanni. It appears, that theſe Sanni inhabited one part of Colchis, which was then diſtinguiſhed from the country of the Lazi; but afterwards they were confounded together. To this account of his voyage, he adds a deſcription of the Coaſt of Aſia from Byzantium to Trebizonde; and another of the country from Sebaſtopolis to the Cimmerian Boſphorus, and from thence to Byzantium; in order that Hadrian might take proper meaſures, if he had any intention to interpoſe with regard to Boſphorus, the King of which, whoſe name was Cotys, died a ſhort time before.

the Emperor (c). We have four Books of his Diatribæ or Diſſertations upon Epictetus [B], whoſe ſcholar he had been; and it appears from Photius (d), that he compoſed likewiſe twelve Books of that Philoſopher's Diſcourſes. We are told (e), that he wrote an Account of the Life and Death of Epictetus; and Arnobius cites him for that Philoſopher's doctrine (f). There is ſtill extant his Hiſtory of Alexander the Great in ſeven Books [C], which is greatly admired by the beſt judges. He wrote alſo ſeveral other works; for Photius (g) mentions his Hiſtory of his own country Bithynia, and another concerning the Alani, and a third concerning the Parthians in ſeventeen books, which he brought down to the war, which was carried on by Trajan againſt

[B] We have four Books of his DIATRIBÆ or DISSERTATIONS upon Epictetus.] Photius tells us (2), that he wrote eight Books; and Aulus Gellius (3) quotes ſome paſſages out of the ſecond and fifth Book. La Mothe le Vayer obſerves (4), that it is difficult to determine, whether he applied himſelf to the writing of Hiſtory, before he publiſhed his diſſertations upon Epictetus or not. For as on one hand, it may be ſuppoſed according to the ordinary and natural courſe of things, that he would turn his thoughts to Philoſophical contemplations in the latter part of his life; on the other hand, we find from the Preface to his Diſſertations, that he wrote them juſt in the ſame manner as Epictetus ſpoke them, and as he heard them from that Philoſopher's mouth, when he was his ſcholar. He complains likewiſe, that they had been publiſhed contrary to his intention, and without his knowledge; which may induce us to conſider them as one of his youthful performances. Mr. Boileau in his Life of Epictetus, tranſlated by Dr. Stanhope (5), tells us, that of all the ſcholars of Epictetus, Arrian is the only one, whoſe name has been tranſmitted with reputation to poſterity; but he is ſuch a one, as ſufficiently demonſtrates the excellency of his maſter, tho' we ſhould own that he alone had been of his forming. For this is the very perſon, who was afterwards advanced to be Preceptor to Antonine, ſurnamed the Pious, and diſtinguiſhed by the title of Xenophon, becauſe like that Philoſopher he committed to writing the dictates delivered by his Maſter in his life time, and publiſhed them in one Volume, under the name of Epictetus his Diſcourſes or Diſſertations, which at preſent we have in four Books. After this he compoſed a little Treatiſe called his Enchiridion, which is a ſhort Compendium of all Epictetus's Philoſophical Principles, and hath ever been acknowledged for one of the moſt valuable and beautiful Pieces of ancient Morality. He obſerves likewiſe in another paſſage (6), that "Epictetus left nothing of his own compoſition "behind him; and if Arrian had not tranſmitted to "poſterity the maxims taken from his Maſter's mouth, "we have ſome reaſon to doubt, whether the very "name of Epictetus had not been loſt to the world."

[C] There is ſtill extant his Hiſtory of Alexander the Great in ſeven Books.] La Mothe le Vayer obſerves (7), that this work of his is ſufficient to give him a place among the principal Hiſtorians; and Photius tells us (8), that he had written the life of that Conqueror in a manner ſuperior to every other Writer. It is ſaid (9), that he was induced by a divine impulſe to undertake this Work under the ſame title of the Ἀνάβασις or the Expedition, and in the ſame number of Books, which Xenophon made uſe of to deſcribe the conqueſts of Cyrus. And it was obſerved, that he was ſo ambitious of following that great Writer, that on account of his imitation of him in his ſtyle and other reſpects, he was generally diſtinguiſhed by the title of the ſecond Xenophon. He declares in his Preface, that he wrote upon the credit of Ariſtobulus and Ptolomy, who attended Alexander in all his enterprizes, and were ſo much the more worthy of regard, that beſides the conſideration of the Royal Dignity of the latter, they did not publiſh their accounts till after the death of Alexander, and upon no other motive but of diſcovering the truth. He acknowledges upon the occaſion of the death of Calliſthenes the Philoſopher, that there was a difference in the accounts of theſe two Authors, tho' they both were preſent with the King, when that unfortunate man was tried. Ariſtobulus ſaid, that he was carried in fetters in the rear of the army, till he died of ſickneſs. And Ptolomy aſſerted, that after he had been put to the rack he was ſtrangled, becauſe he was convicted of having been engaged in the conſpiracy of Hermolaus. So great is the difficulty of knowing the true ſtate of things, ſince the ſame fact is almoſt always differently related by thoſe, who ſaw it, on account of the particular views and intereſts, which very few can abſolutely diſengage themſelves from. However, notwithſtanding theſe particular defects, which Arrian could not remove, his Hiſtory is of great importance, eſpecially ſince thoſe of Ariſtobulus and Ptolomy are loſt. Add to this, that there are a great many paſſages in Quintus Curtius, which want to be reſtored by the text of Arrian. For when the former tells us in his ſixth Book, that Alexander departed from the country of the Batavi, it is very certain, that we ought to correct it, as it is in Arrian, that he departed from Ecbatane. And all the voyages, which have been made to the Eaſt Indies for theſe many years paſt, prove that the latter has been much more exact in obſerving, that the houſes or cottages of ſome of the Ichthyophagi were formed of the bones of whales and other fiſh, than Quintus Curtius, who only tells us, that they were built of ſhells and excrements of the ſea, conchas & purgamenta maris. There are indeed ſome paſſages of Arrian, which Curtius illuſtrates extremely well. And it is difficult to determine which of thoſe two Writers is the moſt exact in the name of Alexander's Phyſician, whom Arrian calls Critodemus, and Quintus Curtius Critobulus, Plutarch not having given us any light upon that ſubject. It is true, that when Pliny applauds the ſkill of the Phyſician, who drew out the arrow from the eye of Alexander's father, without any blemiſh to his face, and calls him Critobulus, he gives us ſome reaſon to ſuppoſe, that the ſon might make uſe of the ſame Phyſician, and conſequently that Quintus Curtius may be in the right in his account. La Mothe le Vayer (10) obſerves, that Arrian's narration is always agreeable, becauſe it is conciſe and clear at the ſame time. He never runs into impertinent digreſſions, nor is embarraſſed with long parentheſes, which render the ſtyle obſcure. There is ſcarce one miraculous event in all his Hiſtory to render it ſuſpicious, if we except ſome predictions of Ariſtander, with the ſtory of the two new ſprings, one of water, and the other of oyl, which roſe near the river Oxus, as ſoon as Alexander encamped there. The model, which, as we obſerved above, our Hiſtorian copied from, would not permit him to affect any grandeur or ſublimity of ſtyle, ſince the eloquence of Xenophon is not of that kind. However, he makes uſe of ſuch a variety of beautiful and proper figures and images, by which means at the ſame time that he has all the perſpicuity of his original, his language is very far from low and mean. He ſometimes introduces oblique ſpeeches, and ſometimes direct ones, and even inſerts at length in his ſecond Book the imperious Letter of Alexander to Darius. The Oration of Calliſthenes againſt Anaxarchus, who wanted to have Alexander adored, is the moſt conſiderable among the direct ones, with two others of that King to his ſoldiers, who began to mutiny, once in the Indies, and afterwards upon the banks of the river Tigris. The ſpeeches which he made before the battles, at the ſtraits of Amanus, and in the plains of Arbela or Gaugamela are only oblique, and very ſhort, as the occaſion required. In ſhort, to reſume the favourable judgment, which Photius paſſed upon the Hiſtory of Arrian, he is of opinion, that whoever compares it with the moſt ancient Hiſtories, which are ſo univerſally admired, will find, that there are ſeveral of them, which are not equal to it. However, it is proper to remark one paſſage, which ſeems to caſt ſome prejudice upon that performance. It is in the middle of the firſt Book, where Arrian declares, that the number and greatneſs of Alexander's actions were the motives, which induced him to undertake his Hiſtory, being conſcious of againſt them. He gives us likewiſe (b) an Abridgment of Arrian's ten books of the Hiſtory of the Succeſſors of Alexander the Great; and adds (i), that this Hiſtorian wrote an account of the Indies in one book, which is ſtill extant. When he began firſt to write, he reſolved to compile the Hiſtory of Bithynia, but wanting the proper memoirs and materials for it, he ſuſpended the execution of that deſign till he had publiſhed ſome other performances. This Hiſtory conſiſted of eight books, and was carried down till the time when King Nicomedes reſigned up Bithynia to the Romans. He obſerved in that Work that he was born and educated in Nicomedia, and that he was Prieſt of Ceres and Proſerpina, to which Goddeſſes that city was dedicated (k). We have nothing of this Work remaining but what is quoted in Photius and Stephanus Byzantinus (l). He mentioned in it the Hiſtory which he wrote of the exploits of Timoleon the Corinthian in Sicily, and of the actions of Dion of Syracuſe (m). He is ſaid likewiſe to have written ſome other Works [D]. of his own abilities to perform ſuch a deſign. Ἐθέλειν καὶ αὐτὸς ὀρμηθῆναι φημὶ ἐς τὴν δὲ τὴν ξυγγραφὴν, ὑπ' ἀπαξιώσας ἑωυτὸν φανῆναι καταῤῥήσιν ἐς ἀνθρώπους τὰ Ἀλεξάνδρου ἔργα. He adds, that without putting his name, which was not obſcure among mankind, and without mentioning either his country, or extraction, or quality, it was ſufficient for him to obſerve, that he had all the advantages of that kind; and that as he had been extremely fond of learning from his infancy, and as Alexander had merited the higheſt rank among the greateſt Commanders, himſelf likewiſe might juſtly expect as advantageous a place among the beſt Writers in the Greek language. La Mothe le Vayer (11) remarks that this paſſage is ſo full of vanity, that the reader muſt have an uncommon ſhare of patience not to be ſo ſhock'd with it, as to be deterred from reading any further. He tells us, that it made him recollect the impertinence of another Greek, whoſe name was Amyntianus, and who was contemporary with Arrian, ſince it appears from Photius (12), that he dedicated his work to the Emperor Marcus Antoninus. In order to gain credit, and to procure himſelf the favourable regard of his readers, he begins with promiſing that his ſtyle ſhould not be inferior in grandeur to the actions of Alexander the Great, which were the ſubject of his Book. And yet there was nothing in the world ſo cold and inſipid as his narration, nothing ſo unentertaining as his manner of expreſſing himſelf, as Photius himſelf acknowledges. It is eaſy to judge from hence, that the ambition of this man was not in the leaſt different from that of Arrian, tho' the event rendered the former much more ridiculous, becauſe he performed nothing equal to his promiſes, whereas Arrian has left us one of the fineſt works in antiquity. But notwithſtanding this, La Mothe le Vayer thinks it proper to animadvert upon this fault of his, that other Writers may avoid it, ſince there is nothing ſo inſupportable as ſelf-praiſe, which draws hatred and contempt upon the perſon, who is guilty of it, inſtead of the eſteem and reputation, which he propoſes to himſelf. However Gronovius, in his Edition of Arrian, publiſhed at Leyden in fol. 1704, p. 26. is of opinion, that our Hiſtorian has not ſhewn any degree of vanity, in the paſſage quoted above, but only ſpoken with a confidence, which was very juſt and due to his merit; Arriani juſta nec excedens & ſtudiis honorifica gloriatio. There have been four Latin Tranſlations of this work of Arrian. The firſt was done by Nicholas Saguntinus; the ſecond by Peter Paul Vergerius; the third by Bartholomæus Facius; and the fourth by Bonaventure Volcanius. Dr. Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Græca imagines, that the two firſt never appeared in publick, becauſe he could not find them in any Library, nor even ſo much as mentioned in the Catalogue of Books. Facius's Tranſlation is generally condemned for his numerous omiſſions, interpolations, miſtakes, and wilful deviations from his original; beſides which he is often guilty of paſſing lightly over whatever he did not fully underſtand. That of Vulcanius is the moſt eſteemed and for that reaſon annexed to all the beſt Editions of our Author. It was tranſlated into Italian by Leo of Modena, and printed at Venice in 1554; and into French by Claudius de Vivart, and publiſhed at Paris in 1581. Mr. D'Ablancourt gave another French Verſion of it, which has been reprinted three times, and is accounted the beſt of his performances (13).

(13) See Mr. Rooke's Preface to his Tranſlation of Arrian into Engliſh.

Mr. Rooke publiſhed an Engliſh Tranſlation of this work of Arrian in 1729 in two volumes in 8vo, with Notes hiſtorical, geographical and critical. To which is prefixed Mr. le Clerc's Criticiſm upon Quintus Curtius; and ſome Remarks upon Mr. Perizonius's Vindication of that Author. The Tranſlator in his Preface tells us, that even Ptolomy and Ariſtobulus, whom our Author chiefly copied, are not always free from ſtrange and unaccountable ſtories of Alexander the Great's exploits; but that as Arrian was a man of ſound judgment, he took care to chooſe only what was moſt probable, and left the reſt as huſks and chaff, to be glean'd up by ſuch as were ambitious of ſwelling their works to a huge ſize by heaps of all gatherings:

Quicquid Græcia mendax
Audet in Hiſtoriâ. Juven. Sat. 10.

He obſerves afterwards, that no ancient Author, who ever wrote a particular Hiſtory of Alexander, now remains, except Curtius and Arrian; that it is evident, that Arrian is the beſt, the trueſt, and the moſt accurate of the two. He acknowledges indeed, that this Hiſtorian has been ſometimes overſeen thro' haſte or inadvertence; and if I add, ſays he, that he is not exempt from human frailty, it will be no great diminution to his credit. He has been much abuſed by ignorant tranſcribers, and tho' three or four have publiſhed Obſervations and critical Notes with their Editions, I ſtill ſuſpect ſeveral paſſages to be corrupt. However I have pointed them out, and earneſtly recommend them to his next Editor to correct by the aſſiſtance of manuſcript copies. He concludes with remarking, that all who mention this Hiſtory, beſtow high encomiums on its Author's veracity beyond any other upon the ſubject.

[D] He is ſaid likewiſe to have written ſeveral other works.] Lucian tells us (14), that he wrote the Life of a Robber, whoſe name was Tiliborus. The paſſage of that Author is the greateſt compliment to Arrian; for the former, when he endeavours to excuſe himſelf for the pains he had taken in writing the Life of Alexander the Impoſtor, ſpeaks in this manner: "Let no per-

" Robber." There is likewiſe under our Author's name a Periplus of the Red-Sea, that is, of the Eaſtern Coaſts of Africa and Aſia as far as the Indies. It is addreſſed to the Emperor Hadrian, according to the Latin Inſcription, tho' there is no mention of him in the Periplus itſelf. Salmaſius (15) is of opinion, that it was written in the time of Pliny the Natural Hiſtorian, or perhaps a little before him, and conſequently, that it could not be compoſed by Arrian, nor addreſſed to Hadrian. He infers this from the mention which is made of ſeveral Princes, who lived in Pliny's time; to which Mr. Tillemont adds (16) a paſſage in the Periplus, where it is ſaid, that they went from Luce to Petra to Malican King of the Nabatheans; for the city of Petra and all Arabia Petræa had ſubmitted to the Romans from the year 105, and were reduced afterwards into the form of a Province; whereas we have no account that Hadrian abandoned it. On the other hand we find medals of the ſtrength and elegance in his manner. Suidas ſays, that Dion Caſſius, who compiled the Roman Hiſtory, wrote the Life of this Philoſopher, who was his countryman. There were ſeveral other perſons of his name [E].

the city of Petra under that Emperor with the title of Metropolis. And therefore this Periplus muſt have been written before the year 105, and conſequently not by Arrian, who lived under M. Aurelius, that is, after the year 160. In ſhort the Author of it ſpeaks of Egypt as his own country, and ſometimes makes uſe of the Egyptian months. Mr. Tillemont (17) thinks it probable, that it might be compiled by that Arrian, to whom Pliny the younger wrote ſeveral letters, and whom he repreſents as a man of great abilities and eloquence, and who was conſidered as an imitator of Demoſthenes. Now it appears that this Arrian had retired from publick employments about the time of Nerva or the beginning of Trajan's reign, in order to live at eaſe, (which was never permitted to any Senators but thoſe, who were advanc'd in years;) and therefore he could not poſſibly be the ſame with the ſcholar of Epictetus, who was undoubtedly more ancient than Arrian the Civilian, who is ſometimes mentioned in the Digeſt, tho' ſome Writers confound them together. Beſides the works of Arrian abovementioned we have a Book of Tactics under his name, the beginning of which is loſt. This was written in the 20th year of the Emperor Hadrian (18). He treats in it of the Order and Arrangement of an Army, but mentions nothing of the military exerciſes of the Roman Horſe, becauſe he had written upon that ſubject before in a Treatiſe addreſſed to the Emperor himſelf. To theſe Tactics of Arrian is added the Order, which he gave for the marching of the Roman Army againſt the Alani, and giving them battle. This may very properly be aſcribed to our Author, who was engaged in a war againſt that people; and, as we obſerved above, wrote an Hiſtory of them, or perhaps of the war againſt them, of which this piece may have been a part.

(18) Idem, pag. 455.

[E] There were ſeveral other perſons of his name.] Julius Capitolinus in his Life of the Emperor Gordian mentions a Greek Hiſtorian of that name, to prove that there were three Gordians in oppoſition to thoſe, who allowed but two. This cannot be applied to our Arrian, who lived an Age before thoſe Emperors. Suetonius in his Life of Tiberius mentions a Poet of the ſame name, but he was more ancient than the other two, ſince Tiberius endeavoured to imitate him in his Greek Poems. He is very probably the ſame, who, as Suidas tells us, wrote the Alexandrias, an Heroic Poem in twenty four Books, upon the Actions of Alexander the Great (19). T.

☞ ARSACES or ARSACIUS, (as the Greek Authors write his name (a),) was King of Armenia in the fourth Century. The Romans, who wanted his aſſiſtance in the war againſt the Perſians, very much courted his alliance [A]. The Emperor Conſtantius, in order to attach him to his intereſt, gave him Olympia in marriage. She was the daughter of Ablavius formerly Præfect of the Prætorium, and had been betrothed to Conſtans Conſtantius's brother (b) [B]. After the death of Conſtantius, the Emperor Julian wrote to Arſaces, and deſired him to meet him with an army upon the borders of Perſia (c). The King complied with his requeſt, or rather command, and ravaged the country called Chiliocomum, which is a very fruitful part of Media (e); but this coſt him very dear afterwards. For Julian having been killed in that war, Jovian his ſucceſſor made peace with Sapores King of Perſia, on this condition, amongſt others, that the Romans ſhould never aſſiſt Arſaces, who had always been true and faithful to them, againſt the Perſians (f). Sapores, upon the concluſion of this peace, which was ſo diſhonourable to the Romans, infeſted Armenia with his armies, and having by fair words and treacherous promiſes engaged Arſaces to come to him, he invited him to a great entertainment, took him priſoner, commanded his eyes to be put out, and having bound him with ſilver chains, which amongſt the Perſians is look'd upon as an honour done to captives, cauſed him to be put to death in the moſt cruel manner (g). Thus was he rewarded for his fidelity to the Romans. His wife fell ſome time after into the hands of Sapores (b), but we don't read in what manner he treated her. Sozomen ſays (i), that Arſaces was a Chriſtian [C]. We find another Arſaces contemporary with this

[A] The Romans courted his alliance.] Arſaces's Kingdom bordering on one ſide upon Sapores's Dominions, and on the other upon the Roman Provinces, we ought not to be ſurprized that his friendſhip was courted by both. The Perſians employed promiſes and threatenings and all kinds of artifice to draw him over to their intereſt; not omitting the moſt valuable preſents. Conſtantius fearing leſt they ſhould at laſt prevail over him, ſent for him, received him with the utmoſt kindneſs and generoſity, and entreated him to be conſtant in his friendſhip and fidelity to the Romans. Arſaces promiſed upon oath, that he would loſe his life, rather than act contrary to their intereſt which promiſe he kept with utmoſt fidelity, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the Perſians. Upon his return into Armenia, Conſtantius loaded him and all his attendants with preſents (1).

[B] Conſtantius . . . gave him (Arſaces) Olympia in marriage; ſhe . . . . had been betrothed to Conſtans, Conſtantius's brother.] Amongſt other crimes, with which Athanaſius charges Conſtantius, he reproaches him with this, as a very odious action. Here follow his own words: Οὗτος γὰρ καὶ εἰς ἀδελφὸν ἀσεβεῖν τετόλμηκε· καὶ προσποιεῖται μὲν εἰκοδομεῖν αὐτὸ μνημεῖον, τὴν δὲ μνηστὴν αὐτοῦ τῶν Ὀλυμπιάδα Βαρβάροις ἐξέδωκεν, ἣν ἐκεῖνος ἄχρι τελευτῆς ἐφύλαττε, καὶ ὡς ἰδίαν ἀνέτρεφεν ἑαυτῷ γυναῖκα (2). That is, "Thus has he (Conſtantius) dared to "be impious towards his brother (Conſtans); that when "he pretends to raiſe a monument to him, he gives "to the Barbarian his bride Olympia, whom Con"ſtans kept till his death, and whom he carefully "brought up as one whom he expected to be his "wife." But what crime was there in this? What diſhonour or injuſtice was it to Conſtans, that a woman, who had been betrothed to him, ſhould be married to a King, and eſpecially one who was a Chriſtian, ſince this procured a powerful Ally to the Romans?

[C] Sozomen ſays that Arſaces was a Chriſtian.] Julian, ſays he (3), wrote to Arſaces, King of the Armenians and in alliance with the Romans, to meet him on the borders of Perſia. In this Letter the Emperor having highly extolled his own character, and repreſented himſelf as worthy of the Empire, and acceptable to the Gods whom he adored; and having blamed Conſtantius his predeceſſor as a wicked and puſillanimous man, he ſpoke to Arſaces in a very contemptuous and threatening manner. And as he had heard that he was a Chriſtian, he added, according to his cuſtom, a great many diſreſpectful things of Chriſt; telling Arſaces in the moſt haughty manner, that his God would never aſſiſt him, if he refuſed to do what he was commanded. We ſhall not call in queſtion Sozomen's accuracy or veracity in this particular; but we cannot forbear obſerving, that if Julian really wrote to Arſaces what that Hiſtorian, rian relates, it was very ill policy in the Emperor; ſince this was the way to exaſperate Arſaces, and force him out of reſentment, to join with the Perſians. And ſince notwithſtanding this haughty and reproachful Letter, that King aſſiſted the Romans (5), he muſt have been of a very mild temper, and have obſerved very ſtrictly that Precept of the Goſpel, which forbids the Chriſtians to revenge themſelves.

(5) See in the text quotation (c) and (d).

[D] Julian wrote a Letter to him (Arſaces) which is very much to the honour of the Chriſtian Religion.] He obſerves in that Letter (6), that what moſt contributed to the ſpreading of the Chriſtian Religion was their kindneſs towards ſtrangers, their care with regard to the burying of the dead, and the ſanctity which they affected in their manners. This he recommends to Arſaces, and to all the Prieſts of Galatia. He alſo orders him to exhort all the Prieſts not to appear in publick Theatres, or in Taverns, nor to exerciſe any ſcandalous art, or do any diſhonourable buſineſs. He commands him to ſhew a particular reſpect to thoſe, who obey theſe injunctions, and to deprive of their poſts thoſe who refuſe to ſubmit. He alſo bids him to build publick Hoſpitals, where ſtrangers not only of the Heathen, but of any other Religion might be entertained, and receive money, if they wanted it, and tells him that he had provided a fund for that purpoſe. For it would be a ſhame, adds he, that no beggars ſhould be ſeen amongſt the Jews, and that the Chriſtians ſhould aſſiſt not only their own poor, but even ours, and that we ſhould be wanting in that reſpect with regard to thoſe of our own Religion. Thus he endeavoured to reſtore Paganiſm to its ancient luſtre, by grafting upon it ſome of the moſt eſſential precepts of Chriſtianity. P.

ARSENIUS, a Deacon of the Roman Church, famous for the nobility of his family, but much more for his vaſt learning and for his piety, was choſen in order to be ſent to the Emperor Theodoſius, who wanted a Tutor for his ſon Arcadius. It was Pope Damaſus who made this choice. Arſenius arrived at Conſtantinople in the year 383. He was very well received there by the Emperor, who was angry one day, both with the ſcholar, and the maſter, becauſe he had ſeen the maſter ſtanding, and the ſcholar ſitting, during the Lecture. He ordered that his ſon, although he had already been declared Auguſtus, ſhould ſtand and be uncovered when Arſenius inſtructed him, and at that time ſhould not wear the marks of the Imperial dignity. Arſenius having uſed all his induſtry to educate his ſcholar in the ſciences and virtue, thought himſelf obliged at laſt to add correction to cenſures. The young Arcadius was ſo enraged at this, that he deſired one of his Officers to rid him of his Tutor (a). The Officer told Arſenius of it, who thought beſt to withdraw privately and go to the Deſerts of Egypt. He there paſſed a great many years with the Hermites of Sceté, in the exerciſes of the moſt auſtere and fervent devotion. He died there at ninety five years of age [A]. Theodoſius, who grieved at the retreat of Arſenius, ordered him to be ſearch'd for every where, without being able to find him (b). There are ſome faults in Moreri's Dictionary relating to this article [B]. I have alſo found ſome in other Writers [C].

[A] He died in the deſerts of Ægypt, at ninety five years of age.] Here follows the diviſion that Mr. Arnaud d'Andilly makes of this long life of Arſenius. He ſpent, ſays he (1), forty years in the Court of the Emperor Theodoſius, forty in Sceté, ten at Trohé beyond Babylon, oppoſite to Memphis, three in Canapé of Alexandria, and two in the ſame place of Trohé, whither being returned he finiſhed his courſe in the fear of God. This expreſſion he ſpent forty years at the Court of Theodoſius, is very improper, for if we would not have a notorious falſhood in it, it muſt be taken in this ſenſe, he was forty years old when he left the Court of Theodoſius. For if we take it in the proper and natural ſignification of the terms, Arſenius muſt have lived above ſixſcore years. There muſt be added to the ninety five all the years he had lived when he ſet out for Conſtantinople, being choſen Preceptor to Arcadius by Damaſus. This Pope would not have choſen a youth of twenty years old. Beſides Theodoſius reigned but ſixteen years, and did not receive Arſenius before the fourth year of his reign.

[B] There are ſome faults in Moreri's Dictionary relating to this Article.] I. Arſenius could not have been ſent to Theodoſius in 383, to be Preceptor to Arcadius and Honorius, for Honorius was not born till 384. Baronius had taken notice of this fault in thoſe who have written the Life of Arſenius, and had aſcribed it to ſome perſon, who knew that Theodoſius had two ſons, aliquis, quod ſciret duos fuiſſe Theodoſio filios, adjecit Honorium (2). This fault is continued in the Life of Arſenius, compoſed by Mr. Arnaud d'Andilly (3), who quotes Rufinus (4) for his authority. II. I acknowledge that Baronius (5) upon the authority of the lives of the Fathers (6), advances that Arſenius was Godfather to the two ſons of Theodoſius; but that does not agree with Rufinus, who ſays, they were committed to the care of Arſenius, preſently after their Baptiſm (7): beſides, Baronius himſelf has obſerved, that there is a miſtake in the Life of Arſenius, when it is ſaid he was ſent by Damaſus to be Preceptor to Arcadius and Honorius. The laſt was not yet born: the other was but eight years old; and it is not probable that Arſenius ſhould ſtay at the Court of Theodoſius, till the time that Honorius wanted a Tutor. III. Mr. Fléchier ſays in expreſs terms, that Theodoſius cauſed Arſenius to be ſought for in all parts of the Empire. It is not probable therefore that Arſenius ſhould not leave the Court, till after the death of Theodoſius, in 395. That I ſay, is not probable, tho' it is ſet down as a certain fact both in the firſt volume of the Dictionary, and in the third. IV. That circumſtance, which M. Fléchier has expreſly taken notice of, that Arcadius's officer, who was employed to kill Arſenius, gave the Tutor notice of it, ſhould not have been ſuppreſſed. The Supplement of the Dictionary ſuppoſes that Arſenius had a divine intelligence of it. V. Arcadius was not aſſociated to the Empire at ſix years of age, but at ſeven or eight, as Baronius and Mr. Fléchier obſerve. Erat tunc Arcadius annum ætatis agens octavum, natus nimirum ſub Conſulatu Gratiani quarto & Merobaudis, triennio ante Theodoſii patris imperium (8). i. e. "At that time "Arcadius was in his eighth year, being born under the "4th Conſulſhip of Gratian and that of Merobaudes, "three years before his Father Theodoſius was Emperor." VI. Socrates had no occaſion to be quoted; for what he has ſaid of Arſenius has hardly any relation to the Article of the ſupplement. However, the XXIIId Chapter of the IIId Book ſhould have been quoted.

be at the lectures, which were read to Arcadius during the Life of Theodoſius. Obſerve this circumſtance well, ſince Matthias was not ignorant that Arſenius made his eſcape before the death of that Emperor: for he obſerves that Theodoſius cauſed him to be ſought for diligently. He quotes the XXIIId Chapter of the IVth Book of Socrates, wherein we do not find a word of what he has related. He adds, that Arcadius, after the death of his father, learned where Arſenius was, and aſked his pardon for what was paſt, and his holy Benediction. Mr. Doujat, carried down with the ſtream, aſſociates Honorius with Arcadius (10). Charles Stephens knew our Arſenius only in the quality of a Patrician: he does not make him quit the Court, but merely his own patrimony, to ſend him into a Convent, by virtue of a voice from the clouds, which commanded him flight, ſilence and reſt. Mr. Hofman has only added the office of Preceptor to Arcadius. Mr. Lloyd has ſuppreſſed the whole Article. ARSENIUS, Patriarch of Conſtantinople in the 13th Century, was a native of that city. He was educated in a Monaſtery of Nice and was alſo Superior of it; but he renounced this office, that he might the better apply himſelf to a monaſtick life, either in the Convent of Apollonias, or in thoſe of Mount Athos. He was brought forth from this ſtate in 1255, by the Emperor Theodore Laſcaris, who made him Patriarch of Conſtantinople. The ſame Emperor four years after declared him on his death-bed one of the two Tutors of his ſon John. The other Tutor was George Muzalon, who ſhewing very pernicious deſigns with regard to the young Prince, made Arſenius diſlike his employment ſo much, that it occaſioned his returning to the Convent. But when in 1261, the Greeks had retaken Conſtantinople under the conduct of Michael Palæologus, Arſenius was called thither to reſume the Patriarchate, and to poſſeſs the ſeat, from which the Patriarchs had been excluded for above fifty years. The year after, the Emperor Michael Palæologus cauſed the eyes of John Laſcaris ſon of the Emperor Theodore to be put out. Arſenius full of indignation at ſo barbarous a treatment towards his pupil excommunicated Michael, who, to repel his eccleſiaſtical thunder, called a Council, and under falſe accuſations, cauſed Arſenius to be depoſed, and baniſhed him into the Iſle of Proconneſus. He lived very long in this baniſhment, but we do not find exactly in what year he died. He was a good man; but quite unfit for buſineſs (a). He is an Author [A].

ARSENIUS Archbiſhop of Monembaſia, or Malvaſia, in the Morea, in the 16th Century, has been conſidered as a learned Man. He was the particular friend of Paul III, and wrote to him ſome very elegant Letters; one amongſt the reſt, wherein he complains of the little affection of the Roman Church for the Greek Nation [A]. He ſubmitted himſelf to the Romiſh Church, which made him ſo odious to the Greek Schiſmaticks, that Pachomius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, excommunicated him, and the Greeks ſay that Arſenius was after his death Broukolakas, that is, that the Devil came to hover about his corps, and animated it again (a). There are ſome works of his compoſing extant [B].

[A] He complains of the little affection of the Roman Church for the Greek Nation.] Theſe are the words of Mr. Guillet. Arſenius wrote very elegant letters to Pope Paul III, which are ſtill remaining. There is one wherein he complains ſtrongly of the little affection of the Roman Church for the Greek Nation, in not having raiſed any one to the dignity of Cardinal. Paul was created Pope in 1535 (1). If we take this complaint in a general ſenſe, we muſt accuſe Arſenius of a falſhood; for it is certain, that Cardinal Beſſarion was a Greek. It muſt therefore be ſuppoſed that the reproaches of Arſenius were like thoſe of Muſurus, who complains bitterly, that not one Greek had a ſhare in the numerous promotions juſt made by Leo X (2). Paul III was elected Pope in October, 1534.

I have been informed by Mr. de la Monnoie, that there is no Letter from Arſenius to this Pope, except the Dedication to the Scholia on Euripides. It is there that he complains, that amongſt ſo many Cardinals of all nations, there are not above one or two Greeks. Καίτοι οὐδ' εἰκοτως ἦν ἵνα ἢ δύο τῶν Ἑλλήνων ἐν τοσούτοις πανσοφωτάτοις ἀναδημάσι τῶν Καρδιναλίων. Nothing is more uſeful or more neceſſary than to go to the fountain head.

He ſays in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to Pope Paul III, that he had drawn it up in Crete, at Venice and at Florence. See Geſner's Bibliotheca.

ARSENIUS a Greek Monk, wrote a Letter againſt Cyril Lucaris Patriarch of Conſtantinople, which was publiſhed in Greek and Latin at Paris, in 1643, with the Acts of the Council, wherein Parthenius Patriarch of Conſtantinople cauſed the confeſſion of this Cyril to be condemned, in the year 1642. Every body knows that this confeſſion of Cyril was conformable to the ſentiments of Geneva. Monſr. Claude has maintained, that this condemnation is a ſuppoſititious piece (a). The Catalogue of the ARSINOE. There have been many Queens of this name. Moreri has ſpoken of the principal, not without being ſometimes deceived. He has been a little too ſhort upon Arſinoe, ſiſter to Cleopatra: we ſhall ſupply this defect, in the article of PTOLEMY AULETES (a).

(a) Note [A].

ARSINOE, wife of Magas, King of Cyrene [A], diſhonoured herſelf by her unchaſtity. Magas a little before he died, betrothed their only daughter Berenice to the ſon of Ptolemy King of Egypt. As ſoon as he was dead, Arſinoe, who had always been againſt this alliance, took meaſures to break it. She offered Berenice with the Kingdom of Cyrene, to Demetrius brother to King Antigonus (a). Theſe offers were accepted. Demetrius embarked immediately, and had ſo favourable a wind, that he did not wait long to ſee Berenice. He was a fine perſon, and he grew the more proud, as he quickly perceived the impreſſion that his beauty had made upon the heart of Arſinoe. He neglected the daughter, to make himſelf more agreeable to the mother: he treated the troops with contempt, and at laſt he became ſo odious, that all the people turned their deſires towards the ſon of Ptolemy. They were reſolved to get rid of Demetrius, and concerted the means with Berenice (b). They ſent ſome aſſaſſins to murder him, at a time that he had choſen to lie with Arſinoe [B]. This woman having heard her daughter, who was at the door, and commanded they ſhould ſpare her mother, covered her gallant with her body as well as ſhe could; but her endeavours were to no purpoſe. They killed him, in conſequence of which the marriage of Berenice with the ſon of Ptolemy came to its full and entire effect (c). Juſtin, if I do not miſtake, is the only Hiſtorian who informs us of this. I am ſurpriſed at it; for an action of that nature well deſerved to be taken notice of. What is ſtill more ſtrange, is that no body tells us what became of Arſinoe, nor from whence ſhe came, nor what became of Berenice; and they are ſo far from their relating that Ptolemy Euergetes, ſon of Ptolemy Philadelphus married her, that we are aſſured he married Cleopatra. Matthias, who ſays this (d), quotes no body; but you may ſee in Joſephus, in the fourth chapter of the 12th book of his Jewiſh Antiquities, that the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes was named Cleopatra. Note that Ptolemy Euergetes had a ſon called Magas (e), from whence we may conjecture that the father of his wife was named Magas, as Juſtin relates it. I ſhall take notice of ſome errors of Moreri [C], and (a) He was King of Macedon.

(b) We may infer that from the words of Juſtin.

[A] She was wife of Magas, King of Cyrene.] He is named Agas in the Editions of Juſtin; but good Criticks have obſerved long ago, that we muſt read Magas: it is thus, they add, that Pauſanias, Polyænus and Athenæus call him (1). It will be objected to them perhaps, that he, of whom Pauſanias has made mention, is not the husband of our Arſinoe; for he was brother to Ptolemy Philadelphus, whereas the huſband of Arſinoe was brother to Ptolemy Euergetes. The Hiſtory of Magas, according to Pauſanias, is as follows. He was the ſon of Berenice, and of one Philip a Macedonian, a man of low extraction. Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater, having been married to Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, carried this Berenice into Ægypt, who lay with Ptolemy, and bore him amongſt other children Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned after his father. She cauſed the government of Cyrene to be given to her ſon Magas, who married Apame, the daughter of King Antiochus, and had great conteſts with Ptolemy Philadelphus. Here is the Magas of Pauſanias (2). Is it not clear, ſome will ſay, that it cannot be the Magas of Juſtin, who was Arſinoe's husband, and died about the time when the ſon of Pyrrhus was reſtored to the Kingdom of Epirus (3)? The Criticks may anſwer, that Magas King of Cyrene having reigned fifty years (4), he might very well have lived till the ſon of Pyrrhus was reſtored, which the beſt Chronologers place under the 493d year of Rome (5), which was the twenty fifth of the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Inſtead therefore of ſaying according to the common notion, that Juſtin ſpeaks of Ptolemy Euergetes, in his XXVIth Book (6), we muſt determine that he ſpeaks of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and that it is he, who is there made brother to Magas King of Cyrene. But if he names Arſinoe the wife of Magas, it is not a ſign that his Magas is different from him of Pauſanias, ſince the ſame King of Cyrene might have married ſucceſſively Apame the daughter of Antiochus, and our Arſinoe. Beſides, the wars in which he engaged againſt Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to Pauſanias, agree very well with the Magas of whom Juſtin ſpeaks. Rex Cyrenarum Agas decedit, qui ante infirmitatem Berenicen unicam filiam ad finienda cum Ptolemæo fratre certamina, filio ejus deſponderat (7). i. e. "Agas King of Cyrene died, who before his ill-

I confeſs, they do not ſeem to agree with the Magas of whom Athenæus has ſpoken; for he was one who enjoying peace, plunged himſelf into luxury and ſloth, and thro' much eating grew ſo fat that it choaked him (8). But this objection is not unanſwerable. Cannot a Prince, whoſe reign continues fifty years, engage in ſome wars, and afterwards give himſelf up to a long reſt?

[B] They ſent ſome aſſaſſins to murder him . . . . at a time he had choſen to lie with Arſinoe.] Biſſelius the Jeſuit has found a ſubject of admiration in this. Adulteris autem duobus illis, ſays he (9), Berenicâ filiâ Mæchæ conſciâ, tenſæ per diſpoſitos ita ſunt inſidiæ, (quod mireris) ut in ipſo flagrantis ſceleris ardore deprehenſis ſuperveniens adulteræ filia, mæchique conjux, Berenice pro thalami nefandi foribus ſubſiſtens, &c. i. e. Neither the circumſtance of the time, nor that of the place have any thing here to be wondered at. It was eaſy to obſerve when Demetrius went to Arſinoe's chamber, and it was the moſt plauſible opportunity that the conſpirators could take.

(9) Biſſelius, Ruin. illuſtrium, Decad. 4. pag. 1536. Juſtin has ſaid, Cui (Demetrio) cum in lectum ſocrus conceſſiſſet, percuſſores immittuntur. i. e. "When Demetrius was gone "to his mother-"in-law's bed, "aſſaſſins were "ſent after him.

[C] I ſhall take ſome notice of the errors of Moreri.] I. This expreſſion is not exact, Magas gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Ptolemy: the Latin is Berenicen . . . . filiam deſponderat (10); "He had be-"trothed his daughter Berenice." Moreri's words conceal from us a fact that is not cleared up in the ſequel of the narration; that Berenice ſtay'd with her father and mother. We think of quite another thing, when we read that ſhe was given in marriage to a ſon of the King of Ægypt. To keep therefore his Readers from running into a miſtake, he ſhould have followed the Latin word deſpondere ſtrictly. This remark ſeems trifling in itſelf; but the uſes of it may be conſiderable to tranſlators. They can never be too ſcrupulous in obſerving this rule: to avoid all equivocal terms, and every thing, that may hinder the Reader from having ideas beſt ſuited to the nature of each ſubject. II. It is not true, that Juſtin ſays that our Arſinoe was the daughter of Antiochus Soter. III. Nor that her husband's name was Magus (11). IV. Nor that this pretended Magus was the ſon of Ptolemy Lagus (12). V. Nor that ſhe cauſed her daughter to be eſpouſed to Demetrius. VI. Nor that ſhe had a deſign of ſetting the crown upon his head. VII. Nor that ſhe was driven away. Can we ſufficiently condemn ſo bold a licentiouſneſs? An Author relates whatever he has a mind to without finding it in a Writer, and then has the aſſurance to quote him. I know that when we take an Hiſtorian of ſo little judgment as Juſtin for our guide, we are obliged to ſupply a good many circumſtances: but then we ſhould mention, that we do ſupply them, and not give them for a tranſlation of Juſtin. I have ſaid that this abridger has but little judgment, and I am ſure Tragus Pompeius would curſe him a hundred times in a day, if he could know the wretched condition to which his work has been reduced by this Epitomiſer. He would even loſe himſelf in the obſcurities of his abridger. Almoſt all the Antiochi, Ptolemies and Antigoni appear there without their marks of diſtinction; one does not know whether he is ſpeaking of the father, ſon or grandſon; one muſt gueſs at it for the moſt part. He has not ſo much as given himſelf the trouble to ſay whether the marriage of Demetrius with Berenice was conſummated. A fine queſtion you will ſay! but I inſiſt upon it, he ought to have ſet down expreſly either the affirmative or the negative: for it is not improbable that a man, who was glad to find himſelf beloved by the mother, ſhould conſent to have his marriage with the daughter put off. You will ſay that Juſtin gives Arſinoe the appellation of mother in law to Demetrius, nimis placere ſoſrui cœperat; but I anſwer, that he afterwards gives Berenice the appellation of virgin, quæ res ſuſpecta primo virgini: conſequently one of theſe phraſes ſubverts the other; and one cannot help ſuſpecting that he does not make uſe of the terms in the moſt exact ſenſe. Juſtin's Index, in Mr. Grævius's Edition, gives Berenice only the title of betrothed (13). However, neither Juſtin nor many other abridgers know that an abridgment ought to reſemble the pygmies, who have all the parts of a human body, but every one proportionably ſmaller than thoſe of a man of a good height. Diminiſh in an abridgment the parts of a narration as much as you will; but do not cut them quite off. Let us reckon for Moreri's eighth fault, the contradiction he is fallen into. Here he would have Berenice the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes to be the daughter of Magus: in another place (14) he affirms that ſhe was this Ptolemy's own ſiſter.

☞ ARSINOE, daughter of Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus, King of Egypt, was married to Ptolemy Philadelphus her own brother [A], who was extremely in love with her. She died without iſſue (a); and her huſband, to ſhew his love for her, not only gave her name to a diſtrict of Egypt [B], which he called Arſinois (b), but alſo erected a fine ſtatue [C] upon Mount Helicon in Bœotia (c), and conſecrated a temple to her (d) [D]. Pauſanias mentions another Arſinoe, who was alſo the wife to this Ptolemy, and had ſeveral children by him. She was the daughter of Lyſimachus (e).

☞ ARSINOE,

[A] She was married to Ptolemy Philadelphus her own brother.] Ptolemy her father having had at leaſt two wives, it might perhaps be thought that Arſinoe was but half-ſiſter to her huſband; but it is certain that ſhe was his ſiſter both by the father's and the mother's ſide. Juſtin expreſly tells us (1), that Philadelphus was Ptolemy's youngeſt ſon, and Pauſanias ſays (2), that he was born of Berenice, and not of Euridice Antipater's daughter, and Ptolemy's firſt wife. Now it is not probable that Philadelphus ſhould have been in love with a ſiſter, who muſt have been a great deal older than him, for Ptolemy had ſeveral children by his firſt wife before he married Berenice, and we do not read that he had any more by her afterwards. But what proves undeniably, that Arſinoe was Philadelphus's ſiſter by the father and mother's ſide, is Pauſanias's expreſs aſſertion: His words are, Πτολεμαῖος Ἀρσινόης ἀδελφῆς ἀμφοτέρωθεν ἐρασθείς, that is, "Ptole- "my being in love with Arſinoe, his ſiſter on both "ſides;" which Amaſæus tranſlates Ptolemæus Arſinoes germanæ ſororis amore victus; upon which Sylburgius obſerves (3), that it would be more proper to tranſlate, uterinæ pariter & germanæ ſororis; for, continues he, the Greek words, Ἀδελφῆς ἀμφοτέρωθεν, ſignify a ſiſter by the father's and the mother's ſide: but he does not obſerve, that this is alſo the genuine ſenſe of the Latin word germana, ſo that he unjuſtly cenſures Amaſæus. Let us add here, that Pauſanias ſpeaking of this marriage between a brother and a ſiſter, tells us (4), that it was not according to the laws of the Macedonians, but to thoſe of the Egyptians, over whom Philadelphus reigned.

[B] Gave her name to a diſtrict of Egypt.] Pauſanias's words are: Νομὸς ἔστι αὐτῆς (Ἀρσινόης) Ἀρσινοίτης Αἰγυπτίοις; that is, "There is a diſtrict in E- "gypt, called Arſinois, after her name." Amaſæus tranſlates νομὸς regio, a country, but Sylburgius very well obſerves (5), that it ſhould be tranſlated Præfectura, which is the word uſed by Pliny (6), who tells us, that Egypt was divided in Præfecturas oppidorum, diſtricts round about the ſeveral towns, each under a particular Governor. Let us obſerve here, that Pauſanias himſelf is not exact, when he tells us this diſtrict was called Arſinous from Arſinoe; it is more probable that it was called ſo from the town, which Philadelphus built in honour of his ſiſter, and which he called by her name. Pliny ſays (7), Arſinoen . . . conditam ſororis nomine . . . à Ptolemæo Philadelpho. We ſhould take notice of Moreri's geographical errors, with regard to the cities called Arſinoe, but that this is foreign to our deſign.

[C] A fine ſtatue.] That ſtatue, ſays Pauſanias (8), was ſupported by a braſs oſtrich, a kind of bird, which tho' it has wings, yet through the bulk and weight of its body cannot raiſe itſelf up into the air. The ſame Author tells us (9), that there was at Athens in the theatre called Odeum (ᾠδεῖον) another ſtatue of Arſinoe, which ſtood near that of her huſband, among the other ſtatues of the Kings of Egypt named Ptolemy; but we are not told by whom that ſtatue was erected.

[D] Conſecrated a Temple to her.] The roof of that temple, according to Pliny (10), was to be of loadſtone, that Arſinoe's ſtatue, which was of iron, might hang in the air. Dinocrates (11) an Architect of Alexandria had begun the work, but his death, and that of Ptolemy prevented the finiſhing of it. But there is much reaſon to queſtion, whether the event would have anſwered their expectation, tho' Pliny does not in the leaſt ſeem to doubt of it; ſee his words: Eodem lapide (Magnete) Dinocrates Architectus Alexandriæ Arſinoes Templum concamerare inchoaverat, ut in eo ſimulachrum ejus è ferro pendere in aëre videretur: interceſſit mors & ipſius, & Ptolemæi, qui id ſorori ſuæ juſſerat fieri. This is not much unlike the fabulous ſtory of Mohammed's iron coffin being ſupported in the air by a large loadſtone fixed in the roof of the Temple where he is buried.

☞ ARSINOE, ſiſter to the preceding [A], was firſt married to Lyſimachus, King of Thracia and Macedonia, when he was already advanced in years, and had ſeveral grandchildren, the children of Agathocles and Lyſandra. This raiſed Arſinoe's fears and jealouſies, when ſhe ſaw herſelf a mother of two ſons; ſhe could not bear the thought of falling with them into the hands of Agathocles, and becoming ſubject to him after Lyſimachus's death; ſo that ſhe reſolved to deſtroy Agathocles [B], and procured it with Lyſimachus's conſent (a). Upon this Lyſandra fled with her ſons and her brothers to Seleucus, General of the Horſe (b), and was ſoon followed by ſeveral of Lyſimachus's Officers, who abandoned his party to join with Seleucus. This raiſed a war, in which Lyſimachus was killed, and Seleucus made himſelf maſter of almoſt the whole Kingdom of Macedonia, but he did not keep it much above ſeven months, being killed by Ptolemy Ceraunus, who by that means made himſelf maſter of Seleucus's new Kingdom. Arſinoe was then with her two ſons at Caſſandria (c), from whence Ptolemy very much wanted to expel them, and to put her children to death, that he might have no competitors in his Kingdom. To compaſs his deſign, he feigned to be in love with Arſinoe, and offered to marry her [C]. She was at firſt extremely perplexed, and did not know what reſolution to take; but at laſt ſhe was prevailed upon by the ſolemn oaths of her brother to accept his offers. She went to meet him, and their marriage was celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity; Ptolemy himſelf put the crown on his ſiſter's head in preſence of the whole army. Arſinoe overjoyed that ſhe had now recovered what ſhe had loſt by the death of her former huſband invited Ptolemy to come to Caſſandria, the only place in which ſhe could be ſafe. But this was what Ptolemy particularly aimed at; for no ſooner was he come to the gate, but he ordered his ſoldiers to ſeize it, and to kill Arſinoe's two ſons [D] who were come to meet him. The young Princes took ſanctuary in their mother's arms, where they were cruelly murthered, notwithſtanding all Arſinoe's efforts to ſave them. She herſelf was ſent to Samothracia into baniſhment, attended only with two ſlaves, ſo much the more unhappy that ſhe was not permitted to die with her children (d). Thus ſhe was puniſhed for the murther of Agathocles, by which ſhe had not gained the leaſt advantage.

[A] Siſter to the preceding.] This appears not only by Juſtin, who calls her (1) ſiſter of Ptolemy Ceraunus, who was the ſon of Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus, and father to the preceding Arſinoe, but alſo by Pauſanias's account. He tells us (2), that Lyſimachus married his ſon Agathocles to Lyſandra the daughter of Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus; and afterwards (3), that Lyſimachus himſelf married Arſinoe Lyſandra's ſiſter. They were therefore both the daughters of Ptolemy, the father of Arſinoe, and conſequently her ſiſters.

[B] She reſolved upon the death of Agathocles.] Juſtin ſays (4), that Lyſimachus, having conceived an unnatural hatred againſt Agathocles, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars, and whom he had choſen his ſucceſſor, poiſoned him with the aſſiſtance of Arſinoe: Agathoclem filium ſuum, ſays Juſtin, quem in ſucceſſionem regni ordinaverat, per quem multa bella proſpere geſſerat, non ſolum patrium, verum etiam humanum ultra morem, miniſtra Arſinoe noverca, veneno interfecit. Pauſanias is not ſo poſitive. It is reported, ſays he (5), that Arſinoe meditated the death of Agathocles. He adds, that other Authors ſay, Arſinoe was in love with Agathocles, and not being able to gain the young man's heart, ſhe reſolved out of revenge to have him killed. However that be, Pauſanias ſeems to have thought that Lyſimachus was at leaſt privy to the murther of his ſon.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

[C] Ptolemy . . . feigned to be in love with Arſinoe, and offered to marry her.] Arſinoe ſuſpected her brother's wicked deſign. He wrote to her, that ſhe would admit her ſons to a partnerſhip of the Kingdom; he deſired her to ſend a proper perſon, in whoſe preſence he might bind himſelf to ſuch oaths, as ſhe ſhould preſcribe him. This put Arſinoe into great perplexity; if ſhe conſented to her brother's requeſt, ſhe was afraid, that he would not much mind his oath; and if ſhe refuſed, ſhe dreaded to provoke his fury, and to expoſe herſelf to all his cruelty. However having more regard for her children's ſafety than for her own, and thinking that by this marriage ſhe ſhould be better able to protect them, ſhe ſent one of her friends, named Chodion, to Ptolemy, who having conducted him into the Temple of Jupiter, ſwore in the moſt ſolemn manner, that it was with a ſincere heart he deſired to marry his ſiſter, that he would give her the title of Queen, that he would not marry any other woman, and that he would look upon her children as his own. This baniſhed all her fears, and filled her with the moſt agreeable hopes; ſhe went to her brother, who received her in the moſt open and chearful manner, his countenance ſhewing as much ſincerity as his oaths had done. They were married, tho' Ptolemy her ſon (6) oppoſed it, as much as lay in his power, warning her that all this was nothing but mere treachery (7).

(6) See the following remark.

(7) Juſtinus, lib. 24. cap. 2.

[D] Arſinoe's two ſons.] They were both beautiful youths, the elder, whoſe name was Lyſimachus, was ſixteen years old, the other, whoſe name was Philip, was three years younger. This is what Juſtin tells us (8) expreſly. But if Arſinoe had but two ſons, Lyſimachus and Philip, how comes the ſame Author to ſpeak of another ſon of that Princeſs, called Ptolemy? Here follow his words, which we ſhall ſet down at length: Arſinoe poſtquam & ſpe impleta eſt, & metu ſoluta, ipſa cum fratre colloquitur, cujus vultus & blandientes oculi, cum fidem non minorem, quam jusjurandum promitterent, reclamante Ptolemæo filio fraudem ſubeſſe, in matrimonium fratris concedit (9). Theſe words, reclamante Ptolemæo filio fraudem ſubeſſe, cannot poſſibly relate to a ſon of Ptolemy himſelf, for it does not appear that he had a ſon; and beſides it is not probable that a ſon would ſay, that his father's promiſes and careſſes were treacherous. The natural ſenſe of theſe words is that Ptolemy was Arſinoe's ſon, who would adviſe her not to truſt to her pretended lover. But if that be ſo, we muſt ſay that Arſinoe had three ſons, and correct Juſtin's aſſertion in one place, by what he aſſerts in another. ☞ ARSLAN (ABU'L MODHAFFER ZEINO'DDIN) (a), the 13th Soltan of that branch of the family of Seljûk which reigned in the Perſian and Arabian Iraks, was the ſon of Toghrul, and grandſon of Mohammed the ſon of Malec-Shâh. He ſucceeded his uncle Soleimân-Shâh, who had reigned but ſix months or little more, in the 555th year of the Hejra (b), and was proclaimed in the city of Hamadân, by the influence of the Arabee Ildighiz, who had the charge of his education, and the chief management nagement of affairs under ſeveral of the preceding Princes [A]. Arſlân, in the beginning of his reign, had a rebellion to encounter with, raiſed in favour of his couſin Mohammed Seljûk-Shâh, by Kimâr Governour of Iſpahan, and Inbânej Governor of Rey, who marched towards Hamadân at the head of a great army. The Soltan, on his part, aſſembling his troops, met the Conſpirators near Kazwin, gave them battle, and obtained a compleat victory; Seljuk-Shâh being ſlain in the field, and his two adherents forced to make their eſcape to Rey, and thence, for greater ſecurity, into the Province of Mazenderân. In 561 (c) Inbânej, having obtained powerful ſuccours from the King of Khowarezm, entered the Perſian Irâk, and pillaged the country about Abher and Kazwin, but Arſlân and the Atabec ſuddenly attacking him, obliged him to retire a ſecond time into Mazenderan. In 563 (d) Inbânej made an attempt on Rey, and the Soltan ſent againſt him the eldeſt ſon of Ildighiz, named Mohammed; but his forces giving ground before thoſe of Inbânej, the father marched to his aſſiſtance. Ildighiz arriving at Rey, ſome overtures of peace were made, and a treaty was at length concluded, whereby Inbânej was to be reinſtated in his Government, on condition that he ſhould go with Ildighiz to make his ſubmiſſion in perſon to the Soltân, and to take an oath of fidelity to him. Inbânej accordingly ſet out with the Atabec for Hamadân, but was aſſaſſinated the night before he was to have waited on the Soltân; nor was it poſſible to diſcover by whom the deed had been committed. Arſlân, immediately on receiving the news, gave the government of Rey and its dependances to Mohammed the ſon of Ildighiz, who ſoon after married the only daughter of Inbânej, and by her had a ſon, who had a conſiderable ſhare in the tranſactions of the ſucceeding reign. In 568 (e) the Soltan's mother, a Princeſs of great virtue, died in the houſe of Ildighiz, whom ſhe had taken to her ſecond huſband; and that great man ſoon followed her: Arſlan was ſo deeply concerned for the loſs of theſe two perſons, that the Hiſtorians attribute to no other cauſe the long illneſs of which he died in the year 571 (f), at the age of forty three, after a reign of about fifteen years. This Prince is highly commended by ſeveral Writers, not only for his valour and generoſity, but alſo for his temper and humanity: he is ſaid, in particular, to have been a great enemy to backbiting; not ſuffering any perſon to ſpeak ill of another in his preſence (g).

There were ſeveral other Mohammedan Princes of this name. I ſhall only mention three of them. I. Arſlân-Shâh, the ſon of Maſûd, by the ſiſter of Soltân Sanjâr the Seljukian, was the 12th Soltân of the Dynaſty of Ghazna. On the death of Maſûd, which happened in the year of the Hejra 508 (b); Shirzad his eldeſt ſon ſucceeded to the crown, but hardly kept it a year, Arſlân Shâh depriving him both of that and his life, and ſeizing all his father's dominions; upon which Bahrâm-Shâh, the youngeſt brother, highly diſcontented that he had no ſhare therein, retired to his uncle Sanjar, by whom being furniſhed with an army, he made himſelf maſter of Ghazna, the capital city, and obliged his brother to fly and leave him in poſſeſſion of the crown: but the auxiliary army was no ſooner retreated, than Arſlân Shâh appeared before Ghazna, and forced his brother to fly in his turn, and to have recourſe again to Soltân Sanjar. That Prince did not deſert his nephew, but led his troops himſelf againſt Arſlân, whom he routed and took priſoner, reinſtating Bahrâm in the throne; and Arſlân died in priſon ſoon after, in the year 512 (i) having reigned about three years (k). II. Arſlân-Shâh, the ſon of Kirmân-Shâh the 5th Soltân of that branch of the family of Seljuk which reigned in Kirmân, ſucceeded his nephew Irân-Shâh. For fear of falling into whoſe hands he had been obliged to conceal himſelf in a Shoemaker's ſhop: But that cruel Prince having been ſlain by his own ſubjects in the year of the Hejra 494 (l), Arſlân-Shâh appeared, and was by publick conſent made Soltân in his room. The Seljukians of Perſia, who had given great diſturbance to his predeceſſors, durſt not attack this Prince; ſo that he enjoyed a peaceable reign of forty two years, dying in 536 (m), and left his crown to his ſon Mohammed-Shâh (n). III. Arſlân-Shâh, the ſon of Toghrul-Shâh, was the 8th Soltân of the ſame branch of the Seljukian family, and ſucceeded to the crown of Kirman on the death of his father, in the year of the Hejra 562 (o), but had the misfortune to have it diſputed with him for ſeveral years by his two brothers, Bahrâm-Shâh, and Turân-Shâh, each of them being acknowledged for Soltân as they happened at ſeveral times to prevail (p); the reigns of thoſe Princes being therefore ſo confuſed, that it is impoſſible to fix the number of years of any one of them.

[A] Son of Hyſtaſpes.] I cannot tell where Moreri read that Artabanus was a native of Hyrcania. The two Authors whom he has quoted (1), ſay nothing like it. Cteſias mentions for Artabanus's father a favourite of Cambyſes, whom he calls Artaſyras, who at firſt favoured the uſurpation of the Magus, and afterwards the deſign formed by ſeven great Lords to drive out the Magus (2).

ditions which were so fatal to the monarchy of the Persians (a). He had no mind that Darius should go to attack the Scythians (b), and much less that Xerxes should engage himself in a war with the Greeks. Herodotus has preserved the solid reasons upon which he founded his advice [B], and the judgment he made upon the prodigious army both by sea and land, with which Xerxes prepared to pass from Asia to Europe (c). The difficulties that Artabanus represented to him were the cause that they chose rather to send him back to Persia, to command in the absence of the King, than to let him continue in the expedition (d). The event will shew how judicious and faithful his counsels were. He did not always persevere in this fidelity; for he conspired against Xerxes, and slew him (e); and afterwards engaged Artaxerxes son of Xerxes, to make away with his brother Darius: he engaged him, I say, by making him believe that Darius was the murderer of Xerxes. But Artaxerxes knew the truth a little afterwards, and killed Artabanus as he was pulling off his cuirass (f). Diodorus Siculus speaks differently from Justin of the manner in which Artabanus was punished for his crime (g). You may see in the note [B] after what manner this Prince could reason upon dreams, and upon the length of our life.

[B] Herodotus has preserved the solid reasons upon which he founded his advice (3).] One would think, that Herodotus had made it his business to do honour to the prudence and wit of Artabanus: he never gives more scope to his imagination, than when he makes this Prince reason. Xerxes after having insulted him in his passion, submitted to his reasons, and gave up the thoughts of the expedition: but two succeeding dreams made him continue it (4). He sought for Artabanus, and told him his dreams; and added, I would know whether you would have such. Take my cloaths, sit upon my throne, and lay upon my bed. Artabanus answered, that he was not worthy so great an honour, and reasoned very sensibly upon dreams. He told him if there was something divine in those of Xerxes, his Majesty had reason to hope, that he should have the same, "for what would it signify, "if a God, who had a war at heart, and came by "night to give it in command to a Monarch resolved "to live in peace, should not come to order the same "thing to the Prime Minister, when he wanted to "know by this proof, whether this God is desirous "of war? But, continues he, do not think it is ne"cessary for that purpose, that I should take your "cloaths and lay in your bed. This I know not "what, that has appeared to you in a dream, is not "so stupid, as to conclude that I am you, because "it shall see me dressed in your cloaths; and, if it "should deign to address itself to me, your cloaths "would not oblige it to change its opinion on my "account any more than my own." Xerxes would absolutely be obeyed: Artabanus dreamed like his master, and opposed the war no longer; but became the promoter of it, tho' he still much doubted the success (5). If these things were true, ought he not to conclude that they came from that spirit, that was a liar and a murderer from the beginning; for Xerxes was threatned with a shameful diminution of his glory, if he desisted from the enterprise (6)? Another time Artabanus reasoned in a very uncommon manner upon the shortness of our life, a thing, which made Xerxes weep at the sight of his innumerable troops (7). We live but too much, says he: our life, short as it is, is extended more than enough to make us mad, and often wish for death as a mild refuge against the miseries that fall upon us. But if life has nevertheless been seasoned with something agreeable, it is a proof that God has a love for mankind. Where are the Greek Philosophers, who ought not to say of this way of thinking, as Pyrrhus said of the Roman Army when he had been to take a view of it: the order of battle of these Barbarians, says he, and their manner of encamping, has nothing of the Barbarian in it (8). It belongs to the Christians to rectify that. Note, that Herodotus was very well acquainted with the vanities and miseries of mankind; but he affected a little too much, to seek for the cause of them in the jealousy or malignity of the Gods. Plutarch calls him to account for it (9).

Artabanus's Reflection upon dreams, and the length of life.

ARTABANUS I. King of the Parthians, the seventh from Arsaces Founder of the Monarchy (a), was son of Priapatius, and brother of Phrahates and Mithridates [A], who all three reigned successively over the Parthians. He succeeded Phrahates his nephew, and died soon after, having been wounded in the arm in the war that he had with the Thogarians (b).

(a) About 240 years before Christ.
(b) Justin. lib. 42. cap. 2.

[A] He was son of Priapatius, and brother of Phrahates and Mithridates.] Moreri makes him son of Phrahates I, and uncle to Phrahates II: but these two relations are incompatible; for Phrahates II was son of Mithridates, who was brother to Phrahates I. How then could he make it out, that a son of Phrahates I should be uncle to Phrahates II? This is the reason that, notwithstanding Justin assigns but two sons to Priapatius, I have assigned him a third, namely, Artabanus I. When Authors are not clear, we ought to be thus free with them. Justin relates two things (1): I, that Priapatius, dying in the twenty fifth year of his reign, left two sons, of whom the eldest, whose name was Phrahates, reigned before Mithridates his younger brother; II, that Phrahates, son of Mithridates, reigned after his father, and was succeeded by Artabanus's uncle by the father's side (2). It is a great confusion; it is insinuating that Mithridates and Phrahates were the only sons of Priapatius: and it is saying that there was yet another, for otherwise Artabanus could not be uncle by the father's side, to the son of Mithridates. I have sought in vain for a solution of this difficulty, in several Commentators upon Justin, and even in the notes of the last French translator (3).

ARTABANUS II, King of the Parthians, when he was yet but King of the Medes [A], was invited by the Parthians to reign over them upon the exclusion of Vonones, whom they had sent for as far as Rome, and whom Tiberius had granted them very readily (a). Artabanus was of the race of the Arsacides, as well as Vonones, and he had likewise this advantage, that the Roman education did not render him odious to this people (b). Vonones was fortunate in the first battle, but he was so unsuccessful in the second, that he

[A] He was King of the Medes.] Moreri and Hofman have said that Tacitus has made him King of the Dacians. This is what that Historian never dreamed of. He only says, that Artabanus was brought up amongst the Dahæ, Artabanus Arsacidarum e sanguine apud Dahas adultus excitur (1). There is a good deal of difference between the Dahæ and the Dacians; and a man must be very inattentive (to say no worse,) when he could think a Prince of Parthia had been brought up near the Danube.

he was obliged to fly to Armenia [B]. The victorious Artabanus did not let him reſt there; and as Tiberius would not give Vonones the aſſiſtance which was neceſſary for him (c), he found himſelf obliged to leave Armenia and retire to Silanus Governor of Syria. This confirmed upon the head of Artabanus the crown, which he had obtained about the year 769 of Rome, and the 16th of the firſt Century. He was uneaſy however at his rival's being in Syria (d), for the correſpondence being more eaſy, kept up the factions; ſo he ſent an Ambaſſador to Germanicus to renew the alliance, and in the mean time demanded that Vonones ſhould be ſent out of Syria. The conſequences of this Embaſſy are not known; but it is known that after the death of Germanicus, the King of the Parthians behaved haughtily to the Romans, and cruelly towards his own people (e). The ſucceſs of the war that he had made with many nations, had inſpired him with courage; ſo that without any regard for Tiberius, whoſe grey hairs he deſpiſed, he ſeized Armenia [C], and gave it to Arſaces his eldeſt ſon [D]. He ſent to demand again all the treaſures that Vonones had left in Cyria and Cilicia (f), and in a rodomontade declared that if they did not deliver up to him all that Cyrus and Alexander had poſſeſſed, he ſhould go and take it by force. The malecontents of this court ſent ſecretly to Tiberius, to deſire Phrahates ſon to King Phrahates (g). This was readily granted them; and when it was known that this Prince, being deſirous to live after the manner of the Parthians, to which he had not been uſed for a long while, had fallen ſick and died, they ſubſtituted Tiridates in his room, who was of the Houſe of the Arſacides, and a near relation of Phrahates, and raiſed another enemy to Artabanus, Pharaſmanes King of Iberia. Here Artabanus came off with the worſt; for after his ſon the King of Armenia had been poiſoned, his other ſon Orodes, whom he ſent into Armenia, was defeated by Pharaſmanes. He was there likewiſe defeated himſelf ſometime after; and having been obliged to advance towards the provinces that Vitellius Governor of Syria had threatned (h), there was nothing that further remained to hinder Mithridates brother to Pharaſmanes from becoming King of Armenia (i). This loſs of Artabanus was ſoon followed by a greater. Vitellius by his intrigues and his money made this Monarch quit the country, and retire to Hyrcania, where he was forced to live upon what he got by hunting (k), whilſt Vitellius put Tiridates in poſſeſſion of the crown. But there was ſo formidable a party made againſt the new King, that Artabanus found it no difficult matter to be recalled, and to conſtrain Tiridates, who was a poor Prince, to withdraw (l). This paſſed in the 36th year of the firſt Century. None of Artabanus's former pride now remained: he ſought the friendſhip of Caligula of his own accord (m): and when by the diligence of Vitellius he ſaw the deſign that he had of carrying war into Syria ready to miſcarry (n), he conſented to an interview with this Roman, and to a treaty of peace; the conditions of which were to the advantage of Caligula. Ten years after, he was dethroned, and conſtrained to ſeek a retreat at the court of Izates King of Adiabene (o). He was received there in the moſt generous manner, and with more

He makes Vonones obtain two victories over the Parthians, who nevertheleſs vanquiſhed his competitor but once (2); and he aſcribes to Vitellius a defeat of the army of Artabanus; a defeat, I ſay, followed with other loſſes of Artabanus about the year 36. But, 1. it is falſe that Vitellius defeated the troops of this King of the Parthians, and 2. it is certain that the miſchief Vitellius did him by intrigues and money, were after theſe other loſſes. Mr. Hofman aſcribes two victories alſo to Vonones, and one to Vitellius, which was the cauſe, ſays he, that Artabanus abandoned Armenia. A miſtake indeed; but a far more excuſable one, than that into which this Writer hath fallen, after Mr. Lloyd and Charles Stephens; for he ſays, that Artabanus, being a great enemy to Tiberius, ſeized upon Armenia, and was ſlain by a Perſian ſoldier, named Artaxerxes, after which there were no Kings of the Parthians, but Kings of the Perſians. A prodigious Anachroniſm! See the Article of ARTABANUS IV.

[C] Without any regard for Tiberius, ... he ſeized Armenia.] It is impoſſible to be more inſulted, than this Emperor was by Artabanus, who no ſooner perceived that his invaſion of Armenia, was an injury that Tiberius did not revenge, than he attacked Cappadocia (3). But what can be more terrible than the letters that he wrote to him? Let us hear Suetonius: Quin & Artabani Parthorum Regis laceratus eſt literis, parricidia, & cædes, & ignaviam, & luxuriam objicientis, monentiſque ut voluntariâ morte maximo juſtiſſimoque civium odio quam primum ſatisfaceret (4). i. e. "He was grievouſly affronted by letters from Artabanus King of the Parthians, accuſing him of parricide, murder, ſloth and luxury, and adviſing him "to kill himſelf forthwith, to ſatisfy the hatred of "his citizens." There was ſomething perſonal in this; for Artabanus behaved very civilly, and even humbly to the ſucceſſor of Tiberius. Hear Suetonius once more: Artabanus Parthorum Rex odium ſemper contemptumque Tiberii præ ſe ferens, amicitiam Caligulæ ultro petiit, venitque ad colloquium legati conſularis, & tranſgreſſus Euphratem aquilas & ſigna Romana Cæſarumque imagines adoravit (5). i. e. "Tho' Artabanus the "King of the Parthians always ſhewed a hatred and "contempt of Tiberius, yet he ſought the friendſhip "of Caligula of his own accord, and came to a con"ference with the conſular legate, and croſſing the "Euphrates, adored the Eagles and Roman Enſigns, "and the images of the Cæſars." Dion Caſſius obſerves, that Vitellius had obliged Artabanus to ſacrifice to the ſtatues of Auguſtus and Caligula, and give his children for hoſtages, after having conſented to the treaty of peace which he directed (6). This ſhews that Joſephus was miſtaken when he thought the interview between Vitellius and Artabanus, and all that reſulted from it, happened under Tiberius (7). It was Tiberius, according to him, that made Darius the ſon of Artabanus be ſent for a hoſtage, with rich preſents, and a Giant, a Jew by nation, whoſe name was Eleazar, and who was ſeven cubits high.

[D] He gave Armenia to Arſaces, his eldeſt ſon.] This is his name in Tacitus and in Dion Caſſius. Joſephus calls him Orodes (8): he has confounded one of Artabanus's children with another. He whoſe name was Orodes, was not King of Armenia, but was ſent thither to avenge the death of Arſaces his eldeſt brother; and had like to have loſt his life in the attempt: for fighting hand to hand in the midſt of the battle with Pharaſmanes King of Iberia, he was wounded, but not killed, as the rumour was at the time to the great prejudice of the Parthians (9), and as Joſephus has ſince affirmed in his Jewiſh Antiquities (10).

more than mere compliments. [E] He died .... whether by the crime of his ſon Gotarzes, or his brother, &c.] The manner in which the exact Mr. Tillemont has expreſſed himſelf, is fallacious. Artabanus died ſoon after, ſays he (11), by the crime of Gotarzes his brother, according to Tacitus, or rather his ſon, as Joſephus affirms. There is nobody that reads theſe words, but would imagine that Joſephus ſays, Gotarzes put his father Artabanus to death. But he ſays no ſuch thing: he ſpeaks of Artabanus, as of a man that died a natural death; he makes him to be ſucceeded by his ſon Varadan, and Varadan by Gotarzes, another ſon of Artabanus. Strange, that Tacitus and Joſephus ſhould agree ſo little in capital circumſtances, about things ſo near their own time! The latter gives Artabanus a peaceable death, and many ſons: the former makes him die together with his wife and his ſon, by the crime of his brother, which ſeems to imply that he had but one ſon. One does not know which ſide to take, when Tacitus is not free from contradictions. At firſt he mentions Gotarzes as the brother of Artabanus: but a little after, he makes him the brother of Bardanes, and inſinuates plain enough, that Bardanes was the ſon of Artabanus; for he repreſents him as greatly enraged againſt thoſe of Seleucia, not only becauſe they did not ſubmit to him, but rather becauſe they had rebelled againſt his father. In quos ut patris ſui quoque defectores, irâ magis quam ex uſu præſenti accenſus (12). What father is this, if it is not Artabanus? I ſhould be almoſt tempted to believe that the Artabanus of whom Tacitus ſpeaks (13), was the ſon, who had already ſucceeded, or was to ſucceed King Artabanus; and that Gotarzes, the other ſon of King Artabanus, got rid of this brother, that he might reign himſelf; and for the greater ſecurity involved the wife and the ſon in the ſame ruin with the father. This conjecture diſſipates all the contradictions. But here are other differences between Joſephus and Tacitus. The latter makes Gotarzes die a natural death, and makes Vonones ſucceed him, and his ſon Vologeſes to ſucceed him (14). Joſephus makes Gotarzes periſh by the treaſon of his ſubjects, and makes his immediate ſucceſſor his brother Vologeſes (15).

ARTABANUS III, King of the Parthians, ſucceſſor and perhaps ſon of Vologeſes, of whom Suetonius ſpeaks as of a good friend of Nero and Veſpaſian, lived in the time of the Emperor Titus. This is what we learn from Zonaras in the following manner (a). He ſays that a man of Aſia, named Terentius Maximus, pretending to be Nero, infuſed this notion into ſome perſons in his own country, and into a greater number ſtill towards the Euphrates, and that at laſt he retired to Artabanus King of the Parthians, who then being in an ill humour againſt Titus, received this perſon very well, and prepared to reſtore him [A].

(a) Zonaras, in Tito, ad an. circiter 80.

[A] He received Terentius Maximus very well, and prepared to reſtore him.] Altho' there have been more than one pretended Nero, a good many people will hardly believe, that this Terentius Maximus is to be diſtinguiſhed from the impoſtor, of whom Suetonius has ſpoken. And, if it be objected, that the latter did not appear till twenty years after the death of Nero, that is, the ſeventh year of Domitian; it will be anſwered that Zonaras is not incapable of confounding two reigns with one another; and that after all it would be a little ſtrange, that two impoſtors ſhould within ſo little ſpace of time, find a great ſupport in the ſame country: or if they did, that they were not both mentioned in the Hiſtorian, who has ſpoken of one of them, as a ſingular event. That one of whom Suetonius ſpeaks, found a great deal of ſupport amongſt the Parthians. Cum poſt viginti annos adoleſcente me extitiſſet conditionis incertæ qui ſe Neronem eſſe jactaret, tam favorabile nomen ejus apud Parthos fuit, ut vehementer adjutus & vix redditus ſit (1). i. e. "When after twenty years, whilſt I was a youth, "there appeared one of obſcure birth, who pretended "to be Nero, he obtained ſo much favour amongſt "the Parthians, as to be greatly aſſiſted, and almoſt "reſtored by them."

ARTABANUS IV, was the laſt King of the Parthians; for Artaxerxes, a Perſian by nation, having deprived him of his crown and life in the year 229, aſſumed the title of King of the Perſians, which his ſucceſſor bore as long as that Monarchy laſted. The reign of Artabanus had been glorious enough, and had made the power of it felt by the Romans, who, on their turn, made their power alſo be felt by this Prince. He was ſo imprudent as not to be upon his guard, whilſt the Emperor Severus ravaged the neighbouring countries: he was ſleeping in quiet under the protection of peace, when he ſaw all on a ſudden the Roman troops fall upon his dominions. All that he could do was to ſave himſelf with a few guards (a); the city of Cteſiphon where he made his reſidence was ſacked; all his treaſures, and all his goods fell into the hands of the enemy (b). But this treachery was nothing in compariſon of that of Caracalla. He ſent Ambaſſadors to him laden with rich preſents, to deſire his daughter in marriage; and urged to him a great many advantages which would reſult from this alliance to both nations (c). Artabanus immediately rejected this propoſal, not foreſeeing any thing agreeable in this marriage, conſidering the difference of language and cuſtoms which would be between his daughter and a Roman Emperor. At laſt Caracalla's freſh inſtances, his oaths, his proteſtation of friendſhip for his future ſpouſe, obtained the conſent of the father. But we ſhall ſee preſently that Caracalla meditated a villany, which may be looked on as a model, or at leaſt as a repreſentation of the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day concerted by Catharine de Medicis. He went with his army into the country of the Parthians, and was received every where as the ſon-in-law of the King; and, as ſoon as they learnt that he was near the capital, Artabanus, accompanied with a prodigious number of people, went to meet him. The Parthians thought of nothing but to teſtify their joy; they did nothing but drink, and ſing, and dance; when Caracalla, giving the ſignal to the troops, put all this this multitude of people to the ſword. They killed as many as they would, for no body was in a condition to reſiſt them. Artabanus was ſaved, but with great difficulty. From that day Caracalla did nothing but plunder and burn, till being weary of doing it, he returned to Meſopotamia, where he was ſlain. Artabanus, eager to avenge the injury that he had ſuffered, marched as ſoon as he could againſt the Roman army, who had choſen Macrinus in the room of Caracalla. The fight having laſted two days ſucceſſively, from morning till night, began again the third, and would in all probability have laſted till the entire ruin of one of the two armies, if Macrinus had not let Artabanus know the unhappy end of Caracalla, and had not declared to him that he diſapproved what was paſſed, and that he would reſtore all the priſoners to him again, and all the ſpoil which remained, and live in peace with him. Artabanus accepted theſe offers, and ſo the peace was concluded between him and the new Emperor in the year 217. He was the firſt that was called the Great King; and he wore a double diadem [A]. His ill fortune in 226 raiſed him a formidable enemy; I mean that Artaxerxes, who maintained his rebellion with [A] He was the firſt that was called the great King; and wore a double diadem (1).] I have quoted my Author, and it is very true, that theſe words are in the Chapter which I have quoted from Herodian. Ἀρτάβανόν τε τὸν πρότερον καλούμενον τὸν μέγαν βασιλέα, ϛ διπλῷ διαδήματι χρώμενον ἀποκτεῖναι (2). I believe he meant, that before Artabanus IV, no King of the Parthians had aſſumed the title of Great King: and he would be grievouſly miſtaken if he ſaid abſolutely, that this was the firſt Prince who was ſo called; for it is certain, that the ancient Kings of Perſia had taken this title, and that it was even peculiar to them. See the 24th Verſe of the Perſæ of Æſchylus and Stanley's Notes upon it. He quotes the teſtimony of Dion Chryſoſtom, Orat. III; of Joſephus, Antiquit. Libr. XI, Cap. VI; of Herodotus, Libr. VIII, and Libr. V; of Xenophon, Expedit. Libr. I; of Ariſtides in Romæ Encomio; of Suidas, in μέγας βασιλεύς. Mr. du Rondel pointed out to me this paſſage of Stanley. We may add to theſe Authors, Plato, in Gorgia, pag. 321, C. Plutarch, in Vitâ Cimonis, pag. 485, E; the Book of Eſther, Chap. XVI, Ver. 1. Read alſo the Panegyric of Iſocrates; you will find there the complaint of this Orator, againſt the Greeks of his time, who, in their ordinary language, gave the Monarch of the Perſians the pompous title of the Great King. Οὐ βασιλέα τὸν μέγαν αὐτὸν προσαγορεύομεν, ὥσπερ αἰχμαλώτοις γεγονότες (3); i. e. "Do not we call him the Great King, "as if we were his captives?" Note, the Kings of Perſia were not the firſt who gave themſelves that name. The Kings of Aſſyria had borne it, as may be gathered from the XVIIIth Chapter of the IId Book of Kings (4), in the words of Sennacherib's Lieutenant. I remember the anſwer, that Father Goulu gave, when a paſſage of his tranſlation of Socrates's Apology was criticiſed. But let us firſt ſet down the words of the Critick. I know not of what to accuſe him, unleſs it be of voluntary ignorance, in a paſſage of his apology of Socrates, wherein he makes him ſay: I am aſſured that tho' he were the Great Lord (le grand Seigneur) and not a perſon of low condition, he would prefer ſuch a night as that to all the nights and all the days of his life, &c. I would be glad to aſk him, if this grand Seigneur is not the Turk; and if it is, how Socrates could ſpeak of him, unleſs by Propheſy, ſeeing it cannot be eight hundred years ſince the Ottomans began their tyranny, and it is above thirteen hundred from the time of Socrates to their time, reckoning from the fourth year of the ſeventy ſeventh Olympiad, in which he was born (5). Here follows the refutation. "An able "man would have ſaved me this anſwer, by not aſk"ing ſuch a fooliſh queſtion. But have a little pa"tience and I will anſwer this ignoramus. Yes, Pa"ladin (6), It is the Turk that is now called the "Grand Seigneur. But in the time of Socrates, it "was the King of the Perſians, that was ſo called, "and no otherwiſe. As for other Kings, ſays Suidas, "they have the title of the States and Countries that "are under their obedience, and thus we ſay, the "King of Macedon and the King of the Lacedæmo"nians. But the King of the Perſians is only called "the Great King, or the Great Lord, μέγας βασιλεύς, "μέγας δεσπότης. And as he bore the title of Great "Lord (Grand Seigneur) his ſubjects had the appel"lation of ſlaves, his Court was called the Port, or "the Gate, and his Courtiers οἱ ἐπιθύραις βασίλεως, "thoſe who were at the Gate of the King. The Em"peror of the Turks had ſucceeded him in the "title of Great Lord, as well as in the greateſt "part of his Kingdoms, and in the form of his go"vernment. So that without revelation or propheſy "Socrates might ſpeak of the Grand Seigneur or Great "Lord, and the Paladin could not find fault with "him, without diſcovering himſelf to be an aſs. "But to refer him to Herodotus, Thucydides, and "other good Authors, would be to no purpoſe. For "the poor creature confeſſes he has no Books nor "any money to buy them; and thoſe who have li"braries would hardly truſt him; and beſides, he un"derſtands nothing about them. I ſhall content my"ſelf therefore, to refer him to the hiſtory of the "Turks, at the end of the Pont-neuf, where the "pictures hang out upon the ſtalls. There he may "learn for nothing in the maps, where the Emperors "of the Turks are engraved, how long it is ſince "the Ottomans became Grands Seigneurs: whether it "is eight hundred years, as the Paladin ſays, or only "three hundred (7)." I have ſet down this whole long paſſage, to ſhew at an eaſy rate, and without conſulting the pieces of the famous diſpute of the General of the Fueillans, the rude and groſs behaviour of that time (8) amongſt the Authors who were at war. But I muſt not paſs over F. Goulu's artifice. Not having found his account in μέγας βασιλεύς, he falſly ſuppoſed that the words μέγας δεσπότης are in Suidas. This would not clear him amongſt learned Readers: it ſerved only to impoſe upon the ignorant; and expoſed him throughout as a falſe quoter: upon the whole it appears, that his Grand Seigneur was juſtly criticiſed.

Beſides the proud title of King of Kings was leſs fit to flatter the pride of the Orientals than that of Great King; for we ſee that Artabanus IV, to raiſe his character, took the title of Great King. He had already as well as his predeceſſors that of King of Kings. In the time of Pompey it was commonly given to the King of the Parthians; and if Pompey did not obſerve that form in writing to him, it was for the ſake of the other Kings, who were come to do him homage (9). Phraates aſſumed it in a letter that he wrote to Auguſtus (10). Suetonius has given it to the King of the Parthians, who was contemporary with Germanicus: it is in that place, wherein he relates his concern for the death of this illuſtrious Roman. Regulos quoſdam barbam poſuiſſe, & uxorum capita raſiſſe ad indicium maximi luctus. REGUM ETIAM REGEM & exercitatione venandi & convictu Megiſtanum abſtinuiſſe, quod apud Parthos juſtitii inſtar eſt (11): that is, "The petty Kings ſhaved their beards and "their wives heads, as a mark of the greateſt grief. "And the King of Kings abſtained from the exerciſe "of hunting, and the converſation of the Nobles, "which amongſt the Parthians is a publick vacation." I am not ſurprized at Artabanus's taſte, when I conſider that the title of King of Kings was much more common than that of the Great King. Agamemnon had the title of King of Kings (12). Diodorus Siculus affirms that Ofmanduas and Seſoſtris were ſo called, one in his Epitaph (13), the other in ſome inſcriptions on pillars (14). Both of them had reigned gloriouſly in Egypt. Cyrus had ſuch a title in his Epitaph (15); and it was given to Tigranes King of Armenia (16). The holy Scriptures give it to Nebuchodonoſor (17). Note that the Kings of Perſia, who ſucceeded the Kings of the Parthians, continued

ARTABAZUS, ſon of Pharnaces, commanded the Parthians and the Choraſmians in the expedition of Xerxes (a). It was he, who, after the battle of Salamis, eſcorted the King his Maſter to the Helleſpont, with ſixty thouſand choſen men (b). As ſoon as Xerxes had repaſſed into Aſia, Artabazus followed him, and he thought himſelf obliged in his way, to puniſh the city of Potidæa, which had ſhaken off the yoke of the Perſians upon the news of their bad fortune. He beſieged it a long time without being able to take it, on account of the inundations cauſed by tempeſts. He had better ſucceſs at the ſiege of Olynthus. He diſapproved the reſolution that was taken of leaving Mardonius in Europe (c), and it was alſo againſt his advice, that Mardonius was engaged in the battle of Platææ, which was ſo fatal to the Perſians. Artabazus, who had foreſeen what would happen, preſerved the forty thouſand men that he commanded, and carried them back into Aſia with much prudence [A]. Moreri ſhews no diſcernment upon that point. See the remark.

[A] He preſerved the forty thouſand men that he commanded, and carried them back into Aſia with much prudence.] Moreri relates, that Artabazus collected the remains of his army. This is not underſtanding the Author he quotes. Herodotus gives us plainly to underſtand, that Artabazus kept theſe forty thouſand men with him as a Corps de Reſerve; and when he had a mind to bring them out to battle, he perceived the defeat of Mardonius, and took his flight another way. If Mardonius had ſurvived the loſs of this battle, he would not have failed to ſay in his Manifeſto, that Artabazus had ſacrificed him; that Artabazus had been nothing but a mere ſpectator of the battle, or elſe a run-away; that Artabazus, who had been againſt hazarding this battle, had contributed as much as he could to the loſs of it, to raiſe a trophy to his own prudence. Artabazus would not have been the only one who maintained by ſuch ſort of proofs his opinion in the Council of War. It is a ſtrange blunder in Moreri to ſay, that the Greeks loſt this battle. And this ſiege of Potidæa, naked and empty as it is of all kind of circumſtances, what does it ſignify? what will a reader be the better for it?

ARTAVASDES I, King of Armenia, ſon and ſucceſſor of that Tigranes, who was conquered by Lucullus and Pompey during the war of Mithridates, villanouſly deceived the Romans in the expedition of Craſſus (a); for after having gone to meet this General with ſix thouſand horſes, and promiſed him a ſupply of forty thouſand men, he did not keep his word, and excuſed himſelf becauſe of the war he had to maintain in his own country againſt the Parthians (b). Craſſus finding himſelf deceived, made uſe of great threats (c); but he was not in a condition to puniſh this perfidiouſneſs: on the contrary, Artavaſdes had a good ſhare in the rejoicings, which were made at the court of the King of the Parthians for the ruin of the Roman Army. He had concluded the marriage of his ſiſter with Pacorus ſon of Orodes King of the Parthians (d); and he was at the court of Orodes, during the exceſs of joy that ſuch a great victory cauſed there. He ſaw a thouſand diverſions filled with inſults on the Romans: he was at the feaſts and plays, and he heard ſome verſes of Euripides applied to the diſaſter of Craſſus, whoſe head was brought whilſt they repreſented the Bacchantes of that Poet. This was the reaſon of Plutarch's ſaying that Orodes underſtood Greek, and that Artavaſdes has compoſed Tragedies, Orations and Hiſtories [A], part of which were then remaining. I think I need not diſtinguiſh this Artavaſdes, from him who deceived Mark Anthony [B]. He perſuaded him to turn his arms againſt the King of the

[A] Artavaſdes compoſed Tragedies, Orations and Hiſtories.] Here is a Greek Poet and Hiſtorian, who as a Poet, was forgotten by Voſſius, but not as a Hiſtorian (1), tho' Mallincrot places him in his Collection of Hiſtorians, who had eſcaped former inquiries. Mallincrot obſerves, that Appian has quoted the Hiſtory of our Artavaſdes; but that he has altered the Author's name a little. He adds, that this Prince is the firſt of his name, who reigned in Armenia (2). This might be true, even tho' the conjecture of ſeveral Criticks upon a paſſage of Juſtin ſhould be true. They pretend it ſhould be read Artavaſdes and not Ortoadiſtes, in the ſecond chapter of the forty ſecond Book. There muſt then have been a King of Armenia named Artavaſdes, in the time of Mithridates the Great, King of the Parthians. This Mithridates was driven out, and was ſucceeded by his brother Orodes, who obtained ſo memorable a victory over the Romans. Our Artavaſdes indeed reigned at the ſame time with Orodes; but notwithſtanding this he might have begun to reign before him, and his father Tigranes might have died before the depoſing of Mithridates the Great; and ſo Artavaſdes might have been engaged in war with Mithridates. It is true, that to make Juſtin agree with Plutarch (3) and Dion Caſſius (4), it muſt be ſuppoſed that his Mithridates the Great is the Phrahates, which they make to reign in the time of Tigranes.

[B] I think I need not diſtinguiſh this Artavaſdes from him who deceived Mark Anthony.] Theſe are my reaſons: he who deceived Craſſus, was the ſon of Tigranes, as Dion affirms (5). He who deceived Mark Anthony, was the ſon of Tigranes according to Joſephus (6), whoſe teſtimony might be confirmed if there were occaſion, by Strabo, who affirms, not only that he who puniſhed Mark Anthony for his perfidiouſneſs reigned after Tigranes (7); but alſo that he was his ſon (8). He therefore, who put a trick upon the Romans in the time of Craſſus, is the ſame that deceived them in the expedition of Mark Antho-

the Medes (e); and by this means engaged him in an enterprize which had very ill ſucceſs, and wherein he did not ſecond him at all (f). Mark Anthony, reſerving his vengeance for a more convenient opportunity, diſſembled for the preſent; but two years after, which was in the 720th year of Rome, he uſed ſo many artifices and ſo many fine promiſes, that at laſt he drew him to have an interview with him: and then he took him priſoner and loaded him with ſilver chains [C], and led him in triumph into Alexandria. The wife and the children of Artavaſdes was alſo one of the ornaments of the triumph of Mark Anthony. They were all led to Cleopatra, in the midſt of people, laden with golden chains; but they could not obtain of them, either by promiſes or threats, to kneel down before her, or make ſupplication to her: they called her only by her name; for which reaſon they were uſed the worſe. Some time after Artavaſdes was put to death, and his head was ſent to the King of the Medes. It was Cleopatra that ſent him this preſent, when ſhe was returned to Alexandria, after the loſs of the battle of Actium (g). She thought this head would make the King of the Medes enter into a ſtricter alliance with Mark Anthony againſt Auguſtus. You may ſee in the following article what became of the ſons of Artavaſdes. He had a daughter married to the ſon of King Dejotarus (h).

ny. Moreri did not underſtand it thus; he would make us own two Artavaſdes. If he had ſtopped here, we ſhould not have wondered much at his opinion, but he proceeds to what we cannot forgive. He would have one Artavaſdes to be the compoſer of Hiſtories and Poems; and the other to be he, whom Mark Anthony led in triumph into Alexandria, the 720th year of Rome. He ſays that this latter left a ſon of the ſame name, who perhaps is he of whom Plutarch ſpeaks, who had ſo much wit (9), and who betrayed Craſſus. What blindneſs is here! Craſſus was betrayed in 701: he who betrayed him was actually King of Armenia: how then could he be the ſon of a King of Armenia, who was dethroned in 720? Moreri obſerves, that this dethroned Prince died in priſon ſome time afterwards. This is forgetting a very eſſential circumſtance; for he was killed. Ἀνῃρέθη συνάπτοντος τοῦ Ἀκτιακοῦ πολέμου (10), i. e. "He was ſlain at the time "of the fight at Actium." Cleopatra, according to Dio, was returning to Alexandria, after the battle of Actium, when this murder was committed (11). It is added that he left a ſon named Artavaſdes. This is a miſtake: his eldeſt ſon who ſucceeded him, was called Artaxias; his other ſon's name was Tigranes. And as for this other Artavaſdes, who according to Moreri's quotation of Tacitus, ſoon loſt Armenia, which Tiberius had given him, he was not the ſon of the other, and was but the third or fourth King after him. Beſides it is falſe, that Tacitus informs us Tiberius gave him Armenia. This is what he ſays: Dein juſſu Auguſti impoſitus Artavaſdes, & non ſine clade noſtra dejectus. Tum C. Cæſar componendæ Armeniæ deligitur. Is Ariobarzanem origine Medum ob inſignem corporis formam & præclarum animum volentibus Armeniis præfecit (12). i. e. "After this Artavaſdes was made King, and depoſed again not "without our loſs. Then C. Cæſar was choſen to "quiet Armenia. He preferred Ariobarzanes a Mede "by nation, on account of the great beauty of his "perſon and the excellence of his mind." Laſtly, what Moreri ſays of Auguſtus having deputed a ſon of Agrippa, who was ſoon driven away, is very falſe; for the ſending of Caius Cæſar, the ſon of Agrippa, was after the ruin of the laſt Artavaſdes. Caius Cæſar was not deputed to reign in Armenia, but only to put their affairs in order: he there eſtabliſhed Ariobarzanes; and afterwards continued to viſit the Eaſt with a pomp worthy of the preſumptive heir of the whole Roman Empire. If one ſhould take pains to make miſtakes, could one make more than Moreri? would one make ſeven or eight in ſixteen lines? Mr. Hofman makes but three in this article. He ſays, I, that Artavaſdes aſſiſted Craſſus againſt the Parthians (13): II, that Tiberius gave Armenia to another Artavaſdes: III, that before this, Auguſtus had given it to Artabazes the ſon of Agrippa, who was ſoon expelled. Mr. Lloyd has ſuppreſſed this whole article, tho' it was a pretty good one in Charles Stephens.

[C] Mark Anthony . . . . . loaded him with ſilver chains.] Dion Caſſius obſerves, that ſuch chains were made uſe of for fear of diſhonouring the Regal Majeſty by chains of iron (14). Paterculus ſays that to make them honourable, they were of gold. Catenis, ſed ne quid honori deeſſet, aureis vinxit (15). The ſame ceremony had been uſed towards Darius (16). But what ſhall we ſay to Ryckius, who has treated as a fiction a fact advanced by Louis Dorleans to make Paterculus agree with Dion (17). The fact is that Artavaſdes was loaded with ſilver chains in priſon, and golden ones on the day of triumph. Rickius affirms, that neither of theſe two Hiſtorians has ſpoken either of the poiſon, or the triumph; and that therefore they cannot be reconciled together. It is certain however, that Dion, in the ſame page, where he has ſpoken of ſilver chains, ſpeaks of golden ones for Artavaſdes and his family on the day of the triumph. What a bad thing is a treacherous memory!

ARTAVASDES II was eſtabliſhed King of Armenia by Auguſtus. He had been preceded after the death of Artavaſdes I, by Artaxias, by Tigranes, and by the children of Tigranes. Artaxias, eldeſt ſon of Artavaſdes I, made his eſcape, when his Father was put in chains (a): but not till he had tried to ſupport himſelf with his troops and by the aſſiſtance of theſe cities, which declared him King, when his Father was taken (b). He had the misfortune to be defeated by Mark Anthony; and then he took refuge among the Parthians, and he had ſuch ſucceſs by their aſſiſtance, that at laſt he became King of Armenia (c): but upon the complaints of his ſubjects, and upon the deſire they had for Tigranes his brother, who was educated at Rome, Auguſtus gave orders to Tiberius to drive out Artaxias, and confer the Kingdom on Tigranes (d). Artaxias was killed by his ſubjects before the arrival of Tiberius [A]: ſo it was not difficult to make Tigranes King (e). This happened in the 734th year of Rome. Neither Tigranes

Tacitus imputes the death of Artaxias only to the treachery of his relations, occiſo Artaxiâ per dolum propinquorum (2); but Horace aſcribes it to the valour of Tiberius, Tigranes nor his ſons enjoyed this Kingdom long (f): They gave place to Artavaſdes II [B], who kept this poſt but a very little time (g). too well how to give a good turn to events; every thing is converted into a ſubject of praiſe in their hands; they find flowers every where to make crowns for Princes. Joſephus ſays only that Artaxias was driven out by Archelaus and Tiberius (4). Suetonius, without ſaying a word of Artaxias, contents himſelf with obſerving that Tiberius ſet Tigranes upon the throne. Ducto ad Orientem exercitu regnum Armeniæ Tigrani reſtituit, ac pro Tribunali diadema impoſuit (5); that is, "Having led his army to the Eaſt, he reſtor-"ed the Kingdom of Armenia to Tigranes, and "placed a crown on his head as a ſign of his autho-"rity." The word reſtore ſeems to have been uſed improperly in this place; for Tigranes, who was the younger brother of Artaxias, had never poſſeſſed Armenia, and had no right to do ſo during the life of his elder brother. Scaliger juſtly obſerved that Euſebius ought not to have made uſe of a word, which ſignifies that Armenia was ſubdued by Tiberius (6), ſince the Armenians deſired no better than to have Tigranes for their King, whom he brought with him. But whilſt he ſo juſtly corrects this miſtake or impropriety of Euſebius (7), he would have done well to avoid the reſtituit of Suetonius, and not to have given Artaxias the title of Uſurper (8). There is another impropriety or falſhood in Euſebius, and in his tranſlator St. Jerom, which has not been corrected by Scaliger. They aſſure us that Tiberius ſeized Armenia, παρεσήσατο, occupavit Armeniam; whereas he only gave the Armenians the King, whom they deſired. It is certain beſides that he ſet him on the throne, put the crown on his head, and that he would have aſſiſted him with force, if there had been occaſion; whence comes it then that Scaliger ſays Armenia was reſtored to Tigranes without the interpoſition of Tiberius? What does he mean by maintaining that St. Jerom having affirmed that Tiberius ſeized Armenia, occupavit, muſt have believed that it belonged already to the Romans? I confeſs I underſtand nothing of this conſtruction. But why did not he fall upon Paterculus, as well as upon theſe two fathers of the Church? Paterculus, a Hiſtorian, that flatters Tiberius as much as any Poet, and praiſes him for having reduced Armenia under the power of the Romans. Redacta Armenia in poteſtatem populi Romani, regnum ejus Artavaſdi tradidit (9). This is not his only fault: he has given the name of Artavaſdes to him, whom Tiberius crowned King of Armenia; whereas he ſhould have called him Tigranes.

[B] Tigranes and his ſons .... gave place to Artavaſdes II.] The Authors of the Supplement to Moreri have been no leſs faulty than Moreri himſelf. I paſs over their ſaying that our Artavaſdes was the ſon of Artaxias, and conſequently the nephew of Tigranes: there is nothing ſaid of that in the ſecond Book of the Annals of Tacitus, the only Author that they have quoted. But let that paſs. They add that the ſons of Tigranes were called Kings by Tiberius, and that Artavaſdes II their couſin ſucceeded immediately to the crown by order of the ſame Emperor. Tacitus, their only witneſs, confounds them; for he ſays expreſly, that all this was done by Auguſtus. He does not ſay with them, that the Romans made war upon this Artavaſdes, and at laſt deſtroyed him: his words are, non ſine clade noſtra dejectus, which may ſignify the contrary to what they ſay, namely, that they drove him out in ſpite of the Romans who ſupported him, and by the defeat of their ſuccours. See the Article of ARTAVASDES King of Media. Laſtly they ſay that Tigranes, uncle to our Artavaſdes, had his head cut off at Rome, under the Emperor Tiberius. This is an abſurdity; for the inſtallation of Tigranes, uncle, as they pretend, to Artavaſdes II, was in the 734th year of Rome, and his reign was very ſhort. The puniſhment of Tigranes, under Tiberius, happened in 789. Thus, according to theſe Writers, this dethroned Prince muſt have ſurvived his fall above fifty years, and have arrived to an old age, that the Hiſtorian would not have omitted, in ſpeaking of the indignity of his death. Obſerve that Tigranes, created King of Armenia in 734, had been made priſoner with his father by Mark Anthony in 720, and that he was then pretty well grown up (10). Obſerve alſo, that ſoon after his coronation, he married his children together (11), according to the cuſtom of thoſe Nations. But further. He whom Tiberius put to death, was a grandſon of Herod. Joſephus tells us that Alexander the ſon of Herod had by Glaphyra his wife, daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, two ſons, of which one called Tigranes reigned in Armenia, and was accuſed before the Romans (12). This without doubt is he of whom Tacitus ſpeaks after the following manner: Ne Tigranes quidem Armeniâ quondam potitus, ac tunc reus, nomine regio ſupplicia civium effugit (13); that is, "Not even "Tigranes, who formerly poſſeſſed Armenia, and "was a criminal, could by means of his royal "title eſcape the puniſhment of the Citizens." Mr. de Tillemont's conjecture, that this Tigranes was King of the leſſer Armenia, which has been given by Auguſtus to Archelaus (14), would be a good one, if it could be made to agree with Joſephus, who ſays that the deſcendants of Alexander ſon of Herod and Glaphyra reigned in the greater Armenia. FAULTS of the Supplement to Moreri.

ARTAVASDES, King of Media, was attacked by Mark Anthony, at the ſollicitation of another Artavaſdes King of Armenia. This attempt was very fatal to Mark Anthony; who imagining, that the King, who had engaged him in it, had betrayed him, turned all his indignation upon him, and made an alliance with the King of Media. He gave him part of Armenia, when he had taken it from the other Artavaſdes; and he reſolved to cement that peace by the marriage of his ſon Alexander with Jotape the King of Media's daughter. The troops which he ſupplied him with, rendered him victorious over the Parthians, and over Artaxias the ſon of Artavaſdes King of Media; but when he had recalled them, and detained thoſe which his ally had lent him, the latter could not ſupport himſelf againſt his enemies, but was taken priſoner. Dion Caſſius relates this under the year 721 of Rome (a). It is probable that this Prince did not long continue priſoner, and that he was that King of Media, to whom Cleopatra ſent the head of Artavaſdes King of Armenia in the year 724 of Rome (b). The Supplement to Moreri is full of errors in this Article [A].

(a) Dion, lib. 49.

(b) Idem, lib. 51.

[A] The ſupplement to Moreri is full of Errors in this Article.] We are told there, I, that this Artavaſdes King of the Medes, ſon and ſucceſſor of Darius, maintained vigorouſly the war againſt Artavaſdes King of Armenia and againſt Pompey: II, that he was at laſt defeated by the Parthians, and fled to Rome to Auguſtus, who gave him the leſſer Armenia inſtead of Media, which he had loſt. Plutarch and Dion Caſſius L. XLIX. are quoted for this purpoſe. But to confute this in a retrograde way; is it not trifling with the world to quote Plutarch ſimply? Does not this ſhew an inclination to commit errors with impunity?

ARTAXATA

ARTAXATA [A], was the capital city of Armenia upon the river Araxes. Hannibal was the perſon who not only formed the plan of it, but likewiſe directed the building of it at the requeſt of Artaxias King of Armenia, to whoſe court he retired after the defeat of Antiochus (a). It is probable that a ſituation which was choſen by ſo great a General, was very advantageous [B], as well in time of war as in that of peace. This city was burnt by Corbulo in the year 811 of Rome (b). This great General would not have uſed ſo much rigour againſt the inhabitants, who had brought him the keys of their city when he had laid ſiege to it, if the laws of war had not in a manner obliged him to it [C]. It was a large city, which he could not keep without a ſtrong garriſon; and it was not poſſible for him to leave in it ſo many ſoldiers as were neceſſary, without weakening his army in ſuch a manner, as would render him incapable of undertaking any further enterpriſe; and there would have been neither profit nor glory in the conqueſt of a place which he muſt have left juſt as he had taken it. He reſolved therefore to deſtroy it, and he was encouraged in that reſolution by a great miracle [D], ſi credere dignum eſt, if we think it worth our while to credit it. The city was covered all of a ſudden with a thick cloud, from whence proceeded a prodigious many flaſhes of lightning, impunity? For who would not rather chuſe to refrain from criticizing, than to read two large Volumes in folio, in order to verify an inconſiderable fact? It is certain, that Dion Caſſius in the XLIXth Book, does not at all mention, that this Artavaſdes took refuge at Rome, or that Auguſtus gave him the leſſer Armenia. I know of no Author, who aſſerts this. I find indeed in Tacitus, that Auguſtus gave the Kingdom of Armenia to one Artavaſdes, after the ſon of Tigranes; but not that he did it in order to make him ſatisfaction for the loſs of Media. It is probable, that thoſe, who compiled the third Volume of Moreri, made uſe of this paſſage of Tacitus for two purpoſes; on one hand, to aſſert that Tiberius gave Armenia to one Artavaſdes, the ſon of Artaxias, and nephew of Tigranes (1); and on the other hand, to tell us, that Auguſtus gave that Kingdom to one Artavaſdes, who had been deprived of that of Media. In ſhort, what a negligence is it, to aſſert, that he made a vigorous ſtand againſt the King of Armenia, and againſt Pompey? This war againſt the King of Armenia, who had no occaſion to be repelled with vigour, if we conſider the treachery of that Prince towards Mark Anthony, was later by about thirty years than that, which Pompey carried on in that country. I have not obſerved either in Plutarch or Appian any Artavaſdes King of Media, who was attacked by Pompey. I have only found in Appian, that Pompey ſubdued Darius King of the Medes (2).

[A] ARTAXATA.] Plutarch obſerves, that this city took its name from that of King Artaxas (or Artaxias), to whom Hannibal propoſed the building of it (1). What Lloyd and Baudrand remark, that Tacitus calls it Artaxia, is not true; for he conſtantly calls it Artaxata. And with regard to what they add, that Strabo gives it the name of Artaxiaſata (2), it is not exact; for this plainly inſinuates, that he calls it only by that name, or at leaſt that it is the principal one, that he gives it. Now it is certain that he generally calls it Artaxata, and that he only ſays once, that it had likewiſe the Name of Artaxiaſata. Pinedo had reaſon to change Ἀρταξιατώτα into Ἀρταξιασάτα in the Stephanus Byzantinus, who undoubtedly did not write it in a different manner from Strabo, ſince he quotes him. It is certain at leaſt, that he did not call this city Artaxia, as Ortelius falſly charges him, as well as Tacitus. The omiſſion which Pinedo reproaches Stephanus with, is inexcuſable; for Hannibal's flying into Armenia, and obſerving a very advantageous ſituation for a city, which he adviſed the Prince who entertained him, to build there, and his undertaking the direction of that affair, are circumſtances, which ought not to have been ſuppreſſed in a Dictionary of cities. I am inclined to think, that Stephanus having Strabo before him, when he wrote the article of Artaxata, did not omit to take notice of what he read there concerning Hannibal; and that it was his Abbreviator, who was inferior to him in judgment, to whom we ought to impute the neglect which Pinedo juſtly complains of. There is no work perhaps, which requires more ſagacity and judgment than the abridgment of a large Book (3). I am never tired with repeating this remark, ſince I ſuffer every day a great deal from the careleſsneſs of the authors of abridgments. They are the occaſion, that I find perplexing obſcurities in an hundred places, which were probably very intelligible in the author who is abridged. See Mr. Gronovius's remark againſt the Authors of the Synopſis Criticorum (4).

(2) It is probably an error of the preſs, that we read Arraxiaſata in Mr. Baudrand.

[B] Its ſituation was very advantageous.] Strabo tells us, that Artaxata was built in a place, where the river formed a Peninſula, ſo that the walls were ſurrounded by the River, almoſt like an intire circle. The Tranſlator of that Author did not underſtand this paſſage, and Pinedo has juſtly reproached him with it (5). If we were only to conſult the Tranſlation, we ſhould imagine that this city had no walls, except where the river did not ſurround it. Cincta muri loco flumine, niſi quà iſthmus eſt. The Greek ſays nothing of that kind: τὸ τεῖχος κύκλῳ περιελιττόμενον τὸν ποταμὸν πλὴν τῷ ἰσθμοῦ.

(5) Pinedo in Stephan. de Urbib. pag. 117.

[C] It was burnt by Corbulo - - - whom the laws of war in a manner forc'd to it.] The more we conſider the inevitable conſequences of war, the more we ſhall find ourſelves inclined to deteſt thoſe, who are the occaſion of it. Here is Corbulo, who reduces to aſhes a large and beautiful city, and who involves in the moſt dreadful Deſolation an infinite number of women, children, and aged people, who had never done him any injury. Aſk thoſe, who are more converſant in military affairs, whether he acted well, they will anſwer you in the affirmative; and that if he had not done ſo, he would have acted like a very unſkilful General, as it would be eaſy to ſhew by the reaſons mentioned by Tacitus. Artaxatis ignis immiſſus deletaque & ſolo æquata ſunt, quia nec teneri ſine valido præſidio ob magnitudinem mœnium, nec id nobis virium erat, quod firmando præſidio & capeſſendo bello divideretur, vel ſi integra & incuſtodita relinqueretur nulla in eo utilitas aut gloria, quod capta eſſent (6). i. e. "Artaxata was ſet fire to, and levelled "with the ground, becauſe it could not be kept with- "out a ſtrong Garriſon on account of the extent of "the walls, and becauſe we had not forces enough "to ſupply that Garriſon and carry on the war; "and if it had been left entire and without a Gar- "riſon, there would have been no advantage or glory "in taking of that city." The reproaches which are caſt upon an enemy, when he abandons his conqueſts without depriving them of all power to injure him, or when he does not ſecure them by weakening his army too much, render him ſo contemptible, that in order to preſerve his reputation, which is one of the moſt conſiderable reſources of war, he is obliged never to give occaſion to ſuch reproaches. It is therefore a fatal and melancholy neceſſity, that the ſevere laws of war ſhould force a General to deprive his enemy of that, which he cannot make any advantage of himſelf.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. 13. cap. 41.

[D] He was encouraged in that reſolution by a great miracle.] Tacitus himſelf with all his great genius gave up himſelf as readily as any other man to the Marvellous, which people love to indulge themſelves in the ſearch and belief of. The inhabitants of Artaxata endeavoured to comfort themſelves upon the ruin of their city among other reaſons by ſome miracle, which aſſured them, that the Gods had not been pleaſed with it; and they eaſily believed whatever was invented with that view. But they have had no Hiſtorian, who has informed us, what they believed ning, while the Sun continued to ſhine round the walls of it. This city was rebuilt ſome time after by Tiridates, who called it Neronea in honour of Nero (c), who had ſhewn him a great many civilities at Rome, when he went thither to do him homage in the year of Rome 819.

believed in this point. The Romans on the other hand did not want perſons, who turned the tables in favour of them. We are obliged to Tacitus for this account. Adjicitur miraculum velut numine oblatum, nam cuncta extra tectis hactenus ſole inluſtria fuere, quod mœnibus cingebatur ita repente atrâ nube coopertum, fulguribuſque diſcretum eſt, ut quaſi infenſantibus Deis exitio tradi crederetur (7). i. e. "To this was added a miracle, which was thought to have been ſhewed by the Deity; for all parts without the city were ſtill enlightened by the Sun, while all within the walls was of a ſudden covered with a black cloud, the lightning flaſhing out perpetually; ſo that the city ſeemed to be delivered up to deſtruction by the Gods themſelves, who were angry with it."

(7) Idem, ibid.

ARTAXIAS I, King of Armenia, while he was only one of Antiochus the Great's Generals, ſeized Armenia, and divided it with another of the Generals of that King [A]. This Prince gave both of them leave to enjoy a ſovereign command there (a). They did not fail of taking the advantage of this complaiſance of his; and when he was defeated by the Roman armies, they ſubmitted to the conquerors, who gave them the title of King (b); after which they enlarged their own dominions as much as poſſible at the expence of the adjacent countries. Tigranes, who was ſo famous during the wars of Mithridates, whoſe daughter he had married, was deſcended from Artaxias. Plutarch tells us, that Hannibal having retired to the court of Artaxias after the defeat of Antiochus, gave him a great deal of excellent counſel; and that having found a place which was neglected, though very proper to build a city in, he drew a plan of one, and carried Artaxias to the place, and adviſed him to build it. Artaxias was extremely pleaſed with the propoſal, and deſired Hannibal to undertake the care of this work, which the latter conſented to; and from hence aroſe that great and beautiful city, which was called from him Artaxata (c). This is all that I can find in the two authors quoted in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary (d); for with regard to Artaxias's revolt againſt his lawful Prince, occaſioned by the confidence which he had in the friendſhip of the Romans (e), I ſee not the leaſt ſhadow or trace of it, any more than of his employing all poſſible means to ſupport himſelf in his uſurpation, nor of his death in priſon under Antiochus Epiphanes. Theſe are mere chimeras without the leaſt authority to ſupport them.

ARTAXIAS II, King of Media, the eldeſt ſon of Artavaſdes, as we have already obſerved (a), was proclaimed King by the army of his father [A], after the latter was taken priſoner with his wife and his other children (b). The eldeſt endeavoured to ſupport himſelf againſt Mark Anthony, and gave him battle; but he was defeated, and obliged to fly into the country of the Parthians. He returned afterwards to Armenia, and reigned there. This was undoubtedly after the taking of Artavaſdes King of Media; for before the Parthians had taken this King (c), they had been defeated, and Artaxias had a ſhare in this diſgrace. He diſpleaſed his ſubjects in ſuch a manner, that they accuſed him at Rome, and deſired Tigranes his younger brother for King (d). Auguſtus, who had this Tigranes with him at court, ſent him to them, and gave orders to Tiberius to crown him. Artaxias was killed by his own relations before the arrival of Tiberius.

[A] He was proclaimed King by the troops of his father.] The Continuators of Moreri repreſent Joſephus or Tacitus as ſaying, that it was Mark Anthony, who placed Artaxias upon the throne. But there is nothing more falſe than this. They add, that Artaxias having been defeated was ſent into exile among the Parthians. This is another miſtake: for he fled thither for refuge. If Mark Anthony had been in a condition to baniſh him after his victory, he would not have baniſhed him among the Parthians, but have carried him to Alexandria in Chains.

ARTAXIAS III, King of Armenia, was the ſon of Polemo King of Pontus, and was named Zeno. He was ſo highly fond from his infancy of imitating the cuſtoms of the Armenians, that he gained by that means the eſteem of that nation, for which reaſon Germanicus thought that he ought not to chooſe any other perſon to fill up the place of Vonones, whom the Armenians had baniſhed. He went therefore to Artaxata, and in the preſence of all the people gave the diadem to this Zeno in the year of Rome 771. The Aſſembly immediately proclaimed him by the name of Artaxias, after that of the capital city. Tacitus, who informs us of all theſe particulars (a), ſpeaks of his death under the year 788 (b).

This latter reaſon, which is much leſs pertinent than the former, has notwithſtanding been adopted by a perſon of great merit (4). Artemidorus confutes it himſelf beyond contradiction, ſince he declares that he had ſtiled himſelf the Epheſian in a great many of his books. He had no deſign therefore to prevent his being confounded with Artemidorus the Geographer. He was undoubtedly much better known by the title of the Epheſian than by that of the Daldian (5).

(5) Lucian in his Philopatr. quotes Ἀρτεμίδωρον τὸν Ἐφέσιον; i. e. " Artemidorus " the Epheſian.

[B] Artemidorus laboured upon a ſubject very unworthy of a man of ſenſe.] If a man was not convinced by his own experience, that there is nothing more confuſed, generally ſpeaking (6), than the ideas, which are called dreams, yet he has nothing to do but to conſider the rules of this Author, and he will neceſſarily be perſuaded that his art deſerves no regard from a man of ſenſe. There is not one dream, which Artemidorus has explained in a particular manner, but what will admit of a very different explication, and that with the ſame probability, and with equal Analogy at leaſt, as thoſe, upon which our Author proceeds. I ſay nothing of the injury, which is done to thoſe intelligent Beings, to whoſe direction we muſt neceſſarily aſcribe our dreams, if we would find in them any preſage of future Events. What a ſtrange manner of acting is imputed to them! How unworthy of their ſuperior underſtanding, their gravity, and in ſhort of their real character. If they cannot inſtruct us in a better way, how great is their ignorance! If they are unwilling to do it, their want of benevolence is equally remarkable (7). Have not we a right to complain a thouſand times of our good Angel, as well as of our bad one, in theſe words of Æneas;

(6) We do not pretend to ſay any thing againſt the extraordinary dreams mentioned in Scripture.

(7) Compare this with the reflections of Artabanus. See the note [O] of his Article.

—— " Ah whither doſt thou fly?

That which is beyond my conception is, to obſerve that Artemidorus has laboured ſo much to perſuade himſelf of the truth of an opinion, which muſt occaſion him ſo much uneaſineſs. Might not he juſtly be fearful of dreaming what his art would ſhew him to be an ill preſage. He had found by his Reſearches, that when a traveller dreams, that he has left the key of his houſe, it is a ſign, that his daughter has been debauched (9). If Artemidorus had dreamt ſuch a dream abroad, would not he have thought, that the laſt favour had been granted at his houſe? Would it have been for his advantage to have known this? Or rather would it not have been better not to have known it? He tells us, that having dreamt that his wife had inſulted him (10), he was troubled the next day, when he ſaw a man, who was not one of his friends, come to him. We ſee how by virtue of his Oneirocriticks he turned an imaginary into a real evil.

(10) Δέξας ὑπὸ τῆς ἑαυτῆ γυναικὸς ἐν ὕπνοις ὑβρίζεσθαι. Cornarius tranſlates it thus, per ſomnium viſus ſum mihi ab uxore meâ vituperiis & plagis impeti. Artemid. lib. 2. cap. 53. p. 144.

The objection which I have urged, and which I found upon the ideas, which the Chriſtian Divines give us of the Nature of Angels, appears to me very ſtrong upon the ſuppoſition of the truth of theſe ideas. But if we follow a different ſcheme from this, and ſuch an one as is not inconſiſtent with the poſſibility of things, this objection will be conſiderably weakened. We may then ſay, that there are a great many Spirits not only more limited than men in ſome reſpects, with regard to their manner of explaining themſelves; but likewiſe more fickle and capricious. Who knows whether they may not love to divert themſelves at our expence, and to make us hunt after riddles, or mix ſomething childiſh and impertinent deſignedly, in order to procure themſelves a more ridiculous ſcene? Who knows but that we may ſerve them for ſport, as the beaſts ſerve us? Who knows whether they may not find in the motion of our animal ſpirits an obſtacle, which they cannot ſurmount, when they endeavour to render themſelves intelligible to us? See the note [D] of the article MAJUS. However, reaſon requires that a man ſhould not make an art of this, and that he ſhould conſider ſuch an art as the moſt chimerical and impertinent of all employments.

[C] He was not ſatisfied with buying all that had been written concerning the explication of dreams; which amounted to many volumes.] I have already declared my aſtoniſhment that there ſhould be perſons, who have endeavoured to convince themſelves of the truth of the pretended ſcience of dreams. I do not at all wonder, that ſeveral perſons, who call themſelves Fortune-tellers, ſhould boaſt of poſſeſſing this art. They might ſupport themſelves by this means, and make an advantage of the dreams of others, without troubling themſelves about their own; for they might perhaps have no belief in the art which they profeſſed. But I cannot judge thus of Artemidorus, or of many other grave Authors, who have written upon the Explication of dreams (11). They were deceived firſt themſelves. Here follow thoſe mentioned by Rigaltius (12). Artemon Mileſius, Antiphon, Apollodorus Telmiſſenſis, Apollonius Attalenſis, Ariſtander Telmiſſenſis, Ariſtarchus, Alexander Myndius, Cratippus, Demetrius Phalereus, Dionyſius Rhodius, Epicharmus, Geminus Tyrius (13), Hermippus, Nicoſtratus Epheſius, Phœbus Antiochenus, Philochorus, Panyaſis Halicarnaſſus, Serapion, Strato. Theſe were all prior to Artemidorus according to Rigaltius. Tertullian names only part of them: Quanti autem, ſays he (14), commentatores & adfirmatores in hanc rem, Artemon, Antiphon, Strato, Philochorus, Epicharmus, Serapion, Cratippus, & Dionyſius Rhodius, Hermippus, tota ſæculi literatura. Andrew Schottus mentions beſides ſome of theſe Aſtrampſychus, Caſſius Maximus, contract an acquaintance with fortune-tellers. He had an extenſive correſpondence with thoſe in the cities and aſſemblies of Greece, in Italy, and the moſt populous Iſlands, and he collected every where the old dreams, and the events which were ſaid to have attended them (b). He deſpiſed the reproaches of thoſe grave and ſupercilious perſons, who treat thoſe as ſharpers, impoſtors, and jugglers, who pretend to foretel things [D], and without paying any regard to what ſuch Cato's ſay, he frequented thoſe Diviners for ſeveral years. In ſhort he devoted all his time and pains to the ſearch after dreams; and he imagined, that this prodigious labour had enabled him to warrant his interpretations by reaſon and experience [E]. He was very careful in inſtructing his ſon in the ſame Sciences, as appears by the two books which he dedicated to him. I am the leſs ſurprized, that he ſhould ſo entirely employ himſelf in this ſubject, when I conſider that he thought himſelf determined to it by the advice, and in ſome meaſure by the command of Apollo (c). He deſires all his readers, in a very ſerious manner, not to retrench any thing from his book, and not to add any thing to it; and he adjures them as it were to obſerve his requeſt in the name of that all-piercing eye of Providence, which ſuperintends the Univerſe [F]. He dedicated his three firſt books to one Caſſius Maximus [G], and the two others to his ſon. They were printed in Greek at Venice in 1518. Rigaltius publiſhed them at Paris in Greek and Latin in 1603, and added ſome notes. The Latin verſion, which mus, and Dionyſius Heliopolita (15). He tells us, that Artemidorus has quoted the two laſt; but with regard to Caſſius Maximus I do not find, that Artemidorus, who dedicated the three firſt Books of his work to him, ſpeaks of him but only as a man who was curious in that ſcience (16), and who might be maſter of it in a ſhort time (17). And as for Dionyſius Heliopolita, I have not found any mention of him in Artemidorus. We may rank Pappus of Alexandria among theſe upon ſure grounds; for he wrote an Explication of Dreams, as Suidas informs us. See above the article of ACHMET. Among the moderns there is one Joſua Abrech, who promiſed very great things in the title of his Book. All that I know of him is from Vander Linden (18), and Theophilus Spizelius (19). His work was printed in the year 1607. We ſhall give an account of Junianus Majus in his proper place (20). I juſt now recollect that Lyſimachus, the ſon of Ariſtides's daughter, maintained himſelf by interpreting of dreams in the publick ſtreets: Μνημονεύει Ἀριστείδου Δυσιστρώτου ἐν μάλα πένητα Λυσίμαχον, ὃς ἑαυτὸν ἐκ πινακίου τινὸς ὀνειροκριτικοῦ παρὰ τὸ ἰακχεῖον λεγόμενον καθεζόμενος ἔτρεφε (21). i. e. "Among the grandſons of Ariſtides by his daughter, "Lyſimachus was extremely poor, who ſat near the "place called Jaccheum, and ſupported himſelf by "explaining dreams by a table." Poverty had reduced him to this. He would have done leſs diſhonour to his grandfather's memory, if inſtead of following of ſuch a method of life, he had made uſe of an awl and laſt, to mend old ſhoes.

But was Artemidorus in ſuch a circumſtance? Was he much leſs blameable than thoſe, who in imitation of Catullus, unreaſonably laugh at the cenſures of theſe old Dotards?

(25) Idem, ibid.

[G] He dedicated his three firſt Books to one Caſſius Maximus.] Rigaltius can find out no ſuch perſon; and perhaps, ſays he, it ſhould be read TABIΩ or TATIΩ MAΞIMΩ; for Julius Capitolinus mentions one Gavius Maximus, who was Prefect of the Pretorium for twenty years in the reign of Antoninus, and was ſucceeded by Tatius Maximus. However that be, the Patron of Artemidorus's Book was a Phœnician by nation (26), a great Orator, and a man of ſo penetrating a genius, that without reading all that Authors have ſaid, he underſtood their works (27). Andrew Schottus calls him Coſſinus Maximus, and diſtinguiſhes him from Caſſius Maximus (28). Here are two errors for one, without mentioning that in note [C] (29). I cannot tell whether any perſon has ever thought of this conjecture, that we ought to read Claudius Maximus inſtead of Caſſius Maximus. There was one Claudius Maximus a Proconſul of Africa under the Emperor Antoninus Pius. The charge of Magic, from which Apuleius vindicated himſelf, was brought before him in order to be tried. It appears from ſeveral paſſages of his Defence, that this Claudius Maximus was conſidered as a man of learning, and one who was very curious in Books of Philoſophy. Bene quod apud te, Maxime, cauſa agitur, qui pro tua eruditione legiſti profecto Ariſtotelis περὶ ζώων γενέσεως, περὶ ζώων ἀνατομῆς, περὶ ἱστορίας multijuga volumina; præterea problemata innumera ejuſdem, tum ex eadem ſectâ cæterorum, in quibus id genus varia tractantur. i. e. We muſt trace this matter a little higher in order to diſcover the origin of this miſtake; and it will be of ſome advantage to make this obſervation. It may diſcover to thoſe, who make abridgments, the moſt fruitful ſource of the errors, into which they lead their readers. Geſner ſays: Artemidorus . . . ſcripſit de Somniorum Interpretatione libros quatuor, item de Auguriis, & Manuum Inſpectione. Suidas. Hujus Autoris quinque libros Aldus Græcè excudit (34). i. e. " Ar- " temidorus . . . . . wrote four Books concerning the " Interpretation of dreams; likewiſe concerning Au- " guries and Chiromancy. Suidas. Aldus printed " five Books of this Author in Greek." He had obſerved afterwards that theſe five Books relate only to dreams. Simler has abridged this paſſage in the following manner: Artemidorus . . . ſcripſit de Somniorum Interpretatione lib. 4. Item de Auguriis, & Manuum Inſpectione. Eos Aldus Græcè excudit. i. e. " Artemidorus . . . . wrote four Books concerning the " Interpretation of Dreams; and likewiſe concerning " Auguries and Chiromancy. Aldus printed them " in Greek." Is this abridging the Expreſſions of an Author, or falſifying them? It is rather the latter than the former.

ARTEMISIA, Queen of Caria, and daughter of Lygdamis [A], attended in perſon King Xerxes in his expedition againſt the Greeks [B]. She was a Lady capable of executing great affairs, and miſtreſs of a reſolution and courage which would have abſolutely become a man. Being poſſeſſed therefore of the ſovereign authority during the preparations of Xerxes, on account of her being a widow, and of the minority of her ſon (a), ſhe took that opportunity of gaining herſelf a great reputation, and engaged of her own accord in that expedition. She diſtinguiſhed her ſelf very remarkably both by her council and perſonal valour. The reaſons which ſhe urged to ſupport her opinion againſt fighting the battle at Salamis (b), were the moſt ſenſible in the world. She extricated her ſelf very artfully out of the danger in that battle, for finding herſelf purſued by an Athenian ſhip without the leaſt poſſibility of defending herſelf, ſhe attacked a Perſian ſhip commanded by Damaſithymus King of Calyndus, with whom ſhe had before had a conteſt, and ſunk it (c). This made thoſe who purſued her imagine, that her ſhip was of the ſide of the Greeks [C], and they ceaſed their purſuit. It was fortunate for her, that there was not one perſon ſaved out of Damaſithymus's ſhip, ſo that ſhe was ſo far from being conſidered as the occaſion of that loſs, that ſhe eſcaped the enemy, and was applauded for having ſunk one of the Grecian ſhips. [A] She was the daughter of Lygdamis.] Herodotus does not ſay what Moreri repreſents him to do; that Lygdamis was King of Halicarnaſſus (1). He only ſays that Artemiſia was of Halicarnaſſus on her father's ſide, and of Crete on that of her mother. If I had not found in the ſame Hiſtorian, that the Lygdamis, who aſſiſted Piſiſtratus, and to whom Piſiſtratus, after he had re-eſtabliſhed himſelf at Athens, gave the command of the Iſle of Naxos, was a native of that Iſle (2), I ſhould have taken him for the father and grandfather of our Artemiſia. Mr. Blancard has continued in his Edition of Harpocration (3) the error of the preceding Editions, viz. Damis for Lygdamis (4). Valeſius's Notes inform us of the correction, which ought to be made there, and which Gronovius made in his Edition of Harpocration in 1696.

[C] This made thoſe who purſued her imagine, that her ſhip was of the ſide of the Greeks.] Herodotus has omitted a very eſſential circumſtance, without which his account wants a great deal of probability. He does not tell us, as he ought to have done, and as Polyænus has actually done, that Artemiſia ordered the Perſian Flag to be taken down in her ſhip (8). Polyænus repreſents her as uſing the ſame conduct with thoſe pirates, who put up all kinds of flags according as they have occaſion for them. When Artemiſia purſued a Greek ſhip ſhe ſet up a flag belonging to the barbarous nations; but when it was neceſſary to fly from the Greeks, ſhe ſet up their flag. He repreſents this Queen's manner of fighting ſo very differently, that he multiplies it into three or four diſtinct actions; and he mentions a ſpindle and diſtaff, which were ſent by the King of Perſia to a Captain of a ſhip; in which account we can find no manner of ſenſe, ſince the ſhip, which was attacked by Artemiſia, was ſunk, and not one perſon eſcaped.

poſed upon in this affair; for he declared, that the men had behaved like women, and the women like men [D]. He intruſted her with the care of the young Princes of Perſia his ſons, when agreeably to her advice he abandoned Greece in order to return to Aſia. The Athenians were ſo highly incenſed that a woman ſhould make war againſt them, that they promiſed a large ſum of money to thoſe who ſhould take Artemiſia priſoner, and ordered all the commanders of their ſhips to uſe their utmoſt efforts for that purpoſe (d). Her ſtatue was to be ſeen at Lacedæmon among thoſe of the Perſian Generals, in the Portico, which was built from the ſpoils of that nation (e). The artifices which ſhe made uſe of in order to gain the poſſeſſion of Latmus was as admirable, according to the precepts of Machiavel, as it was bad according to thoſe of Chriſtianity. She placed her troops in ambuſcade, and went with all the attendance proper for a journey of devotion, attended with eunuchs, women, trumpets and drums, to celebrate the Feaſt of the Mother of the Gods in a wood, which was conſecrated to her near that city. The inhabitants being pleaſed with this zeal of her's, went out of the city in order to admire her devotion, and in the mean time Artemiſia's troops ſeized upon Latmus (f). Theſe great qualifications did not ſecure her from the weakneſs of love [E]. For ſhe was paſſionately fond of a man of Abydos, whoſe name was Dardanus, and was ſo enraged at his neglect of her, that ſhe put out his eyes while he lay aſleep (g). The Gods, in order to puniſh her for this, poſſeſſed her with a ſtill ſtronger paſſion for him, ſo that the Oracle having adviſed her to go to Leucas (h), which was the refuge of deſperate lovers, ſhe took the leap from thence but did not eſcape. She was interred at that place. A great many Writers erroneouſly confound her with Artemiſia the wife of Mauſolus [F], whom

To theſe let us add thoſe of Juſtin. Artemiſia Regina Halicarnaſſi, quæ in auxilium Xerxi venerat, inter primos duces bellum acerrimè ciebat, quippe ut in viro muliebrem timorem, ita in muliere virilem audaciam cerneres (10). i. e. Semiramis, who was a woman of the moſt ambitious and warlike diſpoſition imaginable, was extremely laſcivious. It is remarkable, that the greateſt ſoldiers are generally of an amorous complexion, upon which account the myſtical Commentators may pay a compliment to Homer, who has repreſented ſo naturally the intrigues of Mars and Venus. But I am of opinion, that with regard to women this is not ſo common, and that an engagement in great affairs raiſes them much more above the ſenſibilities of love.

(11) Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 25.

[F] A great many perſons erroneouſly confound her with Artemiſia, the wife of Mauſolus.] Pliny ſeems to have been faulty in this reſpect; for he tells us, that Artemiſia, the wife of Mauſolus, gave her name to an herb, which was called Parthenis (12). Now ſince Herodotus mentions the herb Artemiſia, (it is the ſame that the French call Armoiſe, and which the Engliſh call Mugwort,) and ſince the wife of Mauſolus did not live till after Hippocrates, it follows that one of the two Artemiſia's was taken for the other in this paſſage of Pliny. If one of them gave her name to this herb, it muſt have been the daughter of Lygdamis, the prudent and courageous Artemiſia, who attended Xerxes. Mr. Chevreau, from whom I have borrowed this remark againſt Pliny, informs me, that Leo Allatius, from whom he had taken it, has very juſtly criticized Robert Stephens, who tells us (13), that Artemiſia the wife of Mauſolus ſignalized herſelf in the war, which Xerxes carried on againſt Greece (14). Mr. Chevreau has remarked the ſame miſtake in the Hiſtorical Theatre of Chriſtian Mathieu. He adds, that it was not without ſome grounds, that Pliny in the paſſage which he quoted gave Mauſolus the title of the Wealthy. I find indeed this Epithet in Du Pinet's tranſlation; but not in Father Hardouin's Edition of Pliny; and I only obſerve, that Pliny, deſcribing in another place (15) the magnificence of the Mauſoleum, contents himſelf with ſaying, that Mauſolus was a petty King of Caria, Cariæ Regulus. Father Hardouin endeavours to aſſiſt his Author by ſuppoſing, that all the Kings of Caria were called by the name of Mauſolus, as all the Kings of Egypt were called by that of Ptolemy; and that therefore Artemiſia the wife of Mauſolus, to whom Pliny aſcribes the ambition of having given her name to an herb, was the Lady who lived in the time of Xerxes. But he will give me leave to ſay, that his Author upon that ſuppoſition would be exceptionable on another account. He would have deſcribed a particular Queen by a title, which was common to her with all the other Queens of that country. Father Hardouin founds his conjectures upon a paſſage, in which the two Artemiſia's are ſtiled Queens of Caria (16). I paſs over this foundation of the conjectures; but I find, that Tzetzes is a little embarraſſed in this point (17). One of the Artemiſia's, according to him, was the wife of Mauſolus; the other that of Hecatomnus; and he tells us, that the former was ſhe who attended Xerxes. Now all the Authors are agreed, that the Lady, who built a magnificent monument for her huſband was the daughter of Hecatomnus, and the wife of Mauſolus; and that the Artemiſia, who attended Xerxes againſt the Greeks, was the daughter of Lygdamis. The great Scaliger will not eſcape cenſure here; he has too plainly taken one for the other (18), and that in a place, where it was not eaſy to miſtake thus; for it is in the extract of a Book, in which the Author expreſly tells us, that he ſpeaks of Artemiſia the daughter of Lygdamis, who took up arms for the Perſians (19). Scaliger ſuppreſſing all theſe characteriſticks has ſubſtituted that of the widow of Mauſolus, which can only be applied to the Queen of Caria, who paid ſo great honours to her huſband's memory. This great man has miſled another great man, ſince he was the occaſion of Henry Valeſius's affirming, that Artemiſia, after the death of Mauſolus, ſeeing herſelf ſlighted by Dardanus, whom ſhe was in love with, put out his eyes, and afterwards finding herſelf ſtill more enamoured of him went, and took the leap of Leucas, which proved fatal to her (20). If we do but even tranſiently compare this paſſage with that of Scaliger, we ſhall ſee evidently, that the one is copied from the other. This miſtake of Valeſius in ſo obvious a ſubject, and the difference which he obſerves between Theopompus, who tells us, that ſhe died of regret for the loſs of her huſband, and Ptolemy the ſon of Hephæſtion, who affirms, that ſhe died out of love to another man, as Valeſius pretends, are two circumſtances ſo much the more ſurprizing, as he had quoted but two lines above the ſeventh Book of this Ptolemy, in order to prove that Artemiſia's father was not named Damis, but Lygdamis. Mr. Menage having mentioned a great many advantageous things of Artemiſia the wife of Mauſolus, and particularly the honour which has been done her of propoſing her as a model of conjugal affection, proceeds in this manner: However Ptolemy the ſon of Hephæſtion . . . . tells us that Artemiſia was ſo enamoured of one Dardanus, &c. Having repeated the whole ſtory, he goes on thus: " There were two " Artemiſia's, both Queens of Caria, as we are in" formed by Suidas; one of whom was married to " Mauſolus, and the other was more ancient. And " if this ſtory be true, it is probable that it happen" ed to the firſt Artemiſia, and that Ptolemy the ſon " of Hephæſtion, who aſcribes it to the wife of Mau" ſolus, is miſtaken (23)." The conjecture of this learned man is very juſt; but he is miſtaken in aſſerting, that this Polemy aſcribes the adventure, which he mentions, to the wife of Mauſolus. Became afterwards deeply in love with Dardanus; and that there was no profeſſed coquette, who would not have been aſhamed of the extravagancies of that Queen. Upon this occaſion he quotes what Scaliger relates. We ſee here a very ingenious Gentleman, or rather two of them, Mr. Saraſin and Mr. Menage, both impoſed upon by the learned Scaliger. The ingenious Author of the New Dialogues of the Dead has ſuppoſed, that the ſame Artemiſia, who lamented ſo much her huſband's death, fell in love with a young Gentleman (25).

We ſhould run out into a long detail, if we were to mention all thoſe, who have confounded the two Artemiſia's. Raviſius Tector (26), and the Authors of the Theſaurus Fabri are of this number. Olivier, who wrote a Commentary upon Valerius Maximus, is another, tho' he knew that Strabo and Herodotus do not agree concerning the Genealogy of that Artemiſia, whom they ſpeak of (27). He imagined that one of theſe two Authors was miſtaken, and did not conſider that one of them ſpoke of one, and the other of the other, and that they were both in the right. Mr. Hofman indeed has given us two articles of Artemiſia; but he has introduced very confuſedly in the former what ſhould have been related in the latter article; and he did not know, that the wife of Mauſolus, aad the daughter of Lygdamis, are the ſame perſon. Beſides he quotes Vitruvius for ſuch facts, as he never mentions. Mr. Lloyd ſet him the example in this falſe quotation, which he did not correct in copying Charles Stephens, with whom on the other hand he has taken a ſtrange liberty, by retrenching the whole article of Artemiſia, who attended Xerxes, which was a very good article.

ARTEMISIA, Queen of Caria, daughter of Hecatomnus (a), ſiſter and wife of Mauſolus, has immortalized herſelf by the honours which ſhe paid to the memory of her huſband. She built for him in Halicarnaſſus a very magnificent tomb, which was called the Mauſoleum, and which was one of the ſeven wonders of the world, and afterwards gave the title of Mauſoleum to all the tombs, which were remarkable for the grandeur and ſumptuouſneſs of them. Pliny has given us a particular deſcription of this pompous monument (b). The reader may ſee it in French in M. Chevreau's Hiſtory of the World (c), and in the Supplement to Moreri. Artemiſia did not ſurvive her beloved huſband above two years (d), he dying without children (e), after having reigned twenty four years, about the end of the 106th Olympiad [A]. She died of regret and ſorrow (f) [B] before the Mauſoleum was finiſhed (g). It is ſaid that ſhe ſteeped the

[A] Mauſolus her huſband died . . . . about the end of the 106th Olympiad.] Almoſt all the editions of Pliny inform us, that Mauſolus King of Caria died in the ſecond year of the 100th Olympiad, and in the 302d of Rome (1). But Father Hardouin has given us in his edition according to the beſt Manuſcripts the ſecond year of the 106th Olympiad, and the 402d year of Rome. Obiit Olympiadis centeſimæ ſextæ anno ſecundo, urbis anno CCCCII. Mr. Chevreau obſerves, that Uſher was of opinion, that this paſſage of Pliny was corrupted, and that Mauſolus died the fourth year of the 106th Olympiad and in the year of the world 3651 (2). This agrees exactly with the following words of Father Hardouin, Quid quod & Diodorus non ad Olympiadis CVI annum alterum Mauſoli obitum, ſed ad quartum refert, lib. 16. verſ. 435 (3); i. e. " Dio" dorus likewiſe places the death of Mauſolus, not " under the ſecond year of the CVIth Olympiad, " but under the fourth"; and it coincides with the duration of the reigns of thoſe, who ſucceeded Mauſolus till the expedition of Alexander the Great. See the note [A] of the article ADA. It is certain, that Mauſolus was then dead; and that Artemiſia, who did not ſurvive him above two years, was living when Demoſthenes made an Oration for the liberty of the Rhodians. Now he pronounced his Oration in the 2d year of the 107th Olympiad, as we may collect from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus (4). Mauſolus therefore muſt have died in the laſt year of the 106th Olympiad; and the anonymous Writer, who has given an account of the Olympiads, is miſtaken, in placing the funeral Oration upon Mauſolus by Theopompus under the firſt year of the 103d Olympiad. Valeſius has committed the ſame error. Hæc Artemiſia in funere mariti agones celebravit Olympiade 103 (5). Thoſe Writers, who after the example of Calepin, Lloyd, Hofman, &c. refer us to the VIIth Book of Herodotus, to be informed there concerning the Mauſoleum, do not very carefully conſult the Chronological Tables; or they muſt have been very erroneous ones, if we ſhould find in them the death of Mauſolus before that of Herodotus.

[B] She died of regret and ſorrow.] We have ſeveral authorities of great importance for this fact, as particularly Theopompus, Cicero and Strabo. Theopompus's expreſſions are very ſtrong: Ἡι φήσι Θεόπομπος φθινάδι νόσῳ ληφθῆναι διὰ τὴν λύπην τὴν ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς καὶ ἀδελφοῦ Μαυσώλου, ἀποθανεῖν (6). i. e. the bones and ashes of her husband in water, and swallowed them, that she might serve as a living tomb for him (b). We must observe that she appointed excellent Panegyrics to be made in honour of him, and proposed a prize of great value for the person who should compose the best (i). Theopompus carried the prize. We are told that Isocrates his master was one of the Orators who entered the lists upon this occasion [C]. Theodectus of Phasalis who engaged likewise, wrote a Tragedy intitled Mausolus, which succeeded better than his prose Composition. But we must not forget to observe, that instead of lamentations and tears, with which the greatest part of the Writers represent Artemisia to be overwhelmed during her widowhood, there are some Authors who tell us, that she gained several conquests with great vigour [D].

temisia illa, says he (7), *Mausoli Cariæ Regis uxor, quæ nobile illud Halicarnassi fecit sepulcrum quamdiu vixit, vixit in luctu, eodemque etiam confecta contabuit. "Artemisia, the wife of Mausolus King of Caria, "who built the magnificent Sepulchre at Halicarnassus, lived all her life in sorrow, and at last perished with it. The same sentiment was always "new to her; and it was then only not esteemed "new, when worn out with age." It is almost beyond dispute, that Cicero did not know, that Artemisia survived her husband but two years; for if he had known this, he would not have made use of expressions, which signify a long duration of sorrow. But let us see what Strabo says: Φθίσει δ' ἀκοβαινούσης διὰ πόθος τοῦ ἀνδρὸς (8). i. e. "She pin'd away out "of sorrow for the loss of her husband."

[C] We are told, that Isocrates was one of the Orators, who entered the lists upon this occasion.] I have quoted two good authorities (9) for this; and I can add another of great weight, which is that of Theopompus. He boasted publickly, that he had carried the prize from Isocrates his Master (10). But I am not ignorant that Suidas, without making any mention of Isocrates the Athenian, speaks of another Isocrates the scholar and successor of the latter, and who was born at Heraclea or at Apollonia upon the Euxin Sea. It was this Isocrates, according to Suidas, who disputed the prize of eloquence with Theodectus, Theopompus, and Erythræus (11). The last was of Naucrates in Egypt; so that there must be an error in Aulus Gellius in the passage, where we read that Theopompus, Theodectus, and Naucratis disputed for the prize (12). Naucrates is not the proper name of one of these competitors, but only the name of the city a little altered; for it should have been Naucratites (13). Olivier calls them Theopompus, Theodectus, and Naucrates (14). If we prefer Aulus Gellius to Suidas, which I am inclined to do, we must conclude, that there is an error in the latter passage, in which we read, ἅμα τῷ Ἐρυθραίῳ Ναυκρατίτῃ διηγωνίζατο (15); i. e. "he contended with Erythræus the Naucratite." Photius favours Aulus Gellius, since he supposes that Naucrates of Erythræa was one of the competitors with Theopompus (16). On which side soever we determine, the proper name has been mistaken for that derived from the city. We may observe that Cicero (17), Dionysius Halicarnassus (18), and Quintilian (19), mention one Socrates a scholar of Isocrates. The passage in Plutarch has been translated very differently by Amiot from what it was by Wolfius and Xylander; for the two last tell us, that the Panegyrick upon Mausolus by Isocrates is lost; whereas, according to Amiot, the case is just the reverse. Isocrates, says he, contended for the prize, which Queen Artemisia appointed at the Sepulchre of her husband Mausolus, and the Oration, which he pronounced in honour of the deceased, is still extant there. The different manner of accenting has without doubt occasioned these different translations. Some read it τὸ δὲ ἐγκώμιον οὐ σώζεται; i. e. "but that Panegyrick is not extant;" others read it τὸ δὲ ἐγκώμιον οὗ σώζεται; i. e. "but that Panegyrick is preserved there." Such is the odd fate of manuscripts; a point either removed, or added, or changed, turns the affirmatives into negatives.

[D] There are some Authors, who tell us, that she made several conquests with great vigour.] I do not speak of the Oration of Demosthenes, quoted above (20), tho' it is certain from the manner in which that Orator expresses himself, that Artemisia was not represented at Athens as a disconsolate widow, who pined away with grief, and neglected the affairs of her Kingdom, that she might give up herself entirely to the reflection on the memory of her husband. The Athenians considered her as a woman, who was capable of rendering herself formidable; for one of the reasons which Demosthenes was obliged to reply to, was taken from the commotions, which Artemisia might raise, if the Athenians should interpose in the affairs of the people of Rhodes. But I pass over this, in order to consider something more important. Vitruvius tells us, that after the death of Mausolus, the Rhodians being uneasy that a woman should govern in Caria, resolved to dethrone her (21). Their design was prevented by a stratagem of Artemisia, which was immediately followed by another, which she executed in person, with so much resolution and success, that she made herself mistress of Rhodes in a short time. She erected there a trophy of her victory, with two statues of brass, one of which represented the city of Rhodes, and the other Artemisia marking that city with an hot iron. Vitruvius adds, that the Rhodians never dared to remove that trophy from the place; for such an attempt was prohibited by their Religion; but they built a wall round it, which prevented it from being seen. Do we see here the condition of a widow, who was inconsolable, who spent her life in tears and lamentations, and indulged her sorrow so violently, that she died within two years? It will perhaps be said, that Vitruvius speaks of another Artemisia. I know very well, that Mr. Chevreau thought so (22); but two invincible reasons confute such a supposition. For first, the Artemisia of Vitruvius had been Mausolus's wife; and secondly, she seized a city, which was not built till the Peloponnesian War, when Xerxes and Artemisia were dead. Ἡ δὲ νῦν πόλις ἔκτισθη κατὰ τὰ Πελοποννησιακὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἀρχιτέκτονος, ὡς φασιν, ὑφ' ᾧ καὶ ὁ Πειραιεύς (23). i. e. "The present city was built during "the time of the Peloponnesian War by the same "Architect, it is said, who built the Piræum." Ttetzes therefore had some grounds for saying, that both the Artemisia's commanded armies, ἄμφω δὲ στρατηγέτιδας, γυναίας ἀμφοτέρας (24). One can hardly tell what judgment to pass upon Authors, when we find, that they assert such incompatible things concerning one and the same Queen. There wanted but one man, who had experienced her generosity, to persuade the world, that she died with regret for the loss of her husband. Writers would have repeated this an hundred times, and delivered it down from one hand to another as a fact not only uncommon, but likewise important enough, to be proposed as an example. The most remarkable embellishments are introduced sooner or later into such traditional stories as these.

☞ARUNDEL (THOMAS) Archbishop of Canterbury in the fourteenth Century, was born of a noble family, and son to Robert Earl of Arundel and Warren, and brother to Richard Earl of Arundel, who was afterwards beheaded (a). He was raised from being a Subdeacon and Archdeacon of Taunton at twenty two years of age to the Bishoprick of Ely in the year 1375 under King Edward III. It is said, that he was appointed

In 1388 he was tranſlated by the Pope to the Archbiſhoprick of York, in which he ſpent a prodigious ſum of money in building of Palaces for that See. He was made Lord High Chancellor of England, which office he held till he was tranſlated to the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury in 1396. He was the firſt inſtance of any perſon's ever quitting the See of York for that of Canterbury (b). In 1393 he removed the Term from London to York [B]. Upon the death of Archbiſhop Courtney he was tranſlated to the See of Canterbury by a papal proviſion. The Bull was publiſhed at Canterbury the 11th of January 1396 (c). In his viſitation at London he revived an old conſtitution about the payment of tythes [C]. But he was ſcarce fixed in his See, when he fell under King Richard IId's diſpleaſure, and was obliged to abandon it; for on September 20 1397 the Commons having the King's leave impeached him of High-Treaſon [D], and ſentenced him within forty days after judgment to depart the Kingdom upon pain of death. He went firſt therefore to France, and afterwards to Rome, where Pope Boniface IX entertained him with great civility, and wrote a letter to the King in his favour. But this failing of ſucceſs, he promoted him to the Archbiſhoprick of St. Andrews in Scotland, and, which was a more diſobliging ſtroke to the King, deſigned to give him ſeveral preferments in England by way of proviſion (d). The King hearing of this wrote an expoſtulatory letter to the Pope, which brought him to an abſolute compliance [E]. The Archbiſhop was

But when they met, they determined upon Henry Wakefield Treaſurer of the King's Houſhold. But this election being ſet aſide, the Pope by his own authority declared Arundel, who was then ſcarce twenty two years of age, Biſhop. This, according to Godwin, is the moſt general account of that affair. But ſome other Writers affirm, that as the papal proviſions were at that time prohibited by the authority of the Parliament, he was canonically elected, and conſecrated April 6th, 1375, by Wittleſey Archbiſhop of Oxford. *Barneti morte nunciatâ, perſcriptis ad Elienſes literis enixè petit Rex, ut Joannem Woodrovium Confeſſorem ſuum in Epiſcopum velint eligere. By this conſtitution the inhabitants of the reſpective Pariſhes were obliged to pay to their Rector one half-penny in the pound out of the rent of their houſes (4).

[D] The Commons having the King's leave, impeached him of high treaſon.] The chief article of his charge was, that when he was Bp. of Ely and Lord Chancellor, he had given his advice for a commiſſion to be directed to Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, and Richard Earl of Arundel, his Brother, and had procured himſelf as one of the Chief Miniſters of State to be put into that Commiſſion, and executed it, whereas that Commiſſion was prejudicial to the King's prerogative and dignity (5). Sir John Hayward in his firſt Part of the Life and Reign of King Henry IV (6) tells us, that this Commiſſion, which he was accuſed for executing, was that againſt Michael De la Poole Earl of Suffolk. The King told the Commons, that ſince the impeachment touch'd ſo great a perſon and a Peer of the Realm, he would be farther adviſed. But the Commons reſolved to proceed with vigour againſt him, and urged the proſecution the next day, and deſired the King to order ſuch judgment againſt him as the caſe required. The King replied, that the Archbiſhop had confeſſed to him before ſeveral Lords, that he was miſtaken in executing that Commiſſion, and caſt himſelf upon his mercy. Upon this the King, the Lords Temporal, and Sir Thomas Piercy proxy for the Biſhops and Clergy, declared the Article confeſſed by the Archbiſhop to be treaſon, and adjudged him a traitor. Whereupon it was order'd, that the Archbiſhop ſhould be baniſhed, and his Temporalities ſeized, and his goods and chattles forfeited to the King, who was to appoint the time for his quitting the Kingdom (7). The Archbiſhop was in the Parliament Houſe the firſt day of his impeachment, and offered to make his defence; but he was abſent the next day, when ſentence was pronounced againſt him (8). It ſeems that the King had commanded him not to come into the Houſe, having firſt made him a promiſe of his friendſhip, and given him his oath, that the Lords ſhould do nothing to his prejudice (9). The Author of the Life of King Richard II, written in Mr. Daniel's method, publiſhed in the firſt Volume of the Complete Hiſtory of England tells us (10), that Sir John Buſhy, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, demanded judgment upon Thomas, Duke of Gloceſter, and the Earls of Arundel, and Warwick, for treaſon, in compelling the King to grant them a Commiſſion to govern the Realm, and upon the Archbiſhop for procuring the ſaid Commiſſion, and granting their pardons. The Archbiſhop roſe up to make his defence, but the King enjoined him ſilence till the next day, and then upon his appearance in the Houſe, he commanded him by the Biſhop of Carliſle to go home; and ſo he came to the Houſe no more. The ſame Author obſerves afterwards (11), that the Archbiſhop who had been ſummoned to anſwer for the treaſons charged upon him, but excuſed by the King, and pardoned, with the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſome others, was, at the earneſt importunity of Sir John Buſhy and the Commons of his party, baniſhed, and his Temporalities ſeized into the King's hands, having ſix weeks limited for his departure.

[E] The King hearing of this, wrote an expoſtulatory Letter to the Pope, which brought him to an abſolute compliance.] He tells the Pope, that the Archbiſhop for his treaſonable conſpiracy had been only ſentenced to perpetual perpetual baniſhment; whereas, if he had been dealt with anſwerably to his demerits, he ought to have ſuffered the puniſhment of high treaſon. But in conſideration of his character, and out of regard to Religion, his life was granted him, and the rigour of the law abated. The King obſerves then, that ſince his going beyond ſea, himſelf and his ſubjects were much ſurprized at the turn of his fortune; ſince they underſtood that he had been invited to the Court of Rome, countenanced under his misbehaviour, taken into his Holineſs's protection, and had an expectation given him of recovering his See, or at leaſt of being promoted in the Kingdom to more preferments in value, than he enjoyed before. How deſtructive ſuch unaccountable favours as theſe muſt be to his own dignity and government, and into what apparent danger it might bring his affairs, was eaſy to imagine. For which reaſon, continues the King, we are reſolved never to endure ſuch uſage, tho' the whole world were of a different opinion. For we are throughly acquainted with this man; we know him to be of a turbulent ſeditious temper; who, if he were permitted to live in our dominions, would return to his old practices, poiſon our ſubjects with miſreporting the adminiſtration, and work againſt us in the dark. For it is probable he would uſe ſufficient precaution not to fall under the laſh of the law. We deſire therefore your Holineſs would pervent theſe opportunities of miſchief, and not ſhock our intereſt and inclination by ſuch favours. For ſhould ſuch meaſures be put in execution, it is poſſible they might create ſuch miſunderſtanding between the Crown and Mitre, as might prove difficult to remove. For, to ſpeak plainly, we cannot take that perſon for our friend, who careſſes our enemies, and takes them by the hand in ſo loving a manner. However, if you have a mind to provide for him otherwiſe, we have nothing to object; only we cannot allow him to dip in our diſh. We heartily deſire you would take this matter into ſerious conſideration, as you tender our Royal regard, and expect a compliance with any future requeſt which your Holineſs may make to us (12). This Letter had ſo great an effect upon the Pope, that he not only changed his intentions of giving Arundel preferment; but at the King's inſtance promoted Roger Walden, then Lord Treaſurer of England, to the See of Canterbury, about the beginning of February 1398. Eundem autem a ſede Cantuarienſi tranſtulit, & tranſlato Rogerum Walden, tunc Theſaurarium ſubrogavit, a Rege rogatus, Bonifacius Papa circa initium Februarii anno ſequente (13).

[F] He was a conſiderable inſtrument in engaging Henry of Bolingbroke Duke of Lancaſter, and afterwards King Henry IV, to invade England, in order to dethrone King Richard II.] The people of England being extremely uneaſy at the oppreſſion, which they ſuffered from the King and his favourites, reſolved to ſet the crown upon the head of another, who might govern them in a more eaſy and equitable manner. They determined therefore to fix upon the Duke of Lancaſter, who had all the qualifications proper to make an excellent King, as well as a lineal title to it; becauſe he was the ſon of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon of King Henry III, and after the death of Roger Mortimer, lately killed in Ireland, next allied to the Crown. Henry was then in baniſhment in France; and the people reſolved to invite him over with all the ſecrecy and expedition poſſible, for which purpoſe they ſent a letter by a faithful meſſenger to be delivered to Archbiſhop Arundel who was then in Brittany, and deſired him likewiſe in another letter to ſollicit the Duke to comply with their requeſt (14). Upon this Arundel went with the meſſengers to Paris, where he made the following ſpeech to the Duke, as we find it repreſented in the firſt part of Sir John Hayward's Life and Reign of King Henry IV (15). We are ſent unto you, right high and noble Prince, from the chief Lords and States of our land, not to ſeek revenge againſt our King, upon private injury and diſpleaſure, nor upon a deſperate diſcontentment to ſet the State on fire, nor to procure the ambitious advancement of any particular perſon; but to open unto you the deformities and decays of our broken eſtate, and to deſire your aid in ſtaying the ruinous downfall of the ſame. The remembrance of the honourable reputation that our country hath borne, and the noble acts which it hath atchieved, doth nothing elſe but make the baſeneſs more bitter unto us, whereunto it is now fallen. Our victorious arms have hitherto been famous and memorable, not only within the bowels of our ocean ſea, and in the iſlands adjoining to us; but alſo in France, in Spain, and in other parts of Europe, yea, in Aſia and in Africk, againſt the Infidels and Barbarians; ſo that all Chriſtian Princes have been either glad to embrace our friendſhip, or loth to provoke us to hoſtility. But now the rude Scots, whoſe ſpirits we have ſo many times broken, and brought them on their knees, do ſcornfully inſult upon us. The native and fugitive Iriſh have ſhaken off our ſhacles, and glutted themſelves upon us with maſſacres and ſpoils. With theſe we daily fight, not for glory, but to live; inſomuch that we are become a pity to our friends, and a very jeſt to our baſe and contemptible enemies. Indeed the King hath both ſent and led great armies into theſe countries, but in ſuch ſort, that they have much waſted the Realm with their maintenance, but neither revenged nor relieved it with their arms. And no marvail, for all our diligent and diſcreet Leaders, the very ſinews of the field, are either put to death, or baniſhed, or elſe lie buried in obſcurity and diſgrace; and the marſhalling of all affairs is committed, without any reſpect of ſufficiency or deſert, to the counſel and conduct of thoſe, who can beſt apply themſelves to the King's youthful delights. Among theſe ancient nobility is accounted a vain jeſt; wealth and virtue are the ready means to bring to deſtruction." " It grieves " me to ſpeak, but it helpeth not to hide that, which " every man ſeeth. Our anceſtors liv'd in the higheſt " pitch and perfection of liberty; but we of ſervility, " being in the nature, not of ſubjects, but of abjects " and flat ſlaves, not to one intractable Prince only, " but to many proud and diſdainful favourites; not " always the ſame, but ever new; and no ſooner " have we ſatisfied ſome, but freſh hungry maſters " are ſtraitways ſet upon us, who have more enda- " maged us by extortion and bribes, than the enemy " hath done by the ſword. What unuſual kinds of " exaction are daily put in practice? without either " meaſure or end, and oftentimes without need, " or if any be, it proceedeth rather upon riotous ex- " pences, than any neceſſary or honourable charge, " and great ſums of money are pulled and pilled from " good ſubjects to be thrown away amongſt unprofit- " able unthrifts. And if any man open his mouth " againſt theſe extorted taxations, then either by " feigned imputation of capital crimes, or by ſmall " matters aggravated, or elſe by open cruelty and " force, his life or liberty is forthwith hazarded. It " were too tedious, too odious, too frivolous to put " you in mind of particular examples, as though " your own eſtate, and the lamentable loſs of your " uncle and other noble friends could be forgotten. " Yea I ſuppoſe, that there is no Man of Quality " within the realm, who either in his own perſon or " in his near friends doth not plainly perceive, that " no man enjoyeth the ſafe-guard of his goods " and ſurety of his body; but rich men in the one, " and great men in the other are continually en- " dangered." This then is our caſe: but what is the remedy? We have endured, and we have entreated; but our patience hath drawn on more heavy burthens, and our complaints procured more bitter blows. By the one our livings, and our lives by the other are daily devoured. And therefore we are now compelled to ſhake off our ſhoulders this importable yoke, and ſubmit ourſelves to the ſovereignty of ſome more moderate and worthy perſon; not ſo much for the grief of our miſeries, which are paſt, nor for the pain of our preſent diſtreſſes, as for fear of ſuch dangers as are moſt like to enſue. For the King hath cut away the chief of the Nobility, and the Commons he hath pared to the quick, and ſtill he harrieth us as a conquered country; whereby we are laid bare to the havock of all our enemies, and utterly diſabled, not only to recover that which is loſt, but alſo to retain even that which is left. But to whom ſhould we complain? What ſuccour, whoſe aid ſhould we deſire? You are the only man, who in right ſhould, ſhewed the utmoſt zeal to procure the Duke to be elected King, and made a ſolemn ſpeech upon the chooſing of him [G]. In the year 1403, when King Henry IV deſigned an expedition againſt the Welch, but wanted money to pay his troops, ſome of his officers propoſed an expedient to him; which was, that as there were ſeveral Biſhops in the army in ſhould, and wiſdom can, and in goodneſs will, we hope, relieve us. For you are neareſt to the King in blood; and therefore ought to have the rule of that, which his weakneſs cannot weild? Your years are well ſtayed from the light conceits of youth, and ſo ſpent, that all your actions have made proof of ability in government of greateſt charge. Nothing paſt needeth excuſe, and fear is vain for any thing to come. The pains and perils, which heretofore you have undertaken for the benefit of your country, put us alſo in good hope, that in theſe extremities you will not forſake us. We are all as in a ſhip that is ready to ſink, as in a houſe that is ready to fall; and do moſt humbly crave and call for your help. Now or elſe never ſhew your ſelf in favour of your countrymen, to free us, to free yourſelf, to free the whole State from theſe dangers and decays, by taking into your hands the ſcepter and diadem of the Realm, and reducing again the government thereof to a princely freedom, in combining the ſovereignty of one with the liberty of all. Omit not this occaſion to ſet forth to the view of the world as in a large field, and at free ſcope your virtue and courage, by relieving miſerable wretches from their oppreſſors; which action hath been ſo highly honoured, that many Heathen men for the ſame have been accounted as Gods. This we are conſtrained to offer and entreat. This is both honourable for you to accept, and eaſy to be performed; and ſo much the more, in that no Prince by any people had been deſired with greater affection, nor ſhall be with more duty obeyed. The Duke replied to this ſpeech, that he had all his life been free from ambitious attempts, and that his advanced years had now cured his mind of aſpiring thoughts. That it was extremely difficult to dethrone a King; and even ſuppoſing it poſſible, it would be generally conſidered as unlawful. " And he, continues the Duke " (16), that ſhall attain a Kingdom upon the opinion " of deſert, doth charge himſelf with great expecta- " tion, and how honourably ſoever he carried him- " ſelf, ſhall never want his deadly envyers. Beſides " this, in civil diſſenſions the faith of the whole peo- " ple is fleeting, and danger is to be doubted from " every particular perſon; ſo that it is poſſible, that " all may fall away, and impoſſible to beware of eve- " ry one. Therefore I could rather wiſh to ſpend " the courſe of my years, which yet remain in this " obſcure yet ſafe and certain ſtate, than to thruſt " myſelf upon the pikes of thoſe perils, which being " once enter'd into, are dangerous to follow, and " deadly to forſake. For in private attempts a man " may ſtep and ſtop when he pleaſe; but he that aim- " eth at a Kingdom, hath no middle cauſe between " the life of a Prince, and the death of a Traitor." The Archbiſhop, in anſwer to this, urged the neceſſity which the Duke was under, to engage in the deſign, and aſſured him of all poſſible aſſiſtance from the people of England in general. And with regard to the novelty of ſuch an attempt, which the Duke had ſuggeſted, he obſerved to him (17), that ſuch examples were not rare, nor long ſince put in practice, nor far hence to be fetched. The Kings of Denmark and of Swedeland are oftentimes baniſhed by their ſubjects, oftentimes impriſoned and put to their fine. The Princes of Germany about an hundred years paſt depoſed Adulphus the Emperor, and are now in hand to depoſe their Emperor Wenceſlaus. The Earl of Flanders was a while ſince driven out of his Dominion by his own people for uſurping greater power than appertaineth to his eſtate. The ancient Britains chaſed away their own King Caractacus for the lewdneſs of his life and cruelty of his rule. In the time of the Saxon Heptarchy Bernredus King of Mercia for his pride and ſtoutneſs towards his people was by them depoſed. Likewiſe Aldredus and Ethelbertus Kings of Northumberland were for their diſorders expelled by their ſubjects. Since the victory of the Normans the Lords endeavoured to expell King Henry III, but they were not able. Yet were they able to depoſe King Edward II, and to conſtitute his young ſon Edward King in his ſtead. Theſe are not all, and yet enough to clear this action of rareneſs in other countries, and novelty in ours. The Archbiſhop afterwards attended the Duke to England, and was preſent at the aſſembly of the Nobility, held at the Tower of London on Michaelmas-day, which was the day before the ſitting of the Parliament, when King Richard read the form of his reſignation (18).

[G] He ſhewed the utmoſt zeal to procure the Duke to be elected King, and made a ſolemn ſpeech upon the chooſing of him.] The Duke made a formal claim to the Crown; but how far that prevailed in the election, does not appear. The Archbiſhop did not think fit to inſiſt much upon this title, but put it in the choice of the houſes, whom they would have for their King. For, having mentioned in order ſeveral perſons, who had a near alliance to the Crown, he aſk'd the Houſes at laſt after ſome pauſe, whether they would have the Duke of Lancaſter for their King; to which they anſwered three times, We will have him, and none elſe (19). Upon this the Archbiſhop took him by the hand, and placed him in the Throne of State, the Archbiſhop of York aſſiſting him (20). Arundel then began a ſhort ſpeech upon the occaſion, taking this text for his ſubject, Vir dominabitur, 1 Sam. ix. 17. which according to the Engliſh Tranſlation runs thus: And when Samuel ſaw Saul, the Lord ſaid unto him, Behold the man whom I ſpake to thee of; this ſame ſhall reign over my people. He obſerved, that in theſe words God deſcribes the qualifications of a Governor; and ſince they might be truly applied to the preſent Prince, they afforded a very agreeable proſpect. That now they had no reaſon to fear that threatning denounced againſt the Jews by the Prophet Iſaiah, I will give children to be their Princes (21). That God was pleaſed to remember mercy in his wrath, to viſit his people, and not, as formerly, to ſuffer babes to rule over us (22). That to thoſe Princes, who had lately governed the Nation, the words of St. Paul might juſtly be applied, When I was a child, I ſpake as a child, I underſtood as a child, I thought as a child (23). For with regard to ſpeech, it is certain that a child is very inſignificant and variable. Truth and falſhhood are almoſt indifferent to him. He is forward to promiſe; but quickly forgets the performance. But cum Vir dominatur populo, when the people have a Man to reign over them, there will be none of theſe effects in the adminiſtration. For it is the property of a man to govern his tongue. The Archbiſhop then proceeds to comment upon theſe words of St. Paul, I underſtood as a child; and obſerves, that a child reliſhes nothing but what pleaſes his humour, and flatters his weakneſs. But as for remonſtrance and plain dealing, ſuch freedoms are always unacceptable. That ſuch had formerly been the misfortune of this Kingdom. Whereas on the other hand a man thinks farther, and is more abſolute in his paſſions. In the laſt, continues he, the Apoſtle tells us, I thought as a child; and what are the thoughts of a child? A child makes it his buſineſs only to follow the ſollicitations of appetite. Thus, when a child governs, reaſon is diſcarded, humour is abſolute, and will carries all before it. But where fancy reigns, and reaſon is forced to retire, the adminiſtration muſt needs be unſteady and ill directed. But now having a Man at the helm, we are reſcued from the danger of ſo unhappy a conduct. This Prince, whom we now have, being a man both in age and underſtanding, will readily acknowledge the buſineſs of his ſtation, and make no ſcruple to ſay, I come not to do my own will, but the will of him that ſent me; that is, God's will. And therefore we may promiſe ourſelves, that he will be ſtaid upon wiſdom; that he will ſeriouſly conſider the Providence of God, and govern his practice by the rules of Religion. And in ſhort manage the adminiſtration in ſuch a manner, that the promiſe in Holy Scripture may not be unapplicable to his Government, a King ſhall reign in righteouſneſs, and do judgment and juſtice in the earth (24). He concluded with a ſhort Prayer, that the King might long and happily reign over the Kingdom, to the glory of God, and the proſperity of the Nation; which was joined by the whole Aſſembly with joyful acclamations (25).

in a condition to ſupply him, they ought to be ſent home on foot, and their equipage and money taken from them for the publick ſervice. But the Archbiſhop who was preſent aſſured them, that if any of the ſoldiers offered to plunder his retinue, they might expect to meet with a very vigorous reſiſtance. This reſolution of his prevented the execution of that deſign (e). However he procured the King a ſupply [H]. He exerted himſelf likewiſe with great ſpirit in the Parliament held in 1404 in defence of the revenues of the church [I]. In 1408 he convened the Biſhops and Clergy of his Province of Oxford. The deſign of holding this Synod was to ſtop the progreſs of the Lollards, and to prevent the Univerſity's being farther tinctured with that perſuaſion (f). The proviſions agreed on for that purpoſe were digeſted into thirteen chapters or conſtitutions [K]. [H] This reſolution of his prevented the execution of that deſign. However he procured the King a ſupply.] The Author of the Life and Reign of King Henry IV (26) relates this ſtory in a manner which differs in ſome circumſtances from that of Walſingham quoted by Mr. Collier; and tells us, that the King wanting money for the expedition againſt the Welch, ſome perſons about him, who were, as the Hiſtorian obſerves, more zealous for the King's ſervice, and deſirous to pleaſe him, than to chooſe out fit ways for it, adviſed him to ſeize upon the Biſhop's treaſure and lands; but the Archbiſhop boldly told them, that none of his Province ſhould be ſpoiled by them without oppoſition. Tho' the King was not forward to meddle with the Church-men, yet this advice put him in mind of the riches of the Clergy; which being beſtowed on perſons, whoſe beſt character it is to be deſpiſers of the world, might beſt be ſpared at this juncture. And thereupon, though he would uſe no force, yet he dealt with the Archbiſhop to procure him a ſupply in this exigency; and ſo prevailed with him, that calling a Synod of the Clergy, he obtained a tenth of them for him, and the King ſent the Prince with his army into Wales.

(26) Complete Hiſtory, vol. 1. pag. 288.

[I] He exerted himſelf likewiſe with great ſpirit in the Parliament held in 1404 in defence of the revenues of the Clergy.] This Parliament met at Coventry Octob. 6th; and becauſe it conſiſted of ſuch perſons, as were unſkilful in the Laws of the Nation and illiterate, according to the particular Orders given by the King to the Sheriffs of Counties and Mayors of Corporations, that none but ſuch perſons ſhould be choſen, it was called Parliamentum indoctum, or the Lack-learning Parliament. The chief buſineſs of this Parliament was to raiſe a tax for the King's ſupply; in the debates about which it was concluded, that as the King's affairs ſtood in need of very great ſums of money to defend the Nation from ſo many enemies, as then appeared againſt it, viz. the Welch, Scots, Britains, Flemings and French, he could not be ſupplied by the Laity; but that it was neceſſary that he ſhould ſeize upon the temporalities of the Clergy; which being one full third part of the Nation did little ſervice to the publick, and did the Clergy themſelves no good, making them careleſs of their duty, negligent in their ſtudies, and extremely corrupt in their morals. And this they judged the more reaſonable, becauſe the Laity ſerved the King in his wars both with their perſons and eſtates; but the Clergy were exempted in their perſons, and therefore their eſtates ought to bear a greater part of the charge. Theſe Votes highly incenſed the Clergy; and the Archbiſhop replied, that the Clergy had always as well in this as the former reigns given as large ſums to ſupport the publick charge, as the Laity. And though they did not ſerve the King in perſon in his wars, they ſent their tenants to aſſiſt him, and contributed as much to his ſucceſs by their Prayers, as the Laity did by their weapons (27). Sir John Cheyney, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, replied immediately, that they did not value the Clergy's Prayers, ſince their lands would do the King and Nation more good. This Sir John Cheyney, as we are informed by Walſingham (28), had himſelf before taken Deacon's Orders, but deſerted that profeſſion, and turned Soldier. The Archbiſhop was greatly provoked at what he had ſaid, and told him plainly, that the King and Kingdom could not expect to proſper, where the prayers and ſuffrages of the Clergy were undervalued; but yet if they regarded not their Religion, they ſhould find their power and intereſts were not ſo inconſiderable, but that they would meet with a vigorous oppoſition, if they attempted to take away their juſt rights and poſſeſſions from them, tho' under the ſpecious pretence of a Law. And he declared, that ſo long as he was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, no man ſhould meddle with any lands belonging to his See, but he would oppoſe him with all his intereſt and power. The King was preſent at this conteſt between the Archbiſhop and Commons, and ſhewed ſo little concern for the Clergy, that he ſeemed to favour the deſign of the latter. Whereupon the Archbiſhop in ſome fear of it turned to the King, and kneeling deſired him, that he would conſider, that God had given him the Kingdom, that he ſhould be the Protector of his Church, and to that end he had ſworn at his Coronation to preſerve the Church and her Miniſters in their liberties: which oath he could not break without a great prejudice to his own conſcience and offence to God as well as injuſtice to men; and therefore he implored him to fear the God by whom he reigned, and his own conſcience. The King ſeeing the Archbiſhop's earneſtneſs and zeal, anſwered him, that tho' he could not condemn his piety, yet his fears were groundleſs as to him, for he might aſſure himſelf, that he would leave the Church in as good if not a better eſtate, than he found it. The Archbiſhop being encouraged by this promiſe told the Commons, that their wicked advice was intended more for their own, than the King's advantage; for as it happened to the King's predeceſſors, who ſeized upon the lands and goods of the Friars Aliens, which were worth many thouſand pounds, the Courtiers begged them, and left not the King ten groats of them; ſo if you, ſays he, could obtain your wicked deſigns to have our temporalities ſeized, you would find ſuch methods to gratify your covetouſneſs by them, that the King would not in a year's time be one farthing the richer. The Commons made no reply, but proſecuted their deſign with ſo much vigour, that if the Archbiſhop had not raiſed a ſtrong party againſt it in the Houſe of Lords, the Commons would have carried it. But by his courage and diligence their purpoſe was defeated, and they returned to their former manner of taxing; for the Laity were to pay two fifteens, and the Clergy a tenth and a half, but upon condition, that it ſhould be put into the hands of the Lord Furnival to be employed for the King's wars; and ſo the Parliament ended (29). Walſingham, quoted by Collier (30), tells us, that the Archbiſhop being apprehenſive, that this affair might be brought upon the board again, made an intereſt with the Lords, who declared, that the Church ſhould never be rifled in their time. And at laſt the Commons themſelves aſked the Archbiſhop's pardon, admired his courage, and confeſſed the injuſtice of their expedient.

[K] The proviſions agreed on for that purpoſe were digeſted into thirteen Chapters or Conſtitutions.] Mr. Collier has given a particular account of theſe Conſtitutions in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (31). Several of them were deſigned to reſtrain perſons unauthoriſed from preaching; and determined that all thoſe, who were qualified to preach, ſhould have regard to their audience; and when they preached to the Clergy, ſhould declaim againſt the failings of that order; when they had the Laity for their congregation, ſhould remonſtrate againſt thoſe vices, for which they were moſt remarkable. They prohibit likewiſe the reading of Wickliff's Books, or publiſhing of any Books, unleſs they were firſt examined by the Univerſity of Oxford or Cambridge. And they decree, that no unauthoriſed perſon ſhall preſume to tranſlate any part of Scripture into Engliſh or any other languages; with ſeveral other prohibitions againſt diſputing about the articles of Faith ſettled by the Church.

them in a full congregation at Oxford, and that his books became more valued than before, he reſolved to viſit the Univerſity, and to apply ſome farther remedy. He went down with the Earl of Arundel his nephew, and with a pompous retinue. When he came near the town he was met by Richard Courtney the Chancellor, the Proctors, and a numerous appearance of the Maſters and Students. The Chancellor told the Archbiſhop, that if he only came to ſee the town he was very welcome; but if he came under the character of a Viſitor, he deſired him to take notice, that the Univerſity of Oxford had enjoyed many years the privilege of the Pope's Bull, and been exempted from Epiſcopal and Archiepiſcopal Juriſdiction. The Archbiſhop reſenting this, left Oxford a day or two after, and wrote the King an account of his diſappointment (g), who, having the diſpute referred to his determination, gave it in favour of the Archbiſhop [L]. His warm zeal againſt the doctrines of Wickliff and the Lollards urged him to the greateſt ſeverities, and particularly againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle, Lord Cobham [M]. But he was cut off by death in the midſt of his rigours for the ſuppreſſion of what he thought hereſy on the 20th of [L] Wrote an account of his diſappointment to the King, who, having the diſpute referred to his determination, gave it in favour of the Archbiſhop.] The King upon hearing that the Univerſity had refuſed to admit the Archbiſhop's Viſitation, ordered the heads of the Univerſity to be ſent for up to Court, and the Chancellor and Proctors to be removed from their Office. The Students were ſo far diſconcerted with theſe rigours, that they diſcontinued the public lectures, and were even upon the point of breaking up and diſſolving their body. The King being informed of what paſſed, ſent them a ſevere letter at firſt, but afterwards treated them in a more gentle manner. In ſhort, after a warm conteſt between the Univerſity and the Archbiſhop, both parties agreed to refer the matter to the King; who ordered that the point ſhould reſt upon the foot, it had formerly been ſettled by King Richard II. And thus judgment was given for the Archbiſhop. This Award was afterwards confirmed by Act of Parliament (32). The Archbiſhop, in order to fortify himſelf ſtill further, procured a Bull from Pope John to revoke the privilege of exemption granted to the Univerſity by Boniface. But this Bull of revocation was afterwards vacated by Sixtus IV, who, as much as in him lay, reſtored the Univerſity to their former immunities (33). With regard to the King's deciſion, if the Univerſity did not abide by it, but diſturb the Archbiſhop or his ſucceſſors in their Viſitation, they were to forfeit a thouſand pounds, and their Franchiſes to be ſeized, and remain in the King's hands, till they ſubmitted to the Award.

(g) Idem, pag. 629, 630.

[M] Urged him to the greateſt ſeverities, and particularly againſt Sir John Old-Caſtle, Lord Cobham.] The convocation of the Clergy, which according to the cuſtom of theſe times always ſat with the Parliament, being convened in St. Paul's Church, about three weeks after Eaſter, 1413, in the firſt year of the Reign of King Henry V, the Archbiſhop, who was ſenſible of that King's zeal for the Church, thought this a fit opportunity to root out Hereſy, which had ſpread itſelf very extenſively. And therefore having by twelve Inquiſitors ſent out the year before, made a full collection of the principal doctrines and opinions maintained by the Lollards, which he reduced into two hundred and forty ſix heads, and having diſcovered who were the chief maintainers of them, he repreſented the ſame to the Convocation, and deſired their advice what methods were proper to ſtop the progreſs of Hereſy. At laſt he brought them to theſe reſolutions and decrees, that it would not be poſſible to extirpate the doctrines of Wickliff, unleſs certain great men, who were the profeſſed abettors and maintainers of them, and particularly Sir John Old-Caſtle, were removed out of the way. The Archbiſhop, who had appeared peculiarly zealous in the Convocation againſt Heretics, did not abate of his heat, when it was ended, but immediately went to the King with complaints againſt the Lord Cobham, as an arch-heretic and enemy of the Church, and deſired his permiſſion to proceed againſt him according to the late decree of the Clergy, and the laws in force againſt Heretics. The King obſerving the warm zeal of the Archbiſhop, and being more moderate himſelf, replied, that tho' he had a particular deſire to ſupport the Church both in its Doctrine and Order, and was ſenſible, that unity was the life of Chriſtianity, becauſe it maintains that love, which is the fulfilling of the law; yet he thought that the moſt prudent courſe to reduce the erroneous was by mild perſuaſions and convincing arguments, for if the truth were on their ſide, it would prevail by its own ſtrength at laſt; which if it could be done, it would be much better than to make uſe of thoſe engines, which have been for the moſt part uſed to ſubdue and deſtroy the truth, and ſeldom do any ſervice to the Church, further than to work diſſembled union and converſion. He therefore adviſed Arundel to uſe all gentle methods to reform and reduce him, promiſing, that he himſelf would treat with the Lord Cobham about his opinions, and if he could not reclaim him, would leave him to the Church and Law. The Archbiſhop departed with this anſwer; and the King ſent ſoon after for the Lord Cobham, and having told him of the charge of Hereſy, which the Archbiſhop had brought againſt him, admoniſhed him to ſubmit to the Church. The Lord Cobham thanked him for his kindneſs, but returned him this anſwer, that by the Law of God he owed obedience to no perſon on earth but to his Majeſty, who was his natural Prince and God's Vice-gerent; but as for the Pope and his Hierarchy, he owed them no ſervice, becauſe he knew him to be the Antichriſt, and them the Abomination ſtanding in the Holy Place, by the deſcription given them in ſcripture. This reſolute reply ſomewhat offended the King, ſo that he diſmiſſed him without any further diſcourſe or perſuaſion. The Archbiſhop being informed by the King, of the Lord Cobham's inflexible adherence to his opinions, aſſembled a Council of the Clergy, and ſent his Somner to cite him to anſwer perſonally before him to ſuch accuſations, as ſhould be urged againſt him (34); who told the meſſenger, that he ſhould take no notice of the ſummons. When the day came, the Archbiſhop finding him as good as his word, and being informed that he had fortified his Caſtle, and declared againſt the authority of his Metropolitan, had him publickly cited in form; and at laſt, perceiving that he refuſed to appear, proceeded to excommunication. After this cenſure he ſent him another ſummons, to appear before him on the Feſtival of St. Matthew to ſhew cauſe why he ſhould not pronounce him guilty of Hereſy and Schiſm, and apply to the aid of the ſecular power. During this interval the Lord Cobham was ſeized, and at the day prefixed was brought to St. Paul's before the Archbiſhop, by Sir Robert Morley Lieutenant of the Tower (35). But there was little done at that time, becauſe he delivered in to him a ſhort paper of his opinion about the Holy Sacrament, Images, Penance, and Pilgrimages, which tho' not ſatisfactory to Arundel and the other Biſhops preſent, yet he would give no other anſwer upon thoſe points. He had therefore further time allowed him for a more diſtinct anſwer, which was till the 25th of Sept. when being again examined at the Hall of the Black Friars within Ludgate, he aſſerted, that in the Sacrament of the Altar, there was, after Conſecration, both the Body of Chriſt and Bread, in the ſame manner as in the Perſon of Chriſt the Divinity was united with the Humanity; that the Pope and his Prelates are Antichriſt, and not the true Church of God; that Saints are not to be worſhipped nor to be ſought to by Pilgrimages; and that Images cannot be an object of Worſhip (36). Being inflexible in theſe opinions, the Archbiſhop with great regret, as Walſingham repreſents it, declared him an Heretic convict, and left him as ſuch to the ſecular power, and excommunicated all of February 1413, having enjoyed the See of Canterbury about ſeventeen years [N]. It is ſaid, that as he was pronouncing the ſentence of Excommunication upon the Lord Cobham, he was ſeized with a foreneſs in his throat and at the roots of his tongue, which prevented him from ſwallowing either meat or drink, and ſo he was ſtarved to death. This was conſidered then as a judgment upon him, not only for his ſeverity to the Lollards, whom he had condemned, and cauſed to be burnt to death, but becauſe he had made a Canon the year before in a Synod held at Rocheſter againſt the Lord Cobham, in which he prohibited the tranſlation of the Scripture into the Engliſh tongue, and the preaching of the Goſpel by the Lollards (b). Mr. Collier tells us (i), that he was a perſon of a great natural capacity, well improved by ſtudy and experience; and that he did not want either learning, courage, or activity, to qualify him for his ſtation. However his conduct was exceptionable with regard to King Richard II, in joining his endeavours to dethrone him. That Hiſtorian obſerves likewiſe, that the Lollards ſeem to have given him great provocation, though his ſeverities to them were by no means juſtifiable; and he endeavours to vindicate the Archbiſhop from the charge of inconſiſtency in forbidding the tranſlation of the Scriptures [O]. He was interred at Canterbury.

all thoſe, who for the future ſhould appear in his defence, and abet his intereſt. When the Court roſe, the Archbiſhop gave the King an account of the proceedings, and deſired that the execution might be reſpited for fifty days. This requeſt was eaſily granted; for, as the Hiſtorian continues, both the King and Archbiſhop were extremely deſirous to preſerve him; ſo that being remanded to the Tower, he found an opportunity to make his eſcape (37).

[N] Cut off by death .... on the 20th of February 1413, having enjoyed the See of Canterbury about ſeventeen years.] This is the account of Biſhop Godwin; but Mr. Collier (38) ſays, it was on the 19th of that month; and the Author of the Life and Reign of Hen. V. publiſhed in the Complete Hiſtory (39) tells us, that it was on the 20th of February the year following, and that he ſat eighteen years in the See of Canterbury.

[O] Endeavours to vindicate the Archbiſhop from the charge of Inconſiſtency in forbidding the tranſlation of the Scriptures.] Biſhop Godwin obſerves, that when he was Lord Chancellor and Archbiſhop of York, he preached Queen Anne's Funeral Sermon at Weſtminſter; in which he commended that Princeſs for employing her time in reading the four Goſpels tranſlated into Engliſh with learned Annotations upon them. But how is this commendation reconcileable to his practice afterwards? How does this agree with his Synodical Conſtitution, which prohibits the tranſlation of the Holy Scriptures? To this it may be anſwered, ſays Mr. Collier (40), that the Archbiſhop's Conſtitution declares only againſt a tranſlation made by a private hand; and that no Verſion of the Holy Scriptures ſhould be uſed till it was allowed by a Provincial Synod, or at leaſt by the Biſhop of the Dioceſe (41). Now without doubt the Archbiſhop was ſo far in the right not to allow every private perſon the liberty of tranſlating the Scriptures. To have done otherwiſe might have been a dangerous permiſſion. It might have opened a paſſage to Hereſy and Error, and put it into the power of ignorant and deſigning people to corrupt the Holy Text, and poiſon the Fountain of Life.

☞ASCHAM (ROGER), one of the moſt polite Writers of the ſixteenth Century, and tutor to Queen Elizabeth, was born at Kirby Wiſke or Wiche near Northallerton in Yorkſhire of a reputable family about the year 1515. His father, John Aſcham, was Steward to the family of the Scroops, and remarkable for his great probity, prudence, and modeſty. His mother Margaret was related to ſeveral good families, and a woman of an excellent character. Our Author had two brothers, whoſe names were Thomas and Anthony, and ſeveral ſiſters. His parents, after they had lived together forty ſeven years with the greateſt harmony and conjugal affection, died on the ſame day, and almoſt at the ſame hour. Before his father's death, he was taken into the noble family of the Wingfield's, and educated at the expence of Sir Anthony Wingfield with his two ſons under the care of Mr. R. Bond. While he was very young his affection for learning appeared very evident, and as ſoon as he had learned to read, he began to be extremely fond of Engliſh books. Having compleated his firſt ſtudies under his private tutor, he was ſent by his Patron to St. John's College at Cambridge about the year 1530 (a), where by his intenſe application he made a prodigious progreſs in polite Literature, and contracted an intimacy with perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed genius and learning [A]. He took his degree of Bachelor of Arts with univerſal applauſe the 28th of Feb. 1534, when he was but eighteen years of age; and on the 23d of March following he was elected Fellow of the

[A] Made a prodigious progreſs in polite Learning, and contracted an intimacy with perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed genius and learning.] His tutor was Mr. Hugh Fitzherbert, Fellow of St. John's College, a man of great merit. The College at that time was the reſidence of ſeveral perſons remarkable for their profound knowledge in Divinity, Philoſophy, and polite literature. Their example raiſed ſuch an emulation in our Author, that by his uncommon induſtry and force of genius, he equalled, if not excelled all his contemporaries in the knowledge of the Greek and Roman Languages. Imo certe in hoc uno collegio, quod ea ætate ſingula totius orbis literarum domicilia & doctiſſimorum Theologorum numero, eruditiſſimorum philoſophorum turba, eloquentiſſimorum oratorum multitudine, vel juſtè adæquare, vel longè ſuperare poſſet, erant complurimi homines omni politiori literaturâ linguarumque cognitione præſtantiſſimi. Quorum ille provocatus exemplis, & literarum imbibendarum ardore incenſus, brevi, propter admirabilem ingenii vim, & indefeſſam in ſtudiis induſtriam, tantos in Græcis Latiniſque literis progreſſus feçit, ut omnes æquales, ſi non ſuperaret, certè unus ſingulos adæquaret (1). Among theſe contemporaries of his were George Day, John Redman, Robert Pember, Thomas Smith, John Cheek, Nicholas Ridley, Edmund Grindal afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Watſon, Walter Haddon, James Pilkington, R. Horn, John Chriſtopherſon afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter, Thomas Wilſon, John Seton, and ſeveral other men, who afterwards appeared to great advantage, and filled ſome of the moſt conſiderable poſts in the Kingdom. Mr. Aſcham was remarkable among his other excellent qualifications for a ſingular modeſty, which endeared him to all, who knew him. He was particularly fond of the Greek Language, to improve himſelf in which he inſtructed others in it, when he was very young himſelf. Mr. Robert Pember adviſed him to learn the College by the intereſt of Dr. Nicholas Medcalf Maſter of the College at that time [B]. Theſe honours animated him to a ſtill greater vigour in the proſecution of his ſtudies [C]. At the Commencement at Cambridge held the Tueſday after the Feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul in 1536 he was made Maſter of Arts, when he was twenty one years of age. His pupils made great advances in learning under his care, and particularly Mr. William Grindall, who was afterwards upon Mr. Aſcham's recommendation ſent for to court by Sir John Cheek, and made Tutor to the Lady Elizabeth. Our Author, tho' very young, was appointed by the Univerſity to teach the Greek tongue publickly in the ſchools, and had a conſiderable ſtipend allowed him before King Henry VIII founded his Greek Lecture at Cambridge. Afterwards he read Lectures upon that language in St. John's College for a long time (b). He was at firſt averſe to the new manner of pronouncing the Greek tongue introduced by Sir John Cheek [D], but afterwards conformed to it. In July 1542 he ſupplicated the Univerſity of Oxford under the name of Roger Haſkam to be incorporated Maſter of Arts there, as he had been at Cambridge; but whether learn inſtrumental Muſic, which would prove a very agreeable entertainment to him after his ſeverer ſtudies, and was eaſy to be obtained by him, ſince he was a great maſter of vocal Muſic. In one of his letters he thank'd Mr. Aſcham for the letter, which he had written to him in Greek, with an elegance and propriety worthy Athens itſelf; and recommended to him the learning of inſtrumental Muſic; and continuing to inſtruct the youth in the Greek Language, ſince a ſingle Fable of Æſop read by himſelf would be of more ſervice to him than to hear the Latin Lectures of the moſt learned Profeſſor upon the whole Iliad of Homer. He directs him likewiſe to read Pliny, who diſplays an infinite fund of knowledge, and the whole extent and beauty of the Latin tongue. Rogere cariſſime, ago tibi gratias pro Epiſtolâ tuâ Græcâ, quæ vel Athenis videri potuerat ſcripta, adeo ad unguem καὶ τὸν Ἑλληνισμὸν obſervâſti; & eſt elegantiſſimè depicta, quod in te perpetuum eſt. . . . Plinium lege, in quo rerum cognitio eſt maxima, & Latinæ linguæ opes floridiſſimæ (2). As he advanced in age, he applied himſelf to the conſtant reading of the beſt Greek and Roman Authors, and to the improvement of himſelf in his private exerciſes, and was preſent at all the logical diſputations both at his own college and others, and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of Philoſophy, Eloquence, and Hiſtory (3).

[B] Elected Fellow of the College by the intereſt of Dr. Nicholas Medcalf Maſter of the College at that time.] Mr. Aſcham tells us in his Schoolmaſter (4), that Dr. Medcalf was Maſter of the College, when he came there; A man, ſays he, meanly learned himſelf, but not meanly affectioned to ſet forward learning in others. He was partial to none, but indifferent to all; a Maſter of the whole, a Father to every one in that College. There was none ſo poor, if he had either will to goodneſs, or wit to learning, that could lack being there, or ſhould depart from thence for any need. . . . He was a Papiſt indeed; but would to God among all us Proteſtants I might once ſee but one, that would win like praiſe, in doing like good for the advancement of learning and virtue. And yet, tho' he were a Papiſt, if any young man, given to New Learning (as they termed it) went beyond his fellows in wit, labour, and towardneſs; even the ſame neither lacked open praiſe to encourage him, nor private exhibition to maintain him. "I myſelf, continues our Author, one of the meaneſt "of a great number in that College, becauſe there "appeared in me ſome ſmall ſhew of towardneſs and "diligence, lacked not his favour to further me in "learning. And being a boy, new Bachelor of Arts, "I chanced among my companions to ſpeak againſt "the Pope; which matter was then in every man's "mouth, becauſe Dr. Hains and Dr. Skip were come "from the Court to debate the ſame matter by preach-"ing and diſputation in the Univerſity." This happened the ſame time, when I ſtood to be Fellow there. My talk came to Dr. Medcalf's ear. I was called before him and the Seniors, and after grievous rebuke and ſome puniſhment, open warning was given to all the Fellows, none to be ſo hardy to give me his voice at that election. And yet, for all thoſe open threats, the good Father himſelf privily procured, that I ſhould even then be choſen Fellow. But the election being done, he made countenance of great diſcontent thereat. This good man's goodneſs and fatherly diſcretion uſed towards me that one day, ſhall never be out of my remembrance all the days of my life. And for the ſame cauſe have I put it here in this ſmall Record of learning. For next to God's Providence, ſurely that day was by that good Father's means, Dies Natalis to me, for the whole foundation of the poor learning I have, and of all the furtherance, that hitherto elſewhere I have obtained.

[C] Theſe honours animated him to a ſtill greater vigour in the proſecution of his ſtudies.] He read Cicero with the utmoſt attention imaginable, and was a prodigious admirer of him and of Cæſar's Commentaries, to which two Authors he aſcribed all the purity and unaffected elegance of ſtyle, which appear in his writings. He was likewiſe particularly fond of Plato and Ariſtotle among the Philoſophers, of Thucydides and Herodotus among the Hiſtorians, and Demoſthenes and Iſocrates among the Orators; and he read Lectures upon the two laſt of theſe Authors to his pupils in private. He expounded alſo ſeveral other Philoſophers, Orators, and Poets, either publickly in the college, or privately in his own chamber; by which means, as well as by his own ſtudy and application, he gained ſo extenſive a knowledge of Literature, and ſo ready a faculty in Latin and Greek, that his reputation encreaſed perpetually. Varios philoſophos, oratores, poetas, aut publicè in collegio, aut privatim in cubiculo exponebat. Ex quibus ſtudiis & exercitationibus tantam & eruditionis acceſſionem, & tam plenam utriuſque linguæ facultatem eſt adeptus, ut nomen ejus magis atque magis enituerit (5).

(5) Idem, pag. 9.

[D] He was at firſt averſe to the new manner of pronouncing the Greek tongue introduced by Sir John Cheek.] This we are informed of by Mr. Grant, who approves of this new pronunciation, and tells us, that this engaged Mr. Aſcham at firſt in a diſpute with Mr. Ponet, an ingenious young Gentleman, who was Fellow of Queen's College. But he did not proceed to an open oppoſition to it, out of regard to the Authority of Sir John Cheek and Mr. Smith, afterwards Sir Thomas Smith, whom he eſteemed as his moſt valuable friends, and always acknowledged his obligations to them for their inſtructions. Hic inprimis novam Græcæ linguæ pronunciationem ab ornatiſſimis viris totius Academiæ luminibus, Thoma Smith & Joanne Checo feliciſſimè introductam imitari & amplecti nolebat; & ob eam cauſam in initio cum Poneto juvene ingenioſo & diſerto Reginæ Collegii ſocio, velitabatur. Sed in eam graviter ac apertè invehi propter Checi & Smithi auctoritatem non audebat; quos ſuos ornatiſſimos amicos, doctiſſimos ſemper præceptores agnovit (6). However not long after this he adopted the new pronunciation, and ſtrenuouſly defended it as long as he lived, as appears from a Letter of his to Hubert, a man of eminent learning in the Greek and Latin tongues, who was Secretary to the Count Palatine on the Rhine. This Hubert, as he is ſtiled in the edition of Aſcham's Letters, was the famous Hubertus Languetus, who is ſuppoſed to have been the Author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, publiſhed under the name of Junius Brutus. Mr. Aſcham's Letter to him upon the ſubject of the Pronunciation of the Greek Language is the 12th Letter of the 3d Book, and is dated from Bruſſels the 6th of March 1553.

whether he was incorporated or not, does not appear by the regiſter (c). He was extremely fond of Archery or ſhooting with the bow, as appears by the book which he wrote upon that ſubject, and dedicated to King Henry VIII in the year 1544 [E], before his expedition into France to take Boulogne. He was remarkable for the neatneſs of his hand writing, and taught Prince Edward, the Lady Elizabeth, and the two brothers Henry and Charles, Dukes of Suffolk, that art; and wrote all the letters of the Univerſity to the King, and to perſons of the higheſt Quality for many years (d). In 1544 he ſucceeded Sir John Cheek as Orator of the Univerſity (e). In February 1548 he was ſent for upon the death of his former pupil Mr. Grindall to inſtruct the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards Queen, who made an uncommon progreſs in learning under him, and had a great eſteem for him [F]. He afterwards deſired leave to return to Cambridge, where he purſued his former ſtudies, and diſcharged his place as Orator of the Univerſity, and enjoyed a very 1553. He obſerves there, that the oppoſers of this pronunciation object, that it is in uſe no where but among the Engliſh; and that the modern Greeks abſolutely reject it. Mr. Aſcham remarks upon this, that uſe and cuſtom cannot now be juſtly urged, ſince the ancient and genuine Greek has ceaſed to be a living language; and that the modern Greeks are ſo extremely degenerated, that no argument can be properly drawn from their authority. He inſiſts particularly upon the letter B; which is very differently pronounced by the patrons of the new pronounciation from the oppoſers of it; ſince the latter pronounce the word χυβίρνω, chiverno, in which, as he obſerves, they miſtake in three letters χ, υ, β. The Latins have retained the very ſound as well as ſenſe of this word in their guberno, only changing the χ into a γ, as the ancient Greeks frequently did. With regard to B, he quotes the authority of Euſtathius, who in explaining this line of Homer, Βῆ δὲ κατ' Ὀλύμποιο &c. tells us the Βῆ is the peculiar ſound expreſſed by the bleating of the ſheep; and therefore it is eaſy to determine, whether it is to be pronounced as vi or as be, agreeably to the Engliſh manner; unleſs, ſays he, the Greek ſheep bleated in a different manner from thoſe of England, Germany, and Italy. Jam utrum ulla ovis effert Vi ut vos, an Be ut nos, judicetis. Anglæ ſcio omnes, & Germanæ & Italæ pro nobis faciunt; ſed fortaſſe Græcæ oves olim non balabant, ſed vilabant. Cicero likewiſe in the 22d Epiſtle of his 9th Book ad Famil. ſpeaking of obſcene words, ſays, that the Greek word Βίνει ſounds like the Latin word bini. Cum loquimur terni nihil flagitii dicimus; at cum bini obſcœnum eſt. Græcis quidem, inquies; nihil eſt ergo in verbo, quando & ego Græcè ſcio, & tamen tibi dico, bini, idque tu facis, quaſi ego Græcè, non Latinè dixerim. St. Auſtin alſo in his Book de Doctrinâ Chriſtianâ L. 11. c. 24. remarks, that Beta pronounced exactly in the ſame manner ſignifies a Letter among the Greeks, and an Herb among the Latins. Et Beta uno eodemque ſono apud Græcos literæ, apud Latinos oleris nomen eſt. Mr. Aſcham informs his friend, that he could produce many other teſtimonies to the ſame purpoſe; and promiſes him to conſider the pronunciation of the other letters in the future courſe of his correſpondence. Hubertus wrote him an anſwer to this dated from Heidelberg the 9th of Auguſt the ſame year, which is publiſhed among the Letters written to Aſcham (7).

Our Author's friend Mr. Pember wrote theſe verſes upon his Book:

Some perſons objected to his diverting himſelf with his bow, as if it was incompatible with the character and gravity of a Scholar. But he guarded againſt ſuch imputations as theſe in the firſt Book of his Toxophilus, and ſhewed the reaſonableneſs of relaxing the mind from graver ſtudies by proper exerciſes of the body; which was the more neceſſary for him, as he had a very infirm conſtitution (9). Henry VIII ſettled an annual penſion upon him for the Dedication of that Book, at the recommendation of Sir William Paget; which was diſcontinued upon the death of that King, but reſtored during pleaſure by Edward VI, and afterwards by Queen Mary with the addition of ten pounds a year more, at the ſollicitation of the ſame Gentleman and of the Biſhop of Wincheſter (10).

[F] Who made an uncommon progreſs under him, and had a great eſteem for him.] He had the honour of aſſiſting her in her ſtudies for two years, and ſhe attended to him with ſo much pleaſure, that it is difficult to ſay, whether the Maſter or the Scholar had greater ſatisfaction. Illam ille tanta diligentia, tanta experientia & ſtudio duos annos docuit, & illa illum tanta conſtantia, labore, amore, & voluptate audivit, ut ille ne majore quidem cum jucunditate & voluptate prælegerit, an illa lubentiore animo didicerit, non poſſum quidem facile ſtatuere (11). He read with her almoſt all Cicero's works, great part of Livy, ſelect Orations of Iſocrates, the Tragedies of Sophocles, the Greek Teſtament, the Common Places of Philip Melancthon, and many others of the moſt conſiderable Authors. And with regard to this method, which he took in teaching that Lady, having obſerved in his Schoolmaſter (12), that Pliny the Younger in an Epiſtle to his Friend, expreſſes many good ways for order in ſtudy; but beginneth with Tranſlation, and preferreth it before all the reſt, he proceeds thus: But a better and nearer example herein may be our moſt noble Queen Elizabeth, who never took yet Greek nor Latin Grammar in her hand after the firſt declining of a Noun and a Verb; but only by this double tranſlating of Demoſthenes and Iſocrates daily, without miſſing every forenoon, and likewiſe ſome part of Tully every afternoon, for the ſpace of a year or two, hath attained to ſuch perfect underſtanding in both the tongues, and to ſuch a ready utterance of the Latin, and that with ſuch a judgment, as they be few in number in both the Univerſities or elſewhere in England, that be in both tongues comparable with her Majeſty. And to conclude in a ſhort room the commodities of double Tranſlations, ſurely the mind by daily marking firſt, the cauſe and matter, then the words and phraſes, next the order and compoſition, after the reaſon and arguments, then the forms and figures of both the tongues, laſtly the meaſure and compaſs of every ſentence muſt needs by litile and little draw into the like ſhape of eloquence, as the Author doth uſe, which is read. He obſerves likewiſe in his firſt Letter of the firſt Book to Sturmius, that by the uſe of the double Tranſlations from Greek into Latin, and Latin into Greek, which are recommended by L. Craſſus in Tully's firſt Book de Oratore, and Pliny the Younger in the Epiſtle abovementioned to Fuſcus, he had brought the Lady Elizabeth to a very accurate knowledge of both languages. Gradus hi ſunt, primus, Linguarum Verſio. Non dico ſimplicem explicationem ignotæ linguæ, quæ in ſcholis quotidiana eſt, & ore præceptoris ſolum traditur; ſed iteratam & quaſi reciprocantem duarum linguarum, utriuſque utrobique vertendarum rationem. Nimirum ut Græca Latine, & tum ut eadem ipſa Latina Græce denuo convertantur, juſta commentatione & diligenti ſcriptione, cum proprio, non alieno ſtylo, ſemper adhibitâ. Et ſic ego intelligo utile illud imprimis & prudens conſilium, cum L. Craſſo in primo de Oratore, tum Plinii Secundi ad ſuum Fuſcum in ſeptimo. Atque vix credibile eſt, ad quam excellentem cum Latine tum Græce intelligendi facultatem ipſe divam noſtram Elizabetham hac geminatæ converſionis ratione ſcripto ſemper reddita brevi tempore perduxi. In another Letter to the ſame Sturmius (13), dated from Greenwich Sept. 14th 1555, he tells him, that he enjoyed at court as agreeable a freedom and retirement for his ſtudies, as he had ever done a very conſiderable penſion from King Edward (f). In the ſummer of the year 1550, while he was viſiting his friends in Yorkſhire, he received a letter from Sir John Cheek to come up to court, in order to attend upon Sir Richard Moryſine in his Embaſſy to the Emperor Charles V; and in his journey to London viſited the Lady Jane Grey at her father's Seat in Leiceſterſhire [G]. In September following he ſet ſail with the Embaſſador for Germany, where he continued three years, and contracted a friendſhip with ſeveral learned men [H]. In his Embaſſy he was of great uſe to the Embaſſador [I].

done in the Univerſity; and that he was then reading over with that Lady the Orations of Æſchines and Demoſthenes de Corona in Greek, and that ſhe underſtood at firſt ſight not only the force and propriety of the language and the meaning of the Orator, but the whole ſcheme of the cauſe, and the laws, cuſtoms, and manners of the Athenians. Si aves ſcire quidnam rerum ago in Aulâ, intelligas nunquam mihi magis optatum otium conceſſum fuiſſe in Academia, quam nunc eſt in Regiâ. D. Elizabetha & ego unà legimus Græce Orationes Æſchinis & Demoſthenis περὶ Στεφάνου. Illa prælegit mihi & primo aſpectu tam ſcienter intelligit non ſolum proprietatem linguæ & oratoris ſenſum, ſed totam cauſæ contentionem, populi ſcita, conſuetudinem, & mores illius urbis, ut ſummoperè admirareris. He extolls her likewiſe in the ſame Letter for her ſkill in the Italian and French, as well as the Greek and Roman Languages, and for her extenſive knowledge of things added to an excellent taſte and judgment. Quantum ipſa præſtat Græca, Latina, Italica & Gallica lingua, imo quâ rerum cognitione, & quam docto & intelligente judicio prædita ſit, ipſe tibi fusè enarrabit. Mr. Strype in his Life of Biſhop Aylmer (14) tells us, that among other diſcourſes, which that Biſhop, who was then Tutor to the Lady Jane Grey, had with Mr. Aſcham, the latter aſſured him, that he learned more of the Lady Elizabeth, than ſhe did of him. "I teach her words, "ſaid he, and ſhe teaches me things. I teach her "the tongues to ſpeak, and her modeſt and maidenly "looks teach me works to do; for I think ſhe is the "beſt diſpoſed of any in all Europe." We are informed by Mr. Grant (15), that ſhe had the greateſt value for him imaginable all the time he lived with her, and that he ſhewed all the reciprocal regards to her, which were due to her character. This appeared evidently, when he had left her ſervice inconſiderately, as he acknowledged afterwards, and to the great regret of that Lady. This gave him the higheſt concern imaginable, when he reflected that he might have expected the greateſt advantages to himſelf from ſuch a ſituation. Hæc omnia apertè oſtendebat ille invitus ab illâ non ſatis conſideratus, ut ille poſtea faſſus eſt, diſceſſus; quum Domina ſua Elizabetha invitiſſima Cantabrigiam ad recolenda & celebranda vetera ſtudia reverteretur. Nec aliquid unquam magis eum dolore afflixit, quam quod, illa invita, ab illa diſcederet, à qua maximum ſui laboris fructum expectaret; ut poſtea feliciſſimè contigit, cum Domina Elizabetha ad rerum gubernacula evecta fuit. But it appears from a paſſage in Mr. Aſcham's Letter to Dr. Martin Bucer (16) dated from Augſburg the 7th of January 1551, that when that Divine came firſt into England, and lived at Lambeth, our Author paid him a viſit, tho' then unknown to him, and acquainted him with the ill treatment, which he had received from ſome perſons of the Lady Elizabeth's family; and deſired him to write a letter in his favour to that Lady, who had conceived ſome diſpleaſure againſt him; not for any miſconduct of his, but upon the falſe repreſentations of others. Before his departure from England, he had waited upon her, and ſhe received him with great civility, and reproached him in very kind terms for leaving her, and never having employed any perſon to recover her favour. Meminiſti quomodo olim, cum primum in Angliam veneris, & Lambethi vixeris, ego ad te acceſſi, tum quidem ignotus tibi declaravi, quam malè tractarer, non à Domina mea Elizabetha, ſed à nonnullis illarum ædium. Rogabam te tum, ut tuis literis me reponeres in gratiam Dominæ meæ, quæ nulla mea culpa teſte Deo loquar, ſed iniqua aliorum opera nonnihil à me abalienata fuit. Ante digreſſum ex Anglia adivi illuſtriſſimam Dominam. Humaniſſime me accepit, & multo humanius me objurgavit, quod ſic vellem eam relinquere, nec unquam laborarem per ullum hominem, ut redirem in illius gratiam. He deſired therefore Dr. Bucer very earneſtly to inform that Lady by a letter how much he had ſollicited him to write to her, which he doubted not he would have done before, if that Divine had not been prevented at that time by ſickneſs. He aſſures him, that he was conſcious to himſelf, that he had not done or ſaid any thing exceptionable in her family; and that if his modeſty would ſuffer him, he could give him a ſatisfactory account of the great ſervices which he had done to that Lady. Munitus ſum, mi Bucere, optimâ conſcientiâ rectè factorum & dictorum in illa aula; & niſi pudor me revocaret, exponerem tibi, quam præclaras res à me clariſſima Domina acceperit. This paſſage gives us ſome light into the reaſons of his leaving his Lady in ſo abrupt a manner.

[G] In his journey to London he viſited the Lady Jane Grey at her father's ſeat in Leiceſterſhire.] In his Letter to Sturmius (17) dated the 14th of December 1550, having informed him, that this Lady was then but fifteen years of age, that he had been very intimate with her at court, and that ſhe had written a very elegant letter to him, he obſerves, that upon his return from Yorkſhire he paid her a viſit, and found her reading of Plato's Phædo in Greek, which ſhe underſtood ſo well, that he was extremely ſurprized. That ſhe ſpoke and wrote Greek to admiration; and that ſhe had promiſed to write him a letter in that language, upon condition that he would ſend her a letter firſt from the Emperor's court. In aula fui illi valde familiaris, & ſcripſit ad me eruditas literas. . . . Statim admiſſus ſum in cubiculum; inveni nobilem puellam, Dii boni! legentem Græcè Phædonem Platonis, quem ſic intelligit, ut mihi ipſi ſummam admirationem injiceret. Sic loquitur & ſcribit Græcè, ut vera referenti vix fides adhiberi poſſit. . . . . Mihi diſcedenti recepit ſe Græcè ſcripturam, ſi ego illam meis literis ex aula Imperatoris ſcriptis provocarem. Expecto quotidie Græcas ejus literas; cum venerint, ad te ſtatim mittam. And in his letter to that Lady herſelf (18), he tells her, that amongſt all the agreeable variety of objects, which he had met with in his travels abroad, he had met with nothing ſo truly admirable, as the ſatisfaction which he had the Summer before of ſurprizing her reading Plato's Phædo in Greek, in the abſence of her Tutor, at her father's ſeat, while the reſt of the family were engaged in hunting and diverſion. And he obſerves to her, that in that reſpect ſhe was more happy, than in being deſcended both on her father's and mother's ſide from Kings and Queens. Nihil tamen in tanta rerum varietate tam juſtam mihi admirationem adfert, quam quod hâc proximâ ſuperiori æſtate offenderim te, tam nobilem Virginem, abſente optimo præceptore, in aulâ nobiliſſimi Patris, quo tempore reliqui & reliquæ venationi & jucunditatibus ſeſe dent; offenderim, inquam, ὦ Ζεῦ καὶ Θεοὶ, divinam virginem divinum divini Platonis Phædonem Græcè, ſeduló perlegentem. Hac parte felicior es judicanda, quam quod πατρόθεν μητροθεν ex regibus reginiſque genus tuum deducis. We have a more particular account of this in his Schoolmaſter (19).

[H] Contracted a friendſhip with ſeveral learned men.] He became very intimately acquainted with a great many perſons of merit in Germany and Italy, which country he likewiſe viſited in his travels. He had kept a correſpondence with the famous John Sturmius of Straſburg before he left England; but never ſaw him, that learned man being abſent, when he went to viſit him in that city. They had a prodigious regard for each other, as appears from Mr. Aſcham's firſt Book of Letters, which are entirely addreſſed to Sturmius, who in all his Letters likewiſe treats his friend with the utmoſt reſpect. Our Author was likewiſe very intimate with Jerom Wolfius, and highly eſteemed by ſeveral Princes and Cities of Germany. This, as Sturmius obſerves in a Letter to Paget, was occaſioned by his prudence, humanity, politeneſs, ſador [I]. He returned to England in September 1553, upon the news of King Edward VIth's death, who had not only appointed him an annual penſion in his abſence, but likewiſe made him his Latin Secretary; ſo that he was now deſtitute of all ſupport and friends, till by the intereſt of the Lord Paget and Dr. Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter, he was appointed Latin Secretary to Queen Mary [K]. He had a great ſhare likewiſe in the eſteem of Cardinal Pool [L]. The firſt of June the year following he married Mrs. Margaret Howe, with whom he had a good fortune [M]. Upon Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the crown, he was not only continued in his place of Secretary, and made Tutor to her for the Greek tongue, but alſo by her favour inſtalled Prebendary of Wetwang in the Church of York, vacant by the deprivation of George Palmer L. politeneſs, learning, and ſweetneſs of temper, which procured him the nobleſt recommendations from his friends, and made him ſo very acceptable, that he ſeemed worthy to be employed perpetually in embaſſies; and yet at the ſame time was ſo converſant in learning, and intent upon the purſuits of it, that it might be wiſhed, that he was conſtantly preſent in the aſſemblies of Men of Letters. Propter prudentiam, humanitatem, elegantiam, doctrinam, ſuavitatem, quas virtutes ex ſe habuit; deinde propter amicorum commendationes, quas ejus virtus merita eſt, ita, inquam, gratus & carus fuit, ut dignus videretur, qui in perpetuis eſſet legationibus, ſed ita doctus, ita ſtudioſus, ita idoneus ad literarum ſtudia, ut Joannes Sturmius optaret eum perpetuo eſſe in ſcholis doctorum hominum (20).

(20) Grant, pag. 17, 18.

[I] He was of great ſervice to the Embaſſador.] Sir Richard Moryſine had ſo great an opinion of his judgment, that he conſulted him upon all the important affairs, which he was employed to manage in Germany; and he placed ſuch a confidence in his fidelity and good ſenſe, that he imparted all his deſigns and reſolutions to him. He was greatly charmed likewiſe with his converſation, which was rendered extremely agreeable by his politeneſs, modeſty, and extenſive knowledge of things. Mr. Aſcham was very aſſiduous in his attendance upon the Embaſſador; and read to him while they continued at Augſburg all Herodotus, five of Sophocles's Tragedies, and ſome of Euripides, and three and twenty Orations of Demoſthenes, from their firſt arrival in Germany the 12th of October 1550 to the 12th of Auguſt 1551. He read twice a day for four days every week; and in the morning he explained three or four pages of Herodotus, and in the afternoon 212 or 213 verſes of Sophocles or Euripides. The other three days he copied the letters, which the Embaſſador ſent to England. At night he uſed to converſe among his friends, or write his private letters to England, or inſert in his Diary an account of every thing which he had heard of, or ſeen, or done, that was remarkable. When he had any leiſure from his employment, he ſpent it in viſiting the men of learning, or making obſervations upon the country, where he reſided (21).

(21) Idem, pag. 18, 19.

[K] By the intereſt of the Lord Paget and Dr. Stephen Gardiner Biſhop of Wincheſter he was appointed Latin Secretary to Queen Mary.] Upon his return from Germany, having no further expectations from the Court he went again to the Univerſity; but not long after he was ſent for up to London, and made Latin Secretary; which place had been before given him, while he was abroad in Germany, at the ſollicitation of Sr. William Cecil, Secretary of State to King Edward VI (22). He tells Sturmius in a letter (23) dated from Greenwich September 14th 1555, that all that he had enjoyed under King Henry VIII and Edward VI was reſtored him with ſeveral new advantages, and that he was appointed Latin Secretary to the King and Queen, which poſt he proteſts he would not reſign for any other. He obſerves, that the Biſhop of Wincheſter, who was likewiſe Lord Chancellor, had ſhewn him the utmoſt civility; ſo that he could not well determine whether the Lord Paget had been readier in recommending him than the Biſhop in advancing him. That ſome perſons indeed had endeavoured to ſtop the courſe of his favours to him on account of Religion. But had failed in the attempt. And therefore he was highly obliged to the Biſhop's benevolent diſpoſition towards him, as well as many other perſons, who had received marks of his generoſity. Stephanus Epiſcopus Wintonienſis, ſummus Angliæ Cancellarius, ſumma humanitate atque favore me complexus eſt; ut paratior fuerit Pagettus ne in me commendando, an Wintonienſis in me tuendo atque ornando facilè dijudicare non queam. Non defuerunt, qui curſum benevolentiæ illius in me conati ſunt impedire, religionis causâ, ſed nihil profuerunt. Itaque plurimum debeo Wintonienſi humanitati, & libenter debeo. Neque ego ſolus, ſed multi etiam alii experti ſunt illius humanitatem. He wrote ſeveral letters to that Biſhop, in which he thanks him in very ſtrong terms for the extraordinary favours, which he had received from him. He diſcharged his office of Latin Secretary with great applauſe, and was admired for the elegance and propriety of his ſtyle. At the beginning of the reign of King Philip and Queen Mary, in three days time he wrote ſeven and forty different letters to ſeveral Princes, the loweſt of whom in rank were Cardinals. He held his Fellowſhip of St. John's College, and his place of Orator to the Univerſity almoſt to the Feaſt of St. John in 1554, by the intereſt of the Queen and the Biſhop of Wincheſter (24).

[L] He had a great ſhare likewiſe in the eſteem of Cardinal Pool.] The Cardinal treated him always with the utmoſt humanity and familiarity; and tho' he was a great maſter himſelf of the Latin tongue, yet he in ſome inſtances preferred Mr. Aſcham's pen to his own. Mr. Grant tells us (25), that he had in his poſſeſſion the ſpeech which the Cardinal had ſpoken in Engliſh to the Parliament, when he came over as Legate from the Pope, tranſlated into Latin at the Cardinal's requeſt by Mr. Aſcham; which tranſlation was ſent by Pool to the Pope. He tells Sturmius in a letter to him (26) dated from Greenwich, Sept. 14th 1555, that the Cardinal who he thought was ſuperior to any of the Italians in point of eloquence, was very civil to him, and that he had the honour of being admitted into a great familiarity with him. Reverendiſſimus Cardinalis Polus valde humanus eſt, & haud ſcio an quiſquam Italus, eloquentiæ laude, cum eo comparari queat. Me utitur valde familiariter.

[M] He married Mrs. Margaret Howe, with whom he had a good fortune.] She was a Lady of a very good character and family, whoſe parents were extremely pleaſed with this marriage. When Sturmius heard of his deſign to marry, he wrote to him a letter dated the 24th of June 1554, and aſked him why he concealed the agreeable news from him, ſince he would have ſent him an Epithalmium. He tells him, that he had been informed, that the young Lady was niece to the wife of Mr. Walop who was formerly Governor of Ginnes, when himſelf was at Calais. He deſires him therefore to acquaint him, whether that Lady was to be his bride, and when the day appointed for the marriage was, that if he could not be preſent himſelf, he might at leaſt ſend him his compliments upon the occaſion. Sed quid ego? Sponſus ne factus, id nos celare vis? ut ne tibi aliquod Epithalamium mittamus Germanicum? Audio ſponſam tuam Domini Walopi, Ginenſis olim cum ego Caleti eſſem præfecti, uxorem habere materteram. Deus bone, quam pulchram & venuſtam mulierem, quam honeſtam matronam? Si ſic, hoc eſt, ſi uxorem habere illam vis, aut ſi quæ eſt alia tibi deſponſata, quæſo me fac certiorem, & ſcribe mihi quo ſint die futuræ, ut ſi ipſe non adeſſe queam, mittam Thalaſſium, qui pro me tuos amores ornet (27). Mr. Aſcham in his anſwer to this letter dated the 14th of September 1555, tells him, that his wife was very like her aunt Walop in the face, and that ſhe was juſt ſuch a wife as his friend would wiſh him. De uxore quod cupis ſcire, vultu valde refert materteram ſuam D. R. Walopi uxorem. Et habeo talem uxorem, qualem Joannes Sturmius Rogero Aſchamo libenter optaret.

[N] His modeſty hindered him from making a greater uſe of the intereſt which he had in the Queen.] He had the honour of being with her every day, and reading ſome Greek or Latin to her. He uſed to play with her at dice or other games, and ſhe took a particular pleaſure in his converſation, which was very polite and facetious. He was never refuſed admittance to her, and had all the advantages imaginable to have gratified his ambition, if he would have indulged it. But he was very averſe by nature from aſking favours, and the utmoſt neceſſity could never induce him to it. He ſtudied much more to oblige his Queen by all the ſervices in his power, than to trouble her with his own requeſts. And he uſed frequently to tell his friends, that in all the favourable opportunities which he had of being in her preſence, he never deſired any favour of her on account of himſelf or his family. Majore tenebatur deſiderio voluntate, fide, conſtantiâ, induſtriâ, officioque ſervitio ſuæ Principi ſatisfacere, quam audacibus & moleſtis rogatibus eidem moleſtiam exhibere. Hoc vulgo prædicare, & amicis ſæpe commemorare ſolebat, ſe nunquam in tot pulcherrimis diebus in ſuæ principis præſentia conſumptis, os ad aliquid rogandum aperuiſſe, quo ſe & ſuos ditaret, & locupletiores redderet. The Marquis of Wincheſter, who was at that time Lord Treaſurer, and an intimate friend of Mr. Aſcham's, very often blamed him for his exceſſive modeſty in this reſpect, and told him, that he ought to be leſs aſſiduous in the diſcharge of his office, and more confident in his requeſts to the Queen. But his anſwer was to thoſe who urged him in this manner, that he had rather deſerve well of her Majeſty than obtain the greateſt rewards without any merit. However ſhe granted many conſiderable favours without his aſking for them. Malui, reſpondit ille, mea diligentia & officio benè de meâ principe mereri, quam præclaris muneribus immerito adornari. Nihilominus tamen Regia Majeſtas multis eum & magnis beneficiis è ſua munificâ bonitate collocupletavit. He always rejected with great indignation the preſents which were offered to him, in order to engage him to employ his intereſt with the Queen for others; and he frequently ſaid, that God had not given him the uſe of his tongue, that it might be venal and ſubſervient to his profit. And he choſe rather to live in very moderate circumſtances, than to forfeit his integrity by receiving bribes (28).

(28) Grant, pag. 25, 26.

[O] We ſhall give his character in the note.] While he lived at the Univerſity, he was remarkable for his eaſy and polite behaviour, the undiſguiſed frankneſs of his temper, and his fidelity to his friends. His integrity was unblemiſhed, and he was peculiarly formed to procure the friendſhip of men of merit and learning, and to gain the good will of mankind in general. He had all the zeal and warmth imaginable in maintaining the cauſe of his friends, and ſerving them to the utmoſt of his power. Erat moribus facillimis, animo aperto & ſimplici; natura erat lenis & mitis, comitate affabilis, amicis fideliſſimus; vita honeſtus; homo ad amicitias cum bonis & eruditis copulandas natus; & ad conciliandas & devinciendas hominum voluntates aptiſſimus. Amicos ſumma fide, maximo ſtudio, & quibus potuit officiis, amplexus eſt, coluit, obſervavit (29). He bore adverſity with great patience and reſignation, and was never too much elated with his good fortune. He was indeed ſtrongly affected by the treachery of ſome perſons towards him, whom he had almoſt treated in the moſt generous and diſintereſted manner. He was extremely temperate in eating and drinking, but had a natural averſion to a fiſh diet, ſo that he was obliged in King Edward the ſixth's reign, to procure a diſpenſation from Archbiſhop Cranmer, and in Queen Mary's time he was obliged to make uſe of other methods to preſerve his health. He was always ready to aſſiſt ſtudents with his advice, and generous to poor ſcholars; and his liberality to his friends was very extenſive. Theſe Verſes of Martial particularly pleaſed him:

(29) Idem, p. 9.

Extra ſortunam eſt quicquid donatur amicis:
Quas ſolus dederis, ſemper habebis opes.

That is,

" The pow'r of fortune never can extend " To what we kindly laviſh on our friend:
" What thus we give, ſhall always be our own."

His integrity was untainted; his zeal for the Proteſtant Religion was very firm; and he had a ſupreme reverence for the Deity. His converſation had a ſtrain of unaffected piety in it; and he was regular in his private devotions. His topics of diſcourſe among his friends were of God, the iniquity and malice of mankind, the effects of God's benevolence towards them, and grand deſigns of Providence to lead men to their greateſt and ultimate happineſs. Thoſe who were familiar to him affirmed, that he was exemplary in his conduct in his family, modeſt in converſation, faithful to his Sovereign, obliging to his friends, fond of all parts of true learning, and particularly pleaſed upon all occaſions to expreſs his ſenſe of the Divine goodneſs to men (30). But he is charged by ſome Authors with having been much addicted to dicing and cock-matches, ſo that he lived and died in very mean circumſtances. This Cambden aſſures us of in his Annals of Queen Elizabeth (31). And we are told by Mr. Lloyd in his State Worthies (32), that what he got by his ingenuity, he loſt by his gaming, viz. at dice and cock-fighting; and by Mr. Wood (33), that tho' he had a conſiderable fortune with his wife, yet notwithſtanding that and his place, he lived and died not according to his condition, being given to dicing and cock-fighting. Mr. Grant likewiſe owns (34), that he uſed to take pleaſure in the latter of theſe diverſions, as well as in the exerciſe of ſhooting with his bow. Non video quid impediret, quo minus Rogerus Aſchamus ſua haberet honeſta oblectamenta, arcu uteretur, aut Ἀλεκτρυομαχίᾳ intereſſet. Biſhop Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part III (35) tells us, that he knows not whence Mr. Wood was informed, that he ſpent too much of his latter days in dicing and cock-fighting. This obſervation of his is a little ſurprizing, ſince it appears that Mr. Wood had the authority of Cambden, with that of other Writers, for his aſſertion. However the Biſhop proceeds as follows: A. Nowel, the learned Dean of St. Paul's, who preached his Funeral Sermon, and was his Confeſſor during his laſt ſickneſs, affirms, that he never knew any man live more honeſtly, nor die more Chriſtianly. All that we have of his compoſure ſhews him to have been a maſter of ſuch accompliſhments as are rarely attainable by any of ſuch looſe diſpoſitions. But to return to the more advantageous part of his character; Cambden repreſents him as one of the firſt perſons of our Nation, who cultivated the Latin and Greek tongues, and wrote in them with a purity and eloquence, that deſerved commendation. Inter primos noſtræ nationis literas Latinas & Græcas, ſtylique puritatem cum eloquentiæ laude excoluit (36). Sturmius tells him in one of his Letters, that his Epiſtles were not only agreeable but elegant, and that there is ſuch a happy mixture of wit and gaiety of expreſſion in ſome parts of them, and of dignity in others, and ſuch an harmony in the arrangement of his words and ſentences, that he ſhould have imagined them to have been written with the greateſt accuracy, but that even his ex tempore compoſitions were extremely correct. Literæ tuæ non ſolum ſuaves, verum etiam elegantes ſunt; tanta enim in illis eſt flexibilitas verborum, & ad acutas comitatis, & ad graves Philoſophiæ ſententias; talis in collocando ordo, ut tum ſcriptionis ſuavitatem admirer, tum etiam intelligam à te accuratè eſſe compoſitas; niſi à te nihil proficiſcatur incompoſitum, quantumvis ſubito ſcriptum (37). He was likewiſe greatly admired for the purity and elegance of his ſtyle by ſeveral of the moſt eminent Writers at that time, who had a correſpondence with him by letters, and particularly of the famous Jerom Oſorius a Portugueze Biſhop. Peter Nannius Profeſſor at Louvain, Michael Toxites, Poet Laureat, and Jerom Wolfius. Buchanan pays him a great compliment with regard to his learning as well as integrity in the following verſes, which he wrote upon his death:

[P] He wrote ſeveral pieces, which are greatly admired.] We have mentioned above in note [D] his Toxophilus. We ſhall proceed therefore to his other works, which are as follow. The Schoolmaſter; or a plain and perfect way of teaching children to underſtand, write, and ſpeak the Latin tongue, &c. in two Books. London 1570 and 1589 in 4to. It was dedicated by his widow to Sir William Cecil, Principal Secretary to the Queen. He mentions this Book to Sturmius in the firſt Letter of his firſt Book, and tells him, that as he could not leave his children a great fortune, he was deſirous to furniſh them with a good education; and therefore was preparing them a Schoolmaſter of his own. Cum his meis filiis non illuſtrem fortunæ ſplendorem promittere poſſum, aliquem certæ doctrinæ cultum illis relinquere ipſe cupio. Paro igitur illis præceptorem, non illum foris ſumptuoſâ mercede conducendum, ſed rudi à me ſtylo domi jam delineatum. He then gives him an account of the Method of his Book, and obſerves, that it was written in Engliſh for the greater advantage of the youth, for whoſe uſe it was deſigned; and that he was not ſo much an enemy to his own native language, as not to perceive that it was very capable of all the ornaments of ſtyle. Neque tamen ipſe ſum tam noſtræ linguæ inimicus, quin ſentiam illam omnium ornamentorum cum dictionis tum ſententiarum admodum eſſe capacem. Mr. Philips in the Introduction (39) to his Compendious Way of teaching ancient and modern Languages remarks, that ſeveral of Queen Elizabeth's Miniſters of State being very ſenſible of a defect in the education of youth, our Author was deſired by the Treaſurer Sir Richard Sackville to draw up a ſcheme for that purpoſe, which was publiſhed after his death, and dedicated to Sir William Cecil, principal Secretary of State to the Queen. He obſerves likewiſe, that this Book contains ſome very good hints on that ſubject, if made uſe of in ſchools for writing a good Latin ſtyle; and that the Reverend Mr. James Upton M. A. did good ſervice to Literature in publiſhing a new edition of it, with explanatory Notes at London 1711 in 8vo. In the Preface Mr. Aſcham has this remarkable paſſage (40): Some men friendly of nature, but of ſmall judgment in learning, do think I take too much pains and ſpend too much time, in ſetting forth theſe childrens affairs. But thoſe good men were never brought up in Socrates's ſchool; who ſaith plainly, that no man goeth about a more godly purpoſe, than he that is mindful of the good bringing up both of his own and other men's children. Therefore I truſt good and wiſe men will think well of this my doing; and of others that think otherwiſe, I will think myſelf they are but men, to be pardoned for their folly, and pitied for their ignorance. He obſerves in his firſt Book (41), that " ſome Wits, " moderate enough by nature, be many times marred " by overmuch ſtudy, and uſe of ſome ſciences, name- " ly Muſic, Arithmetick, and Geometry. Theſe " ſciences, as they ſharpen men's wits over much, ſo " they change men's manners over ſore, if they be " not moderately mingled, and wiſely applied to ſome " good uſe of life." Mark, continues he, all mathematical heads, which be only and wholly bent to thoſe ſciences, how ſolitary they be themſelves, how unapt to ſerve in the world. This is not only known by common, experience, but uttered long before by wiſe men's judgment and ſentence. Galen ſaith, Much Muſick marreth men's manners; and Plato hath a notable place of the ſame thing in his Books de Repub. well marked alſo, and excellently tranſlated by Tully himſelf. Of this matter I wrote once more at large twenty years ago in my Book of Shooting. The paſſage in his Toxophilus, which Mr. Aſcham refers to, is as follows: Whatſoever ye judge, this I am ſure, that lutes, harps, barbitons, ſambukes, with other inſtruments, every one, which ſtandeth by fine and quick fingering, be condemned of Ariſtotle, as not to be brought in and uſed among them, which ſtudy for learning and virtue. . . . Much Muſick marreth men's manners, ſaith Galen. Although ſome men will ſay that it doth not ſo, but rather recreateth and maketh quick a man's mind, yet methink by reaſon it doth, as honey doth to a man's ſtomach, which at the firſt receiveth it well, but afterward it maketh it unfit to abide any ſtrong nouriſhing meat, or elſe any wholſome ſharp and quick drink. And even ſo in a manner theſe inſtruments make a man's wit ſo ſoft and ſmooth, ſo tender and quaiſy, that they be leſt able to brook ſtrong and rough ſtudy. Wits be not ſharpened, but rather dulled and made blunt with ſuch ſweet ſoftneſs, even as good edges be blunted, which men whet upon ſoft chalk-ſtones. His Epiſtles were firſt publiſhed at London in the year 1576 by Mr. Grant (42), and in 1578 and 1590, in 8vo. Mr. Wood and Biſhop Nicholſon (43) mention an Edition at London in 1577. There are two Editions at Hanaw in 1602 and 1610, and Colon. Allobrog. in 1611. But the moſt compleat and correct Edition is that publiſhed at Oxford in 1703, by Mr. William Elſtob in 8vo, which contains ſeveral Letters never before publiſhed. The firſt Book contains thoſe, which he wrote to John Sturmius Rector of the Univerſity of Straſburg; the ſecond thoſe Letters, which he wrote while he reſided at Cambridge; and the third thoſe, which he wrote during his travels into Germany or after his return. To theſe are ſubjoined one Book of commendatory Letters and Petitions, and other pieces of that nature, which he wrote in the name of others to Princes and perſons of the higheſt rank; and another Book containing the Letters of Sturmius, Jerom Oſorius, Dr. John Chriſtopherſon, Richard Brandiſbey, Michael Toxites, John Sleidan, Peter Ramus, and other eminent men to Mr. Aſcham. Biſhop Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (44) having obſerved the great advantage and light, which Hiſtory receives from the epiſtolary remarks of men of ſenſe and buſineſs, tells us, that he ſhall only mention one inſtance of the uſefulneſs of ſuch papers; and can only point to a ſmall handful of theſe, the greateſt part of the ſtore being ſtill in private hands. 'Tis, ſays he, the collection of thoſe Latin Letters, that were compoſed by R. Aſcham, and chiefly upon account of their elegancy have had ſeveral Editions. The Author was ſometime an Inſtructor in the Latin tongue, and afterwards Latin Secretary to King Edward the ſixth, Queen (b) Mary and Queen Elizabeth; and in this letter ſtation was frequently employed to tranſlate ſeveral Letters of the then Engliſh Miniſters of State to foreign Princes, Embaſſadors, and other great Men. In theſe we have all the fine variety of language, that is proper for the rendering of either a petition or complaint the moſt agreeable, and withal a deal of very choice hiſtorical matter, that is hardly preſerved any where elſe. Together with the Author's own Letters, we have a good many that are directed to him, both from the moſt eminent foreigners of his time, (ſuch as Sturmius, Sleidan, &c.) and the beſt Scholars, as well as the wiſeſt Stateſmen of his own country. And the (a) Publiſher of theſe aſſures us, that he had the peruſal of a vaſt number of others in the Engliſh tongue, which were highly valuable. His attendance on Sir Richard Moryſon, in his German Embaſſy gave him an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of that country; and the extraordinary freedom and familiarity, with which the two ſiſter Queens treated him here at home, afforded him a perfect knowledge of the moſt ſecret myſteries of State in this Kingdom. So that were the reſt of his papers retrieved, we could not perhaps have a more pleaſing view of the main Arcana in thoſe reigns, than his writings would have given us. His Poems were printed at the end of his Epiſtles in ſeveral editions, but deſignedly omitted in that of Mr. Elſtob. Mr. Wood (47) mentions two other pieces of his writing, viz. A Report and Diſcourſe of the affairs and ſtate of Germany, plary manner [Q], on the 30th of December 1568, being fifty three years of age, and was interred without any pomp the 4th of January following in St. Sepulchre's Church. His funeral Sermon was preached by Dr. Alexander Nowel Dean of St. Paul's (i). His death was univerſally lamented; and Queen Elizabeth is reported to have ſaid, that ſhe had rather have caſt ten thouſand pounds into the ſea, than to have loſt her Aſcham (k). He had three ſons, Giles, Dudley, and Sturmius, the laſt of whom he named ſo out of regard to his friend John Sturmius (l). Giles, his eldeſt ſon, was entered as a ſcholar in Weſtminſter School under Mr. Grant, who had a great regard for him, and recommended him highly to Queen Elizabeth. He was afterwards elected a Fellow of St. John's College at Cambridge by the intereſt of the Lord Treaſurer Burghley, and was famous, as well as his father, for his excellent talent in writing Latin Letters (m).

[Q] He died in a very pious and exemplary manner.] As his life had been conducted with the utmoſt regularity, without offence to any perſon, he received the approaches of death with the greateſt calmneſs and reſolution. He had been many years before ſubject to frequent fevers, which broke his conſtitution; but in the latter part of his life he had been ſeized with an hectic, which left a weakneſs upon him, that was greatly encreaſed by a cold, which he took in ſpending ſeveral whole nights in the compoſition of a Poem, which he deſigned to addreſs to the Queen upon the occaſion of the new year, and in writing of Letters. This caſt him into a fatal ſickneſs the 23d of December 1568. He was viſited by Dr. Alexander Nowel Dean of St. Paul's, whoſe diſcourſe gave him the higheſt ſatisfaction. But his diſtemper encreaſed ſo violently, that all methods were taken in vain to procure him ſleep. He recommended to his wife the care and education of his children in the moſt pathetic manner, and waited calmly for his diſſolution. Dr. Nowel, who had been very intimate with him, and who attended him all his ſickneſs, declared, that he never ſaw or heard of any man, who had led a more exemplary life, or died with more Chriſtian fortitude and piety. Valde illud mihi laudabile videtur, quod de eo idem vir ſanctiſſimus Alexander Nowellus commemorat, ſe nunquam vidiſſe aut audiviſſe ullum hominem aut honeſtius vixiſſe aut exſpirâſſe Chriſtianius (48). ASCLEPIADES, a native of Phlia (a) in Peloponneſus, holds a conſiderable rank among the antient Philoſophers. He was a ſcholar of Stilpo (b), and he engaged Menedemus to frequent the ſame ſchool, and contracted ſo intimate a friendſhip with him (c), that it might be compared with that of Oreſtes and Pylades [A]. After they had ſtudied under Stilpo at Megara they went to Elis, and converſed with the diſciples of Phædo (d). They were both very poor, and obliged to ſupport themſelves by their labour [B]. However they applied themſelves to ſtudy, in order to become great Philoſophers. Menedemus was younger than his friend (e), but they did not regard the difference of their ages, when they were reſolved to marry. Their deſign was to live and keep houſe together, even after they were married. They thought it neceſſary therefore to chooſe their wives with ſo much care, that they might promiſe themſelves domeſtick concord, and they believed that they had found their wiſh in a family in which was a mother and daughter, both of whom were in a ſtate fit for marriage. Menedemus married the mother and Aſclepiades the daughter (f). The latter dying, Menedemus reſigned his wife to her friend, and married a rich young Lady, but he deſired that the whole management of the houſe ſhould continue in the hands of Aſclepiades's wife. It was not at all difficult for him to find a good match, for he had the chief authority in the city where he lived (g), which was Eretria, where he was born. Aſclepiades died there very old (h). He lived in an exceeding frugal manner amidſt the affluence of his friend's houſe (i), and he bore with great ſerenity the misfortune of loſing his ſight [C]. We are aſſured, that his death did not extinguiſh Menedemus's friendſhip for him [D]. As I have obſerved that

[A] It might be compared to that of Oreſtes and Pylades.] Diogenes Laertius's words are as follow: Φίλος τε ἦν μάλιστα (Μενέδημος) ὡς δῆλον ἐκ τῆς πρὸς Ἀσκληπιάδην συμπνοίας, ὑδέν τι διαφερούσης Πυλάδου φιλοσοφίας (1). i. e. "He maintained his friendſhips with the moſt "ſacred and inviolable fidelity, as is evident from "his intimacy with Aſclepiades, which was ſo remark-"able, that it was not inferior to the affection of Py-"lades." The Author tells us afterwards, that this Archepolis offering them a large ſum of money, his bounty was of no uſe to them, for there aroſe between them a laudable diſpute, who ſhould receive it laſt, and not being able to determine it, neither of them accepted of Archepolis's offer.

(1) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 137.

[B] They were obliged to ſupport themſelves by their labour.] They were employed in aſſiſting a maſon. Aſclepiades not having ſo ſtrong a ſenſe of ſhame as Menedemus, did not regard being ſeen naked (2), carrying the mortar to the top of the houſe. But Menedemus went and hid himſelf, whenever he ſaw any perſon coming (3). Athenæus, who does not mention this fact, relates another ſtory ſtill more remarkable. The Areopagites, ſays he (4), ſummoned before them Menedemus and Aſclepiades, two young men, who ſtudied Philoſophy, and were very poor, and aſked them theſe queſtions; "How came you to be ſo fat? You "have nothing to live upon; you ſpend all the day with- "out working, and you do nothing but hear the Philoſo-"phers." Send for ſuch a Miller, replied one of the two Students. Upon which the Miller being brought, he declared, that they both came every night to his mill, and worked in grinding wheat, by which they gained two drachmas. The Areopagus admiring this conduct of them, did them the honour to give them two hundred drachmas. They would certainly have been puniſhed, if they had not ſhewn how they maintained themſelves.

(2) I believe this is not to be underſtood of his being abſolutely naked, but only that he ſtripped himſelf, as labourers do in hot weather.

[C] He bore with great ſerenity the misfortune of loſing his ſight.] I do not doubt but that theſe words of Cicero relate to our Aſclepiades. Aſclepiadem ferunt non ignobilem, nec inexercitum Philoſophum, quum quidam quæreret quid ei cæcitas attuliſſet, reſpondiſſe ut puero uno eſſet comitatior (5). [D] Death did not extinguiſh Menedemus's friendſhip for him.] Being informed that his ſervants had ſhut the door againſt the favourite of Aſclepiades, he ordered that he ſhould be admitted: for know, ſays he, that Aſclepiades, tho' he is in his grave, opens my door to him. Ὅτι Ἀσκληπιάδης αὐτῷ ⊖ κατὰ γῆς ὢν τὰς θύρας ἀνοίγει (6). that he was a ſcholar of Stilpo, it is not neceſſary that I ſhould remark that he flouriſhed a little after the death of Alexander the Great. He had a ſon who behaved very ill, and whom Menedemus turned out of his houſe, without condeſcending to ſpeak a word to him. This affected the young Debauchee ſo much, that he reformed (k).

ASCLEPIADES, a native of Pruſa in Bithynia, was one of the moſt celebrated Phyſicians among the Antients. He was contemporary with Mithridates, as appears by his refuſing to go to his court, whither he was invited by magnificent promiſes (a). He only ſent his remedies in writing (b). He was the head of a new Sect (c), and he diſcovered a method of making uſe of wine in the cure of the ſick (d). The uſe of this and that of cold water, which he allowed them (e), procured him a great reputation (f). Having cured a perſon, whoſe funeral was juſt preparing [A], he gained a prodigious character; but the wager which he laid againſt Fortune, made him talked of with ſtill greater admiration [B]. He engaged that he would never be conſidered as a Phyſician, if he ſhould ever fall ſick; and he won the wager, for he died by a fall when he was very old. It was at Rome that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf. He came thither in order to teach Rhetoric (g), but not finding this employment to be gainful enough, he applied himſelf to Phyſick; and as he did not know the medicines which were then in uſe, he reſolved to condemn them, and invent new ones. He confined himſelf to thoſe inventions, which

[A] Having cured a perſon whoſe funeral was juſt preparing.] Here is what Pliny tells us: Summa autem (fama eſt) Aſclepiadi Pruſienſi . . . . relato e funere homine & ſervato (1). He obſerves in another place, that this kind of reſtoration from the dead was neceſſary in order to eſtabliſh the reformation, which was introduced into Phyſic, and that it is reaſonable to imagine that ſo great an innovation was not made without conſiderable motives. Magnâ auctoritate, nec minore famâ, cum occurriſſet ignoto funeri relato homine ab rogo atque ſervato, ne quis levibus momentis tantam converſionem factam exiſtimat (2). Celſus only mentions occaſionally this ſurpriſing cure of his. In vicino ſæpe quædam notæ poſitæ non bonos ſed imperitos Medicos decipiunt; quod Aſclepiades ſciens funeri obvius inclamavit eum vivere qui efferebatur (3). i. e. "Some "ſymptoms are frequently ſo alike, that they deceive "the unſkilful, tho' not the judicious Phyſician. This "being underſtood by Aſclepiades, when he met a "man carried out to his funeral, he cried out, that "he was alive." But Apuleius knew all the circumſtances of this ſtory, without forgetting, that the heirs were not well pleaſed, that Aſclepiades ſhould affirm, that the man was not dead. Aſclepiades ille, ſays he (4), inter præcipuos medicorum, ſi unum Hippocratem excipias, cæteris princeps, primus etiam vino opitulari ægris reperit; ſed danda ſcilicet in tempore; cujus rei obſervationem probè callebat; ut qui diligentiſſimè animadverteret venarum pulſus incognitos vel præclaros. Is igitur cum forte in civitatem ſeſe reciperet, & rure ſuo ſuburbano rediret, aſpexit in pomariis civitatis funus ingens locatum, plurimos homines ingenti multitudine, qui exequias venerant circumſtare, omnes triſtiſſimos & obſoletiſſimos veſtitu. Proprius acceſſit, ut etiam incognoſceret, more humano ingenii, quiſnam eſſet, quoniam percontanti nemo reſponderat. At vero ipſe aliquid in illo ex arte deprehenderat. Certè quidem jacenti homini ac prope depoſito fatum abſtulit. Jam miſeri illius membra omnia aromatis perſperſa, jam os ipſius unguine odoro delibutum, jam eum pollinctum, jam ſcenæ paratum, contemplatus eum diligentiſſimè quibuſdam ſignis animadvertit; etiam atque etiam pertractavit corpus hominis, & invenit in illo vitam latentem. Confeſtim exclamavit, vivere hominem; procul ergo faces abigerent, procul ignes amolirentur, rogum demolirenter, cænam feralem à tumulo ad menſam referrent. Murmur interea exortum, partim medico credendum dicere; partim etiam irridere medicinam. Poſtremi propinquis etiam hominibus invitis, quod ne jam ipſi hæreditatem habebant, an quod adhuc illi fidem non habebant, ægrè tamen ac difficulter Aſclepiades impetravit brevem mortuo dilationem. Atque ita veſpillonum manibus extortum, velut ab inferis, poſtliminio domum retulit, confeſtimque ſpiritum recreavit, confeſtimque animam in corporis latibulis delitescentem quibuſdam medicamentis provocavit. i. e. "Aſclepiades, "one of the chief of the Phyſicians, and the great"eſt man in that art except Hippocrates, firſt pre"ſcribed the uſe of wine to ſick perſons, by giving "it at the proper ſeaſons; for he made very accu"rate obſervations upon that ſubject, and carefully "remarked the good and bad pulſes of the veins. "This Phyſician happening to come into the city from "his country houſe, ſaw a great funeral in the or"chards of the city, and a great number of men, "who attended it, ſtanding round, all of them very "ſorrowful, and in a mourning dreſs. Aſclepiades "went near out of the curioſity common to mankind, "to ſee who the perſon was, whoſe funeral was pre"pared, becauſe nobody gave him any anſwer, when "he enquired. But he ſoon diſcovered ſomething re"markable in him by his art; and it is certain, "that he reſcued from death the man, who was go"ing to be interred. All the limbs of the unhappy "perſon were already covered with ſpices; his mouth "was already anointed with ſweet unguents; and "every thing was prepared for the funeral, when our "Phyſician upon a careful view and examination of "his body, found the remains of life in it. He im"mediately cried out, that the man was alive; that "they ſhould remove the fire, and the funeral pile, "and carry the ſupper from the tomb to the table. "In the mean while a murmur aroſe, part of the "company inſiſting that the Phyſician ought to be re"garded, others ridiculing the art of Phyſic. The "relations were likewiſe unwilling to hear Aſclepia"des, either becauſe they wanted the eſtate, or be"cauſe they did not credit him; but at laſt with great "difficulty he gained a ſhort reſpite for the dead "man. And thus he procured him to be con"veyed from the hands of the Undertaker's ſer"vants, and as it were from death itſelf, and imme"diately recovered his ſpirits, and by the application "of certain medicines reſtored life, which lay before "concealed in the ſecret receſſes of the body." The ſtory of the woman, who was twice buried, may be very pertinently introduced here. She was recovered without the uſe of Phyſic; but her husband was not very well pleaſed with it. The ſtory is as follows. "In a village in Poitou a woman was ſick of a very "dangerous diſtemper, and at laſt fell into a lethargy; "ſo that her husband, and thoſe who were about her, "thought her dead. They wrapped her up only with "a linnen-cloth, according to the cuſtom of the poor "people in that country, and carried her out to be "buried. As they were going to the church, the "man, who carried her, walked ſo near an hedge, "that the thorns pricked her, and ſhe was awakened "from her Lethargy. Fourteen years after ſhe died "again, or at leaſt was thought to do ſo. As ſhe "was carried out to be buried, and the bearers came "near the hedge, her husband cried out twice or "thrice, Don't go near the hedge (5).

However that be, I am perſuaded, that the reader will be pleaſed to ſee the following paſſage of Pliny: Summa autem Aſclepiadi Pruſienſi (fama eſt) . . . maximè ſponſione factâ cum fortunâ, ne medicus crederetur, ſi unquam invalidus ullo modo fuiſſet ipſe; & victor ſupremâ in ſenectâ lapſu ſcalarum exanimatus eſt (6). i. e. which were eaſy, and which every perſon might make uſe of without the aſſiſtance of a Phyſician. This made them received with pleaſure; every body had recourſe to him, and conſidered him as a perſon ſent from heaven [C]. Among the circumſtances which were favourable to him in raiſing him a reputation, we muſt not omit the abſurd credulity which prevailed at that time with regard to the magical virtues of certain herbs; for it being eaſy to ſhew that the greateſt part of theſe virtues were chimerical, it was no difficult matter for Aſclepiades to deſtroy all the credit of the antient medicines [D]. He did not think that the ſoul was diſtinct from matter (h). He wrote ſeveral books, which are all loſt. Pliny, Celſus, and Galen quote ſome of them. He had divers ſcholars, who became very famous (i). Pliny's delicacy ſeems to me carried too far, when he could not bear that ſuch a man who had ſtudied Phyſick only with a view to get money, ſhould preſcribe

This raſhneſs of our Phyſcian was extremely ſurprizing; but his good fortune in not being contradicted by the event appears to me ſtill more remarkable. I obſerve that in ſome things he had much of the Quack. He allowed the uſe of wine in ſome diſtempers, and he boaſted ſo highly of his medicine, that he affirmed the power of the Gods themſelves was ſcarce equal to that of wine. Aſclepiades utilitatem vini æquari vix Deorum potentia pronunciavit (7).

(7) Idem, lib. 23. cap. 1. pag. 251.

[C] Every body had recourſe to him, and conſidered him as a perſon ſent from heaven.] We ſhall ſee in the following paſſage of Pliny a repreſentation of the aſcendant, which ſome Phyſicians ſtill aſſume. Torrenti ac meditata quotidie oratione blandiens omnia (remedia) abdicavit; totamque medicinam ad cauſam revocando conjecturæ fecit, quinque res maxime communium auxiliorum profeſſus abſtinentiam cibi, alias vini, fricationem corporis, ambulationem, geſtationes; quæ cum unuſquiſque ſemetipſum ſibi præſtare poſſe intelligeret, faventibus cunctis ut eſſent vera quæ facillima erunt, univerſum propè humanum genus circumagit in ſe non alio modo, quam ſi cælo emiſſus adveniſſet (8). i. e. " He amuſed the people with his copious and pre- " pared diſcourſes, and rejected all medicines; and " reducing the whole art of Phyſick to the teſt of " reaſon, he proved it to be founded upon conjecture. " He declared that there were five methods of reliev- " ing the human body, abſtinence from meat, and " at other times from wine, friction of the body, " walking, and exerciſes of it by geſtation. Eve- " ry perſon finding that theſe methods could be rea- " dily practiſed by themſelves, and inclining to be- " lieve thoſe things true, which were moſt eaſy, he " drew upon him the regard of almoſt all mankind, " as if he had been ſent from heaven."

(8) Idem, lib. 26. cap. 3. pag. 444.

[D] The greateſt part of theſe virtues being chimerical, it was eaſy for Aſclepiades to deſtroy all the credit of the ancient medicines.] It is the general property of mankind never to keep the medium. If you do not tell them that there is an infinite number of falſhoods mixed with real facts, they will believe every thing. If you undeceive them by ſhewing them evidently how they have been impoſed upon in ſome caſes, they will doubt of every thing. By this means the impertinence of theſe medicines, which were called magical, aſſiſted Aſclepiades in deſtroying the credit even of thoſe things, which were well grounded. Pliny in the following paſſage will repreſent to us in an admirable manner this inclination to extremes, which is obſervable in the human mind. Super omnia, ſays he (9), adjuvere eum (Aſclepiadem) magicæ vanitates in tantum evectæ, ut abrogare herbis fidem cunctis poſſent. Æthiopide herbâ amnes ac ſtagna ficcari conjectu, tactu clauſa omnia aperiri Achæmenide conjecta in aciem hoſtium, trepidare agmina, ac terga vertere. Latacen dari ſolitam à Perſarum rege legatis, ut quocunque veniſſent omnium rerum copia abundarent, ac multa ſimilia. Ubinam iſtæ fuere, cum Cimbri Teutoneſque terribili Marte ululârent, aut cum Lucullus tot reges Magorum paucis legionibus ſterneret? Curve Romani duces primam ſemper in bellis commerciorum habuere curam? Cur hercle Cæſaris miles ad Pharſaliam famem ſenſit, ſi abundantia omnis contingere unius herbæ felicitate poterat? Non ſatius fuit Æmilianum Scipionem Carthaginis portas herba patefacere, quam machinis clauſtra per tot annos quatere? Siccentur hodie Æthiopide Pontinæ paludes, tantumque agri ſuburbanæ reddatur Italiæ. Nam quæ apud eundem Democritum invenitur compoſitio medicamenti, quo pulchri bonique & fortunati gignantur liberi, cui unquam Perſarum regi tales dedit? Mirum eſſet profecto, hucuſque provectam credalitatem antiquorum, ſalubertimis ortam initiis, ſi in ullâ re modum humana ingenia noviſſent, atque non hanc ipſam medicinam ab Aſclepiade repertam, ſuo loco probaturi eſſemus evectam ultra Magos etiam. Sed hæc eſt omni in re animarum conditio, ut à neceſſariis orſu primo cuncta pervenerint ad nimium. i. e. " Beſides all theſe things he was aſſiſted by the pre- " tended magical virtues of herbs, which were car- " ried to ſo great an exceſs, that they gave him ſuf- " ficient grounds to deſtroy all regard to plants. It " had been aſſerted that the plant Æthiops being " thrown into rivers and lakes would dry them up, and " that the touch of it would open every thing that was " ſhut. That the Achæmenis being thrown into " the enemy's army, would ſtrike ſuch a terror upon " them as would oblige them to fly. That the La- " tace uſed to be given by the King of Perſia to his " Embaſſadors, that wherever they came, they might " have a plenty of all things; with many other ſto- " ries of that kind. Where were theſe plants, when " the Cimbrians and Teutones raiſed the dreadful din " of war; or when Lucullus deſtroyed ſo many " Kings of the Magi with a few legions? Or why " have the Roman Generals in their wars taken care " at firſt of procuring ſupplies from the people about " them? Why did Cæſar's ſoldiers ſuffer hunger in " Pharſalia, if a plenty of all things could have been " procured by means of a ſingle herb? Would it not " have been more proper for Æmilianus Scipio to " have opened the gates of Carthage with a plant, " than to have taken the pains of employing his " engines againſt it for ſo many years? Let the " Pontine Marſhes be now dried up by the Æthi- " ops, and ſo great a portion of land be reſtored to " Italy? And with regard to the compoſition of the " medicine mentioned by the ſame Democritus, in " order to get beautiful, and good, and fortunate " children, did it ever procure this advantage to any " one of the Kings of Perſia? It would really appear " ſurprizing, that the credulity of the ancients, which " aroſe from a reaſonable foundation at firſt, ſhould " be carried ſo far, if the mind of man knew " how to obſerve a proper medium in any thing, " and if we could not ſhew, as we ſhall do in its pro- " per place, that even this ſcheme of Phyſic found " out by Aſclepiades, was carried to an extravagance " greater than that of the Magi. But ſuch is the " turn of the human mind in all points, that every " thing, tho' at firſt founded only upon what was ne- " ceſſary and reaſonable, afterwards degenerates into " exceſs." Father Hardouin refers this to that paſſage, wherein Pliny ſhews the authority, which ſome Phyſicians had gained, tho' they rejected each other's medicines. Hinc illæ, ſays he (10), *circa ægros miſeræ ſententiarum concertationes, nullo idem cenſente, ne videatur acceſſio alterius. preſcribe laws of ſuch importance to mankind [E]. Suidas, who has confounded our Phyſician with one Aſclepiades of Myrlea a Grammarian, has been cenſured by Moreri, agreeably to the obſervations of Voſſius. This is the reaſon why I do not ſpeak of him, and only direct my reader to the proper Authors for his ſatisfaction. I ſhall only remark the errors of ſome other Authors [F]. Thoſe of Moreri are not conſiderable [G].

And it is very evident, that in proportion " as any man among them has the faculty of ſpeak- " ing fluently, he immediately becomes the arbiter " of our life and death."

[E] Pliny . . . . could not bear, that a man, who had ſtudied Phyſick only with a view to get money, ſhould preſcribe laws of ſuch importance to mankind.] His words are very remarkable: Id ſolum poſſumus indignari, unum hominem è leviſſima gente, ſine opibus ullis orſum, vectigalis ſui causâ, repente leges ſalutis humano generi dediſſe, quas tamen poſtea abrogavere multi (11). i. e. " We can only expreſs an indigna- " tion at this, that a ſingle man, of a nation noto- " rious for its great levity, who began without any " fortune, merely for the ſake of his profit, ſhould " give laws to mankind for their health, which " were afterwards rejected by many perſons."

(11) Idem, lib. 26. cap. 3. pag. 445.

[F] I ſhall remark the errors of ſome . . Authors.] Meurſius has been cenſured for imagining, that Aſclepiades of Myrlea, and Aſclepiades of Nice, were two perſons. Malè Meurſius hunc Myrleanum & Nicenum tanquam duos diſtinctos recenſet (12). Jonſius aſſerts, that this is an error, and that it was the ſame Aſclepiades, who was born at Myrlea, and was originally from Nice, and was ſurnamed Myrleanus and Nicenus indifferently. Pinedo laboured under the ſame miſtake as Meurſius (13). In the Index of the Authors quoted by Athenæus, the following words in the 10th Book are underſtood of Aſclepiades of Myrlea, Ἀσκληπιάδης ἐν τοῖς τραγῳδουμένοις (14). Dalechamp has tranſlated them thus: Aſclepiades libro de iis, quorum nomine editæ ſunt tragœdiæ: i. e. " Aſclepiades " in his Treatiſe concerning thoſe, under whoſe name " Tragedies have been publiſhed." Caſaubon criticizes upon this, and ſhews that the title of this work was not of the maſculine gender τραγῳδούμενοι, but of the neuter τραγῳδούμενα; and that Plutarch has quoted it in that manner (15). He does not tell us where this quotation is to be found. I ſhall therefore in order to ſupply that defect obſerve, that it is in the Life of Iſocrates, as will be ſhewn immediately. Caſaubon might have added, that the ſame Treatiſe of Aſclepiades is quoted in the neuter gender by Stephanus Byzantinus and Photius. The reader will ſee this immediately. That Critick thought, that Aſclepiades explained in that work the actions, which ſerved for ſubjects to the tragic Poets. I am not in the leaſt doubt concerning this, or Dalechamp's error. The Latin Tranſlator of Plutarch has blundered in the ſame title; for he has rendered theſe words of Plutarch, Ἀσκληπιάδης ὁ τὰ τραγῳδούμενα συγγράψας, by Aſclepiades tragœdiæ ſcriptor (16). i. e. " Aſclepiades " the Writer of Tragedy." This ſhews evidently without copying the reſt of this verſion (17), that he took Aſclepiades for a tragic Writer. Andrew Schottus has done the ſame thing in his tranſlation of Photius. Photius, num. CCLX. p. 1456, ſays this; Ἀσκληπιάδης, ὃς τὰ τραγῳδούμενα συνεγράψατο (18), that is, according to Andrew Schottus, Aſclepiades, qui tragœdias ſcripſit; i. e. " Aſclepiades, who wrote " Tragedies." This is a miſtake; for Aſclepiades, who is mentioned here, is not repreſented as an Author in that kind of writing. We may obſerve by the by, that he was a ſcholar of Iſocrates; as we may conclude from the time when he lived. Pinedo underſtood much better than the Tranſlator of Plutarch the ſenſe of the word τραγῳδούμενα; for in tranſlating this paſſage in Greek, Ἀσκληπιάδης ὁ τὰ τραγῳδούμενα γράψας ἐν ἓξ βιβλίοις (19), has rendered it thus: Aſclepiades, qui de rebus in Tragœdiâ decantatis ſex libros ſcripſit. i. e. " Aſclepiades, who wrote ſix " Books concerning the ſubjects celebrated in Trage- " dy." Theſe Greek words are extracted from a paſſage in which Stephanus Byzantinus tells us, that Aſclepiades, who wrote theſe ſix Books, was of Tragilus a town in Thrace. I wiſh that Caſaubon had cenſured Dalechamp, who imagined that Athenæus quotes Aſclepiades of Myrlea in the paſſage, which we have given above. Geſner has committed the ſame error (20). Stephanus Byzantinus would have furniſhed him with a juſtification of that cenſure. The reader will find two groſs miſtakes in Pinedo. He ſays, I: that Aſclepiades of Myrlea, the ſcholar of Apollonius, was a Grammarian, who taught at Rome under Pompey the Great, and lived at Alexandria while he was young, under Ptolemy IV: II. he leaves us to gueſs whether it was the ſame Aſclepiades, who taught Grammar in Turditania, a Province of Spain (21). I obſerve upon the firſt article, that a man, who ſhould have lived under Ptolemy IV, and taught at Rome in the time of Pompey the Great, would have been a prodigy; ſince between the laſt year of this Ptolemy, and the death of Mithridates, who was defeated by Pompey, there was no leſs than 140 years. With regard to the ſecond article I ſhall only ſay, that Strabo aſſerts expreſly, that Aſclepiades of Myrlea taught Grammar in Turditania (22). Pinedo had remark'd this in another place (23). How comes it then, that he has made a Problem of it?

Let us briefly examine a remark of Father Hardouin. He tells us, that Aſclepiades of Pruſa was a friend of Cicero, and he proves it by a paſſage from the firſt Book de Oratore. He quotes but a little part of it (24); but the whole paſſage is as follows: Neque verò Aſclepiades is, quo nos medico amicoque uſi ſumus, tum quum eloquentiâ vincebat cæteros medicos, in eo ipſo quod ornatè dicebat, medicinæ facultate utebatur, non eloquentiæ (25). i. e. " And neither did Aſcle- " piades, who was my friend and Phyſician, when " he ſhewed himſelf ſuperior to the reſt of the Phy- " ſicians in eloquence, by the elegance of his diſ- " courſe make uſe of the faculty of Phyſic, and not " of Eloquence." We muſt obſerve, that it is not Cicero, who ſays this, but the Orator Craſſus; ſo that Aſclepiades was the friend and Phyſician of Craſſus, and not of Cicero. It is proper likewiſe to remark, that Cicero ſuppoſes, that Craſſus ſpoke thus in the year 662 of Rome (26); and that he ſpeaks of Aſclepiades as a perſon, who was not then living. This furniſhes us with an objection againſt Pliny, who tells us, that Aſclepiades not making any advantage by the profeſſion of Eloquence, turned his thoughts towards Phyſic in the time of Pompey (27). It is certain, that in the year 662 Pompey was but very young. See the following note, num. IV.

Jonſius ſuppoſes, that there were two Aſclepiades's of Myrlea; that the former was the Scholar of Apollonius the Grammarian, and Author of a Book intitled Φιλοσόφων βιβλίων διορθωτικὰ, Philoſophorum Librorum Emendationes (28); i. e. " Corrections of the " Books of the Philoſophers;" and that the ſecond wrote ſeveral Books concerning Grammar and the Grammarians (29). I do not ſee upon what grounds he makes this diſtinction. His beſt proof would be to ſay, that Aſclepiades of Myrlea confuted in his Grammar an opinion of Dionyſius of Thrace. In iſto opere Dionyſii Thracis de Partibus Grammaticæ ſententiam refellit, teſte Sexto Empirico (30). This Dionyſius, according to Suidas, taught at Rome in the time of Pompey, and had been one of the Scholars of Ariſtarchus. It will be urged therefore, that the Aſclepiades, who confuted him, was a different perſon from the Scholar of Apollonius. I admit this conſequence; but I ſuſpect that there is ſome error in Suidas. It ſeems to me, that a Scholar of Ariſtarchus (31) would have been too old in the time of Pompey (32) to be capable of teaching. I conclude therefore, that Dionyſius of Thrace, the Scholar of Ariſtarchus, was not living till the time of Pompey. It is poſſible that Aſclepiades the Scholar of Apollonius might confute him; for this Apollonius having been Keeper of the Library at Alexandria after Eratoſthenes (33), who died in the beginning of the 146th Olympiad, Olympiad (34), might very well be contemporary with Ariſtarchus; and conſequently he might have Scholars contemporary with thoſe of Ariſtarchus. It is not neceſſary therefore, that the Aſclepiades, who confuted Dionyſius of Thrace, ſhould live later than Aſclepiades the Scholar of Apollonius. I cannot imagine why Voſſius ſhould ſo readily acquieſce in what Suidas tells us, that Dionyſius had been a Scholar of Ariſtarchus, and Profeſſor at Rome in the time of Pompey (35). He has been juſtly cenſured for aſſerting, that Aſclepiades of Alexandria wrote a Book concerning the People of Attica, and quoting the Scholiaſt of Ariſtophanes for his aſſertion. Aſclepiades Alexandrinus * τους κατα δημους ἀρχοντας conſignavit, ut Autor eſt Scholiaſtes Ariſtophanis in nubibus (36). Jonſius ſhews, that the Scholiaſt only ſays, that this Aſclepiades called the Demarchs τους κατα τους δημους ἀρχοντας (37).

[G] Thoſe of Moreri are not very conſiderable.] I. The ancient Authors do not aſcribe to Aſclepiades of Myrlea the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great quoted by Arrian, as he aſſures us. II. To ſay, that Strabo adds, that Aſclepiades of Myrlea had taught Grammar in Spain, intimates, that he has mentioned ſeveral other facts beſides thoſe before related by Moreri, which is falſe. III. It is an error in him to repreſent it as doubtful, whether the relation to Spain does not belong to another Aſclepiades; ſince he expreſly aſcribes it to this. IV. It was wrong to affirm ſo confidently, that Mithridates was at war with the Romans, when he endeavoured to engage Aſclepiades the Phyſician to come to his court; for we have ſeen above (38), that Cicero ſpeaks of this Phyſician as of a perſon who was not living in the year 662 of Rome, at a time, when Mithridates had not yet made war againſt the Romans, if we would expreſs ourſelves with exactneſs. This ſhews, that Moreri muſt have been miſtaken in aſſerting, that Aſclepiades was in great eſteem at Rome in the time of Pompey the Great..... that is, when that great man was the firſt perſon in the Commonwealth. Does not he place the Birth of this Pompey upon the laſt day of September, in the year 648 of Rome? How can he reconcile this paſſage of Cicero, in which he ſpeaks of Aſclepiades? I know indeed, that he may defend himſelf by the authority of Pliny, and that Jonſius will furniſh him with another authority; but who told him that Pliny's credit is ſuperior to that of Cicero; or that Jonſius is not miſtaken? Aſclepiades Medicus quidam (here is quidam very improperly made uſe of; ſince Aſclepiades was too famous to deſerve ſo contemptuous an Epithet (39),) Pruſiacus in Bithynia Philophyſicus cognomine ſub Pompeio M. vixit, teſte Strabone lib. xii (40). i. e. "Aſclepiades, a certain "Phyſician of Pruſa in Bithynia ſurnamed Philophyſicus, lived in the time of Pompey the Great, as "Strabo tells us B. xii." I can only find in the xiith Book of Strabo, that Aſclepiades of Pruſa was a Phyſician (41). Father Hardouin (42) aſcribes to Strabo, whom he quotes L. 12. p. 566, the ſame thing as Jonſius has done. V. The Aſclepiades, whom Plutarch mentions in the Life of Iſocrates, was not a Tragic Poet (33), as Moreri aſſures us.

☞ ASHMOLE (ELIAS), Founder of the Aſhmolean Muſæum at Oxford, was the only ſon of Simon Aſhmole of the city of Lichfield in Staffordſhire, Sadler, and Anne, the daughter of Mr. Anthony Bowyer of Coventry in Warwickſhire, Draper (a). He was born in St. Michael's pariſh in Lichfield the 23d of May 1617 (b). He was educated at the Grammar ſchool in that city, and having ſome inclination to Muſic, he was inſtructed in it, and admitted as a Choriſter in that Cathedral. He received his firſt encouragement from Mr. Thomas Pagit, ſecond ſon of James Pagit Eſq; formerly Puiſne Baron of the Exchequer, who married his mother's ſiſter, and who was, ſays Mr. Aſhmole in his Diary (c), the chief inſtrument of my future preferments, which I acknowledge with all gratitude to his memory. In June 1634 he loſt his father, whoſe extravagance and ill œconomy proved very injurious to himſelf and his family (d). At twenty years of age he married his firſt wife Eleanor, daughter of Mr. Peter Mainwaring of Smalwood in Cheſhire, who, as he informs us (e), proved a virtuous good wife, but left him a widower on the 5th of December 1641, to his own grief, and the grief of all her friends (f). He had one female child by her, who was ſtill-born the 19th of May 1640. In Michaelmas term 1638, he became a Solicitor in the High-Court of Chancery, and had good practice (g); and being admitted of Clement's-Inn, was ſworn an Attorney in the Court of Common-Pleas the 11th of February 1641 (h). In the latter end of Auguſt 1642, the City of London being involved in great conteſts and confuſion, he retired to Smalwood in Cheſhire, where he proſecuted his ſtudies; and in the latter end of 1644 he went to Oxford, the chief reſidence of the King at that time, and entered himſelf in Brazen-Noſe College, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy, Mathematicks, Aſtronomy, and Aſtrology (i). The ſame year he was made a Commiſſioner of the Exciſe; but was oppoſed in the execution of his office by Colonel Bagott, Governor of Lichfield, and was afterwards put into another Commiſſion of the Exciſe at Worceſter, the 16th of December 1645 (k); which Commiſſion was again renewed, and Mr. Aſhmole continued in it, and elected Regiſter to that Commiſſion the 27th of April 1646 (l). On the 9th of May the year before, by the intereſt of Sir George Wharton the Aſtrologer, with whom he had lately contracted an intimacy, he was appointed one of the five Gentlemen, as Mr. Wood tells us, or of the four Gentlemen, according to his own Diary (m), of the Ordinance in the garriſon at Oxford, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his attachment to the Royal Cauſe [A]. the plague at Lichfield; and he has given the following character of her in his Diary (2). She was a diſcreet, ſober, provident woman, and with great patience endured many afflictions. Her parents had given her exceeding good breeding, and ſhe was excellent at her needle, which (my father being improvident) ſtood her in great ſtead. She was competently read in Divinity, Hiſtory, and Poetry, and was continually inſtilling into my ears ſuch religious and moral precepts as my younger years were capable of. Nor did ſhe ever fail to correct my faults; always adding ſharp reproofs and good lectures to boot. She was much eſteemed of by perſons of note, with whom ſhe was acquainted. She lived in much friendſhip among her neighbours, and left a good name behind her. In fine, ſhe was truly religious and virtuous.

[C] He was elected a Free-Maſon.] He was choſen in company with Colonel Henry Manwaring of Kerthingham in Cheſhire, at Warrington in Lancaſhire. This, ſays the Author of the Memoirs of his Life (3), prefixed to his Antiquities of Berkſhire, was a favour eſteemed ſo ſingular, that Kings themſelves have not diſdained to enter themſelves into this ſociety; the original foundation of which is ſaid to be as high as the reign of King Henry III, when the Pope granted a Bull, Patent, or Diploma, to a particular company of Italian Maſons and Architects to travel over all Europe to build Churches. From theſe is derived the fraternity of Adopted Maſons, Accepted Maſons or Free Maſons, who were known to one another all over the world by certain ſignals and watch-words known to them alone. They have ſeveral lodges in different countries for their reception; and when any of the ſociety falls into decay, the brotherhood is to relieve him. The manner of their adoption or admiſſion is very formal and ſolemn, and with the adminiſtration of an oath of ſecrecy, which has had better fate than all other oaths, and has been ever moſt religiouſly obſerved; nor has the world been yet able by the inadvertency, ſurprize, or folly of any of its members to penetrate into this myſtery, or make the leaſt diſcovery.

[D] The King's affairs being now entirely ruined, he retired in order to purſue his ſtudies.] After the ſurrender of Worceſter, he went to Cheſhire, where he lay concealed till October following, and then removed privately to London, and by means of Mr. Jonas Moore, became acquainted with Mr. William Lilly, and Mr. J. Booker, both noted Aſtrologers, by whoſe converſation he made a great progreſs in Aſtronomy and Aſtrology, and was introduced by them to the Aſtrologers annual feaſt, and eſteemed among them as one of the fraternity. In 1647 he retired to Englefield in Berkſhire, where he lived in a very ſtudious manner, and in 1648 he entered upon the ſtudy of plants, and in a few months became an eminent Botaniſt (4). Here amidſt the pleaſures of a rural ſolitude, he prepared ſome pieces, which were afterwards publiſhed (5). He was extremely charmed with this obſcure retirement, for in his Diary (6), he writes as follows: It pleaſed God to put me in mind, that I was now (June 1647) placed in the condition I always deſired, which was, that I might be enabled to live to myſelf and ſtudies, without being forced to take pains for a livelihood in the world. And ſeeing I am thus retired, according to my heart's deſire, I beſeech God to bleſs me in my retirement, and to proſper my ſtudies, that I may faithfully and diligently ſerve him, and in all things ſubmit to his will; and for the peace and happineſs I enjoy (in the midſt of bad times) to render him all humble thanks, and for what I attain to in the courſe of my ſtudies, to give him the Glory.

[E] An account of the variety of fortune, which he paſſed thro' till the Reſtoration.] In the year 1648 an eſtate at Bradfield in Berkſhire, which had been ſettled upon him by a Lady of that County, whom he afterwards married, was ſequeſter'd on account of his loyalty; but this ſequeſtration was taken off at Reading the 21ſt of November following, by the intereſt which he had amongſt thoſe of the contrary party (7). November the 16th 1649 he married Mary, the only daughter of Sir William Foſter of Aldermarſton in Berkſhire, Baronet, the widow of Sir Thomas Mainwaring, Knight, late Recorder of the Corporation of Reading, and one of the Maſters in the High Court of Chancery (8). Mr. Aſhmole lived afterwards in Black Fryars at London; and in January 1651 he began to learn the method of engraving ſeals, and caſting in ſand, and Goldſmith's work (9). About this time he became very famous for his knowledge in Cheminſtry; which induced William Backhouſe of Swallowfield in Berks, Eſq; to communicate ſeveral ſecrets to him in that art. In February the ſame year he learned the Hebrew language of Rabbi Solomon Frank (10). That year his Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum was publiſhed, the cuts of which were engraved at Mr. Aſhmole's own houſe, by that eminent artiſt Mr. Vaughan (11). July the 25th 1653 he became acquainted with the great Mr. Selden, who finding him a man of a good genius, encouraged him in his ſtudies, and was extremely civil to him as long as he lived (12). In 1655 he entered upon the ſtudy of Engliſh Antiquities, and on the 11th of November 1657, he was admitted a member of the Middle-Temple (13). By the means of Sir William Foſter, who claimed a right of preſentation to the Benefice of Bradfield, our Author met with many difficulties from the Tryers, to whom he preſented three different perſons to be admitted to that living, the laſt of whom, after ſome conteſt, was connived at by the committee. His ſecond marriage proved a little unfortunate, for ſome diſputes aroſe between his Lady and himſelf, and ſhe ſued for ſeparate alimony. He writes as follows, in his Diary (14). In 1657 October the 8th the cauſe between me and my wife was heard, when Mr. Serjeant Maynard obſerved to the Court, that there were eight hundred ſheets of Depoſitions of my wife's part, and not one word proved againſt me of uſing her ill, nor ever giving her a bad or provoking word. The iſſue of this was, that the Lady was delivered to her husband, and the cauſe adjudged to be frivolous and without grounds (15). The ſame year he attended Mr. Dugdale, afterwards Sir William Dugdale, in his Survey of the Fen-Country, and was very aſſiſtant to him in that excellent undertaking, ſo much for the honour and advantage of the nation; and the effects of this journey were viſible ſometime after in a large and judicious account of thoſe marſhy countries. He likewiſe trac'd the Roman road from Weeden, called in Antoninus's Itinerarium Bennevenna, on Watling-ſtreet to Lichfield, of which he ſent ſome account to his inſeparable friend Mr. Dugdale, in a letter dated April 20 (16). In May 1658 he began his firſt collection of materials for his Hiſtory of the Order of the Garter (17); which, as Mr. Wood tells us (18), he ſearched for among the Records of the Tower of London. In September following he took a journey to Oxford, and on the 10th of that month he began to make a deſcription of the coins given to the public library by Dr. Laud Archbiſhop of Canterbury and others; which deſcription was of great uſe to him in ſeveral of his works (19). Upon Auguſt the 21ſt 1659, his ſtudy was broke open by the ſoldiers on pretence of ſearching for King Charles II (20). And on the 16th of December following, Mr. John Tredeſcant and his wife ſealed and deliver'd a deed of gift of all their various collections, which were then preſerved at South Lambeth in Surrey (21).

pose (n). At the same time a commission was issued out for the examination of Hugh Peters, concerning the disposal of the pictures, jewels, &c. belonging to the Royal Family [F]. August the 26th 1660, he presented to the King the three books which he had published during the usurpation, viz. Fasciculus Chemicus, Theatrum Chemicum, and The Way to Bliss, which the King received very graciously, and on the third of September following appointed him Comptroller of the Excise (o). November the 2d 1660, he was called to the bar in the Middle Temple, and admitted the 7th following (p), but he never pleaded or practised his profession. January the 15th 1661 he was admitted one of the Fellows of the Royal Society, and in February he was appointed Secretary of Surinam in the West-Indies (q). April the 13th the same year the King gave orders to the Lord Chamberlain to settle him as the first Herald, in case any dispute should happen (r). In June 1664, the White Office being opened, he was made Comptroller thereof (s); and on the 9th of June 1668 he was appointed by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to execute the office of Accomptant General in the Excise, and Country Accomptant (t). Upon the decease of his second wife, the Lady Mainwaring, who died April the first 1668, he married Elizabeth, daughter to Sir William Dugdale, Garter King at Arms, the third of November following (u). July the 9th 1669 he was created Doctor of Physick by the University of Oxford, and his Diploma was presented to him the 3d of November following (x). In 1672 May the 8th, he presented his Institution, Laws, and Ceremonies of the most noble Order of the Garter [G] to the King, who gave him as a reward for his labours four hundred pounds out of the custom of paper. January the 29th 1675 (y) he surrendered his place of Windsor-Herald, and afterwards might have been preferred to that of Garter Principal King at Arms upon the decease of Sir Edward Walker, if he would have sollicited for it [H]. January the 26th 1679 (z) his lodgings in the Middle-Temple were destroyed by fire, by which accident he sustained a prodigious loss [I]. In 1683 he bestowed on the University of Oxford, (who had erected a beautiful Repository near the Theatre,) a noble collection

[F] A commission was issued out for the examination of Hugh Peters, concerning the disposal of the pictures, jewels, &c. belonging to the Royal Family.] These, as we are informed by the Author of the Memoirs (22) abovementioned, had been committed chiefly to his care, but were sold and dispersed over Europe; and are still in the closets of several Princes, who, continues that Author, then connived at, nay, encouraged the depredations made on the Royal Exile, and enriched their own cabinets with the invaluable curiosities of England at a very cheap rate, which neither generosity, honour, nor justice has ever induced them to restore, though they well knew the invalidity of the title upon which they purchased. But crowned heads have as little regard to honour or justice, when they interfere with their interest, as the vulgar; else how shall we account for their courting the Usurper, conceding to the most unreasonable demands, and sacrificing all, even to the most sanguine expectations he could entertain? This Commission was soon brought to a conclusion by the obstinacy or ignorance of their criminal, who either would not or was not able to give the desired satisfaction. Thus was this matter dropt, and every one left, if their own consciences permitted, to enjoy without any molestation the plunder they had collected.

[G] He presented his Institution, Laws, and Ceremonies of the most noble Order of the Garter.] It was printed at London in 1672 in fol. adorn'd and illustrated with beautiful Cuts at the charge of the Author; who was soon after informed that a copy of it was reposited in the Vatican Library at Rome. He presented it likewise to the several companions of that noble Order, and particularly to Christiern King of Denmark, who returned him in 1674 by the hands of Thomas Henshaw Esq; Agent from King Charles II at that Court, a gold chain and medal, which he wore upon some public solemnities by the King's command. Frederic William Elector of Brandenburg likewise sent him a present of the same kind, and ordered his Book to be translated into High Dutch (23). This performance of his raised his character prodigiously, and he was afterwards visited and complimented at his lodgings in the Middle Temple, and at his house at South Lambeth by the Embassadors and Envoys of those Kings and Princes, to whom he had sent his Book (24).

[H] He might have been preferred to that of Garter principal King at Arms . . . . if he would have sollicited for it.] Upon the death of Sir Edward Walker, Garter, on Feb. the 20th 1677, a controversy arising between the King and the Earl-Marshal, concerning the right of the disposal of this office, Mr. Ashmole was of opinion that the right was vested in the King, which was confirmed March 30th following, at an hearing before some Lords of the Council and several Knights of the Garter. Upon the determination of this affair, Mr. Ashmole was very much importuned to accept of this high office, which he declined in order to prevent the suspicion of partiality in giving his opinion at first for the King, and to gratify his father-in-law, Sir William Dugdale, who was created Garter Principal King at Arms, May the 24th following. In the management of this affair, tho' he asserted the King's right, yet he behaved himself with so much circumspection and prudence, that he gave no umbrage to the Earl Marshal, who himself publickly applauded his behaviour (25). The Author of the Memoirs of his Life (26) has given us in his own words the reasons, which he alledged, why he was unwilling to sue for the Garter's place; which he concludes in this manner: God having taken from me both ambition and covetousness, I set more value upon the retired life I was entered into, than all the advantage and honour I should reap by that office (27).

[I] By which accident he sustained a prodigious loss.] Mr. Wood tells us (28), that he was informed by Sir William Dugdale in a Letter dated the 13th of May 1679, that Mr. Ashmole's losses were exceeding great, all his Library of printed Books, which was very large, was consumed, and many other things of value. But all his chief manuscripts escaped, he having them at South-Lambeth. So likewise his gold coins and gold medals; but those of silver were all melted, and have cost him as much as the worth of them in weight in digging among the ruins, sifting the rubbish, and hiring the Silver-Smiths to wash the dust. The copper coins are found, but miserably defaced &c. The same Historian likewise acquaints us, that he was informed by Mr. Ashmole's Letter, which he received by the hands of Dr. Plot the latter end of December 1683, that his chambers in the Middle-Temple were burnt in the great fire there in Jan. 1678, *wherein was a Library of Books; the collection of thirty three years, mostly from abroad; a collection of near nine thousand coins ancient and modern, being the gathering of thirty two years. Also a large collection of ancient evidences and seals of the English Nobility and Gentry. All the great seals of England from the Conquest hitherto, with many of the Religious Houses both in England Scotland; those of England hanging at their several instruments. leiſure. And alſo divers valuable pieces of antiquity, and ſundry curioſities both of art and nature, &c. Mr. Wood likewiſe informs us, that he had ſeen a large paper book near a yard long, containing on each ſide of the leaves two, three or more cuts of eminent perſons in England and other countries, which were collected with great pains, but deſtroyed by this fire; with another large Folio, containing the cuts of proceſſions at coronations, marriages, interviews, funerals, &c; and a third containing proſpects of cities, towns, houſes, &c. He loſt alſo a great number of natural curioſities, foſſils, and Britiſh antiquities, &c.

[K] In 1683 he beſtowed on the Univerſity of Oxford, who had erected a beautiful repoſitory near the Theatre, a noble collection of natural and artificial curioſities, which was conſiderably augmented at his death.] About the latter end of October 1677 he made a motion to ſeveral Heads of that Univerſity, that he would beſtow on it all his curioſities, which he had obtained of a famous Gardiner, whoſe name was John Tredeſcant (29) a Dutchman, and his wife, with all his coins, medals, and manuſcripts, on condition that they would build a Theatre to receive them; which offer they readily agreed to. May 15th 1679 the firſt ſtone of that noble ſtructure, now called Aſhmole's Muſæum, was laid; and the whole building finiſhed in the beginning of March 1682 (30); upon which the 20th of the ſame month he ſent about twelve cart-loads of curioſities thither, which were fixed in their proper places by Dr. Robert Plot, who was intruſted with the care of that Muſæum. The Univerſity returned him thanks for this valuable preſent in a Latin Letter. December 10th 1677 Dr. Robert Plot abovementioned came with recommendations by Mr. John Evelyn dated from Whitehall Decemb. 7th 1677 to Mr. Aſhmole, who promiſed him his intereſt to be choſen Reader of Natural Philoſophy. This Lecture, ſays that Author of the Memoirs of Mr. Aſhmole's Life, has been by many ſaid to have been founded and endowed by our Author, Mr. Aſhmole; but this miſtake is built upon the notion generally conceived, that he deſigned ſuch a benefaction and an ample and generous allowance to the Keeper of his Muſæum at Oxford; but this publick principle was ſtifled in Embryo by the influence of a perſon, who was poſſeſſed of an eminent poſt in the Church, and in ſome of his elegant and polite writings had dropt ſome expreſſions favouring of Socinianiſm, which being not undeſervedly and unanſwerably attacked by a Member of this Univerſity, it was ſo highly reſented that his intereſt with our Author ſtopt the deſign, and the place ſtill remains unendowed. In July 1690 he viſited that Univerſity with his wife, and was received with all imaginable honour, and entertained at a noble dinner in his Muſæum; upon which occaſion Mr. Edward Hannes the Chymical Profeſſor, afterwards an eminent Phyſician, made an elegant Oration to him (31). His benefaction to the Univerſity was very conſiderably enlarged at his death, by the addition of his Library (32), which conſiſted chiefly of manuſcripts and ſome printed books relating to Engliſh Hiſtory, Heraldry, Aſtronomy, and Chymiſtry, with a great variety of Pamphlets, part of which had been aſſorted by himſelf, and the reſt are methodized ſince, and a double catalogue made, one claſſical according to their various ſubjects, and another alphabetical. He bequeathed alſo to the ſame place two gold chains and a medal, the one a philigreen chain of ninety links, weighing twenty two ounces, with a medal of the Elector of Brandenburg, upon which is the effigies of that Elector, and on the reverſe a view of Straelſund, ſtruck upon the ſurrender of that important city; a collar of S. S. with a medal of the King of Denmark; and a gold medal of the Elector Palatine, and a George of the Duke of Norfolk, worn by his grandfather, when he was Embaſſador in Germany. All thoſe he had received as acknowledgments of the honour, which he had done the Garter by his labours on that ſubject (32).

[M] We ſhall give a Catalogue of his works.] I. Annotations upon ſeveral poetical pieces of our famous Engliſh Philoſophers, who have written the Hermetique Myſteries in their own ancient language; illuſtrated with Figures. London 1652 in 4to. This work bears the general title of Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum; and contains The Ordinal of Alchymy written by Thomas Norton of Briſtol; The Compound of Alchymy by Sir George Ripley, with ſeveral other pieces by Richard Carpenter, Abraham Andrews, Thomas Charnock, William Bloomefield, Sir Edward Kelly, Dr. John Dee, Thomas Robinſon, John Gower, Geoffry Chaucer, John Lidgate, William Redman, Peirce the Black Monk, and divers anonymous Writers. Mr. Aſhmole wrote the Prolegomena to theſe Authors, which Mr. Wood tells us (33) is excellently well done, if not too much in the canting or Roſacrucian language, as there is in ſome of the Annotations. The Prolegomena is addreſſed to all ingeniouſly elaborate Students in the moſt divine myſteries of Hermetique Learning. He obſerves, that the ſubject of the enſuing work is a philoſophical account of that eminent ſecret treaſured up in the boſom of nature, which hath been ſought for of many but found by a few, notwithſtanding experienced antiquity hath afforded faithful (though not frequent) diſcoveries thereof. Paſt Ages have like rivers conveyed downe to us (upon the floate) the more light and ſophiſtical part of learning; but what were profound and myſterious, the weight and ſolidity thereof ſunke to the bottom; whence every one, who attempts to dive, cannot eaſily fetch them up. So that what our Saviour ſaid to his Diſciples, may (I hope without offence) be ſpoken to the elected Sons of Art: Unto you it is given to know the myſteries of the Kingdome of God; but to others in parables, that ſeeing they might not ſee, and hearing they might not underſtand. He tells us afterwards, that he does not expect that all his readers ſhould come with an engagement to believe what he writes here, or that there was ever any ſuch thing in rerum naturâ as what we call a Philosopher's Stone. Nor will I, continues he, perſuade them to it, (though I muſt tell them I have not the vanity to publiſh theſe ſacred and ſerious myſteries and arcana as romances.) 'Tis enough that I know incredulity is given to the world as a puniſhment. Yet I'll tell them what one of our ancient poetical Philoſophers ſayes;

Yet as one greatly affecting my native country and the ſatisfaction of all ingenious Artiſts, I have publiſhed (for their uſe) the enſuing collected Antiquities.* He then gives account of the Mineral Stone, "the which, ſays "he, is wrought up to the degree only, that hath "power of tranſmuting any imperfect earthy matter "into its utmoſt degree of perfection: that is, to "convert the baſeſt of metals into perfect gold and "ſilver; flints into all manner of precious ſtones, as "rubies, ſaphirs, emeralds, and diamonds, &c; and "many more experiments of the like nature. But "as this is but a part, ſo it is the leaſt ſhare of that "bleſſing, which may be acquired by the Philoſopher's "Materia, if the full virtue thereof were knowne." He proceeds next to the vegetable, magical, and angelical Stones. By the vegetable, ſays he, may be perfectly known the nature of man, beaſts, fowls, fiſhes, together with all kinds of trees, plants, flowers, &c. and how to produce and make them grow, flouriſh, and bear fruit; how to encreaſe them in colour and ſmell, and when and where we pleaſe, and all this not only at an inſtant, experimenti gratia, but daily, monthly, yearly, at any time, at any ſeaſon; yea in the depth of winter. He mentions likewiſe other virtues of this ſtone. By the magical or proſpective Stone it is poſſible to diſcover any perſon in what part of the world ſoever, although never ſo ſecretly concealed or hid, in chambers, cloſets, or caverns of the earth; for there it makes a ſtrict inquiſition. In a word, it fairly preſents to your view even the whole world, wherein to behold, hear, or ſee your deſire. Nay more, it enables man to underſtand the language of the creatures, as the chirping of birds, lowing of beaſts, &c. to convey a ſpirit into an image, which by obſerving the influence of heavenly Bodies ſhall become a true Oracle; and yet this, as E. A. aſſures us, is not any ways necromantical or deviliſh, but eaſy, wonderous eaſy, natural and honeſt. Laſtly as touching the Angelical Stone, "it is ſubtil, ſaith the aforeſaid Author, that it can "neither be ſeen, felt, or weighed, but taſted only. "The voice of man, (which bears ſome proportion "to theſe ſubtil properties,) comes ſhort in compariſon; "nay the air itſelf is not ſo penetrable, and yet (oh my-"ſterious wonder!) a Stone that will lodge in the fire to "eternity without being prejudiced. It hath a divine "power, celeſtial and inviſible above the reſt; and "endows the poſſeſſor with divine gifts. It affords "the apparition of Angels, and gives a power of "converſing with them by dreams and revelations; "nor dare any evil Spirit approach the place, where "it lodgeth; becauſe it is a quinteſſence, wherein there "is no corruptible thing; and where the elements are "not corrupt, no Devil can ſtay or abide." He tells us immediately after, that by means of this ſtone the human body is preſerved from corruption, being enabled thereby to live a long time without food; nay it is made a queſtion, whether any man can die, who uſes it. Which I do not, ſays he, ſo much admire, as to think why the poſſeſſors of it ſhould deſire to live, that have thoſe manifeſtations of glory and eternity, preſented unto their fleſhly eyes; but rather deſire to be diſſolved, and to enjoy the full fruition, than live where they muſt be content with the bare ſpeculation. He obſerves at the concluſion of his Prolegomena, that his Annotations are limited within the bounds of what is hiſtorical, or what occaſionally muſt needs intrench on the confines of other arts; and all gloſſes upon the philoſophical work purpoſely omitted; for the ſame reaſons, that I choſe to ſend forth other men's children into the world, rather than my own. II. The Proceedings on the Day of the Coronation of King Charles II. Mr. Wood obſerves, that he never ſaw this. III. The Inſtitutions, Laws, and Ceremonies of the moſt noble Order of the Garter. London 1671 (34), in folio. Biſhop Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (35) ſtiles this a moſt elaborate and perfect work upon the ſubject: and in another place (36) he tells us, that the caſtle and chapel of Windſor have been at large treated upon by the excellent pen of Elias Aſhmole Eſq; in his Hiſtory of the Garter. IV. Familiarum illuſtrium Imperatorumque Romanorum numiſmata, Oxoniæ in Bodleianæ Bibliothecæ archivis deſcripta & explanata; i. e. "The medals of the illuſtrious Families "and Roman Emperors, which are preſerved in the "Bodleian Library at Oxford, deſcribed and explain-"ed." This work, which is contained in three folio manuſcripts, was finiſhed by the Author in 1659, and given by him to the publick Library at Oxford in 1666. The originals or copies of theſe are in his Muſæum (37). The Author of the Memoirs of his Life (38) obſerves, that this work was prepared for the preſs, as appears by the Preface to it (39). V. A Deſcription and Explanation of the Coins and Medals belonging to King Charles II. This is a manuſcript in one volume in folio, and was depoſited in the King's cabinet of coins and medals (40). VI. The Arms, Epitaphs, feneſtral Inſcriptions, with the Draughts of the Tombs, &c. in all the churches in Berkſhire. This Book, which, as Mr. Wood informs us, is a large folio written by Mr. Aſhmole in 1666, was collected by him in 1664, 1665, after he had been appointed Deputy Marſhal to Sir Edward Byſhe Clarencieux King at Arms, to viſit that county. The original is in the Library in his Muſæum N°. 850; and the original of the viſitation, which he made of that county, N°. 851, and a copy of both bound together in the Herald's Office at London (41). This work of his was publiſhed at London in three volumes in 8vo in 1723 with the title of The Antiquities of Berkſhire by Elias Aſhmole Eſq; with a large Appendix of many valuable original papers, pedigrees of the moſt conſiderable Families in the ſaid county, and a particular Account of the Caſtle, College, and Town of Windſor. VII. The Arms, Epitaphs, feneſtral Inſcriptions, with the Draughts of ſome Tombs, &c. in ſome churches and houſes in Staffordſhire. This Book, which is in folio, written for the moſt part by Mr. Aſhmole's own hand, was collected partly when he accompanied William Dugdale Eſq; Norroy King of Arms in the viſitation of his province in 1662, 1663. It is in Mr. Aſhmole's Muſæum N°. 853 (42). VIII. The Arms, Epitaphs, feneſtral Inſcriptions, with the Draughts of Tombs, &c. in ſeveral churches in Cheſhire, Shropſhire, Derbyſhire, Nottinghamſhire, &c. This Book, which is in folio, written by our Author, was collected when he attended Mr. Dugdale in the viſitation of his province in 1662 and 1663. It is preſerved in the Muſæum, N°. 854. IX. Hiſtory of the Antiquities of the caſtle, chapel, college, and town of Windſor (43). This was publiſhed at the end of the Antiquities of Berkſhire, as we obſerved above. X. Divers Collections, Remarks, Notes on Books, and MSS. in his Muſæum. Biſhop Nicholſon in his Hiſtorical Library, Part II (44) tells us, that the little, that was to be ſaved out of the ruins, into which the Cathedral of Lichfield fell in our late days of confuſion, was picked up by (one of the great Preſervers of our Engliſh Antiquities) Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; late Garter King at Arms, and is now amongſt many other of his precious remains in his Muſæum at Oxford. This excellent Perſon, continues he, had a deſign to have honoured the place of his nativity with the writing a Hiſtory and Deſcription of its ancient and preſent State, and had collected a good number of choice materials for that purpoſe. We have likewiſe ſeveral tranſlations done by our Author; as particularly, 1. De Mundi Cataſtrophe written by Joh. Franc. Spina. But Mr. Wood tells us (45), that he was not informed by Mr. Aſhmole's letter when or where his tranſlation of this Book was printed, or in what form; but only that he ſubjoined to it a tranſlation of Ambr. Merlin's Prophecy. II. Faſciculus Chymicus &c. written by Arthur Dee. This tranſlation is intitled, Chemical Collections, expreſſing the ingreſs and egreſs of the ſecret Hermetic Science out of the choiceſt and moſt famous Authors. To this tranſlation is added another made by our Author, entitled, ſeveral books of that ſubject were dedicated to him, as others of Aſtrology, &c. were. He was a great Patron of Men of Letters; and the world is particularly obliged to him for the education and ſupport of the learned and eloquent Dr. Smallridge, Dean of Chriſt Church and Biſhop of Briſtol.

Arcanum, or the Grand Secret of Hermetic Philoſophy &c. written by an anonymous author. Both theſe were printed at London in one volume in 8vo, in the year 1650, and ſaid in the title to be made Engliſh by James Haſolle (Elias Aſhmole) Eſq; qui eſt Mercuriophilus Anglicus. Before the title is a cut or buſt of our Author placed upon an altar, upon which is written Mercuriophilus Anglicus, and above the picture is a hand coming out of the clouds, and holding before the Tranſlator's face a ſcrowl of paper with an aſtrological ſcheme upon it; and under all are four Engliſh verſes, partly deſcribing the picture which were compoſed by his friend Thomas Wharton, Dr. of Phyſic. Mr. Aſhmole wrote Prolegomena to theſe two tranſlations, full of the Roſicrucian language, and dedicated to all ingenious elaborate Students in the moſt divine myſteries of Hermetic learning (46). He publiſhed likewiſe a learned treatiſe of the Philoſopher's Stone, intitled, The way to Bliſs, in three Books; London, 1658 in 4to, which was written by an unknown Author in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He had received the copy of it from William Backhouſe, Eſq; abovementioned, who deſired him to publiſh it, to do juſtice to the Author, becauſe they both had met with a pretended copy of that Book prepared for the preſs; which upon examination Mr. Aſhmole found mutilated, and injured by ſeveral impertinent additions, and form'd from ſome ſcattered fragments collected from the whole work. Beſides it was intended, that the world ſhould receive it as the performance of Eugenius Theodidactus, that is, of John Heydon, who had then lately married the widow of Nicholas Culpepper the Aſtrologer; and the title of it was altered into that of the Wiſe Man's Crown, or Roſy-crucian Phyſic; under which title John Gadbury in his Almanack for the year 1658 obſerv'd that it was ready to be publiſhed. Mr. Aſhmole therefore out of zeal for the art of Chemiſtry, and regard to the author of this work, took care to preſent the world with a perfect copy of it. This was highly reſented by Mr. Heydon abovementioned, who publiſhed a piece at London 1660 in 8vo, intitled, The Idea of the Law, characteriſed from Moſes to King Charles II. &c. in the Preface to which he tells the Reader that Mr. Aſhmole had printed a Book, called, The Way to Bliſs, in three Books, in a very defective manner, ſince his own Edition of it had four Books (47). Mr. Aſhmole tells us in his Preface, that the true Author of this Book was unknown, but, ſays he, I have heard ſome notable ſtories, and thoſe back'd with perſuaſive circumſtances to make an eaſy faith think the providence very obſervable, that not only furniſhed a laborious ſearcher into this myſterious learning with the original itſelf, but moſt fortunately directed him to three grains of the powder cloſed up between two leaves thereof with which he made projection. But I affect not to fly-blow the ears of my Readers; only this I can modeſtly aver, that my copy was a tranſcript of that original. The work ſeems to be written about the beginning of the laſt (or end of the former) Century; the main drift of the Author being from weighty and ſerious arguments and examples to prove the poſſibility of the Philoſopher's Stone; whereby is largely manifeſted that nature has exhibited greater wonders to the view of the world, and as great things have been (and conſequently may be) performed by the weaker and leſſer means, where a due, friendly, and philoſophical conjunction of nature and art itſelf is fully underſtood. And yet howbeit, becauſe ſuch are familiar unto, and ordinary among us, we conſider them not. 'Tis a diſcourſe fraught with variety of excellent rational matter, and fitted to the learned as well as meaner capacities; nay, ſuch as I boldly perſuade myſelf will ſatisfy both beyond any thing yet extant of this nature; and I believe many captious arguments heretofore uſed and urged againſt the truth of this ſo infallible a Science, will here meet with ſatisfactory ſolution, and henceforth find no further place in any diſcourſe favouring but of ſobriety. The Diary of his Life, written by himſelf, was publiſhed at London, 1717, in 12mo with the following title, Memoirs of the life of that learned antiquary, Elias Aſhmole, Eſq; drawn up by himſelf by way of Diary; with an appendix of original letters publiſhed by Charles Burman, Eſq; The Editor tells us in the Preface, that the copy from whence thoſe papers were publiſhed, was in the hand-writing of Dr. Robert Plot, Chief Keeper of the Aſhmolean Muſeum at Oxford, and Secretary of the Royal Society, and was tranſcribed by him for the uſe of a near relation of Mr. Aſhmole's, a private Gentleman in Staffordſhire. That they had been collated a few years before by David Perry, M. A. of Jeſus College in Oxford, and Chief Keeper of the Muſeum, who corrected from the original manuſcript (48) ſome few literal errors. The Editor concludes with obſerving, that he ſhall not deſcant upon the uſefulneſs of this kind of works; but only ſay thus much, that they let us into the ſecret Hiſtory of the affairs of their ſeveral times; diſcover the ſprings of motion, and diſplay many valuable, tho' minute circumſtances overlooked, or unknown to our general Hiſtorians; and, to conclude all, ſatiate our largeſt curioſity. The Appendix contains a letter of thanks, dated January 26, 1666. from the corporation of Lichfield upon the receipt of a ſilver bowl, preſented to them by Mr. Aſhmole; a Preface to the catalogue of Archbiſhop Laud's medals, drawn up by Mr. Aſhmole, and preſerved in the public library at Oxford; a letter from Dr. Thomas Barlow, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, to Mr. Aſhmole, dated December 28, 1668, on the preſent of his Books, deſcribing Archbiſhop Laud's Cabinet of Medals; a letter from John Evelyn, Eſq; to recommend Dr. Plott to him for Reader in Natural Philoſophy; and another from Mr. Joſhua Barnes dated from Emanuel College, Cambridge, October 15, 1688, wherein he deſires Mr. Aſhmole's pardon for having reflected upon his Order of the Garter in his own Hiſtory of King Edward III. with Mr. Aſhmole's anſwer to that letter, dated October the 23d following.

He was a man of a ſerene peaceable temper, and in all reſpects worthy of his function. He was an excellent Logician, and maſter of a peculiar ſagacity and clearneſs in reaſoning, and very converſant in the Fathers and School-Men, which gained him a great eſteem among thoſe Divines who had an inclination to thoſe ſtudies (c).

☞ASPILCUETA (MARTIN DE) commonly called the Doctor of Navarre (Navarrus, or Doctor Navarrus) becauſe he was of that country, was born of a noble family [A] the 13th of December 1491, at Varaſayn, a ſmall city of the Kingdom of Navarre, not far from Pampeluna. He entered very young into the monaſtery of Regular Canons at Roncevaux (a), where he took the habit, which he wore all his life-time, though he left the Convent. He went afterwards to Alcala (b), where he ſtudied Polite Literature, Natural and Moral Philoſophy, and Divinity, applying himſelf chiefly to the Syſtem of Peter Lombard, commonly called the Maſter of the Sentences. Having made a conſiderable progreſs in theſe Sciences, he retired to Ferrara [B], and there ſtudied the Law with ſuch ſucceſs, that he was ſoon thought capable of teaching it to others, which he did with applauſe [C] at Toulouſe and Cahors. Some time after he returned to Spain, and was made firſt Profeſſor of Canon Law at Salamanca (c), where he gained a great reputation, by endeavouring to inſtill good principles into the minds of the youth under his care, and encouraging them to the ſtudy of the Canon Law, which before his time was almoſt entirely neglected in that Univerſity. He continued there fourteen years, and intended, after he ſhould have finiſhed a courſe of twenty years, to be diſcharged from his functions, that he might be at liberty to apply himſelf to other ſtudies. But he could not accompliſh this deſign; for John the Third, King of Portugal, choſe him to be Profeſſor of Law at Coimbra (d), where he had lately founded an Univerſity. He gave Aſpilcueta a larger ſalary than what had ever been given to Profeſſors, either in Spain or in France, which might perhaps be thought the reaſon why Aſpilcueta complied with the King's deſire [D]. He ſtaid there ſixteen years, when having

[A] Of a noble Family.] His father's family was diſtinguiſhed not only becauſe it was very ancient, but alſo becauſe Francis Xavier the Apoſtle of the Indies was of that family, as our Aſpilcueta himſelf tells us (1). His mother was of the family of Jaureguiçar, otherwiſe called Baſtan, anciently ſettled in the Pyrenean Mountains (2).

[B] He retired into France.] The occaſion of it was as follows: John d'Albret, King of Navarre, having been excommunicated with his wife Catherine de Foix by Pope Julius II, as favourers and abettors of Lewis XII King of France, whom the Pope had declared an enemy of the Church, Ferdinand King of Spain, who had procured that excommunication, invaded the Kingdom of Navarre, which obliged John d'Albret to take refuge in thoſe eſtates, which he poſſeſſed in France. Peter of Navarre his great Marſhal, and Francis his brother, who adhered to the King, attended him; and Aſpilcueta, who was Francis's Companion and Divine, (cum Comes tum Doctor) was obliged to follow him, and continued with him twelve years (3).

(3) Idem, ibid.

[C] He taught the Law with great applauſe.] His chief Lectures were upon Canon Law, which Father Niceron ſhould have obſerved (4); whereas he ſpeaks in general terms, as if Aſpilcueta had alſo taught the Civil Law. It appears however that our Author ſometimes inſiſted upon the principles of common morality: an inſtance of which we find in Nic. Antonio, who tells us (5), that Aſpilcueta proved in an elaborate diſcourſe, that we ought not to love or hate a man, merely becauſe he is our fellow-citizen, or a ſtranger, of the ſame nation with us, or of another, but that we are only to conſider his moral principles, and his virtue and good qualities. It were to be wiſhed, that Aſpilcueta had added, without any regard to his private opinions: but this is more than could be expected from a Roman Catholick Divine, and is not always to be met with even in thoſe, who have ſhaken off all human authority in religious ſubjects.

(4) See his Memoirs, &c. tom. 5. pag. 3.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

[D] This might perhaps be thought the reaſon, why Aſpilcueta complied with the King (of Portugal's) deſire.] When a man's conduct may proceed either from a good or bad principle, and we have no particular reaſons to aſcribe it to the one rather than to the other, the general corruption of men will eaſily lead us to impute their actions to an evil motive; tho' Chriſtian charity having by his continual labours well deſerved to enjoy ſome repoſe, he was permitted to reſign his Profeſſorſhip, and retire into his own country, where he took care of his nieces, the daughters of his brothers who were dead. He alſo went into Caſtile, and during his ſtay there he was Confeſſor to Jane the widow of the Prince of Portugal, and to the Princes of Bohemia her nephews, the ſons of the Empreſs Mary. Aſpilcueta deſigned at laſt to return into Portugal [E], but he was obliged to go to Rome to plead the cauſe of Bartholomeo de Caranza Archbiſhop of Toledo [F], who was accuſed of hereſy before the Tribunal of the Inquiſition, and whoſe cauſe having firſt been pleaded in Spain, was by the Pope's order to be tried at Rome (e). Aſpilcueta pleaded this cauſe for Caranza with the utmoſt zeal, but without ſucceſs [G]. As his writings had gained him a very great reputation, we are not to wonder at his being received at Rome in the moſt honourable manner. Pope Pius V made him Aſſiſtant to Cardinal Francis Alciat his Vice-Penitentiary; and Gregory XIII never paſſed by Aſpilcueta's door, but he called for him, and ſtopped ſometimes a whole hour to talk with him in the ſtreet, nay he did not diſdain to pay him a viſit, even when he was attended with ſeveral Cardinals. Theſe honours did not raiſe his vanity, for he was always very modeſt and humble, an inſtance of which we ſhall give in the note [H]. His name became ſo famous, that even in his time the higheſt encomium that could be given to a learned man, was to call him a Navarrus, that name, which Aſpilcueta bore, implying the utmoſt perfection in all kind of Sciences, as that of a Roſcius was anciently given to the moſt accompliſhed Players. Aſpilcueta, according to Erythreus (f), was conſidered as the Oracle, not of one city only, but of the whole world; all ſorts of people reſorted to him, as to an Apollo, to have their doubts reſolved; and whatever he ſaid was received as an anſwer from ſome Deity. Such was the authority he had acquired, not only by his learning, but alſo by his virtue and ſincerity. He was very regular in the practice of all the Chriſtian duties, according to the rites and ceremonies of the church of Rome. His temperance and frugality not only preſerved his health and ſtrength in ſuch a manner, that even in a very advanced age, he had all the liberty of mind neceſſary to apply himſelf to ſtudy, but he was alſo capable of giving to the poor ſubſtantial proofs of his liberality, for he was always very charitable [I]. His humility and the ſtrong inclination he had for ſtudy, made charity ſhould oblige us to judge otherwiſe. And as it is very cuſtomary with Profeſſors to prefer thoſe Univerſities, where they have the greateſt ſalary, Aſpilcueta might very probably be accuſed of leaving his chair at Salamanca for that of Coimbra, only becauſe the latter was more profitable. It ſeems that he had been accuſed of this, for he defends himſelf in ſeveral places of his works (6), and ſhews, that the King of Portugal John III had prevailed over the Emperor Charles V by the interceſſion of Iſabella his ſiſter, to ſend him Aſpilcueta into Portugal, that that part of the world might alſo enjoy his learned Lectures (7); ſo that it was not the love of gain that obliged him to leave Salamanca, but the intreaties of his ſuperiors, which, with regard to a private man, have the force of a command. Add to this, that he refuſed ſeveral poſts of honour, which a covetous man will always make his advantage of.

[E] He deſigned—to return into Portugal.] It was either out of gratitude to Queen Catherine, who had beſtowed great favours upon him, or becauſe maintaining himſelf with the money he had got there during his Profeſſorſhip, he thought that if it was not unjuſt in him, yet it was ungrateful to convey to another place the fruits of his counſels and learning. This I take to be the ſenſe of Nicholas Antonio's Latin. Tandem cum Portugalliam denuo cogitaret, forſan conſcientia tactus beneficiorum ſibi à Catharina Regina olim collatorum, aut quod ejus regni pecuniis ſeſe exhibens opimos conſilii & doctrinæ fructus alibi reddere, ſi non iniquum ſaltem ingratum exiſtimabat (8). The words exhibere ſeſe often ſignify among the Civilians, to maintain one's ſelf; and in this ſenſe I ſuppoſe Nicholas Antonio employed them.

(8) Idem, ibid.

[F] To plead the cauſe of Bartholomeo de Caranza Archbiſhop of Toledo.] As this Archbiſhop was a man of a very eminent character, it was proper that he ſhould be defended by a perſon of the greateſt merit and learning, and none could be found but Aſpilcueta. This is what Nicholas Antonio ſays (9). Thuanus adds (10), that Aſpilcueta, being then eighty years old, neglected the care of his own health to aſſiſt his friend; he attended Caranza to Rome, and defended him very courageouſly notwithſtanding the oppoſition of King Philip and his Miniſters. Navarrus, quanquam octogenari proximus omnem ætatis & valetudinis curam amici periculo poſthabuit, & Carançam (11) Romam ductum comitatus, ejus innocentiam, averſo Philippo & ejus Miniſtris, conſtantiſſime tutatus eſt.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(11) Thus Thuanus writes this Archbiſhop's name. Nic. Antonio writes it Carranza.

[G] Without ſucceſs.] We learn from Thuanus (12), that tho' nothing could be proved againſt Caranza, yet he languiſhed in priſon, where he at laſt died very miſerable; whence it appears, that all Aſpilcueta's endeavours and eloquence in his behalf proved unſucceſsful. We are not to wonder at this, ſince he had againſt him the King and his Council, and, what is a thouſand times more terrible, the formidable Tribunal of the Inquiſition.

(12) Ubi ſupra, pag. 112.

[H] An inſtance of his modeſty and humility.] Thuanus furniſhes us with it, and is ſo much the more to be credited, as he was an eye-witneſs of what he relates on this occaſion. "I remember, ſays he (13), "that when Paul de Foix was Embaſſador at Rome "for the King of France, whither I accompanied him, "Aſpilcueta came to viſit him; and not finding him "at home, he went to meet him at the entrance of the "Church of the Trinity. There with his head bare, "he proſtrated himſelf to the ground, and kiſſed the "Embaſſador's feet. De Foix ſurprized at this hu"mility refuſed the honour, which Aſpilcueta intend"ed him, and entreated the venerable old man to "riſe. Aſpilcueta anſwered, that he owed theſe marks "of reſpect and veneration to a nation, from which "his Kings were deſcended. At laſt he was prevail"ed upon to ſtand up; but neither the prayers nor "repeated commands of the Embaſſador could oblige "him to cover his head, tho' he walked with him "in an open place, expoſed to all the injuries of the "ſeaſon, which was then very cold." Thuanus adds a circumſtance which is very much to the glory of Aſpilcueta. As he was extremely well verſed in the doctrine, which relates to caſes of conſcience, and likewiſe a very honeſt man, he had been ſometimes conſulted by the Emperor Charles the fifth, and by Philip his ſon, with regard to the Kingdom of Navarre, which had been uſurped by King Ferdinand; and he always adviſed them either to reſtore it, or to give an equivalent for it, if they would act in a conſcientious manner (14).

[I] He was very charitable.] Being very old he uſed to ride on a mule thro' the city, and aſſiſted all the poor he met; to which his mule was ſo well accuſtomed, that ſhe ſtopped of her own accord at the ſight of every poor man, till her maſter had relieved him (15).

made him decline all the honourable posts in Church and State which were offered him [K]. This great man died the 21st of June 1586, being then ninety four years, six months, and eight days old, as we learn from the inscription on his tomb, which we shall give in the note [L], and not above an hundred years, as some Authors have said (g). Aspilcueta has been extremely celebrated [M] by his contemporaries, and by the Authors who lived after him (h); the Casuists and Writers on Canon Law quote his authority very often, yet Mr. Du Pin observes, that he is sometimes too remiss with regard to morality, and that his stile is neither polite nor entertaining (i). As he had always his pen in hand, we are not to be surprized that he wrote a vast number of works, which are all either on Morality, or Canon Law. We shall give a catalogue of them in the note [N].

ASSERIUS

[K] He declined all the honourable posts in Church and State, that were offered him.] Before he was made Professor at Salamanca, the King offered him a place in the Council of the Kingdom of Navarre, which is held at Pampeluna, with a Prebend in the Cathedral of that city, but he preferred a Professorship and his private studies to the care of publick business; and after his return from Portugal, he refused to be admitted amongst the Senators of the great Council of Castile, as also amongst the supreme Judges of the Inquisition, which places King Philip II would have conferred upon him. He chose rather to employ his time in correcting and improving the works he had already written, and in composing others. The same reason made him refuse a Bishoprick which was offered him by the King and Queen of Portugal, who had a very great love and esteem for him (16).

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) It appears by this that he had given something to an Hospital, but we are not told to what Hospital, nor whether it was before or after his death.

He was buried in a very solemn manner, the Monks, Priests, Auditors of the Rota, and the Prelates, who were then at Rome, attending his corps, by the express order of the Pope. His remains were deposited in the Church of St. Antony belonging to the Portugueze, where his bust was also placed. He had no very agreeable countenance; he had a Roman nose (18), and was so meagre and thin, that he seemed rather to be a breathing image, than a real man (19). But the qualities of his mind abundantly made amends for the disadvantage of his person.

[M] Aspilcueta has been extremely celebrated.] Andrew Resendius and Emanuel Costa, who had been Aspilcueta's Scholars in Portugal, place him above all the Doctors and Canonists of his age. Doctorum Conimbricensium, says the former (20), facile & sine controversia Princeps. Doctorum Juris Canonici, says the latter (21), facile Princeps. Francis Sarmiento, tho' his antagonist, speaks after the same manner; and Rhoderic Arriaga tells us (22), that Aspilcueta's decision must be of great weight, when he declares any action innocent, because he was a man of great learning and eminent piety, whose conscience was not only timorous, but even scrupulous. This is very different from Mr. du Pin's opinion (23); but we must observe, that Mr. du Pin passed for a Jansenist, and Arriaga was a Jesuit; which is sufficient to account for the difference of their opinion in this particular. We may add here, that Aspilcueta's life has been written by Simon Magus a Canon of St. Peter at Liege, who had been an intimate friend of our Author's. This life was prefixed to his Manual printed before his death at Rome, and at Cologn. But he was not well pleased with it, as he testifyed himself in a letter to Simon, according to Valerius Andreas. There is another life of Aspilcueta, written by Roscius Hortinus a very eloquent writer; which life is prefixed to the Edition of our Author, published at Rome by Michael Aspilcueta his nephew, in the year 1690. This life, says Nic. Antonio (24), is more to be depended upon than the former, as having been printed under the inspection of the deceased's relation, by whom the writer might be informed of the truth, and prevented from mixing it with errors and falshood. Besides these lives, there is a funeral oration in a panegyrical style, composed by Thomas Correa a Portugueze, and a famous Professor of eloquence and rhetoric at Rome. He pronounced that oration in the church of St. Anthony on the day in which Aspilcueta was buried; it was printed that same year by James Tornesius. We need not mention the several elogies and other verses that have been composed in praise of our Author by the most eminent Poets of his time, either in Latin, or the modern languages (25).

[N] A catalogue of his works.] There is an Edition published at Rome in three volumes by James Tornesius in 1590, which does not contain the work, intitled, Consilia, i. e. The advices. These have been added with some other pieces to the Edition printed at Venice in 1602 (26). There is another Edition published at Lyons in 1591, from that of Rome (27). The first volume of the Roman Edition, contains, 1. Manuale, sive, Enchiridion Confessariorum & Pœnitentium. i. e. "A Manual for Confessors and Penitents." The Author had first composed that work in Spanish, in which language it was printed at Salamanca in 1557, in 4to. It wanted a treatise concerning usury and simony, which the Author added by way of supplement in the same language, and printed it in 1569. He afterwards translated it into Latin, in which tongue it bore several impressions. Simon Magnus having corrected the style, and made some additions to it, published it at Paris in 8vo in 1587. Francis de Sese made also some additions to it, and had it printed at Venice in 1573, in 4to. Andrew Victorelli also enlarged it; his Edition was published in the same city, and in the same form. Other writers have abridged that work, as Cominio Ventura, whose abridgment was printed at Bergamo in 1593, in 24mo. Stephen d'Avila a Jesuit published his at Lyons in 1608, 24mo (28). It has also been translated into Italian (29). 2. De horis Canonicis & oratione. i. e. "Of Canonical "hours, and of Prayer," first printed in Spanish in 1560, in 8vo, then translated into Latin, and printed at Lyons in 1580, and at Rome in 1586. 3. Miscellanea centum de Oratione, præsertim Psalterio, & Rosario Virginis Mariæ, & de Institutione recta Oratorum, & actis quibusdam eorum, & de pertinentibus ad illa. i. e. "An hundred miscellaneous observations concern-"ing Prayer, especially the Psalter and Rosary, &c." The second volume contains 1. Commentarius de Silentio in Divinis officiis, præsertim in choro servando, i. e. "a "Commentary concerning the Silence to be kept dur-"ing Divine Service, especially in the choir." This little work, says F. Niceron (30), is almost entirely extracted from the Manuale. 2. Commentarius in caput, Inter verba XI. Quæst. III. in quo de gloria, honore, laude, ac bona fama, deque ingloria, vituperio, infamia, & detractione tractatur. i. e. "A Commentary ... which treats "of glory, honour, praise, and a good name, and "of their contraries." This work was first composed in Spanish, and printed at Coimbra, in 1544, in fol. and at Valladolid in 1572; it was afterwards translated into Latin, and published at Rome in 1584, in 4to. 3. De regularibus Commentarii tres, i. e. ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, Author of the Life of King Alfred [A], and Biſhop of Shirburn in the ninth Century, was born at St. David's in Wales, where he entered himſelf into the Order of Benedictine Monks. He is ſaid to have been a ſcholar of John Scotus Erigena, under whom he made a great progreſs in learning (a). Dr. Cave tells us (b), that he was a relation and Chancellor of Aſſerius Archbiſhop of St. David's; and Mr. Hearne in his notes upon Sir John Spelman's Life of King Ælfred the Great (c) aſſures us, that he was nephew to the Archbiſhop, who, according to him, was really the Author of the Hiſtoria de rebus Geſtis Alfredi Regis, generally aſcribed to the Biſhop of Shirburn. His reaſon for this aſſertion is, that in the book itſelf it is ſaid that he wrote ann. 893, which was ten years after the death of the former, as appears from William of Malmſbury. Having met with ſome ill treatment from Hemydus, who was a man of authority in his country, and being invited by King Alfred to his court, he went thither, and gained ſo great a ſhare in that Prince's favour, that he gave him the Biſhoprick of Shirburn, and made him Abbot of the Monaſteries of Amerſbury and Banwel (d), and, as Sir John Spelman tells us (e), of Exeter. Dr. Cave obſerves, that it was he who perſuaded Alfred to found the Univerſity of Oxford, and ſettle annual ſtipends

" Commentaries concerning the Regulars," firſt printed at Rome in 1576, in 4to, and afterwards reviſed by the Author. 4. De Alienatione rerum Eccleſiaſticarum, ac de ſpoliis Clericorum Commentarius, in principium & Gloſſ. Summæ XII. Quæſt. II De ſpoliis Clericorum ſuper caput, Non liceat Papæ eadem cauſa & quæſtione. i. e. " A Commentary concerning the " alienation of Church Goods, and the robbing of the " Clergy &c." Printed at Rome in 1573, in 8vo, and afterwards reviſed by the Author. 5. Commentarius reſolutivus de Uſuris, i. e. " A Commentary con- " cerning Uſury," firſt publiſhed in Spaniſh with the additions to the Manuale, at Valladolid in 1569, and afterwards in Latin at Rome in 1585, in 4to, and at Antwerp in 1600, in 8vo. 6. De reditibus beneficiorum Eccleſiaſticorum Commentarius, quo docetur quibus uſibus ſint impendendi, & quibus perſonis dandi aut relinquendi. i. e. " A Commentary concerning the re- " venue of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, ſhewing in what it " ought to be ſpent, and to whom it muſt be given " or left." Printed in Spaniſh in 1566, and dedicated to King Philip II. afterwards in Latin in 1568, and in 1574 dedicated to Pope Pius V. The Author undertakes to prove in that piece, that an incumbent ought to give to the poor all the income of his living, except what is neceſſary for his ſuſtenance. Such a deciſion ſeemed too ſevere to Francis Sarmiento, Auditor of the Rota; he attacked our Author, who defended himſelf in the following work. 7. Apologeticus pro libro de reditibus Eccleſiaſticis. i. e. " A de- " fence of the Book concerning Eccleſiaſtical revenues," printed at Rome in 1570, and at Antwerp in 1574. This work occaſioned two famous men to write concerning Aſpilcueta's opinion, and to confirm it by their authority. The firſt was Francis Turrianus a Jeſuit, who wrote to Gonſalvo Herrera, Biſhop of Laodicea; the ſecond was Achilles Statius, a Portugueſe, who addreſſed his letter to our Author. Theſe letters were afterwards added to a new Edition of Aſpilcueta's Commentary concerning Eccleſiaſtical Benefices. 8. Commentarius in Cap. Humanæ Aures XXII. quæſt. V. De veritate reſponſi partim verbo expreſſo, partim mente concepto redditi. i. e. " A Commentary . . . . concern- " ing the truth of an anſwer partly expreſſed, partly " intended." 9. De finibus humanarum actionum commentarius, i. e. " A Commentary upon the end of " human actions;" printed at Lyons in 1573, in 8vo, and at Rome 1585. 10. Epiſtola Apologetica ad illuſtriſs. excellentiſſimumque Dom. Gabrielem a Cueva, Ducem Albuquerquenſem, Gubernatoremque Mediolani. i. e. " An apologetical Epiſtle to Gabriel a Cueva, Duke " of Albuquerque, and Viceroy of Milan." He wrote this Letter to defend himſelf againſt thoſe, who pretended and endeavoured to prove, that he ſtayed at Rome, becauſe King Philip II was exaſperated againſt him. This Letter contains the Hiſtory of his life. II. Commentarius in ſeptem diſtinctiones de Pœnitentia. i. e. " A Commentary upon the ſeven diſ- " tinctions concerning Penitence." 12. Commentarius de Anno Jubilæo, & Indulgentiis omnibus. i. e. " A " Commentary upon the Jubilee year, and upon all " the Indulgences;" printed firſt at Coimbra in 1550, afterwards with additions at Rome in 1576, in 4to, and at Milan 1579, in 8vo. In the third Volume we find 1, 2. Relectiones duæ de Reſcriptis. 3. Commentarius in Rubricam de Judiciis. 4. Relectio Cap. Nov. de Judiciis. 5. Relectio de Reſtitutione Spoliatorum (31). 6. Relectio Cap. Ita quorundum, de Judæis, in quo de rebus ad Saracenos deferri prohibitis, & cenſuris ob id latis. i. e. " A lecture . . . . concerning the Jews, " which treats of thoſe affairs which it is not permitted " to bring before the Saracens, and of cenſures pro- " nounced on that account." Printed at Coimbra, in 1550, in 8vo. 6. Commentarius de datis & promiſſis pro juſtitia vel gratia obtinendis. i. e. " A Commen- " tary concerning gifts, or promiſes made in order to " obtain either juſtice or favour," printed at Rome " in 1576, in 4to. Beſides theſe pieces, the Venice " Edition publiſhed in 1602 contains, De Cambiis. De Simonia mentali. i. e. " Of intended Simony." De Furto notabili. i. e. " Of hotorious theft." De neceſſitate defendendi proximum ab injuria. i. e. " Of the " obligation to defend one's neighbour againſt injury." De homicidio caſuali. i. e. " Of accidental manſlaugh- " ter." De incompatibilitate Beneficiorum. i. e. " Of " the incompatibility of Benefices." De Eleemoſyna. i. e. " Of Alms." De lege pœnali. i. e. " Of pe- " nal law." Beſides theſe treatiſes, there is another intitled, Conſiliorum ſeu Reſponſionum Lib. V. i. e. " Five Books of Counſels or Anſwers," diſpoſed according to the order in which the decretals ſtand, and divided into two volumes in 4to. James Caſtellanus has abridged all Aſpilcueta's works, and publiſhed his abridgment at Venice in 1598, in 4to; it was afterwards corrected and publiſhed with ſome additions by Peter Anthony de Lazzaro (32).

[A] Author of the Life of King Alfred.] Dr. Nicholſon in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library (1) obſerves, that Aſſerius wrote this King's Life no further than the 45th year of his age, which, according to his computation, fell in the year of our Lord 893. So that tho' the Book, as it is publiſhed, continues the Hiſtory to Alfred's Death, yet that part is borrowed from Authors, who lived later; and particularly the Verſes in the manner of an Epitaph upon him were written by Henry of Huntingdon. He ſhews thro' the whole, continues that learned Author (2), a great deal of modeſty, eſpecially in the account which he gives of his own being invited to court, and his reception there. He mentions nothing of the viſionary Dialogue between King Alfred and St. Cuthbert, which all the reſt of the Hiſtorians largely inſiſt upon, together with the good effects, which it had upon the Dioceſe of Lindisfern. He is exactly copied by Florence of Worceſter and other Writers, when they treat of the affairs of that reign. This Book of Aſſerius was firſt publiſhed by Dr. Parker Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the old Saxon character at the end of his edition of Thomas Walſingham's Hiſtory printed at London in fol. 1574. He choſe to print it in that character in order to engage his Engliſh Readers in the ſtudy of the language of their anceſtors, and the antiquities of their own country (3). It was publiſhed again in a collection of the Engliſh Hiſtorians by Cambden at Francfort in folio, 1602 (4). Mr. Wiſe of Oxford publiſhed a very beautiful edition of it at Oxford 1722 in 8vo.

pends upon the Profeſſors of the ſeveral Sciences. We have a Chronicle or Annals aſcribed to him [B]. Dr. Gerard Langbain remarked from a manuſcript that our Aſſerius was the Author of the tranſlation of Boetius de Conſolatione aſcribed to King Alfred (f). Pitſeus (g) ſays, that he wrote likewiſe ſeveral Homilies; Aurearum Sententiarum Enchiridion; i. e. "A Manual of Golden Sentences." Comment. in Boethium de Conſolatione; i. e. "A Commentary upon Boethius de Conſolatione, &c. And Balæus (h) obſerves, that he wrote the Annals of Britain. Brian Twyne in his Antiquities of Oxford (i) aſſures us, that he is a Writer, whoſe authority was never in the leaſt called in queſtion. He died, according to Mr. Du Pin (k), Dr. Cave, Olearius, and Oudin, in the year 909; but Mr. Hearne places his death much ſooner [C].

[B] We have a Chronicle or Annals aſcribed to him.] Theſe Annals were publiſhed by Dr. Thomas Gale in his Hiſtoriæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, & Anglodanicæ Scriptores decem, printed at Oxford in fol. 1691, under the following title; Chronicon Favi S. Neoti, ſive Annales Joannis Aſſerii, ut nonnullis videtur. They begin with theſe words: Igitur Britannia Romanis uſque ad Caium Julium Cæſarem inceſſa atque incognita fuit; i. e. "Britain therefore was unknown to "the Romans, till the time of Caius Julius Cæſar," and they end in the year 914 with theſe words, Anno DCCCCXIV facta eſt pax inter Carolum Regem Francorum & Rollonem Ducem Normanniæ; i. e. "A peace was concluded in the year 914 between "Charles King of the Franks and Rollo Duke of "Normandy (5)." Dr. Gale tells us, that the manuſcript copy, which he made uſe of, was in the Library of Trinity College in Cambridge. Dr. Nicholſon obſerves (6), that John Brompton (7) cites ſeveral things relating to the Hiſtory of King Offa out of the writings of Aſſerius, which are not to be found in his Life of Alfred. Hence ſome perſons have concluded, that he might have been impoſed upon by thoſe that have given the name of that Author to ſuch anonymous Collections, as they could not aſſign to any particular Author. And this ſuſpicion may ſtill continue, for any thing which this Book diſcovers to the contrary. For King Offa is ſcarce named in it; and therefore Brompton muſt have fallen upon a ſpurious piece (8), how genuine ſoever this may prove. However Dr. Gale was of opinion (9), that it was really written by Aſſerius, which notion ſeems to be favoured by its inſiſting chiefly upon the fortunes of King Alfred. Caſimir Oudin in his Commentarius de Scriptoribus & Scriptis Eccleſiaſticis (10) thinks the contrary opinion moſt probable, ſince the Annals extend to the year 914; whereas Aſſerius died at fartheſt in 909, and there is no mark of any Appendix to it. Beſides there is the expreſs mention in it of the Death of Aſſerius Menevenſis Biſhop of Shirburn under the year 909; Anno 909 Aſſerius Shirburnenſis obiit, & Friteſtanus ſuſcepit Epiſcopatum Wintoniæ. Leland in the ſecond volume of his MS. Collect. f. 191. b. quoted by Mr. Hearne in his Notes upon Sir John Spelman's Life of King Ælfred the Great (11) profeſſes himſelf ignorant of the name of the Author of this Chronicle, and calls it the Chronicle of St. Neots, becauſe, as Dr. Nicholſon obſerves (12), he found it in that Monaſtery. Marianus Scotus had alſo met with it ſome where; for he tranſcribes it very frequently in his own Chronicle.

[C] Mr. Hearne places his death much ſooner.] Having obſerved in his Notes upon Sir John Spelman (13), as we remark'd in the text of this article, that the Life of Alfred was not written by Aſſer Biſhop of Shirburn, but by Aſſer his uncle, Archbiſhop of St. Davids, he endeavours to prove it from this conſideration, that it is ſaid in the Book itſelf, that he wrote an. 893, which was ten years after the death of the former, as appears from William of Malmſbury; and conſequently that the Biſhop of Shirburn died in the year 883. "I know indeed, continues he, that in another Book "of Aſſer's, called his Annals, publiſhed by Dr. Gale "in the ſecond volume of his Oxford Hiſtorians, "'tis expreſly ſaid, that Aſſer Biſhop of Shirburn died "ann. 909; but that being an addition of a later hand, "I ſuppoſe it to be an ignorant miſtake for Aſſer Archbiſhop of St. David's." ASSHETON (WILLIAM) was deſcended from an antient and good family of that name in Lancaſhire, and born in the beginning of the year 1641. His father was Rector of Middleton in that county (a). Our Author was admitted a Student of Brazen-Noſe-College in Oxford the 3d of July 1658 (b), and placed under the care of a Tutor, who was of the Preſbyterian party [A]. Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his application to his ſtudies, and the progreſs which he made in all parts of learning, that he was elected into a Fellowſhip in that College in the year 1663, being then Bachelor of Arts (c). [A] Placed under the care of a Tutor, who was of the Preſbyterian party.] Mr. Wood tells us (1), in his uſual rough ſtyle, that he was put under a Preſbyterian Tutor, and frequented with Sam. Parker (afterwards Bp. of Oxford) the religious meetings in the houſe of Beſſe Hampton, an old decrepit Laundreſs living in Holywell, in the North Suburb of Oxon; but his mind being altered as to thoſe matters after the reſtoration of his Majeſty King Charles II, he was made Fellow of his College in 1663. But we have a little different account of the conduct of our Divine before the reſtoration in the life of him publiſhed by Thomas Watts, A. M. in 1714. p. 6, and 7. where we are informed, that "he was providentially bleſſed in ſome orthodox "and loyal inſtructors, ſuch as ſecured him from "the general contagion. So early, even then, did "he imbibe the ſound principles of our pure and "undefiled religion, that kept him unſpotted from "the world. However, he fell into ſome dangerous "hands at ſchool and the univerſity, and lay under "many temptations, where the leavens of error and "hypocriſy prevailed. And tho' in his childhood he "could not be ſenſible of the moſt aſtoniſhing tragical act in the Royal Martyr's fall; yet every year, "as he grew up, preſented ſuch horrid ſcenes before "him, that he could not but receive the proper antidote in his youth, and dread the villanies of that "age, till the glorious Reſtoration-Day, which fixed "him in all good principles, and made him always "zealous for our excellent conſtitution both in Church "and State. Beſides, as it pleaſed God to endow him "with a moſt compaſſionate good nature, a very "ſtudious humble mind, and modeſt behaviour, as "with all virtuous inclinations and ſpecial graces; "ſo he could never be ſo much as tainted with ill "notions of any kind, nor ever be drawn into the "party of any furious zealots, libertines, &c. whom "he wanted not ſpirit to oppoſe upon all due occaſions, and in proper ſeaſons throughout his life, "which diſtinguiſhed him even in the Country-"School, but more eminently in Brazen-Noſe-College, "Oxon, &c."

He ſucceeded Dr. Benjamin Parry in the Prebend of Knareſburgh in the Church of York in February following (g). He ſerved his Patron as Chaplain both in Ireland and England, modeſtly declining all preferment. In 1674 he publiſhed at London his Caſes of Scandal and Perſecution [C], in which he expreſſed a warm zeal both againſt the Papiſts and the Diſſenters from the eſtabliſhed church. and convincing reaſons of, I. That wiſe and learned King James and his Privy Council, anno Reg. 2do. II. The honourable Houſe of Commons aſſembled in this preſent Parliament in their Votes &c. Febr. the 25th 1662. III. The Preſbyterian Miniſters in the city of London met at Sion College, Decem. the 18th 1645. IV. Twenty eminent Divines, moſt (if not all) of them members of the late aſſembly, in their Sermons before the Two Houſes of Parliament on ſolemn occaſions. Faithfully collected by a very moderate hand, and humbly preſented to the ſerious conſideration of all diſſenting parties. In the next page are ſet down the names of the eminent Non-conformiſt Divines, whoſe teſtimonies are cited; which are added again at the end of his Preface, and the beginning of his Collection; and likewiſe in the concluſion of his ſecond Edition of this Book, which he publiſhed at Oxford the ſame year, containing eighty ſix pages in 4to with his name prefixed to it, and the Pro-Vice-Chancellor of Oxford's Imprimatur before it. The title was the ſame with the former, with this addition to it; faithfully collected by William Aſheton Maſter of Arts, and Fellow of Brazen-Noſe-College in Oxford. The ſecond Edition corrected and enlarged, with an additional Preface, wherein the nature of perſecution in general, and the unjuſt complaints of the diſſenting parties concerning it in particular, are diſtinctly conſidered, But the former Preface is likewiſe added, with this advertiſement before it: There are ſome paſſages (particularly page two and four) will ſeem impertinent till the Reader is informed, that in the firſt Edition the Author's name (for reaſons beſt known to ſome, whoſe judgment he highly values) was concealed, but is now (by the ſame advice) prefixed. He addreſſes himſelf to the Diſſenters, and vindicates himſelf from their cenſures, ſhewing the occaſion of this work; how he became diſſatisfied about Toleration, which he liked at firſt, but now endeavours to prove impracticable by their petitioners for it, whom he could not find intelligible in their Propoſals, and whom he attempts to confute from the teſtimonies of their own friends againſt Toleration, whoſe names he ſets down as follows: Dr. Cornelius Burgeſſe, Mr. John Ward, Mr. Will. Good, Mr. Tho. Thorowgood, Mr. Humphry Hardwich, Mr. Arthur Salway, Mr. William Reynor, Mr. Thomas Caſe, Mr. John Lightfoot, Mr. Thomas Watſon, Mr. George Hughes, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Mr. Richard Baxter, Mr. Thomas Horton, Mr. Lazarus Seaman, Mr. Matthew Newcomen, Mr. Richard Vines, Mr. Simeon Aſh, Mr. James Cranford, Mr. Thomas Edwards. Our Author has added a few marginal notes to his Collections, and concludes his Book with ſeveral reflections, which ariſe from the premiſes (2). Mr. Wood informs us (3), that there was an Edition of this piece printed without the Author's knowledge at London.

[C] His caſes of ſcandal and perſecution.] This Book was dedicated to the Duke of Ormond, and intitled, The caſes of Scandal and Perſecution, being a ſeaſonable enquiry into theſe two things: I. Whether the Non-Conformiſts, who otherwiſe think Subſcription lawful, are therefore obliged to forbear it, becauſe the weak Brethren do judge it unlawful? II. Whether the execution of Penal Laws upon Diſſenters for Non-Communion with the Church of England, be perſecution? Wherein they are pathetically exhorted to return into the boſom of the Church, the likelieſt expedient to ſtop the growth of Popery. By William Aſheton, D. D. Domeſtic Chaplain to his Grace the Duke of Ormond. He mentions in his Dedication and Introduction the reaſons, which induced him to the publication of this Treatiſe; as particularly Compaſſion to their deluded Proſelytes; and ſecondly, a due Care, as he tells us, of our own people, to ſecure them as far as poſſible, from the inſinuating arts of ſuch as lie in wait to deceive. He proceeds in his Introduction to enquire into the cauſes of the encreaſe of Popery; and expreſſes himſelf in this manner. The late, and I think, juſt apprehenſions of the growth of Popery having awakened authority into ſome ſeaſonable endeavours for ſuppreſſing it, the Clergy of this nation have thought themſelves obliged both in preſs and pulpit to encourage ſo good a work. For tho' our people are ſo highly prejudiced againſt her doctrine, that many of them know no other rule, whereby to judge of the ſoundneſs of their Tenets, than by the greater or leſſer diſtance they have from Popery; yet being deſirous that Religion ſhould be the object of their choice, not chance, and that the practice of it ſhould be grounded upon the clear evidence of truth and reaſon, as well as cuſtom and education, to which the greateſt part of mankind owe their particular perſuaſions; ſeveral Treatiſes have been lately written, wherein the Proteſtant Catholic Doctrine is fully eſtabliſhed, and the Romiſh objections or rather flouriſhes (for indeed they are no better) are as ſolidly anſwered; an undertaking not altogether ſo unſeaſonable as ſome perſons, who would be thought wiſer than their Brethren, are pleaſed to judge. He then tells us, that he had made a collection of ſome ſuitable materials againſt the Church of Rome, with a reſolution to reduce them into a proper form, and publiſh them as ſoon as poſſible, when he occaſionally met with the following of Dr. Sanderſon, Biſhop of Lichfield. Prudent Statiſts forbear to advance againſt a potent enemy abroad, till they have compoſed ſmaller quarrels and mutinies at home. We think it therefore more needful, ſeaſonable, and expedient to clear thoſe points in difference betwixt us and our Brethren at home, than to handle any of the controverſies in debate betwixt us and thoſe of Rome; both becauſe the people are in more danger of being miſled by thoſe, than of being ſeduced by Papiſts; and becauſe the Papiſts make a great advantage (indeed the greateſt, and in a manner the whole advantage they have againſt us) of theſe home-bred differences. He then ſtates the caſe of Scandal, and the miſtakes therein, in a full objection about giving offence, to which he anſwers; firſt, from their own admired Mr. Baxter's Cure of Church Diviſions, p. 113. and ſecondly, from our great and learned Hooker, Eccleſiaſtical Polity, p. 115. and Biſhop Sanderſon in his Five Caſes of Conſcience, p. 111; proving how many ways a man may become guilty of ſcandalizing another by his example; as the former denotes how men are ſcandalized, when they are moved, led, or provoked unto ſin. Wherein we are not ſo much to look at the event, what that is or may be, as the cauſe whence it cometh; for no man is concerned in any ſcandal that happeneth to another by occaſion of any thing done by him; neither is chargeable further with it, than he is guilty of having given it. From theſe authorities, Dr. Aſheton argues for the Subſcription and Conformity of thoſe Diſſenters, who thought it neither ſinful nor unlawful. Theſe were the points in diſpute at that time, which he further preſſes upon their conſciences, both from Mr. Baxter again in his Prince of Love, p. 87, and Mr. Jeans's Mixture of Scholaſtic and practical Divinity, 2d part, page 133, 135; from whoſe words, continues our Author, " it appears, that my Brethren " are not eo nomine obliged to neglect Conformity, be- " cauſe their Proſelytes may think fit to be offended " at them; but only (according to the Biſhop's fourth " rule)

Apology [D], in defence of the doctrine of abſolute ſubmiſſion to Kings. This book of his expoſed him to the cenſures of two parties, one of which reproached him for carrying his notions of the power of Kings too high; and the other, for his conduct afterwards under the Revolution (k). To juſtify himſelf from the imputations of the latter, he wrote a piece in defence of King William and Queen Mary under the title of A ſeaſonable

" rule) they are ſo to manage their ſubmiſſion to " the Church with ſuch Chriſtian Deportment, where- " by it may appear to others as well as themſelves, " that Conſcience, not Intereſt, hath occaſioned their " Subſcription." He proceeds next to prove the Non-Conformiſt highly guilty of ſcandal by this Syllogiſm; Men are ſcandalized, when they are led, moved, or provoked nuto ſin. But the Non-Conformiſts by their ſeparation do lead, move, and provoke their Proſelytes to ſin. Therefore they are beyond excuſe guilty of ſin. The major of theſe propoſitions he is certain will be readily granted him; and the minor admits of this ſad Confirmation. " The " Non-Conformiſts do provoke their Proſelytes to ſin " theſe two ways. Firſt, by error in judgment. Se- " condly, by occaſioning them to neglect their duty " in Praxi." He then concludes his proofs by deſiring every impartial Reader to judge between the Church of England and the Diſſenters. Theſe men pretend they cannot lawfully and with a good conſcience ſubmit to the conſtitutions of the Church. But why all this niceneſs? Is there any law either natural or poſitive, which doth either directly and in terminis, or by good Logical inference and immediate deduction, condemn any of them as unlawful? If ſo, let ſuch law be produced, and the controverſy is at an end. But they have been ſo infinitely baffled in ſuch vain attempts, that this procedure of late hath not been much pretended, but inſtead of ſuch plain and candid entertainment, we have been ſhuffled off with the empty pretences of an accidental unlawfulneſs, ariſing from the diſſatisfaction of their Proſelytes, who yet imbibed thoſe ſcruples from the repeated clamours of their diſſenting Teachers. He conſiders next, the Caſe of Perſecution, and repeats the ſame anſwer, which he ſays was never yet refuted, that he gave in the Preface to his ſecond Edition of Toleration diſapproved, p. 4. in which, after having exploded the falſe, vulgar, and dangerous conceit of men's learning and piety, or holding their perſons in admiration, and proved the moderation and ſincerity of our firſt Reformers from Popery, he proceeds to fix the notion of perſecution, as it is an eager, violent, or any inflicting of outward evils for the exerciſe of true Religion; and ſums up the argument in this manner. Preaching and Prayer are neceſſary duties, which cannot be performed without circumſtances. Theſe are determined in Scripture, nor muſt be left undetermined therefore by the ſupreme Magiſtrate: who to effect this makes laws and conſtitutions, that have penalties annexed to be inflicted on the diſobedient. The infliction of theſe penalties is the execution of juſtice and the Magiſtrate's duty, but no perſecution. Therefore thoſe perſons, that ſuffer theſe penalties, are not injuriouſly perſecuted, but juſtly puniſhed. From hence he endeavours to prove, as well as from the judgment of Biſhop Sanderſon in his 7th Sermon ad populum, p. 354 and from the arguments of their own famous Calamy, Newcomen, and Baxter, that the Diſſenters from the Church of England have never ſuffered any perſecution, ſince they were the aggreſſors. This he partly inſinuates, by reminding them of other ſorts of perſecution with St. Auſtin De Unit. Eccleſ. contra Petil. Epiſt. c. 17. who obſerves that there is a perſecution of the tongue and of an irregular life, as well as of the hand: Gravius perſequitur filius patrem malè vivendo, quam pater filium caſtigando; & gravius ancilla Saram perſequuta eſt per iniquam ſuperbiam, quam eam Sara per debitam diſciplinam; & gravius Dominum perſequebantur, propter quos dictum eſt, Zelus domus tuæ comedit me, quam eos ipſe, cum eorum menſas everſit, & eos de flagello de templo expulit. i. e. " A ſon perſecutes " the father more by his ill life, than the father does " the ſon by chaſtiſing him. The ſervant Hagar per- " ſecuted Sarah more with her unreaſonable haughti- " neſs, than Sarah did Hagar with the diſcipline, " which was requiſite towards her. And theſe per- " ſons, upon whoſe account it was ſaid, The zeal of " thy houſe hath eaten me up, perſecuted our Lord " much more, than he did them, when he over-turn'd " their tables, and drove them out of the Temple." To this Piece our Author has ſubjoined the following poſtſcript. A Proteſtant Gentlewoman being married to a Roman Catholic, was highly ſollicitous (and her charity is very commendable) about her eternal State. Whereupon ſhe applied herſelf for ſatisfaction to ſome Preſbyterian Divines, (which party ſhe then much favoured,) who amongſt ſome other unſuitable diſcourſes moſt undutifully reflected upon the Church of England, calling her Ceremonies Popiſh and ſuperſtitious, telling this Gentlewoman, that a ſet-form of Prayer was Popiſh; particularly, that our Liturgy is Popiſh, and taken out of the Maſs-Book. Whereupon having peruſed the ſervice of the Church, (which formerly either out of prejudice, or the direction of thoſe guides, ſhe wholly neglected,) ſhe is now fully ſatisfied, that there is nothing contained in it, but what is ſound, orthodox, and agreeable to Holy Scripture; and therefore, if that be Popery, ſhe thought it moſt rational to be a Papiſt; and accordingly (being quite wearied and even diſtracted with their impertinent diſcourſes) embracing the Roman, hath ever ſince refuſed the Proteſtant Communion. " This matter of fact, con- " tinues he, (which is no feigned but a real caſe) doth " make it more reaſonable to tranſcribe the words " of the learned Biſhop Sanderſon, relating to our an- " ti-ceremonial Brethren, and their falſe imputations " of Popiſh and Popery; whereof he gives the true " definitions, and ſhews how far any doctrine or prac- " tice may be truly called Popiſh, vindicating the " Reformation of our Church from it, in Pref. Serm. " XIV. 9. 14. and Preface before Serm. XX. 8. 11. " and again in his Preface before Serm. XIV. 8. 17. " and at laſt referring the Reader to that clear and " ſatisfactory account given by the Church in one of " the Prefaces uſually prefixed before the Book of Com- " mon-Prayer."

[D] His Royal Apology.] The whole title is as follows: The Royal Apology; or an Anſwer to the Rebels-Plea; wherein are the moſt noted anti-monarchical Tenents: Firſt, publiſhed by Doleman the Jeſuit to promote a Bill of Excluſion againſt King James I. Secondly, practiſed by Bradſhaw and the Regicides, in the actual murder of King Charles I. Thirdly, republiſhed by Sidney and the Aſſociators to depoſe and murder his preſent Majeſty. The ſecond Edition. London 1685. In his Preface he obſerves, that in the year 1594 the Jeſuit Parſons publiſhed a Conference under the name of Doleman; the deſign of which was to promote a Bill of Excluſion againſt King James I; and that tho' the Jeſuit's malice was defeated with regard to the perſon of that King, yet it had a great effect in the ſufferings of his ſon King Charles I; for he who ſhall peruſe the many virulent Libels, which firſt occaſioned and then fomented that unnatural rebellion, will eaſily be inſtructed how that conference was tranſcribed and tranſpoſed by the patrons of the faction; and, to ſpeak in our modern language, he cannot but obſerve, that the Popiſh Doleman is the Oracle of the true Proteſtant Party. " Now that this may not be rejected as a " ſlandering deſign, only to make them odious to " authority, as is commonly objected, I have here " drawn for the reader's ſatisfaction a ſhort parallel " between Doleman, Bradſhaw, Sidney, and ſome " others; upon peruſal of which it will plainly ap- " pear, that the Jeſuits principles, as managed by " Bradſhaw and the Regicides, did cut off the head " of King Charles I. And ſince the ſame principles " have been tranſcribed by the brethren of the As- " ſociation, we have juſt reaſon to ſuſpect the ſame " practices likewiſe; and that thoſe, who defended " the murder of King Charles I, would doubtleſs, if " they had power in their hands, depoſe and murder " King Charles II. If any Republican ſhall think " fit to doubt, that the following Diſcourſe is either " partial or unconcluding; i. e. that I have either ſaid " ſomething that is falſe, or elſe have omitted in any " inſtance the very ſtrength of their caſe, let him " make known his grievance; and I do here pro- " miſe upon ſuch notice given, I will (thro' Divine

" Aſſiſtance) endeavour his ſatisfaction." Our Author endeavours in this Treatiſe to ſhew, that the Government of England is not a mixed Monarchy, nor the King one of the three Eſtates; and in what ſenſe the King of England is an abſolute Monarch, and how limited. He proceeds then to conſider in what ſenſe that celebrated ſaying of Bracton, Lex facit Regem; i. e. " The Law makes the King," is to be underſtood, and to examine the other controverted paſſage, Rex habet Superiorem, Deum & Legem, etiam & Curiam; i. e. " The King has ſuperior to him God " and the Law, and likewiſe the Court." He conſiders alſo the nature of the coronation-oath, and the extent of the King's prerogative; and concludes his Diſcourſe with the following argument: The ſupream power muſt not be reſiſted. But the King of England hath ſupream power. Therefore his Majeſty cannot be reſiſted. The propoſition is the voice of nature; there can be no order nor government, unleſs this truth be admitted. Reaſon tells us, Par in parem non habet poteſtatem; much leſs hath an inferior a coercive power over his ſuperior.

[E] He wrote a piece in defence of King William and Queen Mary under the title of A ſeaſonable Vindication of their preſent Majeſties.] He was reproached at the Revolution for having deſerted his own declared principles in point of Government; and therefore he wrote this piece in his own defence, in which, as the Author of his Life obſerves (3), he publiſhed his own convictions for the ſatisfaction of others, who might, as he did, ſwear allegiance to King William and Queen Mary with a good conſcience, upon the ſurprizing merciful deliverance of theſe Kingdoms from Popery and Arbitrary Power. His chief argument was drawn from the Statute of the 25th of Edward III; with Sir Edward Coke's Expoſition of that Statute concerning the Kings de facto & de jure. He obſerves likewiſe, that this is not only the ſingle Gloſs of Sir Edward Coke, but that all others, who write of the Pleas of the Crown, give the ſame expoſition. And therefore ſince it is moſt reaſonable to think that to be the ſenſe of the Law, which learned Lawyers and Judges have agreed to be the ſenſe of it, private perſons, who are of a different opinion, ſhould be modeſt in their cenſures, and ſuſpect their own judgments, and reſt ſatisfied, that there is ſome weighty reaſon, (tho' perhaps their prejudice will not yet ſuffer them to comprehend it,) why thoſe Judges of the Law determine in this manner.

[F] He always declared himſelf averſe to the engaging abſolutely in any party.] The Author of his Life tells us (4), that he had obſerved enough of the intrigues of Courts, of the plots of Cities and deluſions of Countries; that he ſaw too much in every reign both of Popiſh and Diſſenting Parties in the bowels of the Church; he knew the madneſs of the people; and how deſigning men can ſeduce them to proclaim hoſannas at one time, and demand crucifixion at another. He ſaw the mean ſelfiſhneſs, ambition, and violence of the beſt parties; which gave him the ſame idea of parties in general, and conſequently the precautions recommended by Archbiſhop Dawes in his Sermon upon the Martyrdom of King Charles I, that we ought to take care not to liſt ourſelves, as thorough members of any party. However, as the Author quoted obſerves (5), he was averſe to all innovations and alterations in the Liturgy, unleſs for improvement, as in the Office for the Sick, &c. imagining all other condeſcenſions to be vain and dangerous, and that the chief Diſſenters would never conform but at the expence of Epiſcopacy.

(5) Pag. 41.

[G] Exerted himſelf with great zeal in oppoſition to Popery by four Tracts, which he publiſhed.] He firſt publiſhed in 1686 The Country Parſon's Admonition to his Pariſhioners againſt Popery; with Directions how to behave themſelves when any one deſigns to ſeduce them from the Church of England. He obſerves here the reſtleſs importunity of the Romiſh Clergy to gain proſelytes to their Church, and that they have different terms of addreſs, very plauſible and inſinuating, adapted to the capacities of all ſorts of people; and therefore that they may not be ſurprized with their clamours, nor impoſed upon by their methods of deceit, he gives his people the following directions; 1. To ſhew their faith by their works; 2. A modeſt dependance on their ſpiritual Guides or their miniſterial Functions; 3. To avoid, as far as poſſible, all diſputes about Religion; 4. To deſire the arguments of the perſon, who attempts to pervert them, in writing; which if he refuſes, they are to ſuſpect him as an impoſtor; but if he grants them, to carry the paper to their Miniſter. This piece was followed the next year with a Defence againſt a Popiſh Tract called The plain man's Anſwer to his general and ſpecial Exceptions. This Defence of his was entitled The plain man's Reply to the Catholic Miſſionaries, &c; in which he tells us, that he found their arguments weak and trifling, only full of boaſting and pretenſions to Infallibility in the Church and Prieſts of Rome above any other; tho' there is greater uncertainty, more diviſions and diverſity of opinions, even in matters of faith, in their own Church, than ours; and their Prieſts are ſo far from interpreting Scripture infallibly, that there is nothing more fallible and contradicting than the vaſt volumes of Popiſh Commentators, publiſhed with the uſual approbations and permiſſu Superiorum. He concludes with an Expoſtulation with the Miſſionary, whom he engaged more cloſely the year following in a Diſcourſe againſt the Infallibility of the Church. He addreſſed it to the Romiſh Miſſionaries. He examines what this Infallibility ſignifies, whether in the firſt place Indefectibility or Duration, which he proves neither to be true nor ſufficient, nor anſwering thoſe ends, for which this privilege is pretended, if they could apply all the promiſes of protection and preſervation to the Roman Church, as if it were the Catholick Church. But this he ſhews to be a miſtake in their Writers, without any ſhadow of proof, ſince it is evident, that a particular cannot be an univerſal; and no Church can be termed Catholick, but ſo far as it is orthodox, and holds the Catholick Faith, as the Church of England does. He proceeds then to examine their other notion of Infallibility, as the infallible direction of the Church of Rome, as if they had an infallible Judge among them, which they imagine to be neceſſary in order to interpret the Scriptures, and determine controverſies. Upon this he demands, Who is the infallible Judge? Who this unerring Guide? Where may he be found to be conſulted and followed? Is he ſome authorized perſon or perſons repreſenting the whole Body? Then he muſt be either the Pope, which the moſt ſober and learned Papiſts uſually reject, as a weak and ungrounded opinion: Or they agree ſecondly in a General Council, tho' there be none now ſitting in any part of the Chriſtian World; and thoſe that have been, and confirmed by their Popes, have actually erred, have condemned each other, and made contradictory Definitions and Decrees, which cannot determine themſelves, nor explain their own meaning; a privilege (if granted to any writing) moſt peculiar to the Holy Scriptures, as written by infallible Inſpiration. In this manner he endeavours to explode their pretended Infallibility, and in the concluſion demands again, " What it ſignifies, " whence they had it, or where we Proteſtants, who " are ſo much upbraided with the want of it, may " find it? What controverſies it hath decided? What " texts of Scripture hath it explained? What diffe- " rences hath it compoſed?" In 1688 he publiſhed A full Defence of the former Diſcourſe againſt the Miſſionaries Anſwer. Being a further examination of the pretended Infallibility of the Church of Rome, or as it is intitled in the firſt impreſſion, A Defence of the plain Man's Reply to the Catholick Miſſionaries, &c. He prefaces this Book with an Advertiſement concerning blaſphemy, ſwearing and curſing, perjuries, drunkenneſs and prophanation of the Lord's Day, he wrote ſeveral pieces in order to ſtop the courſe of debauchery and prophaneneſs [H]. In 1695 he publiſhed the firſt part of his Conference with an Anabaptiſt [I], occaſioned by a diſpute which he was challenged to by one of the Teachers of that denomination of Diſſenters, who had a meeting in his pariſh, but afterwards broke it up, and did not provoke him to a ſecond part (m). This induced him to return from controverſial Divinity to the more agreeable and uſeful part of it, which relates to practice; upon which in 1696 he formed a treatiſe from a Sermon which he had preached at court before the late Queen Mary, and dedicated it to her Royal Conſort, with the title of A Diſcourſe concerning a Death-bed Repentance [K]. The ſame year he publiſhed A Theological Diſcourſe of Laſt Wills and Teſtaments [L]. The controverſy with the Socinians being afterwards

cerning the occaſion of theſe papers, which paſſed between a Romiſh Miſſionary and Country Miniſter, on account of an honeſt Farmer of his pariſh, whom a Romiſh Prieſt endeavoured to pervert with this ſuggeſtion, that, as without faith there is no ſalvation, ſo without infallibility there is no faith; and that this is only to be found in the Church of Rome; for which the former demanded his proofs in writing, and then carried them to his Miniſter, which occaſioned the whole diſpute. Our Doctor enlarges againſt the Infallibility and Supremacy of the Pope, and anſwers all their preſumptions of Catholiciſm, and pretences to a Succeſſion of St. Peter, as Prince of the Apoſtles, clearing the ſeveral prophecies and promiſes in Scripture concerning the Jewiſh and Chriſtian Church, without their Infallibility, referring them to Dr. Cave's Diſſertation of the Government of the ancient Church; and to Archbiſhop Bramhal for the exemption of the Britiſh Churches from all foreign juriſdiction; as likewiſe to Dr. Barrow's Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy. This Supremacy he obſerves is oppoſed by the greateſt part of the Catholick Church or company of Believers profeſſing the faith of Chriſt diſperſed over the face of the whole world, who refuſe communion with the Biſhop of Rome, and proteſt againſt his uſurpations and errors. He remarks, that they urge their claims of Infallibility with a kind of Diffidence and caution, and can never find even their laſt refuge, in a General Council, of an unerring Guide, as they have no ſuch Judge now in being. He ſhews likewiſe the preſumption of General Councils in their Decrees, and particularly that of the Councils of Conſtance and Trent in denying the Cup to the Laity, notwithſtanding our Saviour's poſitive command. Altho' our Redeemer hath inſtituted the Sacrament in his laſt Supper, and delivered it unto the Apoſtles in both kinds; yet the Synod hath decreed that it ſhould be received for a Law, that the Sacrament be adminiſtred in one kind; and whoſoever ſhall ſay, that by the command of God all the faithful ought to receive in both kinds, let him be accurſed. Concil. [H] He wrote ſeveral Tracts, in order to ſtop the courſe of debauchery and profaneneſs.] He publiſhed in 1695 A ſhort Diſcourſe againſt Blaſphemy, being a conference with M. S. concerning 1. The Rudeneſs of Atheiſtical Diſcourſe. 2. The Certainty and Eternity of Hell Torments. 3. The Truth and Authority of the Holy Scriptures. This piece was occaſioned by a profane diſcourſe of a perſon, whom he met with at a Gentleman's Table. In 1692 he publiſhed A Diſcourſe againſt Drunkenneſs; and another againſt Swearing and Curſing; which he ſhews to be 1. rude and boiſterous in reſpect of men; 2. daring and provoking in reſpect to God; 3. vain and unprofitable with reſpect to themſelves. In 1693 he publiſhed Directions in order to the ſuppreſſing of debauchery and profaneneſs; in which he obſerves, "that tho' there are large complaints "againſt the debauchery of the preſent Age; yet "bleſſed be God, wickedneſs is ſo far from being "eſtabliſhed by a Law, that the ſtricteſt legal me"thods are employed to reſtrain it. Their Majeſties "do not only diſcountenance vice by the virtuous "example of their own ſacred perſons, but alſo by "their authority in the letters, proclamations, and "repeated orders, iſſued thereupon. But, quid Leges "ſine Moribus? The beſt conſtituted Laws will be of "no uſe without a due execution. If the penalties of "our Laws, thro' the cowardice or contrivance of "inferior Magiſtrates, ſhall not be inflicted, offenders "will ſoon be inſolent, but never reformed. This "very conſideration hath awakened the zeal of ma"ny pious men, who, out of a ſenſe of their duty "to God and their Country, are deſigning a method to "reform theſe abuſes." Our Author means here the Society for the Reformation of Manners, whom he admoniſhes of their duty in four inſtances, innocency, induſtry, courage, and caution; with regard to the laſt of which particulars he adviſes them to avoid popularity, and not value themſelves upon the character of Reformers; and to avoid affectations in their language, looks, &c. to be moderate in their proceedings, and not raſh and violent in their methods of Reformation; and to be unanimous, and not ſuffer their difference in opinion to diſorder their proceedings. This he obſerves in particular reference to thoſe of the Church of England and the Diſſenters, both joining in ſo good a work; as there are good men of all perſuaſions, whoſe diviſions and diſtinctions he laments, and concludes his addreſs to them in theſe words: It were indeed heartily to be wiſhed, that theſe diſtinguiſhing names were utterly aboliſhed, that all Proteſtants were perfectly united, and that ſuch an expedient could be found, as might effectually do it. We hope and breath for it.

[I] His conference with an Anabaptiſt.] It is intitled, A Conference with an Anabaptiſt. Part I. Concerning the Subject of Baptiſm. This Book he dedicated to his Pariſhioners at Beckenham; and obſerves in it, that the pretence of the Anabaptiſts to an expreſs command is impertinent and unreaſonable, and grounded upon a falſe principle, that nothing ought to be done in the worſhip of God without expreſs command in Scripture; which principle he ſhews to be contradicted by their own practice in three inſtances, obſervation of the Lord's day, taking an oath, and communicating women. He endeavours to ſhew likewiſe, that tho' there is no expreſs command, yet there is a virtual, implicit, and conſequential one; and that the Anabaptiſts acknowledge this to be ſufficient. He obſerves likewiſe that the Baptiſm of infants is proved from their Church-Membership, the notion of which he explains.

[K] A Diſcourſe concerning a Death-bed Repentance.] He obſerves in this Diſcourſe, that the ſoul is immortal, and ſhall be eternally either happy or miſerable; and that this life is the only time to prepare ourſelves for our future ſtate. He explains what is meant by a Death-bed Repentance; and remarks, that wicked men, when they come to die, may remember their ſins, and be ſorry and beg pardon for them, with ſerious reſolutions of amendment, and even make reſtitution; yet all this may fall ſhort of a real repentance.

[L] A Theological Diſcourſe of laſt Wills and Teſtaments.] He dedicated this Diſcourſe to the Duke of Ormond; in which he gives the following directions, that men ſhould make their Wills in their health, with a Chriſtian and charitable temper, with prudence, and juſtice in making reſtitution for injuries, which they have done. He excites the Clergy likewiſe to urge the ſick perſon to be liberal to the poor, and confutes the pleas and pretences made uſe of to excuſe the neglect of charitable diſtributions, as particularly that charity is Popiſh; that the Laws have provided for the poor; that our circumſtances will not admit of it; that the objects are ſo numerous, that we may give away our whole eſtate; that we deſign to remember the poor when we die: that charity is often abuſed, and legacies perverted. He recommends terwards warmly agitated, he publiſhed two Treatiſes in oppoſition to their ſchemes [M], and about the ſame time he wrote a practical piece intitled The Plain Man's Devotion, Part I. In 1698 he brought to perfection the ſcheme which he had formed for the benefit not only of Clergymens widows, as it was at firſt deſigned, but of all ranks and profeſſions, by ſettled jointures and annuities at the rate of 30 per cent. which ſcheme we ſhall give an account of in the note [N]. He was far from having a view to his own intereſt in this affair, ſince he was at a conſiderable expence in bringing it to perfection (n). In 1699 December the fifth he preached a Sermon before the ſons of the Clergy at St. Paul's [O]; and November the 21ſt the year following before the Society of the Natives of the county of Kent at St. Mary Le Bow in London [P]. In 1701 he publiſhed the

in a particular manner the poor widows and children of Clergymen, and gives an abſtract of the Charter for relief of them.

[M] Publiſhed two Treatiſes in oppoſition to their ſcheme.] He publiſhed the firſt in 1697 under the title of A ſeaſonable Vindication of the Bleſſed Trinity. Being an anſwer to this queſtion, Why do you believe the Doctrine of the Trinity? Collected from the works of the moſt Reverend Dr. John Tillotſon, late Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Right Reverend Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, now Lord Biſhop of Worceſter. In this Tract he endeavours to ſhew, that the doctrine of the Trinity is a very rational doctrine, and to explain what is meant by the word Trinity, and what doctrines concerning it are propoſed to our Belief; what is faith or belief in general; why we believe the Doctrine of the Trinity; and how it can be proved, that God hath revealed it. He proceeds then to anſwer the objections, which are urged againſt it. The year following he publiſhed another ſmall Collection from Dr. Iſaac Barrow, intitled A brief State of the Socinian Controverſy concerning a Trinity in Unity. He concludes, that the proper employment of our minds about theſe myſteries, is not to ſearch and ſpeculate into them, or to diſcourſe elegantly and boldly about them, but with a pious ſubmiſſion to embrace and adore them.

[N] Which ſcheme we ſhall give an account of in the note] We ſhall extract this from a Book printed at London in 1713, intitled A full Account of the Riſe, Progreſs, and Advantages of Dr. Aſſheton's Propoſal (as now improved and managed by the worſhipful Company of Mercers, London,) for the benefit of widows of Clergymen and others, by ſettled jointures and annuities at the rate of thirty per Cent. With Directions for the widow how to receive her annuity without any delay, charges, or deductions. Plead for the widow. Iſa. i. 17. The Advertiſement informs us, that this propoſal being firſt projected for the benefit of thoſe who have ſmall eſtates, the words poverty and poor ſometimes occur in the explication of it, and therefore that perſons of honour and quality may not be prejudiced againſt it, as if it nothing concerned them, they may be informed, that this propoſal, as now modelled and improved, may be ſerviceable to thoſe of quality and eſtate; 1. by enabling them to ſettle or enlarge jointures without clogging their eſtates; 2. by encouraging them to demand larger portions, than otherwiſe without the help of this propoſal they could rationally expect. The ſettling of this exerciſed Dr. Aſſheton's thoughts for many years. For tho' he was aſſured by ſeveral judicious perſons, that the deſign was practicable, yet where to fix it, or how to provide ſuch a fund as might ſecure the ſubſcribers, was the difficulty. As to himſelf, he was fully convinced not only of the trouble and charge in managing ſuch a work, but alſo the hazard to his reputation, if it ſhould not ſucceed. For the generality of men are very unjuſt in their cenſures, and will allow nothing to be well deſigned, that ſhall want ſucceſs. However he reſolved to proceed, and, if poſſible, to finiſh what he had ſo long projected. His firſt addreſs was to the Corporation of the Clergy, who received him with great reſpect, but declared that they were not capable of accepting his propoſal. His next application was to the Royal Bank of England, which likewiſe refuſed it; upon which he applied to the Mercer's Company, who agreed with him upon certain orders and rules, with ſubſequent conceſſions; of which the moſt remarkable are as follows: That the Company will not take in ſubſcriptions beyond the ſum of a hundred thouſand pounds; that all married men not exceeding the age of thirty years or under may ſubſcribe any ſum not exceeding one thouſand pounds: that all married men not exceeding the age of forty years may ſubſcribe any ſum not exceeding five hundred pounds: and that all married men not exceeding the age of ſixty years, may ſubſcribe any ſum not exceeding three hundred pounds. And that the widows of all perſons ſubſcribing according to theſe limitations ſhall receive the benefit of thirty pounds per Cent per annum free of all taxes and charges, at the two uſual feaſts of the Annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary and St. Michael the Archangel; and that the firſt of theſe payments ſhall be made at the firſt of the ſaid Feaſt-days, which ſhall happen four months or more after the deceaſe of the perſon or perſons ſo ſubſcribing; excepting ſuch as ſhall voluntarily make away themſelves, or by any act of theirs occaſion their own death either by duelling or committing any crime, whereby they ſhall be ſentenced and put to death by juſtice. In any or either of thoſe caſes, the widows to receive no annuity; but upon delivering up the Company's Bond, to have the ſubſcription-money paid to them. 3. That no ſea-faring men may ſubſcribe, who follow it as their buſineſs or vocation; nor others, who go farther than Holland, Ireland, or the Coaſts of England; and that any perſon may ſubſcribe for any others, whom he ſhall nominate in his laſt Will, during the natural life of his wife, if ſhe ſurvive, and his intention be declared in his ſubſcription.

[O] A Sermon before the Sons of the Clergy at St. Paul's.] In the Dedication of this Sermon to Sir Nathan Wright and the other Stewards of the Feaſt of the Sons of the Clergy, he declares his ſatisfaction, that one chief deſign in compoſing that Sermon was ſo acceptable to them, viz. the promoting a general ſubſcription for the relief of the poor widows and children of Clergymen. Having obſerved, ſays he, that ſeveral other Orders and Profeſſions do maintain their own poor, I thought it ſeaſonable to remind you, that it is at leaſt decent, to ſay no more, that the Clergy likewiſe ſhould attempt the ſame; and I have great cauſe to hope, with a little application, the thing will be found very practicable. For if every Clergyman, whoſe preferment is two hundred pounds per annum, would ſubſcribe ten ſhillings yearly; if he who hath one hundred pounds per annum, would ſubſcribe five ſhillings yearly; this, I am confident, would anſwer the expectation. The Text of his Sermon is from Eccleſ. ix. 10. Whatſoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wiſdom in the grave, whither thou goeſt. He ſhews, that our great work in this world is to adorn our ſouls with thoſe divine virtues and graces, whereby we are made like unto, and qualified for, the converſation of good Beings in another world; and to employ our talents for the benefit of others. He obſerves then, that the deſign of that day's ſolemnity was to honour and own their profeſſion; and to relieve and provide for poor dependants, both widows and orphans. And this charity he urges by ſeveral important motives.

[P] Before the ſociety of the natives of the County of Kent at St. Mary le Bow in London.] His text was, 1 Corinth. x. 31. Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatſoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. He ſhews firſt, that when God's wiſdom, power, mercy, and other attributes are acknowledged by any of our actions, then in Scripture language God is glorified; and that thoſe natural actions of eating and drinking may be done from theſe their own ends, the nouriſhing of our bodies, the refreſhing our ſpirits, and preſerving our health. He then proceeds to enlarge upon the reaſons the firſt Part of his Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm [Q]; and the year following Directions for Prayer [R]. The ſame year he printed a propoſal for a charity-fund to be ſettled in each dioceſe, and diſpoſed of by the Biſhop, &c. for the benefit of ſuch Clergymen as have ſmall preferments (o). In 1703 he publiſhed his Vindication of the Immortality of the Soul, and a Future State [S]. Having thus cleared the grounds of all religion, and fixed the hopes and principles of men upon the moſt ſolid foundation, he publiſhed in 1704 a Method of Devotion in times of Trouble and Affliction, collected chiefly out of the holy Scriptures and publick Offices of the Church; and the year following, A brief Exhortation to the holy Communion, with the Nature and Meaſures of Preparation concerning it, fitted to the meaneſt Capacities. It appears, that he believed this Sacrament to be an euchariſtical, repreſentative, and commemorative ſacrifice [T]. As devotion was the great Object of his mind he finiſhed his moſt conſiderable work of that kind in 1706, which he publiſhed under the title of A Method of Devotion for ſick and dying Perſons; with particular Directions from the beginning of Sickneſs to the hour of Death. In the ſame year he took occaſion from the remarkable ſtory of Mrs. Veale, who died at Dover, and was ſaid to have appeared to her friend Mrs. Bargrave at Canterbury, to publiſh his opinion of The Poſſibility of Apparitions [U]. After this he publiſhed ſome occaſional prayers from Biſhop Taylor, Biſhop Coſins, Biſhop Kenn, &c, and then a devout collection of Divine Hymns and Poems on ſeveral occaſions, printed at London in 1708. The year following he publiſhed a piece in oppoſition to the Rights of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted, &c. [W]; and in 1710 Directions for the Converſation of the Clergy;

reaſons of the preſent ſolemnity; which he ſhews to be, 1. to maintain friendſhip, by improving the underſtanding and rectifying the judgment; by regulating and compoſing the paſſions; and aſſiſting us in our uſeful deſigns, and relieving us in our wants: 2. To promote charity, from two conſiderations, as it is the beſt and ſureſt expedient to preſerve our eſtates in this life, and to ſecure a reward in the future.

[Q] His Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm.] The whole title is, An Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm. Part I. Containing an Explication of the preliminary queſtions and anſwers of the Apoſtle's Creed. He dedicated this to his pariſhioners of Beckenham. He obſerves in his Preface, that he has ſet down the proofs out of Scripture in the body of the Cathechiſm, in words at length; that he has divided the Expoſition into ſeveral Sections, ſeveral of which are not to be repeated by the children in Church; and that he has endeavoured, as far as the words of the Catechiſm gave him occaſion, to vindicate and explain the doctrine and diſcipline of the Church of England.

[R] Directions for Prayer.] This was the ſubſtance of a Sermon, occaſionally heard by one, who was a Diſſenter, but afterwards conformed to the Church of England, and publiſhed at his requeſt. He ſhews, that a ſet form of Prayer is both lawful and expedient, and diſcourſes concerning zeal and fervency in Prayer. In the firſt inſtance he obſerves, that our Saviour did both commend and practiſe a form of Prayer; and in the ſecond, that we ought to pray with an earneſt deſire, and yet with decency; with a fervent zeal, and yet without rudeneſs.

[S] His vindication of the Immortality of the Soul.] He dedicated this Book to the Duke of Ormond. In his Introduction he obſerves, that the chief cauſe of all the wickedneſs and profaneneſs, that abounds in the world, is the not believing, or not conſidering the Immortality of the Soul; and therefore for the ſatisfaction of thoſe, who are in doubt concerning this grand article of Religion, he endeavours a clear and full proof of it. He obſerves, that ſuch a kind of evidence is to be received in this point, as the nature of the thing will admit; and that in this diſpute the exiſtence of a God is to be pre-ſuppoſed. He explains then what is meant by the Soul, and what by the Immortality of it. He ſhews a future ſtate of exiſtence to be deſirable, poſſible, and probable; and this probability appears from the creation, providence, and the inclination and perfection of man's nature. That it is certain, tho' not with the certainty of ſenſe and experience, but that of faith, and confirmed by Scripture, and demonſtrated by the reſurrection and aſcenſion of our Saviour. He confutes likewiſe the notion of the ſleep of the Soul, from Phil. i. 21, 22, &c.

[T] He believed this Sacrament to be an euchariſtical, repreſentative, and commemorative ſacrifice.] The Author of his Life tells us (7), that he carefully read upon the ſubject of the Sacrament, Dr. Hickes and Dr. Hancock, Mr. Johnſon on the Chriſtian Oblation, Mr. Scandret, Mr. Leſly, and Mr. Nelſon on the Chriſtian Sacrifice; as before Mr. Mead and Dr. Cudworth, to whoſe notion he ſeem'd inclined. Yet he would not differ, nor have the peace of the Church troubled about words and names, which antiquity hath uſed, and might uſe in a lawful ſenſe. He believed this Sacrament to be an euchariſtical, a repreſentative and commemorative Sacrifice, and wiſhed that authority might order a credential, and the memorial or prayer of Oblation (as in the Liturgy of Edward VI) to be inſerted again in our Communion-Office.

(7) Pag. 125.

[U] His opinion of the poſſibility of apparitions.] It is an anſwer to this queſtion, Whether can departed ſouls, (ſouls ſeparated from their bodies) ſo appear, as to be viſibly ſeen and converſe here on earth? In this piece he ſhews, that there are ſpirits and incorporeal beings, as well as men, which none but a Sadducee or an Atheiſt will pretend to deny. And that there is an inviſible world, as well as a viſible one, is rational, and convincing. He obſerves, that there are ſpirits and immortal ſouls of the ſame nature with Angels, who are miniſtring ſpirits, and have often appeared in viſible forms. Human ſouls therefore, as well inclined, or divinely permitted for the good of others here, may appear in the like manner, tho' not reunited to their groſs terreſtrial bodies, but aſſuming certain ætherial ſhapes in reſemblance thereof, or airy vehicles, as Philoſophy calls them. He concludes from theſe conſiderations, that ſuch apparitions may be true, tho' we are not able to explain the manner of them. And tho' many of theſe reports have been mere impoſture and colluſion, or the impreſſions of fear, and a melancholy imagination; yet ſome of theſe appearances have been ſo publicly viſible, and ſo well atteſted, that if there is ſuch a thing as Fides Hiſtorica, and if we may believe a thing, which we ourſelves did not ſee, the truth of ſuch apparitions is not to be diſputed.

[W] A piece in oppoſition to the Rights of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted.] It is intitled, A ſeaſonable Vindication of the Clergy. Being an anſwer to ſome reflections in a late Book intitled, The Rights of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted, &c. Humbly ſubmitted to the ſerious conſideration of the nobility and gentry of Great Britain. By a Divine of the Church of England. He obſerves, that tho' an unſeaſonable vindication is uſually rejected as a ſuſpicion of guilt, yet where ſilence againſt foul and falſe imputations may be interpreted a confeſſion, there the proteſtation of a man's own innocency is ever juſt, and ſometimes neceſſary; and when others do the Clergy open wrong, it is not then vanity, but charity to do themſelves open right. And whatever appearance of folly, or vain boaſting there is in doing ſo, they are chargeable with it, who gy; collected from the Viſitation Charges of the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward Stillingfleet, D. D. late Lord Biſhop of Worceſter. His conduct in the ſeveral relations of Life was very juſt; and he was particularly eſteemed by Dr. Teniſon, the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Dr. Sharp, the late Archbiſhop of York, whoſe predeceſſor conferred upon him a Prebend in his Cathedral, ſolely on account of his merit (p). He was particularly pleaſed in the latter part of his life with reading Seneca and Tully de Senectute (q). He died in his pariſh of Beckenham, and was interred in the chancel of that church September the 17th 1711, in the 70th year of his age (r).

compel them to do it, and not the Clergy themſelves. He proceeds then in the following manner. Amongſt the many afflictions, which the orthodox Clergy are ſure to meet with in the world, this is not the leaſt, that they are to wreſtle with the unjuſt and bitter upbraidings of unreaſonable and malicious men, whoſe tongues being ſet on fire of hell, are thereby unhappy inſtruments of the Devil, (that great accuſer of the Brethren,) whoſe known deſign it is, by villifying their perſons, to enervate their function, and by falſe ſuggeſtions, to make their labours ineffectual. The pride, ambition, and covetouſneſs of the Clergy, their careleſs non-reſidence, their encroaching pluralities, their pragmatical intermeddling with ſecular affairs; theſe are the noted topics of ſome men's enlargement; wherein with what virulency they expreſs themſelves, it were a happy thing, if the frequent practice of ſuch perſons would ſuffer us to be ignorant. There is a ſtrange fondneſs in ſome men to reflect upon their ſuperiors in Church and State, and the fluency of their zeal on ſuch occaſions is very remarkable. But their conceits are never ſo raiſed, ſo ſparkling, and triumphant, as when they encounter the tribe of Levi. He endeavours then to ſhew, that the Clergy are the lights of the world, and to have not only ability, (which is not ſufficient, ſince God is a God of Order, and we muſt not run before we are ſent) but likewiſe a commiſſion (John xx. 21. As my Father hath ſent me, even ſo ſend I you) to perform their miniſterial acts, whereby, thro' the divine inſtitution and bleſſing, they convey grace into the ſoul; and to be Embaſſadors of reconciliation for Chriſt, 2 Cor. v. 20. who receive their credentials from the King of Kings; and therefore ought in that view to be maintained and honoured. Upon this occaſion, he ſhews the neceſſity and dignity of a well conſtituted miniſtry. And the entertainment, ſays he, we find in the world, doth make it ſeaſonable ſo far to magnify our office, as to remind you how much you are obliged to that deſpiſed order of men, called the Clergy, who are yet miſrepreſented and oppreſſed by many falſe reflexions. As when their acceptance of theſe honours, with which the Queen, who is the fountain of honour, may as prudently encourage Divinity as any other profeſſion, ſhall be voted pride. When modeſt endeavours for the bettering of our fortunes ſhall be ſtiled ambition. When an honeſt care to provide for our families (no leſs requiſite in Church-men, than in any other men) ſhall be branded as covetouſneſs. When legal proceedings to ſecure our rights and privileges from the encroachment of others, ſhall be condemned not only as covetouſneſs, but contention alſo. When falſe vizards ſhould be put upon the face of things, no wonder tho' we take up the prophet Iſaiah's complaint, Lord, who hath believed our report? as truth itſelf ſhall loſe its credit, &c. And therefore it concerns us, as we value our own reputation or the welfare of people committed to our charge, to wipe off that dirt, which malice on the one hand, and ſenſuality on the other (tho' with different deſigns) have thrown upon us. Our Author proceeds then to collect their ſeveral calumnies and cenſures into one entire objection, and to return the proper anſwer to them. He ſhews the neceſſity of a well-ſettled revenue, upon the conſideration of thoſe duties particularly required of the Clergy, to be given to hoſpitality, apt to teach. He vindicates likewiſe the Biſhops and dignified perſons from ſome texts objected to them, obſerving, that thoſe, who interpret the Scriptures by the corrupt gloſſes of their own partial reflections, may pretend to prove what they pleaſe; but they who are humble and modeſt, and unbiaſſed in their judgments, do eaſily obſerve, that it is not power and authority, or the title of Lord, that is here condemned, but the abuſe of them by ambition, tyranny, and oppreſſion, we are admoniſhed againſt. But thoſe places of Scripture have been on all occaſions ſo fully cleared from the exceptions of Noveliſts by ſundry of our learned men, that to inſiſt farther upon them would be wholly needleſs. In ſhort, we do not find any where in Scripture, that the Prieſthood of the Goſpel doth render a man incapable of any thing, whereunto he hath either a natural or civil liberty. And therefore as a Clergyman, notwithſtanding his ſpiritual function, may lawfully enjoy temporal land, if an heir to it from his father; ſo he may as lawfully exerciſe temporal power and authority, or be made noble with ſecular titles of honour, when they are given him by his Prince. And the reaſon is this, becauſe tho' the ſpiritual power doth not include the temporal, yet neither doth it ſo exclude it, but that they may, without any incongruity, concur and reſide both together in the ſame perſon. "The lawfulneſs of the thing, continues he, "being once granted, the expediency of it is very "eaſily thus eſtabliſhed. That ſince a Clergyman is "a member, not only of the Church, but alſo of "the ſtate; and ſince a Sovereign Prince hath a juſt "right and title to the parts and abilities of all his "ſubjects (to employ them when, and how he pleaſeth "for the good of the public,) let any man now re"ſolve me, why the Queen muſt be deprived of her "ſubject's ſervice, or the Clergy of ſuch opportunities "of expreſſing their duty? And therefore ſince the "former Kings and Queens of England out of a due "ſenſe and apprehenſion of the learning, prudence, "and integrity of the Biſhops, have ſummoned them "to their Parliaments, called them to their private "councils, commiſſioned them to be judges of their "Courts of Conſcience, entruſted them with the ma"nagement of their Treaſury, and other principal "offices of the Kingdom, (all which, as experience "proves, they have diſcharged with very good ſuc"ceſs;) and for their better ſupport and encourage"ment herein, to bring a juſt awe and authority to "their perſons, and to ſecure them from contempt, "have given honours and revenues ſuitable to ſuch "high employments. This being ſo, I am to ad"moniſh the adverſaries of the Church, that, if they "pleaſe, it will much better become them to amend "their own faults, rather than out of envy at the "preferment of Church-men, thus to preſume to cen"ſure the diſcretion of their Sovereign." He then conſiders the objection, that whilſt Biſhops are incumbered with temporal honours and employments, they neglect the neceſſary duty of preaching; to which he replies, that there are ſeveral duties to be performed by the Clergy, of which preaching is but one. Unleſs therefore, they can make it appear, that all theſe duties are to be diſcharged by one and the ſame perſon, there is little force in the objection. A Lecturer, tho' he ſeldom reads the public Prayers of the Church, or adminiſters the Sacraments, or catechiſeth the ignorant, or viſiteth the ſick, or comforteth the afflicted, or abſolveth the penitent; yet if he is conſtant in preaching, (tho' he neglects all the other offices of the Miniſterial Function,) he ſhall have the character of a painful Divine, a faithful labourer in the Lord's vineyard. I demand therefore, ſince government is as neceſſary as preaching, (for Preachers muſt be governed, or they will ruin the Church,) why a Biſhop, who faithfully governs his dioceſe, who furniſheth all his Churches with able Preachers by due and regular ordination; who encourageth thoſe, that are diligent and deſerving; and reproves, corrects, and reclaims the extravagant; I ſay let malice itſelf reſolve me, why ſuch a one, when the great Biſhop of our ſouls ſhall call us all to our laſt account, may not then comfortably expect a Prophet's reward, tho' he ſeldom comes into the pulpit?

ASTYANAX, the only ſon of Hector and Andromache [A], was the occaſion of very uneaſy apprehenſions to the Greeks in the midſt of their victory, though he was then but an infant. Contrary winds preventing them from returning to their own country after the deſtruction of Troy, Calchas declared that it was neceſſary for them to caſt Aſtyanax headlong from the top of the walls, becauſe if he grew up, he would certainly revenge the death of his father, and prove more valiant even than he. Upon this Ulyſſes endeavoured to diſcover him; and having found him, notwithſtanding the care which his mother took to conceal him, he threw him down from the walls (a). Others tell us, that it was Menelaus who performed this execution (b). Others aſcribe his death to Pyrrhus alone, without any mention, that the Greeks or Calchas judged it neceſſary (c). However that be, the Poets and Writers of Romances have raiſed him from the dead, or rather made him eſcape the hands of the Greeks [B].

The ſorrow of Andromache in the XXIIth Book of the Iliad ſhew evidently, that ſhe had but this one. [B] The Poets and Writers of Romances have raiſed him from the dead, or rather made him eſcape the hands of the Greeks.] They tell us, that the ſame ſon of Hector, who was named Aſtyanax or Scamander, was likewiſe called Francion, and that he was the ſtock, from which the Kings of France are deſcended (3). Annius of Viterbo's Manetho aſſerts, that Francus, the ſon of Hector, was King of the Celtæ, that is of the Gauls. The impoſtor, who forged this piece, quotes in his Notes Vincent de Beauvais, who tells us, that this Francus having retired into Gaul after the Deſtruction of Troy, gained ſo great a ſhare in the King's favour, that he married his daughter, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdom. I have not found in Manetho (4) what Du Pleix aſcribes to him; that Francus ſucceeded Rhemus King of the Gauls, whoſe daughter he had married (5). I cannot diſcover any thing of this kind even in the Commentator upon Manetho. Du Pleix adds, that Trithemius, quoting for his Author Hunnibald, who lived under Clovis I, and who alledges for his authorities Dorac and Waſthald, Scythian Hiſtorians, tells us, that Hector had two ſons, one of whom, whoſe name was Aſtyanax or Scamander, periſhed at the taking of Troy, the other named Laodamas (6) or Francion, eſcaped from the hands of the enemy, and fled with a conſiderable number of Trojans into Pæonia, which was afterwards called Pannonia; and that having been courteouſly entertained by the King of the Pæonians, he continued in that country upon the Frontiers of Scythia, and built there the city of Sicambria, where he and his poſterity reigned till the time of King Antenor, who was ſlain by the Goths 420 years before Chriſt. The cruelties of the Goths obliged the Trojans or Sicambrians to retire into Germany, where they divided themſelves into two branches; one of which at laſt founded the French Monarchy in Gaul; the other ſtaid in Germany, and founded there Franconia or Eaſtern France. What chimeras are theſe! Moreri not conſidering that the Authors of thoſe Legends have falſities of their own to anſwer for, has aſcribed to them what they have not ſaid. He tells us, that the ſpurious Manetho and other Authors of that ſtamp have repreſented Francion or Francis (7) the ſon of Hector, as the firſt King of the Gauls. But they do not pretend this, ſince they tell us, that the King of the Gauls gave his daughter to him. Beſides, what a careleſsneſs is it to repreſent Andromache only as the mother of this Francion, when there might have been aſcribed to her a more real ſon, I mean, Aſtyanax? Theſe are two errors of Moreri; and here follows a third. He tells us, that Aſtyanax was thrown down headlong from the walls by Ulyſſes's order, and he quotes Virgil's Æneid. Now this Poet has ſaid nothing to that purpoſe in any of his works.

ATHENAGORAS, an Athenian Philoſopher, flouriſhed after the middle of the ſecond Century, and was remarkable for his zeal for Chriſtianity, and his great learning. All this appears evident from the Apology, which he addreſſed to the Emperors Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, and Lucius Aurelius Commodus. This was done in the year 179, if we credit Baronius (a), or in the 168th, according to Mr. Dodwel (b). It is not eaſy to prove in any ſolid manner that the latter opinion is more probable than the former [A]. I do not find any perſon but ſuppoſes, that he was ſent by the Chriſtians to the court of the

[A] He addreſſed his Apology in the year 179 . . . or in 168. It is not eaſy to prove in any ſolid manner, that the latter opinion is more probable than the former.] Several reaſons are urged on both ſides the queſtion. Thoſe of Mr. Dodwell are as follow (1). Athenagoras's Apology was addreſſed to two Emperors, to whom the Author gives the titles of Armeniacis, Sarmaticis, & quod maximum eſt, Philoſophis. This is applicable to Marcus Aurelius, and Lucius Aurelius his brother; but not to Lucius Aurelius his ſon. The latter was never ſtiled the Philoſopher; and it appears by the ſecond Apology of Juſtin Martyr, that this title was common to Lucius Aurelius and Marcus Aurelius his brother. Hunc titulum cum Marco Lucium Verum habuiſſe communem conſtat è ſecundâ Apologiâ Juſtini (2). Father Pagi, Diſſert. Hypat. p. 216. makes uſe of the ſame argument, and quotes Euſebius, L. IV. c. xii. Now this Lucius died about the end of the year 169. The Apology muſt therefore have been preſented before that time. I omit the particular reaſons, which induced Mr. Dodwel to fix upon the year 168 for the Epocha of that work. It is objected to him, that the Epithet of Sarmaticus is not ſuitable to Lucius Aurelius, who died before the Sarmatians were attacked; but he anſwers, that this Epithet was inſerted by a miſtake of the Tranſcribers, inſtead of that of Parthicus, which was given to the two brothers with that of Armeniacus, after the war againſt Armenia (3). He adds, that the profound peace, upon which Athenagoras congratulates the Emperors (4), does not at all agree with the time, when Marcus Aurelius and his ſon reigned together. He ſays nothing with regard to the principal objection; and yet ſome reply might be given to it, as we ſhall ſee immediately. We muſt not forget, that Athenagoras intimates, that his Apology was written in the ſame Olympiad, in which Peregrinus burnt himſelf (5). This action of Peregrinus happened, according to Mr. Dodwel and Tillemont (6), under the year 165; but Scaliger has placed it under the year 168 (7). He grounds it upon this conſideration, that Peregrinus did this act during the celebration of the Olympic Games. He is of opinion, that Athenagoras's Apology was preſented to the Emperors the ſame Olympiad. His reaſon is, that Peregrinus caſt himſelf into the fire three years before the death of Lucius Verus, one of theſe Emperors. This argument is better than the proof, which Mr. Dodwel has drawn from the words of Athenagoras; for they only mention the place where, and not the time when, he burnt himſelf.

the Emperor, and actually preſented an apology for them [B]; but there is ſome reaſon to doubt of theſe facts; and there is great probability to ſuppoſe, that it was the ſame caſe ſelf. Περὶ τὴν Ὀλυμπίαν (8). i. e. "Near the city "Olympia." See Mr. Tillemont (9). The argument drawn from the profound peace of the Empire is of ſuch a kind, that it ſerves both parties; for Cardinal Baronius urges this fact as a reaſon, that the Apology could not be preſented under the reign of Marcus Aurelius's brother, or at any other time but in the year 179 (10). Mr. Tillemont did not well underſtand the Cardinal's meaning, ſince he charges him with having concluded that this Apology was not written till the year [176, or] 177, from its having mentioned, that the Empire was then in a profound peace (11).

I ſhall now mention the principal reaſons of thoſe, who aſſert that Athenagoras's Apology was not preſented till the year 177, when Commodus, the ſon of Marcus Aurelius, was advanced to the dignity of Auguſtus (12). They affirm, that the perſon, who is the collegue of Marcus Aurelius in the inſcription of the Apology, was the ſon and not the brother of that Emperor; and they prove it from the paſſage, in which theſe two Princes are compared to God the Father and God the Son. Ipſa quidem oratio longe validius nobis præbet argumentum: Vos quidem, ſubjicit vir diſertus, in ſummâ Imperii Majeſtate adeo conjunctis animis orbem regitis, ut inde cœleſtis etiam regni contemplationem animo quis complecti queat. Ut vobis enim Patri & Filio in poteſtate ſunt omnia, regno in vos divinitùs collocato, (Regis enim Anima, inquit Spiritus Propheticus, in manu Dei eſt,) ſic uni Deo & Filio ejus, hoc eſt Verbo, ſubjecta ſunt omnia. Nullus hic eſt cavillationibus locus. Imperatores non tantum alloquitur, ſed etiam comparationem inſtituit duos inter terrenos Reges, quibus omnia humanitùs loquendo parebant, ac ſummum cœli & terræ Dominum, qui ſimul cum ſuo Unigenito imperii orbis univerſi habenas moderatur (13). i. e. "The Apology itſelf affords us an argument ſtill more convincing; for "the eloquent Writer of it proceeds thus: You indeed amidſt the ſupreme Majeſty of the Empire govern "the world with ſuch harmony and union, that we "may from thence form an idea of the Kingdom of "Heaven. For as you being Father and Son enjoy "the ſovereign authority over all things, the Empire "being given you by Heaven, (for the heart of the "King is in the hand of the Lord, as the Prophet "tells us,) ſo all things are ſubject to the one God and "his Son, who is the Word. Here is no manner "of room for objections; for the Author not only "addreſſes himſelf to the Emperors, but even makes "a compariſon between two earthly Princes, to "whom all things, humanly ſpeaking, were ſubject, and the ſupreme Lord of heaven and earth, "who with his only begotten Son governs the Uni"verſe." In this manner Mr. de Larroque repreſents the force of his proof. Mr. Tillemont has added another paſſage. "Athenagoras * expreſſes "his wiſh to theſe two Princes, that the Father "might ſucceed the ſon: ἵνα παῖς παρὰ πατρὸς διαδέχηται τὴν βασιλείαν. He addreſſes himſelf therefore "to a Father and ſon, one of whom enjoyed the "Empire, tho' the other might have the title of "Emperor; that is, he addreſſes himſelf to Marcus "Aurelius, and Commodus his ſon, and not to two "brothers, who reigned in conjunction. He expreſſes "himſelf ſtill more plainly in another paſſage †, where "he ſays, All things are ſubject to you, who are Father "and Son; ὡς υἱῷ Πατρὶ καὶ Υἱῷ πάντα ὑποτάσσεται. Father Pagi ‡ could not evade this, but by ſaying, "that Athenagoras conſidered Lucius as the ſon of "Marcus Aurelius, tho' he was his brother, in order "to make a more exact alluſion to the two Perſons "of the Trinity, the Father and Son (14)." Father Pagi would have made uſe of a ſubterfuge in this caſe, which was not at all proper to impoſe upon the reader. He would have done much better to have defended himſelf by ſaying, that Athenagoras knew, that Lucius Aurelius had married the daughter of Marcus Aurelius; and that therefore, as he addreſſed himſelf to a father-in-law and his ſon-in-law, he might conſider them as father and ſon. It is thus in effect that Father Pagi has anſwered this objection (15). He obſerves likewiſe, that this was the opinion of Mr. Toinard. The other paſſage, which Mr. Tillemont quotes, is by no means concluſive. It may be underſtood in this ſenſe: We offer up our prayers for your Empire, that the ſon may receive it of the Father, as juſtice requires. Περὶ μὲν τῆς ἀρχῆς τῆς ὑμετέρας διαδέχηται, ἵνα παῖς μὲν παρὰ πατρὸς κατὰ τὸ δικαιότατον διαδέχηται τὴν Βασιλείαν (16). Pro imperio veſtro oramus, ut & filius à patre, ſicut æquiſſimum eſt, imperium per manus accipiatis. This diſcourſe is very reaſonable, whether we ſuppoſe, that the Apology was preſented to Marcus Aurelius and his brother, or to Marcus Aurelius and his ſon. This is a wiſh, which upon the hypotheſis of Baronius, would relate leſs to Commodus, who was already aſſociated in the Empire, than to the deſcendants of Commodus. It is a wiſh, that the family of Marcus Aurelius might always poſſeſs the Imperial Majeſty according to the order of the lawful ſucceſſion in a direct line. We may obſerve, that Father Pagi quotes this wiſh as a proof, that the ſon of Marcus Aurelius was not then Emperor. I ſhall refute in another place (17) the inference, which is drawn from what Athenagoras has ſaid of one Alexander.

We may conclude two things from all this; the firſt is, that the foundation of the controverſy turns upon this; that one ſide ſuppoſes Marcus Aurelius's collegue to be his brother, and the other that it was his ſon. The ſecond is, that neither of them have urged any thing clear and evident upon the ſubject, ſince the diviſion ſtill continues. Scaliger (18), Father Labbe (19), Father Pagi, Mr. Dodwel, Mr. Chevreau (20), &c. are for the brother; Suffridus Petri (21), Baronius, Father Petavius (22), Mr. Du Pin (23), Mr. de Larroque, Mr. Tillemont, and ſeveral other learned men, are for the ſon.

We may remark by the bye an error of Grotius. Floruit Athenagoras, ſays he (24), circa annum Chriſti 190, ut ex libri inſcriptione apparet. This is not juſt; for Marcus Aurelius dying in 180, the title of a Book, which was dedicated to him, does not prove, that the Author muſt have flouriſhed about the year 190.

[B] That he was ſent by the Chriſtians to the Court of the Emperor, and actually preſented an apology for them; but there is ſome reaſon to doubt of theſe facts.] Baronius's words are as follow: Orientis quoque Eccleſias eâdem eſſe clade vexatas, LEGATIO pro illis ab Athenagora Athenienſi . . . . tunc ad Imperatores ſuſcepta, & Apologia pro eiſdem tunc ſcripta ac dictis principibus, OBLATA, manifeſtum certamque fidem faciunt (25). i. e. "It is evident that the Churches of the Eaſt were in"volved in the ſame calamity, from Athenagoras "the Athenian's being ſent at that time to the Em"perors on their account, and from his apology, "which was written then in their defence, and pre"ſented to the ſame Emperors." Father Labbe, expreſſes himſelf in as full a manner to the ſame purpoſe: LEGATIONEM SUSCEPIT, pro Chriſtianis inter annum 165 . . . & annum 170 . . . non deſunt tamen, qui anno duntaxat 177 OBLATUM librum illum Imperatoribus aſſerant (26). i. e. "He undertook an Em"baſſy for the Chriſtians between the year 165 . . . "and the year 170 . . . but there are ſome who aſſert, "that this Book was not preſented to the Emperors "till the year 177." Moreri in tranſlating this paſſage of Father Labbe, has made uſe of theſe words; He preſented an excellent apology in favour of the faithful to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. . . . He had been ſent to Rome by the Chriſtians, and this happened from the year 165 to 170. He did not well underſtand the original; for Father Labbe's expreſſions ſignify, not that Athenagoras's Embaſſy continued from the year 165 to the year 170; but that it ought to be placed under ſome part of that interval of time. Thoſe, who know how frequent the journies of the Roman Emperors were in thoſe times, would not eaſily venture to ſay without very good grounds, that ſuch or ſuch a perſon was ſent to them at Rome. We muſt conclude therefore, that Moreri has a little raſhly left his guide; and has determined the duration and place of this Embaſſy, which Father Labbe has not done. Mr. Dodwel who conjectures that Athenagoras executed cuted this Embaſſy (27), when the Emperor Lucius Verus returned to Rome to celebrate his triumph there (28), has no ſhare in our little cenſure, becauſe he has determined the place; for this limitation of his is a conſequence of the Hypotheſis, which he has followed after a laborious examination of the circumſtances. But I am not eaſily inclined to believe, that he is right in affirming, that this Chriſtian Philoſopher performed really the functions of an Embaſſador.

My firſt reaſon is drawn from the ſilence of all the Antients. Is it poſſible, that no writer ſhould have ſaid ſomething of ſuch an Embaſſy, which would have been ſo remarkable from the circumſtances of the time, the merits of the Embaſſador, and the force of the apology preſented to the Emperors? In the ſecond place I cannot think it at all probable, that when the Chriſtian name was ſo odious, and ſo highly perſecuted, Athenagoras ſhould have appeared at the imperial Court, as a Deputy from the body of Chriſtians, and obtained an audience there, and even preſented to the Emperor a long diſcourſe, in which notwithſtanding the reſpectful moderation which he ſhews in it, he repreſents the moſt abſurd enormities of the Pagan Religion, and animadverts upon thoſe points, which were moſt capable of exciting the reſentments of the perſecutors. I add to this, that the title of this diſcourſe, which is the ſtrongeſt proof, that can be oppoſed to me, is no proof. Ἀθηναγόρου Ἀθηναίου φιλοσόφου Χριστιανῶν πρεσβεία περὶ Χριστιανῶν. i. e. "The Embaſſy of Athenagoras the Athenian, a Chriſtian Philoſopher, in favour of the Chriſtians." This is the title of the piece. But we may remark, I. that there are ſome manuſcripts, in which after πρεσβεία we find ἢ ἀπολογία, i. e. "or the apology (29)," and that there are others, in which inſtead of πρεσβεία we read ἀπολογία. II. That the word πρεσβεία ſignifies not only an Embaſſy or deputation, but likewiſe a requeſt or petition, Τὴν πρεσβείαν non modo Legationem, ſed & Deprecationem ac Supplicationem apud Græcos ſignificare notum eſt (30). III. That the title of Embaſſy is not given to an Embaſſador's ſpeech, but to the whole relation, which is drawn up of his negotiations. It would therefore be a great impropriety, to take the word πρεσβεία here for an Embaſſy. Laſtly, I obſerve, that Mr. Tillemont does not expreſs himſelf as the other writers have done. We ſee plainly, ſays he (31), that the Chriſtian Religion was then perſecuted in the Eaſt, ſince Athenagoras was obliged to write an apology under the title of an Embaſſy for the Chriſtians. He addreſſed it to the Emperors. He does not mention any journey, or deputation, or apology preſented to the Emperors; he only ſpeaks of a diſcourſe written by the Author in his ſtudy, and addreſſed to Marcus Aurelius, &c. Every one knows the difference between a writing, which is actually preſented to a Prince, and one, which is only addreſſed to him. I own, that Mr. Tillemont's authority appears to me in this caſe of conſiderable importance; for he has laid it down for a rule of his conduct, not to ſtretch the teſtimonies of Authors beyond the clear and evident ſenſe of them; and confines himſelf very ſcrupulouſly within the limits of his proofs. I infer from hence, that he thought there was no foundation for this Embaſſy of Athenagoras or for ſuppoſing, that he actually preſented his apology.

I ſhall reduce my ſentiments upon this point to a few words, and venture to aſſert, that Athenagoras is to be compared to thoſe modern writers, who without quitting their cloſet, publiſh every where their writings under the title of A petition of the Proteſtants preſented to the King. Thoſe, who ſhall read theſe pieces a hundred years hence, will not doubt but that they were actually preſented; but we, who live at this time, know well enough that this is falſe; we know, that in the year 1680 there was diſperſed a pamphlet, which was written with all the air of a petition actually preſented to the King of France by thoſe of the Reformed Religion (32). A prodigious number of people thought ſo in foreign countries, and in thoſe Provinces, which are remote from Paris. And yet I have been informed, that it was never preſented, and it is certain, that the deputies of the churches, who had drawn it up, diſowned the publication of it. There was publiſhed a piece of the ſame kind, during the conferences at Ryſwick in the year 1697. It was a looſe piece without any name; and yet ſome time or other it may be placed among the authentic acts, ſince there is nothing in it, to inform us, but it was actually preſented to Lewis XIV. The primitive Chriſtians probably acted in the ſame manner. They wrote pieces addreſſed to the Emperors, and publiſhed them in hopes, that ſome copy of them might fall into the hands of thoſe Princes, and incline the Court to remove thoſe violences, which were exerciſed towards the Chriſtians, who were unjuſtly accuſed. Once more, I perſuade myſelf, that Athenagoras did in the IId Century, what Calvin did in the XVIth. Calvin, who lay concealed at Baſil in a little room, dedicated to Francis I, his Chriſtian Inſtitutions, which neither himſelf nor any other perſon ever preſented to that Prince.

(32) See the following note.

I muſt not omit obſerving, that the ſame day, in which I wrote this remark, I communicated it to Dr. Cockburn (33), who immediately promiſed me to conſult Mr. Dodwel upon this point. He did me the favour to ſhew me the anſwer, which he received, and which is full of exquiſite learning, from whence ſeveral conſequences are drawn in favour of the opinion, which I have attacked. The letter of that learned man deſerves to be printed. I ſhould have been glad to inſert it here, if I had been permitted; but not being allowed that liberty, I am obliged likewiſe to deny myſelf the liberty of proſecuting the diſpute.

(33) He is a Scots Gentleman, a Doctor of Divinity, and Author of ſome books in Engliſh againſt Madam Bourignon's opinions.

[C] A prodigious number of petitions of the Proteſtants in France, have been printed without ever having been preſented to the King.] The public is ſo well aſſured of this, that I ſhould undertake a very ſuperfluous taſk, if I were to amuſe myſelf by a formal proof of it. But with regard to the petition, which was diſperſed in 1680. I have reaſon to believe, that my readers will imagine, that I have proceeded too far in denying that it was preſented. It is proper therefore to propoſe my reaſons. I ſhall begin with diſtinguiſhing this petition from ſeveral others, which were drawn up at different times; and I ſhall obſerve, that it is that, which was anſwered by a Prieſt, whoſe name was Soulier. The anſwer which he wrote, was publiſhed without his name. This anſwer is mentioned in the ſixth page of The laſt efforts of oppreſſed innocence, and in page 305 of the Hiſtory of the Edicts of Pacification (34), and in the third volume of the hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes (35). We find in this laſt Book an abſtract of that anſwer, and it is mentioned there as a piece, the author of which was not known. The writer of the hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes aſſures us, that the petition was preſented. It happened, I cannot tell by what means, continues he, that ſome time after it was printed and ſold publickly. I believe that this writer is miſtaken, and that it was printed and ſold before it could be preſented. Now after it was publiſhed, to be ſure the King had not received it. See in the life of Mr. du Boſc an account of the reſentment of the council, becauſe the deputies of the Reformed Churches had publiſhed a petition, which they had preſented, but which the King had not then returned any anſwer to (37). This Prince was ſo highly incenſed at the printing of that petition, that he condemned it without having ſeen it, and ordered two of the deputies to be ſent to the Baſtile (38). This happened about the year 1671. How is it probable, that nine years after, at a time when affairs were in a much worſe ſituation, the Deputies of the Churches ſhould preſume to publiſh a petition after they had preſented it to the King, and before they knew his anſwer. The author of the hiſtory of the Edicts of Nantes might elude this, by aſſerting that the Miſſionaries procured the publication of the petition of the Proteſtants. This, tho' poſſible, is contrary to all probability. But here follows a fact, which is ſtill more direct to the purpoſe. Mr. Jurieu wrote a Book very ſoon after this Petition was publiſhed, and he mentions it only as a petition, which was deſigned to

to be preſented (39). Does not he deſerve more credit upon ſuch points, than the author of the hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, who did not write till ſeveral years after this event? When I perceived the oppoſition between theſe two writers, I procured the three chief Deputies of the Churches, and particularly him, who is thought to be the author of the petition, to be conſulted. The anſwers, which I have obtained, agree entirely in this, that they are not certain, whether it was preſented or not. They excuſed their forgetfulneſs in this point on account of the multitude of affairs, which paſſed thro' their hands then, and upon the length of time, and the variety of troubles, which they have paſſed thro' ſince. I have no grounds therefore to apprehend, that equitable perſons will charge me with raſhneſs, for determining in the manner, in which I have done; for beſides the proofs, which I have urged, I remember that the moſt freſh and almoſt original report was that which Mr. Jurieu has followed; and which was, that the petition was publiſhed without having been preſented by the Deputies.

[D] We find him quoted only in one of St. Epiphanius's works.] We muſt likewiſe correct the text of that Father, in order to find the following quotation in him: Τί ἦν ὁ Διάβολος λέξεται; πνεῦμα περὶ τὴν ὕλην ἔχον, καθάπερ ἐλέχθη, ὦ Ἀθηναγόρα, γινόμενον ὑπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ (40). i. e. "What therefore at laſt ſhall we determine the Devil to be? A ſpirit, who is converſant about matter, as it is ſaid, O Athenagoras, and produced by God." Thus ſtands this paſſage in the editions of Epiphanius; and according to this we muſt aſſert, that he treats here of another Athenagoras, who muſt have been an interlocutor in the dialogue, of which Epiphanius has given us ſome extracts. Now this is a dialogue written by Methodius againſt Origen, in which Methodius is one of the interlocutors. But the critics have juſtly conjectured, that inſtead of ὦ Ἀθηναγόρα, we ought to read τῷ Ἀθηναγόρᾳ, ab Athenagora, i. e. "by Athenagoras (41)."

[E] He was not wholly free from Heterodoxy.] He admits of two kinds of evil angels; the one contains thoſe, whom God created, and who executed amiſs the commiſſion, which they had received to govern matter, and to preſide over the production of forms. The other includes thoſe, whom the former begot by carnal converſation with women; that is the ſouls of the giants, who were produced by this commerce (42). Suffridus Petri obſerves, that Athenagoras founds his hypotheſis upon two paſſages of Scripture miſunderſtood. Teſtimonia ſunt potiſſimum duo, ſed malè intellecta, quibus niti videtur Athenagoras (43). He is likewiſe miſtaken in the ſenſe and application of a paſſage in the goſpel, which condemns thoſe, who divorce one wife in order to marry another; for he makes uſe of it to condemn ſecond marriages, which he calls without any reſerve a ſpecious adultery. Ἂν οἷος τὶς ἐτύχθη, μόνοις, ἢ ἐφ' ἑνὶ γάμῳ. ὁ γὰρ δεύτερος, ἐυπρεπὴς ἔξι μοιχεία. ὃς γὰρ ἂν ἀπολύσῃ, φησὶ, τὴν γυναῖκα αὐτοῦ, ἢ γαμήσῃ ἄλλην, μοιχᾶται. εἴτε ἀπολύειν ἐπιτρέπων ἧς ἔπαυσε τὶς τὴν παρθενίαν, οὔτε ἐπιγαμεῖν. ὁ γὰρ ἀποστερῶν ἑαυτὸν τῆς προτέρας γυναικὸς, καὶ εἰ τέθνηκε, μοιχὸς ἐξὶ παρακεκαλυμμένος, παραβαίνων μὲν τὴν χεῖρα τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὅτι ἐν ἀρχῇ ὁ Θεὸς ἕνα ἄνδρα ἔπλασε καὶ μίαν γυναῖκα (44). i. e. "Either let every one continue as he was born, or be contented with being once married, for a ſecond marriage is a ſpecious adultery. For whoever, ſays Chriſt, ſhall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery; he neither ſuffering you to put away her, whoſe virginity you have firſt enjoyed, nor to marry another. For he, who deprives himſelf of his former wife, tho' ſhe be dead, is a ſecret adulterer, as ſoon as ever he tranſgreſſes the command of God; becauſe God in the beginning created one man and one woman." We ſee that he lays upon all men in general the ſame law, which God laid only upon the High-Prieſt (45). He would inſiſt upon it, that if they will marry, it ſhould be but one wife. And he is not contented, that themſelves ſhould have been abſolutely chaſt and free from any commerce with women before, but he would have them likewiſe chooſe virgins for their wives. This is erring conſiſtently; for if ſecond marriages are criminal, a youth, who ſhould marry a widow, would be guilty, and commit a new crime every time that he diſcharged the matrimonial duties, ſince he would occaſion his wife to be guilty of a crime. Now, according to the rules of morality, whoever cauſes another to ſin, ſins himſelf. We may ſay the ſame thing of a virgin, who ſhall marry a widower. I cannot tell, ſays Mr. Tillemont (46), whether the expreſſion *, which Athenagoras makes uſe of with regard to the prophets at a time, when the ecſtacies of Montanus began to diſturb the Church, might not give occaſion to apprehend, that he was engaged in that party. However, neither Scultetus, nor Mr. Du Pin † have remark'd that this paſſage is capable of a bad ſenſe. I do not find, that there is the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect him of being a Montaniſt upon ſuch an account. How many orthodox perſons are there, who aſſert, that the ancient prophets were ſeized with an ecſtaſy, and that their tongues or pens were the inſtruments of the Holy Ghoſt? What then can he find exceptionable in theſe words of Athenagoras, Νομίζω καὶ ὑμᾶς.... ἐκ ἀκοήτους γεγονέναι οὔτε τῶν Μωσέως, οὔτε τῶν Ἡσαΐου καὶ Ἱερεμίου, καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν προφητῶν, οἱ κατ' ἔκςασιν τῶν ἐν αὐτοῖς λογισμῶν κινήσαντος, αὐτοὺς τοῦ Θείου πνεύματος, ἃ ἐνηργοῦντο ἐξεφώνησαν· συγχεησαμένου τοῦ πνεύματος, ὡσεὶ καὶ αὐλητοῦ, αὐλὸν ἐμπνεύσαι (47). i. e. "I think alſo .... that you are not ignorant of thoſe writings, which Moſes, Iſaiah, and Jeremiah, and the reſt of the Prophets have left. Who in their ecſtaſies, being moved by the divine Spirit, ſpoke thoſe things, which they received; the Spirit working by them in the ſame manner, as a piper blows his pipe." It is true that the compariſon of the Holy Ghoſt with a player upon the pipe or flute, is low; but at the bottom it is no error.

What I have obſerved concerning the law, which was preſcribed to the High-Prieſt of the Jews, ſuggeſts to me a conjecture, which I ſhall venture to propoſe to the Reader. The primitive Chriſtians, who declared ſo ſtrongly againſt ſecond marriages, were perhaps led into this opinion by the conſideration, that we are obliged to be more perfect under the law of the Goſpel, than under that of Moſes; ſo that lay-Chriſtians are obliged to obſerve the ſtricteſt rules, which were in uſe among the Prieſts of the Synagogue. In ſhort, it ſeems that in ſome reſpects all Chriſtians are initiated into the Prieſthood (48). If it was thought proper therefore to prohibit the High-Prieſt of the Jews from marrying a widow, in order that ſuch a prohibition might make him reflect upon the obligation he was under to purity, is not there ſome reaſon to think, that all Chriſtians ſhould be put under the ſame yoke? It was in this manner perhaps that they reaſoned; and perhaps likewiſe the firſt ſource of this ſevere morality was the view of fully removing that kind of polygamy, which divorce rendered frequent. The falſe wits would appear more than ridiculous, if they ſhould pretend to criticiſe the law preſcribed to the High-Prieſt. He ought to have been ſubjected to a burdenſome law, it will be ſaid, whereas on the contrary he was obliged to indulge himſelf in a more delicious reliſh, and not to take up with a diſh at ſecond hand. The reſt were to be contented with the leavings of others; he alone was obliged to be more difficult in his gratifications, and of a taſte much more delicate. This is trifling and low raillery; for in reality it is a ſlaviſh condition for a man not to be permitted to marry when he pleaſes; and how many ſenſual perſons are there, who, tho' they have a full liberty of choice, prefer widows to any other miſtreſſes? Beſides, is it not mere blindneſs not to ſee the wiſdom of the legiſlator in this prohibition? Did not this law direct the High-Prieſt to avoid more ſtrictly than others the leaſt irregularities? For if a woman was not worthy of him, when ſhe ceaſed to aſpire to that excellent degree of perfection and glory, which ſhe might obtain by preferring a chaſt widowhood to a ſecond marriage; if the mere want of this ſublime virtue, which want is not excellent and truly Attic, but a little too full of tranſpoſitions and parentheſes. They have been printed a great many times, as we may find in Mr. Du Pin, who has omitted ſome editions [F]. I ſhall ſpeak of a Romance which has been publiſhed under the name of Athenagoras [G], If I could but have conſulted the Diſſertation which Father le Nourry publiſhed (e), I ſhould undoubtedly have extracted ſome good materials for this Article; but his book has not reached us (f), though it was printed in 1697. I have ſeen ſome account of it in the Journal des Savans (g), and in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic (h).

not ſo much a real crime as the mere privation of a diſtinguiſhed merit, was ſufficient to render her unworthy of the marriage of the High-Prieſt, was it not a proof, that God required of him a peculiar abhorrence for impurity, and a particular care and ſtrictneſs in the regulation of his conduct? Read the following words of a great man: Quin & illa ad declarandam inſignem vitæ mundiciem pertinent, quod ſi quis de ſtirpe Aaron teneatur profluvio ſanguinis, vetatur ad ſacerdotis menſam accedere, ſacriſque veſci panibus. Item quod quicunque vicio maculâve corporis eſſent deformati, ſubmoventur à ſacris miniſteriis. Rurſus quod ipſe pontifex jubetur virginem ſuæ gentis ducere, à viduâ, repudiatâ, ac proſtitutâ, abſtinere. Non ſtatim quod plebi licet, licet & ſacerdoti. Multitudini multa conceduntur, à ſacerdote ſumma requiritur puritas in omni vitæ portione (49). i. e. "Beſides theſe rules were deſigned to "point out a peculiar ſtrictneſs and purity of life; "that if any perſon of the tribe of Aaron was troubled with a flux of blood, he was forbid to approach the Prieſt's table, or eat of the ſacred bread. "And likewiſe, that whoever were deformed and had "any blemiſh in their bodies, ſhould be removed from "the ſacred offices. And again, that the High-Prieſt "himſelf was commanded to marry a virgin of his "own nation, and to abſtain from a widow, and from "one, who had been divorced or proſtitute. What "was lawful for the common people, was not at the "ſame time lawful for the Prieſt. Many things were "granted to the multitude; but the greateſt purity "in every part of life, was required of the Prieſt." The ſame ſpirit reigned in the diſcipline of the Chriſtians, even at the time when they did not exclude married perſons from the Prieſthood (50); for they excluded thoſe, who had two wives ſucceſſively, or who had married a widow, or had been diſhonoured by the adultery of their wives; and if this diſhonour happened to them while they were in orders, they were obliged either to deliver themſelves by divorce, or to renounce their ſtate as Clergymen. Verba ſynodi Neocæſar. cap. 8. *hæc ſunt: Si cujus uxorem adulterium commiſiſſe, cum eſſet laicus, evidenter fuerit probatum, hic ad miniſterium Eccleſiaſticum admitti non poteſt. [F] Mr. Du Pin has omitted ſome Editions.] His Catalogue is very large (53); but it is not always well pointed in the Amſterdam Edition (54). This occaſions great confuſion in the mind of the reader. There is no mention of the edition of Oxford, nor of that of Leipſic; the former was publiſhed in 1682 in 12mo by Dr. Fell, Biſhop of Oxford, and the latter in 1684 in 8vo by Adam Rechenberg. Both theſe Editions are in Greek and Latin, and illuſtrated with Notes. Mr. Du Pin has not mentioned likewiſe Mr. Kortholt's Commentary upon Athenagoras's Treatiſes. This work was printed at Kiel in 1675 in fol. and inſerted with Additions in the Edition of Juſtin Martyr, Athenagoras, &c. at Leipſic in 1686. We may obſerve, that Guy Gauſſart, Prior of Sainćte Foy at Coulommiers, tranſlated Athenagoras's Apology into French; to which he added the Notes of Suffridus Petri. This Tranſlation was printed at Paris in 8vo 1574. Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who informs us of this (55), mentions a French Tranſlation of the two Treatiſes of Athenagoras, done by Arnaud du Ferron (56); but he does not tell us either where or when it was printed (57).

[G] A Romance publiſhed under the name of Athenagoras.] According to Dr. Cave, there has only been ſeen the French Tranſlation printed at Paris by Daniel Guillemot in 1612, with the following title: Du vrai & parfait Amour, eſcrit en Grec par Athenagoras Philoſophe Athenien, contenant les Amours honeſtes de Theogone & de Charide, de Pherecides & de Melangenie: i. e. "Of true and perfect Love, written in Greek "by Athenagoras, an Athenian Philoſopher; con-"taining the chaſt Loves of Theogonus and Chari-"dea, of Pherecides and Melangenia." Martin Fumée, Lord of Genille, had made this Tranſlation, and ſent it in 1569 to Mr. de Lamané, Secretary to Cardinal d'Armagnac. It was found in the papers of Bernard de San-Jorry, who publiſhed it in 1612 (58). Conſult Huetius, who ſpeaks very largely of this Book, and conjectures, that Philander was the real Author of it (59). He tells us, that this Fumée boaſted, that he had the original Greek by means of Lamané, Protonotary to Cardinal d'Armagnac.

We may remark, that the Edition mentioned by Dr. Cave, which he ſaw in Dr. Voſſius's Library, was not the firſt. I have one printed at Paris by Michael Sonnius in 1599 in 12mo. The title is almoſt exactly the ſame with that of the Edition mentioned above (60). The Preface was written by Bernard de San-Jorry, and dated from Caſtres the firſt of October 1596. It informs us, that San-Jorry, who was almoſt ſeventy years of age, had found amongſt his papers a copy of this work, which he had procured to be tranſcribed from that, which had been ſent to Mr. de Lamané, and that he deſired Mr. de Fonbouzart, who was going to court on account of his own affairs, to do him the pleaſure to take the charge of this work, and communicate it to ſome Printer, as he paſſed thro' Paris.

ATHENÆUM [A] was a publick edifice of Rome, built by the Emperor Hadrian,

[A] ATHENÆUM.] This name being derived from Minerva, who in Greek is called Ἀθηνᾶ, the Goddeſs of polite Arts and Sciences; it was thought juſt, that a building erected in favour of the Men of learning ſhould bear the name of that Goddeſs. Some Writers have imagined that it was a Temple conſecrated to her; but Aurelius Victor does not give us this idea of it. Gymnaſia, ſays he (1) ſpeaking of the Emperor Hadrian, Doctoreſque curare occæpit, adeo quidem ut etiam ludum ingenuarum artium, quod Athenæum vocant, conſtitueret: i. e. "He began to take "care of the ſchools and profeſſors, ſo that he built "a college for the liberal Arts, which is called A-"thenæum." The other Hiſtorians, who ſpeak of it, only repreſent it as a place for Declamations and Lectures. Ad Athenæum audiendorum & Græcorum & Latinorum Rhetorum vel Poetarum cauſſâ frequenter proceſſit: i. e. "He frequently went to the "Athenæum in order to hear the Greek and Latin "Rhetoricians and Poets." Thus Lampridius ſpeaks of Alexander Severus. This paſſage is quoted in Calepin immediately after we are told there, that the Athenæum was conſecrated to Minerva, and that the Poets and other Greek Writers brought their works thither, as the Latin Writers carried their compoſitions to the temple of Apollo. We may judge

(1) In Hadriano.

Hadrian [B], in order to ſerve for an Hall to the Doctors, and thoſe, who wanted to read their writings before a conſiderable number of people. It appears from the beginning of Juvenal's Satyrs, that this manner of reading in publick was very common, and that Fronto lent the uſe of his houſe and gardens to the Poets, who had occaſion to recite their verſes before a numerous audience (a). Several other perſons granted the uſe of their houſes for that purpoſe (b); but it happened unfortunately for the Poets, that they often left them very conſiderable expences to defray [C]. It belonged to the perſon who was to read his compoſitions, to furniſh the room, and to pay the charge of the ſeats. There is ſome probability that the Emperor Hadrian, who had a great regard and good taſte from hence of the accuracy of thoſe, who compiled or corrected that great Dictionary. Cruquius made uſe of the ſame diviſion; he ſends the Latin Poets to the temple of Apollo, and the Greek Poets to the temple of Minerva; which he calls Athenæum (2). But let us continue to examine what the ancients have ſaid concerning the place in queſtion. Cum Pertinax eo die proceſſionem, quam ad Athenæum paraverat, ut audiret Poetam, ob ſacrificii præſagium diſtuliſſet (3): i. e. "When Pertinax deferred going "that day, as he had reſolved, to the Athenæum, "to hear the Poet, on account of the omen at the "ſacrifice." Another Hiſtorian tells us, that Gordian, who was Emperor, had declaimed in the Athenæum; Ubi adolevit, in Athenæo controverſias declamavit (4). Philoſtratus tells us, that the Sophiſt Hadrian, who had gained the ſuperiority at Rome, had no ſooner given out, that he would harangue, but the Senators, Knights, and all the ranks of men, crowded to the Athenæum. Δρόμῳ ἐχώρουν ἐς τὸ Ἀθήναιον ὁμοῦ μέσοι (5). Let us add the following words of St. Jerom, Quando omne Athenæum Scholaſticorum vocibus perſonabat (6): i. e. "When the whole A-"thenæum reſounded with the voices of the Scho-"laſticks." And theſe of Sidonius Apollinaris; Dignus omnino, quem plauſibilibus Roma foveret ulnis, quoque recitante crepitantis Athenæi ſubſellia cuneata quaterentur (7): i. e. "He was worthy to be encou-"raged by the approbation of Rome, and that when "he recited his works, the crowded ſeats of the re-"ſounding Athenæum ſhould be ſhaken with the ap-"plauſe." The Etymology, which Dion Caſſius gives us, is a new reaſon againſt thoſe, who ſuppoſe the Athenæum to have a Temple of Minerva. He tells us, that this place was called ſo on account of the exerciſes of the Men of Letters there ἀπὸ τῆς ἐν αὐτῷ τῶν πεπαιδευμένων ἀσκήσεως (8). He informs us likewiſe, that the Conſul aſſembled the Senate in the Athenæum, when he heard that the Pretorian Cohorts had ſeized the murderers of Pertinax. The objection which may be drawn from this, that the Senate met only in places conſecrated by the Augurs, is not of equal force with the reaſons, which prove that the Athenæum was not a Temple of Minerva. Thoſe Writers who aſſert, that the firſt place which was called Athenæum, was in Athens (9), would find it very difficult to prove it. The Abbé des Marolles underſtood this word in a ſenſe ſtill more falſe; for he tells us in his Tranſlation of Aurelius Victor, that Hadrian ſent for the Men of Learning from all parts, as if he would have transferred Athens to Rome.

I ſhall obſerve by the by, that in the city of Alexandria the Poets, Rhetoricians, and Grammarians aſſembled themſelves in the Temple of the Muſes, in order to diſplay their genius. Ἀπάγει παρὰ τὸ τέμενος τῶν Μουσῶν· ἔνθα ποιηταὶ καὶ ῥήτορες καὶ τῶν γραμματικῶν οἱ παῖδες φοιτῶντες, ποιοῦνται τὰς ἐπιδείξεις. [B] It was built by the Emperor Hadrian.] I have proved this by the paſſage of Aurelius Victor, ſo that Caſaubon is extremely miſtaken in ridiculing Theodorus Marſilius, whom he treats with great ſeverity without naming him (10). The latter makes uſe of a great deal of impertinent pains in his Commentary upon Perſius, to prove, that the Athenæum and the Temple of Apollo Palatinus were the ſame place. Voſſius has taken notice of this error of his, and cenſures Father Raderus for the ſame in his Commentary upon the LXXth Epigram of the Xth Book of Martial (11). He might likewiſe have cenſured Savaro on the ſame account, who by theſe words of Horace, underſtands that Horace was not willing, that his Verſes ſhould be read in the Athenæum (13). He gives this explication as the very words of an old Scholiaſt. Lipſius makes uſe of the ſame authority, tho' he owns, that another old Scholiaſt underſtands in that place by ædem the Temple of Apollo Palatinus (14). "He borrows the uſe of an houſe, "he builds a hall to hear in, and hires ſeats, in or-"der that he may gain ſucceſs by reciting his works." Juvenal will ſerve me for a ſecond authority; for he threatens the Poets with the mortification of not meeting with any Nobleman, who will allow them a ſufficient ſum, to reimburſe them for the expences, which they have been at:

Nemo dabit regum quanti ſubſellia conſtent,

I would not poſitively affirm, that they never recited in a houſe, which they hired; but I cannot help ſaying, that Voſſius affirms it without any ground, ſince the teſtimonies, which he quotes, ſignify nothing leſs than what he pretends. The firſt paſſage, which he cites, is that from the Dialogue de Cauſis corruptæ Eloquentiæ, in which we have ſeen above the words domum mutuatur, which ſignifies an Houſe, the uſe of which is borrowed, and not an hired Houſe. The ſecond is that from Juvenal, which is as follows:

" But to your ſhare to try what Fame will fall,
" Any great Man will lend an empty hall."

It is very evident, that in this paſſage as well as in the preceding there is no mention at all of the Poets hiring of a room in order to recite their Poems, that one cannot conceive how ſuch miſtakes could eſcape the obſervation of Voſſius, in a book printed during the Author's life (19), and entitled de Imitatione cum oratoriâ tum præcipuè poeticâ, deque Recitatione Veterum: Of Imitation with regard to Oratory and eſpecially Poetry; and of the Manner of Authors reciting their works among the ancients." This laſt ſubject has been treated fully by Creſollius in his Theatre of the ancient Sophiſts.

☞ATHENÆUS a Phyſician, was born at Attalia, a city of Cilicia. He was contemporary with Pliny [A], and was the founder of the Pneumatic Sect. His doctrine was (a), that the Fire, Air, Water and Earth are not the true elements, as is generally ſuppoſed, but that their qualities are ſo, namely Heat, Cold, Moiſture and Dryneſs. To theſe he added a fifth element, which he called Spirit (πνεῦμα), whence his Sect had its name. He thought that this Spirit penetrated all bodies, and kept them in their natural ſtate; this he borrowed from the Stoicks, whence Galen calls Chryſippus one of the moſt famous of thoſe Philoſophers, the father of the Pneumatic Sect. We find a hint of this doctrine alſo in Virgil [B]. But Athenæus was the firſt who applied it to Phyſick. He thought that in the greateſt part of diſeaſes, this Spirit was the firſt that ſuffered; and that the pulſe (b) was only a motion cauſed by the natural and involuntary dilatation of the heat in the arteries and heart. We have but very little of this famous Author remaining, ſo that we muſt look for a farther account of the doctrines of this Sect in the writings of Aretæus (c).

[A] He was contemporary with Pliny.] We may conjecture that he lived after Themiſon, by a paſſage of Galen, wherein he tells us that Magnus, who was a follower of Athenæus, had compoſed a Diſcourſe on the diſcoveries made after Themiſon. It is very probable that Magnus wrote this book with a view to relate the innovations his maſter had made in Phyſick. That he was not before Celſus is probable, becauſe this Author makes no mention of him. The ſame may be ſaid with regard to Pliny. We may farther obſerve, that Archigenes, who did not write after the time of Adrian, was the diſciple of Agathinus, and he of Athenæus. Now if we allow Athenæus to be but fifty years older than Archigenes, which is about the ſpace between the beginning of the reign of Veſpaſian and that of Adrian, he cannot be later than Pliny; and this Author's ſilence concerning him ſeems to ſhew that he is not more ancient.

[B] We find a hint of this doctrine in Virgil.] It is in the 6th Æneid,

Principio cœlum, ac terras, campoſque liquentes,
Lucentemque globum Lunæ, Titaniaque aſtra
Spiritus intus alit, totamque infuſa per artus
Mens agitat molem, & magno ſe corpore miſcet.

" Know firſt, that heav'n and earth's compacted frame,
" And flowing waters, and the ſtarry flame,
" And both the radiant lights, one common ſoul
" Inſpires, and feeds, and animates the whole.
" This active mind infus'd through all the ſpace,
" Unites and mingles with the mighty maſs."

ATHENÆUS, a Greek Grammarian, born at Naucratis in Egypt, flouriſhed in the third Century [A]. He was one of the moſt learned men of his time. He had read ſo much, and remembered ſuch a variety of things, that he might be juſtly ſtiled the Varro

[A] Athenæus . . . . flouriſhed in the third Century.] Tanaquil Faber has cenſured Helvicus, who quoting Suidas, has placed Athenæus under the Emperor Antoninus Pius (1). Here are two errors; for Suidas makes him flouriſh under Marcus Aurelius, and does not deſerve to be copied in this point, ſince Oppian, who dedicated a Poem to the Emperor Caracalla (2), died before Athenæus. Helvicus therefore ought to have placed Oppian fifty years after our Author. This is one error, which Faber objects to him; and he aſſerts that Athenæus lived at the ſame time as Herodian, who concluded his Hiſtory in the year 238. It is certain that Athenæus places himſelf later than Oppian: Καὶ τὸν ὀλίγῳ πρὸ ἡμῶν γενόμενον Ὀππιανὸν τὸν Κίλικα (3): i. e. " And Oppian the Cilician, who " liv'd a little before us." He ſays this, when he ſpeaks of ſeveral Authors, who had written upon fiſhing. It will undoubtedly be objected, that he ſays in another place (4), that he knew the Poet Pancrates, who received ſome preſent from the Emperor Hadrian. But this will not prove any conſiderable difficulty. It is ſufficient to ſuppoſe, that this Pancrates was very young at that time, that he lived eighty years, and that he died before Athenæus was twenty years of age. We ſhall find, that nothing hinders the latter from having lived till the time of the Emperor Gordian. If Mr. Tillemont had recollected the Greek paſſage of Athenæus, which I have quoted, the old age, which he ſuppoſes our Author muſt have reached to, would have appeared ſtill more ſurprizing to him; for he imagines him to have been very old, only from the ſuppoſition that his work was written after the death of Commodus; and the reaſon which he gives is, that Athenæus knew the Poet Pancrates, who was famous in the time of Hadrian (5). He does not object againſt Suidas, who has placed him under Marcus Aurelius; tho' that Author deſerves to be cenſured in conſequence of the Greek paſſage, which we have ſeen above. It cannot juſtly be urged, that it is not Athenæus, who affirms that he knew the Poet Pancrates; but that theſe words are Callixenus the Rhodian's, whom he had quoted juſt before. This ſuppoſition cannot be admitted. Caſaubon has very well ſhewn that Callixenus's words are wanting in Athenæus's Book (6); but he has omitted one very ſtrong reaſon for this conjecture; which is, that the paſſage in queſtion begins thus: Since I have mentioned the city of Alexandria, Callixenus would not have expreſſed

Varro of the Greeks (a). Of all the works which he wrote [B] we have none extant but that which is entitled The Deipnoſophiſts, that is to ſay, The Sophiſts at Table (b), in which he introduces a certain number of learned men of all profeſſions, who diſcourſe upon a great many ſubjects at the table of a citizen of Rome, whoſe name was Larenſius. There is an infinite variety of facts and quotations in this work of Athenæus, which render the reading of it very agreeable to thoſe who are capable of admiring antiquity from a real knowledge of it. But there is no doubt, but that the learned men who were contemporary with the Author, had not ſo favourable an opinion of his work as we have at preſent. Thoſe learned men were able to conſult the originals, and had ſeen moſt of the things which Athenæus propoſed to them, ſo that they conſidered his performances only in the worſt light as a mere compilation and collection of quotations. But with regard to us, who can conſult but a very ſmall part of the Authors cited by him, and can only find in his book an hundred curious particulars which he mentions, we conſider his compilation as a very valuable treaſure; we conſider it only in the moſt favourable light, and we transfer to the Author the eſteem which we have for the rare particulars which he mentions, and which are become rare, only becauſe the books, from which he took them, are not now extant. By this means a compiler, who is abſolutely deſpiſed in the preſent age, will be admired a thouſand years hence, if there ſhall happen in the Republick of Letters the ſame revolutions, which occaſioned the loſs of the greateſt part of the antient Greek and Roman Authors. We cannot be certain, that ſuch a revolution will never happen. We ought not to cenſure thoſe, who compile; they labour perhaps more for the advantage of future ages, than thoſe Authors who borrow nothing from their fellow-writers. We find in the Deipnoſophiſts of our Author ſeveral ſatyrical ſtrokes, and a great many pieces of ſcandalous hiſtory, with a variety of obſcene ſtories. There is no book extant, which has been worſe handled by the Tranſcribers than Athenæus [C]. All the editions which we have of it, are very defective [D]. Some perſon has made an abridgment of this work [E]. Moreri has attempted to ſay ſomething of this, and has ſed himſelf in this manner in a work concerning that city (7). It was Athenæus therefore, who made uſe of that phraſe, after he had concluded what he had quoted out of Callixenus.

[B] The works which he wrote.] He wrote one concerning the Kings of Syria, as he informs us himſelf (8). Voſſius aſcribes to him another concerning the illuſtrious Men and Generals of Armies, who had fought duels (9). He founded this upon the words of the fourth Book: Ὅτι δὲ καὶ οἱ ἔνδοξοι καὶ οἱ ἀγχιμάχοι ἐμονομάχησαν καὶ ἐκ προκλήσεως τοῦτ' ἐποίουν, ἐν ἄλλοις εἰρήκαμεν (10). i. e. "We have obſerved in another place, "that illuſtrious Men and Generals of Armies being "challenged did not refuſe to engage in ſingle com-"bat." This ſubject would be very proper for a particular treatiſe; but it might have been likewiſe inſerted as an Epiſode in another work, and eſpecially by an Author who travels ſo far in a ſhort time, and loves a Rhapſody ſo much as Athenæus. Upon this account Voſſius's opinion is not very certain.

[C] There is no Book extant, which has been worſe handled by the Tranſcribers than Athenæus.] It is impoſſible to reckon the omiſſions, tranſpoſitions, and falſe readings in it, the number of them is ſo great. Theſe faults may be imputed to the Tranſcribers; but with regard to the loſs of part of the work, we muſt not blame them ſo much for it. The two firſt Books are wanting, with the beginning of the third, and the greateſt part of the laſt. To ſupply this loſs in the beſt manner poſſible, the abridgment of what is loſt has been publiſhed with what remains intire; for, as I ſhall ſhew immediately, we have an abridgment of the whole work ſtill extant.

[D] All the Editions, which we have of it, are very defective.] The firſt is that which Aldus Manucius publiſhed in 1514. Marcus Muſurus, a Greek by nation, aſſiſted him in the publication of this Edition. However as they had no good manuſcripts, and were not ſo accurate as was neceſſary in correcting it, there remained an infinite number of faults in it. The Baſil Edition, which followed this in 1535 apud Joannem Valderum in folio, publiſhed by James Bedrot and Chriſtian Herlinus, is equally bad. Natalis Comes ventured to tranſlate Athenæus into Latin. Every one knows that he was a Man of Learning. We find by his Mythology that he had read and ſtudied a great deal; but as he was not at all converſant in critical Learning, it is certain that his tranſlation is the moſt wretched performance imaginable. This is the firſt verſion which was publiſhed of it. Ante omnes (nam de Sanga Romano vereor ut credendum ſit Paulo Jovio,) Latinum fecit Athenæum (11). i. e. "He was the firſt who tranſlated Athenæus into Latin; "for with regard to Sanga the Roman, I am afraid "we cannot truſt Paulus Jovius." Quamvis rumor ſpargeretur Sangam Patritium Romanum, virum, ut aiunt, eximiæ doctrinæ, id præſtitiſſe (12). i. e. "Tho' "there is a report, that Sanga a Roman Patrician, "and a man, as it is ſaid, of excellent learning, per-"formed that taſk." Caſaubon does not tell us where Paulus Jovius ſays this. It is in his Book de Piſcibus Romanis. His words are as follow: Sanga Romanus, Poeta lepidus, cujus beneficio Athenæum Latinum legimus (13). i. e. "Sanga a Roman, and a Poet of "great wit, by whoſe means we read Athenæus in "Latin." But theſe five laſt words are not to be found in the Edition of Baſil in 1561 per Henricum & Petrum Pernam; which ſhews, that Paulus Jovius had acknowledged that he was miſtaken. Dalechamp, a celebrated Phyſician, publiſhed a ſecond tranſlation, which is preferable to that of Natalis Comes, and would have been much better than it is, if the Author had had leſs practice. But as he applied himſelf to his profeſſion, and only allowed to Athenæus the leiſure, which he had remaining from the attendance upon his patients, he did not perform all that might have been expected from him, tho' for almoſt thirty years together he had devoted to this work all the time, that his employment would allow him (14). This is the utmoſt which has been done for our Author. Dalechamp's Edition, with the Greek on one ſide and the Latin on the other, with the volume of Notes by Caſaubon, is the beſt that can be procured. The Abbé des Marolles has tranſlated this Author into French. I do not at all doubt but that he followed the Latin tranſlation as his only model, and has committed a great number of faults. I know nothing of this performance but from the Journal des Savans (15). It is in 4to, and was printed at Paris in 1680. It is the firſt French verſion of the original, and the laſt compoſition of the Tranſlator. I have been informed, that it ſold ſo well, that it is ſcarce to be met with among the Bookſellers, and bears an exceſſive price. With regard to Sanga's verſion, ſee above the quotations (11), (12), and (13).

placed higher than Euſtathius (17), becauſe Euſtathius has more than once made uſe of the Abridgment of Athenæus preferable to the original, which has occaſioned him to fall into ſome miſtakes (18). Caſaubon aſſerts that this Abridger was ſome Grammarian or other, who undertook the ſame taſk with regard to Athenæus, as Hermolaus had done with regard to Stephanus Byzantinus, and that he deſerves in ſome reſpects to be commended for his learning, and in others to be cenſured for want of exactneſs (19). The manuſcripts of Athenæus were already very much corrupted, when this Abridgment was made. This may be proved by two reaſons. We find in the Abridgment ſeveral corruptions like thoſe of thoſe manuſcripts; and the Author of the Abridgment himſelf confeſſes, that he has omitted ſome things, becauſe they had been falſified (20). Caſaubon had the manuſcript of the Abridgment (21). David Hoeſchelius ſent it to him. The firſt Book and part of the ſecond was wanting in it; ſo that there was retrenched from the beginning of it almoſt all that had been inſerted in the Editions of Athenæus to ſupply what was loſt in the Deipnoſophiſts.

[F] Moreri has attempted to ſay ſomething of this; and has been greatly miſtaken.] His words are as follow: Athenæus wrote a work of the Deipnoſophiſts in fifteen Books, which Hermolaus of Byzantium abridged, according to Suidas. I ſhall ſay nothing of his omiſſion. It is evident that he ſhould have told us, whether what we have is the work itſelf, or only the abridgment of it, which he ſpeaks of. But let us confine ourſelves to his faults of commiſſion. I. It is falſe, that Hermolaus of Bizantium abridged Athenæus. II. It is falſe, that Suidas ſays it. III. It is falſe, that Suidas has mentioned any one, who abridged the Deipnoſophiſts. Caſaubon ſeemed to me at firſt to have been the occaſion of theſe miſtakes; I mean, the innocent occaſion of them; for who could have imagined, that any perſon could have ſtumbled in theſe word? Putem confectum Conſtantinopoli ante annos quingentos & amplius hanc Epitomen ab aliquo Grammatico, qualis fuit Hermolaus Byzantius Auctor eorum Excerptorum, quæ hodie pro Ἐθνικῶν Stephani libris in doctorum manibus verſantur (22). i. e. "I ſhould "think, that this Abridgment was made at Conſtan"tinople above five hundred years ago by ſome Gram"marian; ſuch an one as Hermolaus of Byzantium, "the Author of thoſe Excerpta, which are at preſent "in the hands of learned men inſtead of Stephanus's "Ethnica." But I found afterwards, that it was Charles Stephens, who miſled Moreri. I am of opinion, that Volaterranus was the firſt, who falſely aſſerted, that Suidas ſays, that Hermolaus of Byzantium had abridged Athenæus. This error of Volaterranus was taken in the Edition of Athenæus in 1535, as we may be informed without conſulting that Edition by Geſner's Bibliotheca. How eaſy ſoever it was to avoid the falling into the ſame miſtake, ſince Geſner took notice of it, yet it is certain, that Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hoſman have run into it, and have likewiſe aſſerted what is ſtill worſe, that we have nothing of Athenæus remaining but the Abridgment of Hermolaus of Byzantium. Opus, quod ad nos ſane haudquaquam integrum pervenit; ejus Epitome ab Hermolao Byzantio TANTUM relicta, Authore Suidâ. i. e. "A work, which has not come "down to us entire, the Abridgment of it by Her"molaus of Byzantium ONLY remaining, according "to Suidas."

(22) Idem, Animadv. pag. 3.

[G] All that he tells us . . . . of two other perſons of that name is very defective.] Theſe two are Athenæus the Hiſtorian and Athenæus the Philoſopher. Moreri tells us, that the former wrote the Hiſtory of Semiramis, and that this Hiſtory is to be found in the ſecond Book of Diodorus Siculus, and that Muretus has copied it without quoting the Author. A reader muſt be very inattentive not to perceive, that thoſe words contain ſomething of a contradiction. Is it uſual for an Hiſtorian to place in a little corner of his work all that another Hiſtorian wrote concerning a long reign and one very fruitful in events? Could a critic of Muretus's character include in one of his ſhort chapters (23) the whole Life of Semiramis? This is abſurd. He ſhould therefore have expreſſed himſelf in ſome ſuch manner as this: Diodorus Siculus relates an action of Semiramis, and quotes an Author, whoſe name was Athenæus. Muretus relates the ſame action without citing any Author. To conclude from thence, that this Athenæus had written the Hiſtory of Semiramis, and conſequently that he ought to be placed among the Hiſtorians, is too haſty a way of proceeding. For upon ſuch a view Seneca muſt have written the Hiſtory of almoſt all the great Men; for there is ſcarce any one, of whom he has not mentioned ſome action or other, or ſome remarkable ſentence. This is urged in oppoſition to Voſſius, who at all adventures has placed the Author mentioned by Diodorus Siculus among the Hiſtorians. But he has taken care not to aſſert poſitively, that this Athenæus wrote the Hiſtory of Semiramis.

(23) It is the 17th of the 6th book of his Variæ Lectiones. Moreri has quoted it; but the quotation is placed under the article of ATHENÆUS the Phyſician.

With regard to Athenæus the Philoſopher, it is a miſtake, that Strabo quoted by Moreri affirms that he taught at Rome the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle; that upon his return home, he was accuſed of having a deſign of forming a Republick, and that he was ſeized. What Strabo tells us is as follows (24): "Athenæus, "a Peripatetic Philoſopher, born at Seleucia in Cili"cia, had a ſhare in the Government, and was a De"magogue (25) in his own country for ſome time. "Afterwards he became an intimate friend of Murena, "and fled away with him, when it was diſcovered, "that Murena conſpired againſt Auguſtus. He was "ſeized in his flight, but the Emperor not finding "him guilty, ſet him at liberty. Athenæus returned "to Rome, and repeated to thoſe, whom he met, theſe "words of Euripides,

"I am juſt come from the cave of the dead and the "gates of darkneſs." It is impoſſible to conceive whence theſe errors of Moreri ſprung; for it ſeems to be more difficult to give ſuch a falſe repreſentation of things, than to relate them as they are to be found.

☞ATHENODORUS ſurnamed Cordylio, a very eminent Stoic Philoſopher, was probably of Pergamus (a), where he lived till he was very much advanced in years. He conſtantly refuſed to accept the favours which Kings and Generals would have beſtowed upon him. Cato the younger being in Aſia at the head of an army, and knowing the merit of this great man, was very deſirous of having him with him; but thinking that a letter would not prevail upon him to leave his retirement, he reſolved to go himſelf to Pergamus, and by his entreaties and prayers, he prevailed upon Athenodorus to follow him to the camp, whither he returned in a triumphant manner, being more remarkable for his new acquiſition, than Lucullus or Pompey could be for the conqueſts they had made (b). Athenodorus continued till his death with Cato, in whoſe houſe he died (c). He is perhaps the ſame who is mentioned by Diogenes Laertius [A], in the Life of Zeno Citticus.

☞ ATHENODORUS the ſon of Sandon was a famous Stoic Philoſopher. He was born at Tarſus (a), or perhaps in a village near it, whence he was ſurnamed Cananita. He went to the court of the Emperor Auguſtus, but we cannot tell at what age. The Emperor beſtowed the greateſt honours upon him (b), and made him Tutor to Tiberius (c). It appears that Auguſtus had a very great eſteem for him, and found by experience that Athenodorus was a man of virtue and probity (d). This Philoſopher uſed to ſpeak very freely to the Emperor, and to give him advice even in a very extraordinary manner, of which we ſhall relate an inſtance in the note [A]. Having continued at court till he was very old, he deſired leave to return into his own country, which the Emperor granted him. Before he went away, he warned the Emperor not to give himſelf up to anger, but, whenever he ſhould be in a paſſion, to rehearſe the four and twenty letters of the alphabet, before he reſolved to ſay or do any thing; whereupon Auguſtus taking him by the hand, I want, ſaid he, your aſſiſtance ſtill longer, and kept him for a year more (e). Plutarch, who tells us this, relates in another place an action of Athenodorus, which ſhews, that this Philoſopher had very good principles even in his youth [B]. When he was returned to Tarſus, he there laboured to reſtore the liberty of his country, where one Boetius, as bad a Poet as a Citizen, having gained the favour of the mob, acted the Tyrant. Athenodorus finding the city in a very ill ſituation, endeavoured at firſt by good words to reclaim Boetius and his followers; but finding that his mildneſs only encreaſed their pride and inſolence, he at laſt reſolved to exert the power which the Emperor had given him, and baniſhed Boetius, with his chief partizans (f). We are not told when he died, but ſince he was very old when he left the court of Auguſtus, it is very probable that he did not live to ſee how unſucceſsful he had been in the education of Tiberius. He wrote ſeveral works [C], mentioned by the Ancients, but none of them are extant.

of the Books there, all what had been ſaid amiſs by the Stoics: but this being diſcovered, brought Athenodorus into ſome danger, ſo that he reſtored again the paſſages, which he had eraſed. Now ſince Athenodorus Cordylio lived a long time at Pergamus, where Cato met him, and ſince he was a great Stoic, it is probable that he was zealous enough for the glory of his ſect, to expunge out of their Books, whatever might be a diſhonour to them. We may obſerve, that we do not find, that the Athenodorus, of whom we ſhall give an account in the next article, ever was at Pergamus, tho' his native place not being very far from that city, we dare not be poſitive. If Diogenes Laertius had been more careful to diſtinguiſh the perſons, of whom he ſpeaks, when they have the ſame name, he would have ſaved the critics a great deal of trouble. He mentions in the ſame place (2), another Athenodorus, who was the diſciple of Zeno Citticus, and conſequently much more ancient than Athenodorus Cordylio.

[A] An inſtance of his free advice to the Emperor.] It is well known that Auguſtus extremely loved the company of women, and that even the Roman Senators often ſent him their wives, who were generally in a covered chair or litter, that they might not be ſeen. It happened one day, that Athenodorus met a Senator, who was extremely concerned, becauſe the Emperor had ſent for his wife, who was very beautiful. The Philoſopher took hold of this opportunity, to make the Emperor ſenſible of the danger to which he expoſed himſelf by theſe practices. He put himſelf into the chair inſtead of the Senator's wife, and taking a naked ſword in his hand, he ordered the chairmen to carry him to Auguſtus. As ſoon as he was come into his preſence, he ruſhed out of the chair ſword in hand, as tho' he had intended to murther the Emperor, who was at firſt exceedingly terrified; but when Athenodorus had acquainted him with his intention, Auguſtus was very well pleaſed with the contrivance, and promiſed upon oath never to expoſe himſelf thus any more (1). Cedrenus, who gives us a very particular account of this, is miſtaken, where he calls Athenodorus an Alexandrian. Strabo, who was this Philoſopher's contemporary, was no doubt better acquainted with the place of his birth; and he tells us (2) expreſly that Tarſus was his native country, πατρὶς.

[B] This Philoſopher had very good principles even in his youth.] He had an elder brother called Xeno, who was left guardian to him, and had ſquandered away the beſt part of his eſtate. At laſt he was condemned for a rape, and all his goods confiſcated. Athenodorus was at that time very young, and part of his brother's confiſcated eſtate being delivered to him, he would not forſake him, but gave him half of the eſtate; and tho' his brother acted in a very ungrateful manner to him, even at the time when he ſhared his eſtate with him, yet he did not ſhew him the leaſt reſentment, but ſupported with the utmoſt patience, and greatneſs of mind his brother's ill-nature (3).

[C] He wrote ſeveral works.] Athenæus mentions one (4), intitled, περὶ σπουδῆς καὶ παιδιᾶς, i. e. "Of "things ſerious and jocoſe." Laertius quotes (5) the eighth Book of a work, intitled, περιπάτων, Diſſertations, in which Athenodorus ſaid, that one Diogenes of Tarſus uſed to anoint himſelf, which made him always look neat and bright. Strabo ſays (6), that he wrote concerning the ocean, and its tide. Laſtly, we find in Stephanus (7), that Athenodorus wrote the hiſtory of his own country. Stephanus's words are, Ἐπὶ ὁ Ἀγχιάλη κλίσμα τ' Ἀγχιάλης τῆς Ἰαπέτου θυγατρὸς, ὡς Ἀθηνόδωρος περὶ τῆς αὐτῆ πατρίδης γράφων, &c. i. e. "Anchiale was founded by Anchiale the daughter of "Japetus, as Athenodorus writes in his Book concern-"ing his own country." However, we cannot be poſitive that all theſe works were written by the ſame Athenodorus, tho' nothing appears to the contrary, as Voſſius (8) juſtly obſerves.

☞ ATKYNS (RICHARD), was deſcended from a good family [A], and born at Tuffleigh in Gloceſterſhire in the year 1615, and having been educated in Grammar Learning, was ſent to Baliol College in Oxford in 1629, and continued there two years as a Gentleman Commoner. He removed from thence to Lincoln's-Inn, and ſoon after travelled into France with the ſon of Thomas Lord Arundel of Wardour by a ſecond cond Venter; but the young Gentleman dying there, he returned home, and improved himſelf in the accompliſhments of a Courtier, and then married, which laſt circumſtance proved very unfortunate to him in the latter part of his life. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars he raiſed a troop of horſe for the King at his own charge, and ſerved him in a very particular manner; for which he afterwards ſuffered extremely in his eſtate. At the Reſtoration, being then a Colonel, he was made one of the Deputy-Lieutenants of Gloceſterſhire, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his attachment to the Government and to the Church of England. He wrote ſeveral Tracts [B]. At laſt being committed

[A] Was deſcended from a good family.] His father was ſon and heir of Richard Atkyns of Tuffleigh in Gloceſterſhire, Eſq; who was Chief Juſtice of Weſt-Wales, and one of Queen Elizabeth's Council of the Marches in Wales, and brother to Sir Edward Atkyns of Lincoln's Inn, one of the Barons of the Exchequer. His mother was ſecond daughter of Sir Edwin Sandys of Latimer in Bucks, Baronet, by his wife the Lady Elizabeth Sandys of the Vine near Baſingſtoke in Hampſhire, deſcended from Margaret Bray, the only child of John Bray, next brother and heir to Sir Reginald Bray, Knight-Banneret, and Knight of the Garter, who died without iſſue (1).

[B] He wrote ſeveral tracts.] I. The Original and Growth of Printing, London 1664 in four ſheets in 4to. II. His Vindication. London 1669 in 4to. III. A Relation of ſeveral paſſages in the Weſtern War of England, wherein he was concerned. IV. Sighs and Ejaculations. Theſe two laſt pieces were printed with his Vindication. We ſhall give the reader ſome account of his Original and Growth of Printing, from Mr. Palmer's General Hiſtory of Printing, publiſhed at London in 1732, in 4to. Book III. Chap. I. All our Engliſh writers, who have mentioned the Introduction of that art into England before Mr. Atkyns, and particularly Stowe, Baker, and Howel, have proceeded only upon conjecture or common and fallacious reports; or perhaps the firſt of the abovementioned writers led the reſt into theſe miſtakes, that printing was not invented till the year 1459, nor brought into England till 1471; that the firſt preſſes were ſet up at the Abby of Weſtminſter; that Dr. Iſlip, Abbot of Weſtminſter, firſt introduced the art into England; and that London had it at leaſt ten years before any other city of Europe, except Mentz and Harlem. The falſity of ſeveral of theſe particulars appears from the firſt Book of the General Hiſtory of Printing abovementioned; and the reſt are manifeſtly diſproved by a Book in the Library of the late Lord Pembroke, which was printed at Oxford in 1468. But in 1664, Mr. Atkyns publiſhed his account of this Book, and of an old Manuſcript Chronicle, preſerved at Lambeth in the Archbiſhop's Palace, in his Original and Growth of Printing, which he publiſhed by order of Sir Will. Morrice then Secretary of State. The deſign of this Book, which is little more than an invective againſt the company of Stationers, is to prove that Printing is a branch of the Royal Prerogative, and a Flower of the Engliſh Crown. But the Chronicle, which a friend of his ſent him a copy of, is far from being of undoubted authority, ſince it is liable to theſe exceptions; 1. That neither Mr. Atkyns nor his anonymous friend pretend to have ſeen the original, much leſs to have compared the copy with it. 2. They give no account when and by whom this Chronicle was written, and how it was bequeathed to the Library at Lambeth. 3. No Author beſides Mr. Atkyns mentions this Chronicle in that Library, except thoſe, who wrote it from him; tho' that Author expreſſed his hopes, that his Book would occaſion the diſcovery and publication of it for the ſatisfaction of the public. 4. It is not to be found there now, the late Earl of Pembroke having employed a perſon to ſearch for it, but in vain. 5. It gives an account of ſome particulars, abſolutely inconſiſtent with the more authentic accounts which we are now maſters of, with reſpect to the circumſtances of the firſt diſcovery of the art; ſo that we may ſuppoſe, that whoever the Author was, he has taken ſome part of his account from common report and from the Dutch, who have claimed the invention. We may add to this, that Mr. Atkyns has interſperſed his own obſervations, in the account of the author of the Chronicle in ſuch a manner, that it is very difficult to diſtinguiſh them exactly. However, as it gives the moſt probable and clear account of this affair, we ſhall preſent the reader with the Cronicle, which is as follows. Thomas Bourcher, Archbiſhop of Canterbury moved the then King (Henry VI) to uſe all poſſible means for procuring a mold (for ſo 'twas then called) to be brought into this Kingdom. The King (a good man and much given to works of this nature) readily hearkened to the motion, and taking private advice how to effect this deſign, concluded it could not be brought about without great ſecrecy, and a conſiderable ſum of money given to ſuch perſon or perſons, as would draw off ſome of the workmen from Harlem in Holland, where John Guthenberg had newly invented it, and was himſelf perſonally at work. 'Twas reſolved that leſs than one thouſand marks would not produce the deſired effect; towards which ſum the Archbiſhop preſented the King with three hundred marks. The money being now prepared, the management of the deſign was committed to Mr. Robert Tournour, who then was of the robes to the King, and a perſon moſt in favour with him, of any of his condition. Mr. Tournour took to his aſſiſtance Mr. Caxton, a citizen of good abilities, who trading much into Holland might be a creditable pretence, as well for his going as ſtaying in the Low-countries. Mr. Tournour was in diſguiſe (his beard and hair quite ſhaven off;) but Mr. Caxton appeared known and publick. They having received the ſaid ſum of one thouſand marks, went firſt to Amſterdam, then to Leyden, not daring to enter Harlem itſelf; for the town was very jealous, having impriſoned and apprehended divers perſons, who came from other parts for the ſame purpoſe. They ſtayed till they had ſpent the whole one thouſand marks in gifts and expences, ſo that the King was fain to ſend five hundred marks more; Mr. Tournour having written to the King, that he had almoſt done his work, a bargain (as he ſaid) being ſtruck between him and two Hollanders for bringing off one of the workmen, who ſhould ſufficiently diſcover and teach this new art. At laſt with much ado they got off one of the under workmen, whoſe name was, Frederick Corſells (or rather Corſellius,) who late one night ſtole from his fellows in diſguiſe into a veſſel prepared before for that purpoſe, and ſo the wind (favouring the deſign) brought him ſafe to London. 'Twas not thought ſo prudent to ſet him on work at London, but by the Archbiſhop's means, who had been Vice-Chancellor and afterwards Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxon, Corſellis was carried with a ſtrong guard to Oxon; which guard conſtantly watched to prevent Corſellis from any poſſible eſcape, till he had made good his promiſe, in teaching how to print; ſo that at Oxford printing was firſt ſet up in England; which was before there was any printing-preſs or Printer in France, Spain, Italy, or Germany, except the city of Mentz, which claims ſeniority as to printing, even of Harlem itſelf, calling herſelf Urbem Moguntinam artis Typocraphicæ inventricem primam; tho' 'tis known to be otherwiſe, that city gaining that art by the brother of one of the workmen of Harlem, who had learned it at home of his brother, and after ſet up for himſelf at Mentz. This preſs at Oxon was at leaſt ten years before there was any printing in Europe (except at Harlem and Mentz,) where alſo it was but new born. This preſs at Oxford was afterwards found inconvenient to be the ſole printing place of England, as being too far from London, and the ſea; whereupon the King ſet up a preſs at St. Albans, and another at the Abby of Weſtminſter, where they printed ſeveral books of Divinity and Phyſick; for the King, for reaſons beſt known to himſelf and council, permitted then no law-books to be printed, nor did any Printer exerciſe that art, but only ſuch as were the King's ſworn ſervants, the King himſelf paying the price and emolument for printing books. Thus far the Chronicle, or Mr. Atkyns's extract from it. But the author of it, as Mr. Palmer obſerves (2), is miſtaken in ſeveral points. 1. In ſuppoſing Harlem to be the place, from whence Corſellis came. It is not probable, that the art was invented there, eſpecially by Guttenberg, or in the year 1459, ſince it appears, that the Pſalter was printed at Mentz by Fauſt two years before that, beſides the ſeveral books printed with wooden blocks. 2. If the book mentioned by Mr. Atkyns to have been printed at Oxford, in 1468, be the firſt book printed there, it is plain, that this city had not the art ten years before any other; becauſe there is extant a book printed at Straſburg, by John Guttenberg in 1458. It was likewiſe at Venice, in the monaſtery of Sublaco, Augſburg, Rome and France before 1468. If it be urged, that there might be other books printed before that at Oxford, or that it required ſome time to provide all the neceſſary materials of a printing-houſe, the ſame plea will equally ſerve for thoſe other places abovemention'd. 3. If we admit Guttenberg to have carried the art to Holland, which is extremely probable, it will ſtill be falſe, that Mentz received it from the brother of one of his workmen. Theſe are the inconſiſtencies and contradictions to plain facts, now certainly known, which derogate from the authority of this Chronicle, and of thoſe, who follow it. We have already hinted, that he rather followed the reports ſpread about from Holland, than made any ſtrict enquiry into this ſubject. This will appear more evident from the following conſiderations. 1. That during the infancy of the art (3), Fauſt and Schoeffer, and together with them Guttenberg, carried on the buſineſs with all poſſible ſecrecy, till the former being obliged to diſcover it at Paris for his own ſafety, being accuſed of magic, and the latter having broken the partnerſhip, and gone to ſet up the art elſewhere, it was thought of no further uſe to conceal his invention. 2. That Mr. Mattaire ſuppoſes, that Guttenberg being caſt at law, and ſentenced to reimburſe his moiety, and pay the charges of the ſuit, went away to Straſburg to evade the ſentence; where not thinking himſelf ſafe from further proſecution, he might really come down to Harlem, and there inſtruct Coſter or ſome others in this art. This ſeems to be more than probable, not only from the author of the Chronicle's mentioning Guttenberg, and not Coſter, as inventor of the art, but likewiſe from his dating the invention nine years later than it was diſcovered; which muſt be aſcribed to its not having been known at Harlem till the year 1459, tho' it had been practiſed at Mentz from the year 1450, or ſoon after. 2. If we conſider that Holland and the Low-Countries were the only places of Germany, into which we traded, whereas the city of Mentz, which lies very far in the Continent, was then little known to us; we ſhall not wonder, that our firſt accounts of the original of printing ſhould be taken from the Dutch, agreeably to their violent claims to the invention of it, and their ſtories invented to deprive Fauſt of the honour of his diſcovery; for the Chronicle acquaints us, that the city of Oxford received it from a fugitive ſervant of Guttenberg, who had learned it from his brother then working with him, and went to ſet it up there. There remains one ſingle difficulty ſtill; why the Chronicle aſcribes the invention to Guttenberg, when all the Dutch writers make no mention of him, but attribute it entirely to their countryman Coſter. To ſolve this, if we ſuppoſe this account given to the author by Frederick Corſellis, or even by Mr. Caxton or Turnour, which is very probable, we may juſtly preſume, that they ſpoke as they were informed upon the place, agreeably to the account which Guttenberg gave of himſelf and of his invention, which the Dutch did not venture to contradict till after his death or departure from Holland, when they aſſumed the whole diſcovery to themſelves, and repreſented Coſter as the ſole inventor, excluſive of every other pretenſion. We have inſiſted the longer upon theſe circumſtances, becauſe they notoriouſly demonſtrate, that thoſe contradictions to plain facts, univerſally known and aſſented to by all but the Dutch writers, confirm the authority of the reſt of the Chronicle; ſince they are exactly drawn from the legends of that nation, which were then generally believed over all the Low-Countries, and were the only accounts that our merchants, and particularly the two gentlemen employed by King Henry VI, could procure concerning the original of printing. And it is not improbable, that what the Chronicle of Mr. Atkyns mentions of the impriſonment of ſeveral perſons at Harlem on ſuſpicion of a deſign to ſteal the art, might be done rather out of fear, leſt any of thoſe ſtrangers ſhould deprive them of their honour by expoſing the vanity of their pretenſions, ſince themſelves could not be ignorant of what was done at Mentz long before that time. But before we diſmiſs this Chronicle, which, as we obſerved above, was unknown till Mr. Atkyns publiſhed it, we ſhall give an account, which Mr. Palmer found in a manuſcript in his poſſeſſion, and which ſeems to be older than the year 1664, when Mr. Atkyns printed his Chronicle. This account entirely agrees, except in a few circumſtances, with that of the Chronicle abovementioned; and is as follows.

The riſe and progreſs of printing in England.

The art of printing was firſt brought into England in the time of Henry VI. at the charges of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (Bourchier,) who employed one Turnour Maſter of the Robes to the King, and one Mr. Caxton a Mercer of London, but uſing the trade of a Merchant, to go to Harlem to endeavour to bring over ſome of the workmen, that had then newly practiſed the art there, who prevailed upon ſome of the under-workmen to come over with them into England, and to teach them their trade. As ſoon as they were landed, they were conveyed under a guard to the Univerſity of Oxford, for fear they ſhould run back again; and there they ſet up a preſs about the year 1467, as appears by ſeveral books, that were printed there about that time. The names of thoſe workmen were Rood an Almayn (or German) and Winken de Worde; and the charges of the journey coſt the Archbiſhop 1500 marks, as appears by ſeveral papers and memorials relating to this matter, that are ſtill extant in the Library at Lambeth. Shortly after there was a preſs ſet up at the Abbey of St. Albans, which continued to the diſſolution, &c.

☞ ATKINS or ETKINS (JAMES), Biſhop of Galloway in Scotland in the 17th Century, was the ſon of Mr. Henry Atkins, Sheriff and Commiſſary of Orkney, and born at Kirkwall in the Stewartry of Orkney. He was educated in the College at Edinburgh, where he commenced Maſter of Arts, and afterwards went to Oxford in order to compleat his ſtudies, eſpecially in Divinity, under Dr. Prideaux, the Regius Profeſſor there, in 1637. He was afterwards appoin ed Chaplain to James Marquis of Hamilton, the King's High Commiſſioner for Scotland; in which ſtation he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that his Patron upon his return to England procured a preſentation for him from the King to the Church of Birſa in the Stewartry of Orkney; where he continued ſome years, and was appointed Moderator of the Preſbytery. [A] His loyalty expoſed him to great inconveniences and dangers till the reſtoration.] In the beginning of the year 1650, when James Marquis of Montroſs landed in Orkney, Dr. Atkins was nominated by the unanimous votes of the Preſbytery to draw up a Declaration in their names and his own; which with their conſent and approbation was publiſhed, and contained very ſtrong expreſſions of loyalty and firm reſolution to adhere to their allegiance to the King. Upon this account the whole Preſbytery was depoſed by the General Aſſembly of the Kirk, which was ſitting at that time at Edinburgh, and the Dr. was likewiſe excommunicated for correſponding with the Marquis, who had fallen under the ſame cenſure. The Council of Scotland immediately paſt an Act for ſeizing of our Divine, in order that he might be tried for his life; but upon private notice from his Kinſman Sir Archibald Primeroſe, who was then Clerk of the Council, he eſcaped to Holland, where he concealed himſelf till the year 1653, when he returned to Scotland, and removed his family to Edinburgh, and lived there privately till 1660 (1).

He was remarkable for his ſincere piety and ſingular learning; and very zealous in oppoſing the taking off of the penal laws againſt Popery in Scotland; and notwithſtanding he was incapable of walking thro' age and ſickneſs, yet he was daily carried to the Parliament, where he declared publickly againſt aboliſhing of theſe laws, and uſed all his efforts to perſuade the Nobility and Gentry to a conſtant adherence to the Proteſtant Religion, and to oppoſe all the deſigns, which might be prejudicial to it (2). ATRAX or ATRACIA (a), a city in Theſſaly (b) upon the Peneus, received its name from Atrax, the ſon of Peneus and Bura, who built it (c). It muſt have been very conſiderable, ſince the Poets ſometimes make uſe of the Epithet Atracian to ſignify Theſſalian [A]. Pliny places the Atracians among the people of Ætolia (d); but we muſt not infer from thence, that he meant a different people from thoſe who inhabited the city of Atrax, which he fixes in Theſſalia (e). The confines of the people and the diviſions of the provinces were frequently changed, and by that means the ſame province or diſtrict, which belonged at one time to Ætolia, was conſidered as belonging to Theſſalia at another time. The river ATRAX, which emptied itſelf in the Ionian Sea (f), paſſed thro' the country of the Atracians.

[A] The Poets ſometimes make uſe of the Epithet Atracian to ſignify Theſſalian.] Ceneus, who was killed in the fight between the Centaurs and Lapithæ at the marriage of Perithous is called Atracides by Ovid (1); not to ſignify that he was the ſon of Atrax, for a little before he ſtiles him the ſon of Elatus (2); but to ſignify in general that he was of Theſſalia. I am not ignorant, that according to other Authors (3) he was the ſon of Atrax. The ſame Poet calls the wife of Perithous ſimply Atracis.

Valerius Flaccus diſtinguiſhes her by theſe words, Atracia Virgo (6).

(6) Argonaut. lib. 1. ver. 141.

We cannot ſuppoſe, that Ovid meant, that ſhe was the daughter of Atrax. This would prove too much. For then Ceneus muſt have had the ſame father; but he has made him the ſon of Elatus, and he has not told us, that Ceneus was brother to the Lady who was married; which would have been an unpardonable omiſſion, if he had thought that he was brother-in-law to Perithous.

I believe that Apuleius imagined, that the proper name of Perithous's wife was Atracis; for as he wrote in proſe, he would not have called her ſo, if he had known that this word was only a poetical figure. Sic inſtar Atracis (ſays he (7), vel (read &) Peritheoi diſpectæ diſturbatæque nuptiæ. Beroaldus has very juſtly diſcovered, that the Author is treating here of Hippodame (or Hippodamia) the wife of Perithous; but when he adds, that ſhe was called Atracis, becauſe ſhe was the daughter of Atrax, who was the firſt Author of Magic among the Theſſalians (8), he advances a thing, which he ought to have brought ſome proofs of; for we do not find that Atrax inſtituted Magic. It is true, that it was ſtiled Ars Atracia (9); but it was only in the ſame ſenſe as Ars Theſſalica, which ſignifies in general Magic, becauſe Theſſaly was famous for it (10). It is in the ſame ſenſe that we ought to underſtand theſe verſes of Valerius Flaccus:

The Scholiaſt upon Statius is the only Writer, if I am not miſtaken, who has aſſerted, that Atrax was the father of Hippodamia; for it is in this manner I would correct the word Hippocatiæ, and not, as Barthius has done, by Hippocrateæ (12). The Scholiaſt upon Homer's Odyſſey B. XXI, Euſtathius upon the ſame paſſage, and Hyginus C. XXXIII, tell us, that Perithous's wife was named Hippodamia, and that ſhe was the daughter of Adraſtus. I cannot tell whether the genitive caſe Ἄδρηκος has not been changed into Ἀδράστου. If this be the caſe, the true name of the father of Hippodamia muſt have been removed to make way for that of Adraſtus. The tranſcribers have introduced ſome alterations as difficult to be made as this. I ſhall produce an inſtance taken from this very ſubject. All the manuſcripts of Lycophron read at preſent ἅρπαγες λύκοι (13), i. e. " ravenous wolves." This ſignifies the Argonauts. But the copy, which Stephanus Byzantinus made uſe of, reads this paſſage, ἄτρακες λύκοι (14), i. e. " Atracian wolves," or wolves of Theſſalia. It is thus Euſtathius has cited this paſſage of Lycophron (15).

As for what Barthius aſſerts, that Atraciæ Oræ in Propertius (16) ſignifies a diſtant place, and that Catullus has made uſe of the word Atracis in the ſame ſenſe (17), is not very well imagined. Some Criticks read in Catullus Atacis, a river in Gaul, and not Atracis, a river of Greece. However that be, we ought not to underſtand what Catullus and Propertius ſay in a literal ſenſe (18). With regard to what Barthius ſuppoſes, that they intended ſome alluſion to the magic Arts, it is a mere ridiculous imagination.

☞ATTERBURY (FRANCIS), ſon of Dr. Lewis Atterbury, mentioned in the preceding article, was born at Milton near Newport-Pagnel in Buckinghamſhire, March the 6th 1662 (a). He was educated at Weſtminſter-School, and from thence elected, with the faireſt promiſes of the Great Man he afterwards proved, to Chriſt-Church-College in Oxford in the year 1680, when he was ſeventeen years of age (b). He ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf there by his fine genius, and admirable ſkill in polite Literature, and gave the public two years after a remarkable inſtance of his poetical talent in his Latin tranſlation of Mr. Dryden's Abſalom and Achitophel [A]. We have likewiſe among his Engliſh juvenile performances in verſe a beautiful Epigram upon a Lady's Fan [B]. June 13th 1684 he took the degree of Bachelor

There was alſo another Latin Verſion of the ſame Poem publiſhed the ſame year at Oxford by Mr. William Coward of Merton College (2), afterwards an eminent Phyſician. The original begins thus;

Mr. Atterbury's Tranſlation is as follows:

Multiplici celebrare jugo connubia leges;
Cum vir ſponſarum numeraverat agmen, & uni

The other Latin Verſion mentioned by Mr. Wood, was publiſhed in 4to. We ſhall give a ſpecimen of the beginning of it, which the learned reader may compare with that of Mr. Atterbury, which ſeems much ſuperior to the other both in elegance and perſpicuity; and Mr. Wood obſerves *, that it was more extolled than that of Coward.

He, on whose birth the lyric Queen
Of numbers smil'd, shall never grace
The Isthmian Gauntlet, nor be seen
First in the fam'd Olympick race.
He shall not after toils of war
And taming haughty Monarch's pride,
With lawrell'd brows conspicuous far,
To Jove's Tarpeian Temple ride.
But him the streams, that warbling flow
Rich Tyber's flow'ry meads along,
And shady groves, (his haunts) shall know
The Master of th' Æolian Song.
The sons of Rome, majestic Rome!
Have fix'd me in the Poet's Choir,
And envy now, or dead, or dumb,
Forbear to blame what they admire.
Goddess of the sweet-sounding lute,
Which thy harmonious touch obeys,
Who canst the sinny race, tho' mute,
To Cygnet's dying accents raise;
Thy gift it is, that all with ease
My new unrival'd honours own;
That I still live, and living please,
O Goddess! is thy gift alone.

The other is that of Ode 9. Book III.

H. Whilst I was fond, and you were kind,
Nor any dearer youth, reclin'd
On your soft bosom, sought to rest,
Phraates was not half so blest.
L. Whilst you ador'd no other face,
Nor lov'd me in the second place,
My happy celebrated fame
Outshone ev'n Ilia's envy'd flame.
H. Me Chloe now possesses whole,
Her voice and lyre command my soul;
Nor would I death itself decline,
Could her life ransom'd be with mine.
L. For me young lovely Calais burns,
And warmth for warmth my heart returns.
Twice would I life with ease resign,
Could his be ransom'd, once with mine.
H. What if sweet love, whose bands we broke,
Again should tame us to the yoke;
Should banish'd Chloe cease to reign,
And Lydia her lost pow'r regain?
L. Tho' Hesperus be less fair than he,
Thou wilder than the raging Sea,
Lighter than down, yet gladly I
With thee would live, with thee would die.

[C] Exerted himself in the controversy with the Papists by publishing An Answer to some considerations on the Spirit of Martin Luther and the Original of the Reformation.] The Considerations, which Mr. Atterbury answered, were written by Mr. Obadiah Walker, Master of University-College; and Mr. Atterbury's Answer was published the 10th of August 1687; to which a Reply was made by Mr. Thomas Deane M. A. and Fellow of University-College (3). Mr. Atterbury observes in the Preface to his Answer, that the Doctrines have for near two Centuries kept the field against all encounterers. And does the Author think, says he, they may be foiled at last by two or three little remarks upon the Life and Actions of a single Reformer? But it looks like a jest, when the irregularities committed by Luther in Germany are turned upon us here in England. As if any thing that he said or did could affect a Church established upon its own bottom, and as independent on any foreign authorities, as the crown her Defender wears. Luther's voice is indeed to us, what our Author (a) terms it, The Voice of a Stranger; and though we are always ready to wipe off the unjust aspersions cast upon him by his enemies, yet this is what we are obliged to, not as sons, but as friends. Whenever injured virtue is set upon, every honest man is concerned in the quarrel. But these last attacks have been so very feeble, that had we for once trusted the cause to its own strength, 'twould have suffered but little damage. He tells us afterwards, that his attempt is confined within the bounds of an answer; and pretends to nothing more than a bare pursuit of the Author step by step; and the laying open his blunders for the reader's ease, just in the same order they lie. There was nothing frightful in this task, but the toil of being forced to think so long upon so very thoughtless a Writer. In all other respects 'twas as easy as one would wish. The History-Part lay within a little room; and the reasonings upon it were so thin, that they needed only setting in the light to be look'd through. In both my greatest helps have been drawn from one single Author the Considerer himself; who in every Book of his has made it appear, that he can write contradictions as well as believe them. In his Answer he considers the objections urged against Luther's doctrines from the pretended defects in his morals, particularly with regard to incontinence, and contention, and disobedience. With respect to the first, he observes (4), that there is no one action thro' the whole course of Luther's Life, that can possibly come under that character, but only his marriage with Bora; which happened not till 1525, whereas he began his Reformation in 1517. Fleshly Lusts therefore could have given no just prejudice against his doctrine, when it first appeared, since his very adversaries do not till long after that charge them upon him. It is likewise certain, that he did not preach against the Vow of Continence till several years after. As for the other charge of contention and disobedience (5); the question is not whether Luther disobeyed, for that is confessed; but when and in what manner he did it. For if upon enquiry it be found, that for near three years together he treated his adversaries with all mildness, and paid a just deference to his superiors; if he threw not off their authority, while there was any hope left of doing things in a regular way, and mingled no gall in his expressions till after all the venomous mouths in Europe had been opened upon him, how can he with any colour of reason be termed contentious or disobedient? And that this was his case any impartial man, that reads the joint accounts of Sleidan, Soave, Melancthon, and Melchior Adamus, must needs acknowledge. Mr. Atterbury afterwards remarks (6), that Luther's doctrine with regard to Justification does not coincide with the Solifidian and Fidiciary opinion; since an hundred instances might be brought from his writings, where the necessity of good works in order to salvation is displayed; which is acknowledged by Cardinal Bellarmin, who allows that Luther taught that good works were in some measure necessary, because he affirms that to be no true faith, which does not produce good works. Lutherus docet aliquo modo necessaria esse bona opera, cum affirmet veram fidem non esse, quæ non parit bona opera (7). . . I will not say, continues our Author (8), that in the prosecution of this he never went awry; he did so in reviving that doubt which was some time in the primitive Church of St. James's Epistle being canonical, because he thought it ran counter to St. Paul; but he withdrew this plea of his, when he was better informed; if quoting from it afterwards, as from Scripture, be owning its authority. . . . Indeed in the first Edition of his German Bible he calls it Straminea, not absolutely, but in comparison with those of St. Paul. But in all the Editions after 1526 it is left out; and the arida, the pamphlet talks of, is in none of them all. He then considers the objections urged against Luther for depretiating religious vows, penance, &c. With respect to the novelty of his opinions, and his marching alone against the doctrine of the primitive ages, it deserves no other answer than that true jest of Scaliger's, Nos non sumus Novatores, sed vos estis Veteratores (9). He never denied the validity of the former Clergy's ordination, but proceeded in the work of his Ministry, without expecting any new mission (10).

ſhewed an uncommon fund of learning, enlivened with that agreeable ſpirit and vivacity peculiar to his writings. miſſion (10). But, it will be ſaid, he rejected the authority of Councils. Yes, ſi quando contraria Scripturæ ſtatuunt, whenever they determine any thing contrary to Scripture; and ſo do all the Reformed as well as he (11). Luther is next arraigned for ſpeaking contemptuouſly of the Fathers; but this is a rank calumny. Let his lateſt writings ſpeak for him in this point (12). I ſay not this, ſays he in his Commentary upon the ſecond chapter of Geneſis, to lay a blot upon the holy Fathers, whoſe labours we ought with veneration to receive. They were great men; but men ſtill. Mr. Atterbury then vindicates him from the imputation of deſpiſing Church-Guides, and yet arrogating to himſelf all the authority of them (13); and he obſerves (14), that as for the heat, with which Luther treated his adverſaries, 'twas ſometimes ſtrained a little too far, but in the general was extremely well fitted by the Providence of God to rouſe up a people the moſt phlegmatic of any in Chriſtendom. Europe lay then under a deep lethargy, and was no otherwiſe to be reſcued from it, but by one, that would cry mightily, and lift up his voice with ſtrength. Beſides, Printing and Letters had juſt peeped abroad in the world, and the Reſtorers of Learning in Italy, taking the advantage of the preſs, wrote very eagerly againſt one another; ſo that invectives were in theſe days the faſhionable way of writing. If Luther therefore mingled a little gall with his ink in his Books of Controverſy, he followed but the humour of the age; and conſidering the ſtupidity, the malice, and the obſtinacy of his readers, cannot but be thought excuſable. I have ſeen at the end of Theodoret's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory a Catalogue of Cæſars, Biſhops, Heretics, &c. where Chryſoſtom is ſet down as guilty of too great ſharpneſs and liberty of ſpeech; but it is added, profecto illorum temporum vitia ſecari atque uri, non levibus medelis curari voluere. And this is the plea we would make for Luther. Our Author then examines the reproach caſt upon that great Reformer for having frequent intercourſes and dialogues with the Devil (15), and particularly for the diſputes between them concerning private Maſſes, againſt which the Devil is ſaid to have urged many reaſons. Mr. Walker having attempted to anſwer theſe reaſons, Mr. Atterbury remarks with a great deal of humour, that the tables are turned, and whereas the ſcene before lay betwixt Luther and Satan, 'tis now betwixt the Devil and the Conſiderer. And for my part, ſays he (16), to give every one his due, I think the Devil has much the better on't. He afterwards obſerves (17), that the Church of England was not concerned in what Luther ſaid or did. Whilſt he was pulling down the Papacy in Germany, ſhe was carrying on the ſame deſign here at home. She had ſtruggled for a Reformation ever ſince Wickliff's days for about a hundred and fifty years together. Her Lollards (as they were called) had all along ſpoken, written, and died for it. She could not however bring it to the birth till about this time, when the eyes of all Europe began to be opened. Then it was ſhe puſh'd it forward, and threw off the Pope's yoke in concert with other churches. Her proceedings, continues he, were regular, and by the joint authorities of the State civil and eccleſiaſtical. If irregularities were done elſewhere, let them anſwer for them, that did them. Whatever Luther's actions at that time might be, they concern us no more than the Hiſtorian's (18) flouriſh about Sultan Selim's conqueſt, does his Hiſtory of Hereſies. They were cotemporary indeed, and that's all; for there's no other dependance between them. But neither is the Reformation in general blaſted by this method. For let Luther be as bad as he will, yet the doctrine of the Apoſtles, and the primitive Church is, we hope, never the worſe for his preaching it. He pretended to no new Revelation; had he done ſo, 'twould have been requiſite perhaps, that he ſhould have lived up to it. He only pointed out ſome old truths, that had lain hid a great while, and detected ſome errors, which in the courſe of time had, like ruſt, overſpread Chriſtianity. Here have we nothing to do but to put ourſelves upon the ſearch, whether thoſe pretences of his to antiquity be true or falſe; for if they be true, 'tis a confeſt point, that they muſt be liſtened to, whoever he be that makes them. Mr. Atterbury therefore concludes (19), that the method of Mr. Walker's pamphlet is every way inſufficient; and let the ſpirit of Martin Luther be as evil as it is ſuppoſed to be, yet the proof of this would not blaſt any ſingle truth of that Religion he profeſſed; tho' upon a faithful enquiry it will be found, that his life was led up to thoſe doctrines he preached, and his death was the death of the Righteous. This piece of our author was the occaſion of Biſhop Burnet's ranking him in the firſt volume of the Hiſtory of his own Time (20) among thoſe eminent Divines, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their admirable defences of the Proteſtant Religion. And Biſhop Atterbury appeals to this himſelf in that part of his ſpeech upon his tryal, where he vindicates himſelf from the ſuſpicion of Popery. Was I, ſays he, influenced by any diſlike of the eſtabliſhed Religion, and ſecretly inclined towards a Church of greater pomp and power? I have, my Lords, ever ſince I knew what Popery was, oppoſed it, and the better I knew it, the more I diſliked it. I begun my ſtudy in Divinity, when the Popiſh controverſy grew hot about that immortal book of Tillotſon's, when he undertook the Proteſtant cauſe in general, and as ſuch I eſteemed him above all. You will pardon me, my Lords, if I mention one thing. Thirty years ago I writ in defence of Martin Luther, and have preached and writ to that purpoſe from my infancy; and whatever happens to me, I will ſuffer any thing; and will, by God's Grace, burn at the ſtake, rather than depart from any material point of the Proteſtant Religion, as profeſſed in the Church of England. Mr. Wynne likewiſe, who was his Council, in his defence of the Biſhop obſerves, "how grievous it was for one of his Lord-"ſhip's character and function, to be taxed with "breaches of his duty to God and man, of ſcandal "to Religion, of deſigns of overthrowing Church and "State in favour of Popery, who happens to be the "only Clergyman in England, that ever thought it "worth his while to draw his pen in defence of Mar-"tin Luther, the great inſtrument of our Reformation "from Popery, and who has upon all occaſions ap-"peared the moſt ſtrenuous aſſerter of it."

ment which he met with in an application to the late Earl of Nottingham, is ſaid to have been the reaſon of his coming up to London (f). For we are told, that ſome time before his father's death having ſollicited that Nobleman in order to ſucceed his father in the Rectory of Milton, the preference was given to Dr. Wotton, ſo that he loſt his expectation of that preferment, which he then called the height of his ambition, and matter of his option, eſpecially as it was the place of his birth. But this diſappointment proved the occaſion of his advancement, for in a ſhort time he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner, that two years afterwards we find him made Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary, and choſen Lecturer of St. Bride's, and Preacher at Bridewell; before the Preſident and Governors of which Hoſpital, and thoſe of Bethlehem, he preached on the 16th of Auguſt 1694, being Election-Day, a remarkable Sermon in Bridewell Chapel on The Power of Charity to cover Sin [E]. October the 21ſt the ſame year he preached before the Queen at Whitehall a Sermon on The Miraculous Propagation of the Goſpel, and

(f) See Mr. Tho. Stackhouſe's Memoirs of the Life and Conduct of Dr. Francis Atterbury late Biſhop of Rocheſter from his birth to his baniſhment, pag. 18, 19. London 1723, in 8vo.

[E] A remarkable Sermon . . . . on the power of Charity to cover Sin.] His text was, 1 St. Peter iv. 8. Charity ſhall cover a multitude of Sins: from whence he inferred this general propoſition, "that the virtue "of Charity is of ſo great price in the ſight of God, "that thoſe perſons, who poſſeſs and exerciſe it in "any eminent manner are peculiarly entitled to the "divine favour and pardon, with regard to number-"leſs ſlips and failings in their duty, which they "may be otherwiſe guilty of. This great Chriſtian "perfection, of which they are maſters, ſhall make "many little imperfections to be overlooked and un-"obſerved; it ſhall cover the multitude of Sins." This occaſioned ſome obſervations upon that Sermon, by Mr. Hoadly, in the Poſtſcript to his ſecond Letter to Dr. Atterbury, publiſhed in the year 1708, and reprinted in his collection of Tracts (21) in 1715, where he obſerves, that he ſhould have left the main doctrine, tho' contrary to the deſign of the text, without any cenſure, conſidering that it might be underſtood only of ſuch unavoidable ſlips and failings, and little imperfections, as have not the wrath of God in another world expreſly revealed againſt them in the Goſpel; but that the particulars, which follow, and the manner, in which this general propoſition is explained, cannot ſo readily be paſſed over. Mr. Hoadly remarks then, that the Charity, which our author ſuppoſes to be of ſuch great efficacy, is ſometimes declared to be the love both of God and man, as comprehending all or almoſt all the moral duties, which is of greater extent than that of St. Peter, and leaves a man uncapable of very groſs Sins. And therefore the man actuated by this divine and comprehenſive virtue may properly, after this, be ſaid to have no ſins to be covered; becauſe Charity in this ſenſe is inconſiſtent with any, and cannot be ſaid to take away the guilt of them, but by taking away their exiſtence. Whereas the Charity meant by St. Peter is Charity among ſt one another, and a mutual forgiveneſs among mankind. But the moſt exceptionable part of Mr. Atterbury's Sermon is, that we are told, that as for thoſe ſins, which a man had fallen into, before the attainment of this gift, they were certainly remitted alſo, and covered before the attainment of it; elſe doubtleſs he had never attained it. On the contrary, we are aſſured in the Goſpel, that unleſs we forgive men their treſpaſſes, our heavenly Father will not forgive us our treſpaſſes, which we have at any time committed againſt him, and that our former ſins ſhall not be covered, till we have attained that Charity, to which the promiſe of forgiveneſs is annexed. Beſides, Mr. Atterbury's doctrine repreſents Charity to be of no force nor account with God with reſpect to our paſt ſins; which, it ſeems, he pardons without any regard to our attainment of Charity, nay, whilſt we are void of it, and before we have attained it; notwithſtanding he has expreſly declared the contrary. Mr. Hoadly then examines the following paſſage of the Sermon, wherein we are told, that the charitable man is peculiarly entitled to the pardon of many ſins, becauſe he is in a peculiar manner liable to incur the guilt of many; whereas juſt before the author had ſaid, that the reſt of the virtues conſtantly attend upon Charity; that no great guilt of any kind can well be thought to harbour in that breaſt, where true Charity dwells; and the charitable man was declared uncapable of committing any heinous ſins. But now he is the moſt liable of all others to incur the guilt of many ſins; and thoſe not of the lighteſt ſort, which proceed, according to Mr. Atterbury, from that frame of mind, on which Charity is grafted; and from the very exerciſe of the virtue itſelf. For Charity, ſays he, is grafted always on good nature and a ſweetneſs of diſpoſition. But this cannot be true, ſince the Goſpel requires the exerciſe of Charity from men of all ſorts of natural diſpoſitions. Beſides the temper, on which alone our author will permit Charity to be founded, is very far from the true good nature; ſince he declares it to be ſuch a temper, as hinders us from arming ourſelves with that ſtubborn, incomplying virtue, which is requiſite to preſerve a man undefiled and blameleſs. It makes us eaſy and yielding, . . . ready to comply with a thouſand things, (of which we are not exactly well ſatisfied) upon the pure ſcore of good nature, &c. This is undoubtedly a ſtrange account of the moſt excellent of Chriſtian virtues, which makes it the daughter of weakneſs, and the companion of a ſhipwreck'd conſcience. Again, the exerciſe of Charity, eſpecially where the principle of it is ſtrong, is declared by our author, to lay us open to ſeveral failings. For inſtance, 1. It makes us omit oftentimes the duties incumbent on us from our profeſſions and callings. 2. It makes us perhaps neglect to take care of thoſe, whom it is the firſt point of Charity to take care of, our children and families. 3. It warms us with ſuch a zeal for doing good, as breaks out ſometimes into acts not reconcileable with the rules of right reaſon; and Saint Francis's preaching the Goſpel to beaſts and birds is given as an inſtance of this: 4. The charitable man, who loves every thing, doth not fail ſometimes to love his own virtue too; to be ſo ſtruck with the excellency of Charity, as to be too little concerned for faith. Mr. Hoadly examines theſe aſſertions; and then proceeds to the third reaſon, which our author aſſigns for the pardon of the charitable man's ſins, which is, becauſe his Charity has engaged the united prayers of multitudes; and no wonder if they prevail. But if his ſins be ſuch as the Goſpel condemns, and he has not forſaken them, the united prayers of the whole creation will avail nothing towards his pardon. If they be ſuch, as Mr. Atterbury improperly ſtiles ſins, ſuch imperfections as are conſiſtent with a ſtate of ſafety, upon the terms declared in the Goſpel, they do not ſtand in need of ſuch united prayers. But what is this to the power of his own Charity to cover his ſins; when this is here aſcribed to the force of the united prayers of others, not to the virtue of his Charity? In the inferences, which our author draws from what he had before laid down, he obſerves, that God hath a right to all the higheſt inſtances and degrees of virtue, that it is poſſible for us to abound in, that we are ſtrictly obliged to practiſe them to the utmoſt; and yet ſo far is he pleaſed to abate of this right, as to accept the performance of one great duty in lieu of the omiſſion (he ſhould have ſaid, the performance) of many others. This Act of Grace he magnifies by obſerving, that reaſon never did or could make this known to the Heathen world; and adds, that the Goſpel hath now revealed it unto us. But Mr. Hoadly aſks, where this Revelation is to be found in the Goſpel, ſince it ſeems directly contrary to the whole tenour of it? This relaxes the obligations, which men are under to the diſcharge of their ſeveral duties; and upon this ſcheme, as Mr. Atterbury himſelf obſerves, we have no reaſon to complain of the ſtrictneſs of our rule, or the hardſhips of our Chriſtian warfare. The rule is ſtrict indeed; but then as there are great helps and aſſiſtances, enabling us to live up to it, ſo great abatements and allowances, we ſee, are made to us at laſt, if we do

In December 1698 he reſigned his Lectureſhip at St. Bride's, as appears by his Farewel-Sermon [G]; in which he tells his audience, that during the ſeven years which he had held that Lectureſhip, he had preached the Goſpel of Chriſt in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity among them, directing his diſcourſes againſt thoſe vicious principles and practices, which ſeemed not. In ſhort, if our author's account of the Goſpel terms be juſt, St. Paul ought not to have ſaid, that the Grace of God bringing ſalvation, hath appeared in the Goſpel, teaching us to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, and to live ſoberly, righteouſly and godlily; but that there is no neceſſity for theſe virtues, but that God will accept of one duty in lieu of many others; and that our performance of that ſhall be our juſtification, notwithſtanding our omiſſion of many others. But this is a ſort of ſalvation, in my judgment, ſays Mr. Hoadly, unworthy of the nature of man to receive, and unworthy of the nature of God to offer.

[F] We ſhall give ſome account of this piece in the note.] Mr. Atterbury having ſaid in his ſermon, that ſome men, who write pretended Hiſtories of Religion, are beholden to the real Religion of others, that their Hiſtories are not written; Sir Robert Howard, the author of the Hiſtory of Religion, who ſuppoſed himſelf to be intended by that paſſage, obſerves, in a letter prefixed to this piece, that as for Mr. Atterbury, he knew him not; but he has made himſelf known, ſays he, by chooſing a very improper place (the pulpit) to vent a paſſion unſuitable to Chriſtianity or common morality; for ſuch muſt an injurious violence be eſteemed, that has no reaſon pretended to excuſe, or at leaſt to extenuate his paſſion. From that place we expect to be taught by perſuaſion, not by railing; yet he ſeems to have a Chriſtian conſideration, that hinders him from writing ſome body's life. If he means mine, I will free him from his tender Chriſtianity, and own that I writ The Hiſtory of Religion; and if he pleaſes to uſe the freedom I give him, I aſſure him, I ſhall not be diſpleaſed at any truth, that he can write; but if his uſual paſſion guides him otherways, I ſhall attend him with ſuch anſwers, and make him ſuch ſuitable returns, as will be proper for the occaſion, and conſider his calling with as little reſpect as he did the ſacred place, where he choſe to rail. The author of the firſt Letter (22) tells us, that Mr. Atterbury's reſentment againſt Sir Robert Howard was particularly occaſioned by a paſſage againſt perſecution; wherein he adviſes the contending parties of Chriſtians, that "ſetting aſide their wranglings about obſcure and undecidable queſtions and myſteries, they would conſider the Goſpel as a doctrine chiefly of love, mercy, and charity, and behave themſelves accordingly towards one another." He remarks likewiſe, that one of the reaſons, which Mr. Atterbury alledges why the ſcorner ſeeketh wiſdom, and findeth it not, is a very ſtrange one; becauſe, ſays our Divine, the Scorner is a man of quick and lively parts; and ſuch men are apt to give themſelves a looſe, beyond plain reaſon and common ſenſe. The author of the Letter remarks upon this (23), that the whole deſign of that part of his ſermon is to ſhew, "that quick and lively parts are marvellous hindrances in the queſt of "wiſdom and truth. According to him, the only "hopeful candidate of wiſdom is Sancho Pancha." He ſaith, continues that author (24), that the thing, which the Scorner ſeeketh for is wiſdom; and yet he adds, he finds it not, becauſe he has quick and lively parts. That is, according to this Student (25), the Scorner ſeeks for what he has, and he miſſes it, becauſe he poſſeſſes it. It is well that the Student's ſermons are ſo ſhort, as they always, I obſerve, are; for theſe are ſuch flat and direct contradictions, that if there were many of them, they would too much expoſe the preacher to the contempt of his very meaneſt hearers. I have done with Father Francis for the preſent; only this, Sir, I ſhall promiſe you, that when he is diſpoſed to try his hand in writing lives, he ſhall have the ſatisfaction to ſee his own picture drawn in ſuch lively colours, as time ſhall not eaſily deface. The ſame author, in his ſecond Letter, in anſwer to the charge of Socinianiſm againſt Dr. Tillotſon conſidered, and to the appendix concerning The Hiſtory of Religion, having treated his antagoniſt Dr. Monroe with great ſeverity, ſtiles Mr. Atterbury a man of learning and wit (26), and very unlike to that Doctor, and obſerves that Sir Robert Howard was ſomewhat concerned, that ſuch a perſon as the former ſhould firſt miſtake the deſign of his book, and then make ſuch haſte to ſcandalize him for it in the Royal preſence, whereas he could not but ſmile at the efforts of the latter. The writer of another little piece in that collection, intitled, The Author of the Hiſtory of Religion vindicated from the ſcandalous and unchriſtian invectives of Mr. F. A. &c. concludes with theſe words (27). A little thinking and reaſoning will perhaps ſatisfy the curious why the author of the Hiſtory of Religion has not been dreſſed up in the San Benito. For reaſon we thus: would Mr. Atterbury be content that his character ſhould be opened, and The Hiſtory of his life drawn forth? He muſt needs have more tenderneſs for his own reputation than ſo. He knows it is not prudence (or ſhould know ſo) to break his neighbour's windows, when his own houſe is made of glaſs. Again, we may conſider, that tho' a dog may bark, and no body mind him, yet if he bite, he may chance to have his teeth knock'd out.

[G] In December 1698 he reſigned his Lectureſhip of St. Bride's, as appears from his Farewel-Sermon.] It was preached on Decemb. 11th 1698, and is the laſt of the ſecond volume of his poſthumous Sermons publiſhed by Dr. Moore. The text is Rom. xii. 18. If it be poſſible, as much as lyeth in you, live peaceably with all men. He obſerves, that he choſe that ſubject, becauſe as it was the laſt opportunity, that he ſhould have of beſpeaking his audience under that character, which he had till then born towards them; and becauſe it was likely therefore, that the conteſt then on foot about the choice of a new Lecturer, might end in the ſame little animoſities and miſunderſtandings, which are uſual on ſuch occaſions. I thought, ſays he (28), I could not do better than to diſcourſe to you upon a ſubject, that might be of ſome uſe to temper and allay them, and to diſpoſe you towards ſuch a peaceable ſtate of mind, as becomes thoſe, who are about to chooſe a Miniſter of the Goſpel of Peace. He obſerves (29), that they live peaceably in religious matters, who on the one ſide are contented to enjoy their own opinions, without arraigning their Superiors in Church and State for being otherwiſe minded; and without diſturbing the publick peace, in order to propagate their tenets, and make proſelytes; and who on the other ſide do not by unjuſtifiable methods of ſeverity force men into the profeſſion of what they diſbelieve; whoſe zeal for their faith never makes them forget their temper, nor out-run the bounds of Chriſtian goodneſs and prudence; who make great allowances for the weakneſs of mens reaſon and the ſtrength of their prejudices, and condemn not all as inſincere, who are not ſo enlightened as they are; but leave them to ſtand or fall to their own maſter; ſeemed to him moſt to prevail, and ſparing nothing, which he obſerved to be amiſs among them, out of regard to men's perſons or opinions, or to any worldly conſideration whatever. He obſerved that the infidelity of the age had forced him to dwell often on the great articles and myſteries of our faith, and to explain them largely; but he called God to witneſs, that he never propoſed any explication of thoſe points, or recommended any thing of this kind to their belief, but what he firmly and from the bottom of his heart believed himſelf. "The faith, ſays he (b), I have delivered to you, the faith of the "Church of England, into which we were all baptized, is, I am entirely ſatisfied, the "ſame that was once delivered to the Saints. I hope none of you will be ever invited by "the ſpecious arts and inſinuations of hereſy to depart from it. I am ſure the profeſſion "of it in all its branches and members, is what by the grace of God I intend to live and "die in." He is thought by ſome perſons to have born no inconſiderable part in the famous controverſy between Mr. Boyle and Dr. Bentley about the genuineneſs of Phalaris's Epiſtles [H], which were publiſhed by the former in the year 1695, and attacked by the Doctor in his Diſſertation upon Phalaris's Epiſtles; an examination of which was ſoon after publiſhed by Mr. Boyle. But a greater ſcene of controverſy afterwards opened itſelf for him with regard to the Convocation, which it will be proper to trace from the firſt occaſion of it. In the year 1697 there was publiſhed a pamphlet in 4to, ſuppoſed to be written by Sir Bartholomew Shower, and intitled, A Letter to a Convocation Man, concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of that Body [I]. An anſwer to this letter appeared ſoon after in 8vo, written by Dr. William Wake, the preſent Archbiſhop of Canterbury, intitled, The Authority of Chriſtian Princes over their Eccleſiaſtical Synods aſſerted, with particular reſpect to the Convocations of the Clergy of the Realm and Church of England; occaſioned by a late pamphlet, intitled, A Letter to a Convocation-Man &c.

maſter; praying for them in the mean time, that they may come to the knowledge of the truth, and endeavouring by all gentle perſuaſive methods to reclaim them. He lays down afterwards (32) this excellent rule for our conduct in religious diſputes, that "we muſt con-"tend for the truth of the Goſpel itſelf, ſo as not to "forget the plain precepts of it; and for the glory "of God with ſuch a well regulated zeal, as does "not trample upon any of his commands; that is, "the warmth of our concern for the beſt doctrines, "perſons, or things, muſt never ſo far tranſport us, "as to make us ſay any thing of any man, but "what our cauſe and his character will juſtify; nor "endeavour to inſpire people with worſe opinions "concerning him, than we in our conſciences believe "he deſerves." He remarks likewiſe (33), that it is a man's duty to keep himſelf always from embarking in parties and factions, and falling in with vehemence into all the intereſts and deſigns of them. This will neceſſarily in time imbitter his ſpirit, and ſour his humour, make him like and diſlike men implicitly, and lead him into many reſentments, which he has nothing to do with.

It may be juſtly called the Pride and Glory of the Moderns, and a Confutation of all that can be ſaid in preference of the Ancients. There is ſuch an eloquence of ſtyle, and juſtneſs of expreſſion, exact method, terſe wit, fine raillery, and genteel ſatyr thro' the whole, that whoever is minded to be curiouſly entertained for a while, let him read it; whoever deſires to overcome in the philological way, let him make it his pattern, and learn to imitate it. He will ſoon perceive therein ſuch a ſtrength of genius and warmth of invention guided by art, and kept in by the laws of correct writing, ſuch an eaſy diſplay of learning, happy declenſions of his adverſary's force, and foiling him frequently at his own weapon, as will induce him to be of my opinion, viz. that Dr. Bentley was certainly cut down by ſome eminent Maſter, however decent it might be thought at that time for a young Gentleman to give him the* Coup de Grace, and ſharpen it with this Sarcaſm:

What may convince the world of the truth of this common conjecture is the figure that he makes in another famed controverſy, wherein he avowedly ſtands alone, and treats his adverſary, (no leſs an adverſary, than the Reverend Doctor Wake, the preſent Archbiſhop of Canterbury,) in the ſame keen manner. Mr. Rymer in his Eſſay concerning curious and critical learning (36), tells us, that if he may be permitted to ſuggeſt his own opinion, he fancies that this Book againſt Dr. Bentley was written (as moſt publick compoſitions in Chriſt-Church are) by a Select Club. And Mr. Budgell takes notice of the ſame conjecture in his Life of the Earl of Orrery (37), and obſerves, that the Author of the Tale of a Tub hints at this, when in his battle between the ancients and the moderns, he ranges Sir William Temple and that Nobleman on the ſide of the ancients, and ſpeaking of the latter, ſays, Boyle clad in a ſuit of armour, which had been given him by all the Gods, &c. However Mr. Budgell concludes, that Mr. Boyle was at leaſt the Author of the greateſt part of that Book; ſince the ſame ſtyle and ſpirit runs thro' the whole piece; ſo that it muſt have been formed and put together by one hand; and I never yet heard, ſays he, any reaſon to doubt but that hand was the late Earl of Orrery.

[I] A Letter to a Convocation-Man concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of that Body.] The Author of that Pamphlet begins with plain Engliſh, as he calls it, that if there ever was need of a Convocation, ſince Chriſtianity was eſtabliſhed in theſe Kingdoms, there was need of one at that time. He endeavours then to prove "their aſſembling, con-"ferring, or reſolving, does not depend on the ab-"ſolute free pleaſure of the Prince; but tho' the "King be intruſted with the formal part of ſum-"moning and convening, yet by the very eſſence "and conſtitution of our Church, a Convocation "ought to ſit, meet, and act, and by law and cu-"ſtom muſt aſſemble and confer in time of Parlia-"ment." He concludes, that Canons framed by the King and Convocation have a full force and validity, and need no confirmation by the Parliament, provided they do not impugn common law, ſtatutes, cuſtoms, or prerogative. He defines an Engliſh Convocation to be "an Eccleſiaſtical Court or Aſſembly eſſential to "our conſtitution, and eſtabliſhed by the law of it, "by the ſame law, as the Gentleman receives his "rent, and the Member enjoys his privilege;" and in another place (38), that it is the higheſt Eccleſiaſtical Court or Aſſembly call'd and convened in Parliament-time. He acknowledges the King as ſupreme Head over all perſons and in all cauſes, in contradiction to all foreign Powers and Juriſdictions only (39); and inſinuates (40), that the King by reſtraining the ſeſſions and actings of Convocation had broke in upon the eſſence and conſtitution of our Church and the fundamentals of our Government.

&c. [K]. Dr. Wake was ſeconded by a Gentleman of the Law, whoſe name was Mr. W. Wright, and who publiſhed an anonymous piece under the title of A Letter to a Member of Parliament; occaſioned by A Letter to a Convocation-Man concerning the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of that Body, &c. London, 1697, in 4to. This Gentleman maintains the right of the Crown to diſſolve eccleſiaſtical aſſemblies, and that the Convocation cannot meet without the King's permiſſion. But Dr. Wake was not long after attacked by Mr. Samuel Hill, Rector of Kilmington, who publiſhed, without his name, Municipium Eccleſiaſticum, or The Rights, Liberties, and Authorities of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted, againſt all oppreſſive Doctrines and Conſtitutions; occaſioned by Dr. Wake's Book, &c. 1697, in 8vo. The Doctor therefore found himſelf obliged to vindicate himſelf in his Appeal to all the true Members of the Church of England in behalf of the King's Eccleſiaſtical Supremacy as by Law eſtabliſhed; by our Convocations approved; and by our moſt eminent Biſhops and Clergymen ſtated and defended, againſt both the Popiſh and Fanatical Oppoſers of it. London in 1698, in 8vo. On the ſame ſide likewiſe appeared an anonymous advocate for the civil powers, in a ſmall Tract intitled, A brief Enquiry into the Ground, Authority, and Rights of Eccleſiaſtical Synods, upon the Principles of Scripture and Right Reaſon; occaſioned by a late book, intitled, Municipium Eccleſiaſticum. London 1699, in 8vo. Mr. Hill wrote a defence of himſelf under the title of The Rights of the Chriſtian Church further defended, in anſwer to the Appeal of Dr. Wake. By Samuel Hill, Rector of Kilmington, 1698, in 8vo. There appeared on the oppoſite ſide a pamphlet, ſuppoſed to have been written by Dr. Richard Weſt, and intitled, Some Thoughts on a Convocation, and the Notion of a Divine Right, &c. 4to, 1699. The year following Mr. Atterbury entered into this diſpute with great vigour and reſolution, and publiſhed his Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation ſtated and vindicated; in anſwer to a late book of Dr. Wake's, intitled, The Authority of Chriſtian Princes over their Eccleſiaſtical Synods &c. and ſeveral other pieces. London 1700, in 8vo [L]. This book appeared at firſt without his name, though, as Dr. White

[K] Dr. Wake's Book intitled, The Authority of Chriſtian Princes &c.] In this Book he endeavours to prove that under the Government of a Chriſtian Prince the Church has no other right to aſſemble in Synods, but what it receives from the grant or expreſs permiſſion of ſuch a Prince. And conſequently, that no perſon can be deputed to a Synod without his particular leave: and when the Synod is aſſembled, they have no right to ſit, debate, diſpute, or determine upon any point of doctrine or diſcipline, any further than is allowed by the Prince; who may ratify, annul, or alter all their acts and proceedings, as he thinks proper; and ſuſpend the execution of all or any of their Conſtitutions and Decrees. In ſhort that the authority of their Acts depends entirely and ſolely upon him, and that no Synod can diſſolve themſelves without his permiſſion. Dr. Kennet in his Eccleſiaſtical Synods &c. (41) obſerves, that Dr. Wake's attempt upon this ſubject was the more difficult, becauſe no Writer before him had profeſſly treated of theſe matters. And truely, continues that Author, ſince our Church was reformed, no occaſion had been given. No diſputing with the King's Supremacy among Church-men, as by law eſtabliſhed, from 25 H. VIII. to 9 W. III. For this reaſon the Doctor had a better title to civil uſage, becauſe he was a firſt adventurer, and made diſcoveries of a world, as it were, before unknown. He had a further right to ſome allowances, in that he owned himſelf in haſte, and ſpoke modeſtly of what he had done. He offers it as a rude and haſty performance (*Ep. (41) Part 1. p. 21, 22. edit. London 1701.

[L] Publiſhed his Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation &c.] He tells us, that Convocations or Provincial Synods have been held frequently from the very beginning of Chriſtianity. The authoritative part of theſe meetings was compoſed of the Biſhops and Preſbyters. They met twice a year, and needed no leave. In theſe Aſſemblies the Gravamina Cleri, or Articuli Reformationis were conſtantly expected from the lower Houſe. A Convocation of the Province of Canterbury is an attendant upon a Parliament of England. The Clergy were brought to Parliament by the præmunientes clauſe. But in proceſs of time, by a miſtake in their politics, they were ſeparated from the Parliament, and yet continued to attend it in two provincial Aſſemblies or Convocations; which as they met for the ſame purpoſe, and had the ſame reaſons of State inſerted into their Writs of Summons as the Parliament had, ſo they kept cloſely to the forms and rules and manner of ſitting and acting practiſed in Parliament; and they had parliamentary ways, and parliamentary privileges, and attended the Parliament as one of the three States of the Realm. But he declares, that he is not for ſetting a plea for any old privileges and preeminences of the Clergy, which are long ſince dead and buried, and which he thinks ought never to be revived, even for the ſake of the Clergy themſelves, who have thriven beſt always under a competency of power and moderate pretences. Theſe Parliamentary Convocations, he ſays, came into the room of Provincial Synods. But he aſſerts, that the Clergy have not only a right to meet and ſit in Convocation, as often as a new Parliament ſits, but a right alſo, when met, of treating and deliberating about ſuch affairs as lie within their proper ſphere, and of coming to ſit reſolutions upon them, without being neceſſitated antecedently to qualify themſelves for ſuch acts and debates by a licence under the Broad Seal of England. He takes a great deal of pains about the Statute of 25 Henry VIII. c. 19. which was the Act of Submiſſion, and puts ſuch a ſenſe upon it as at length to conclude, that with regard to all convocational Acts previous to the paſſing or decreeing a Canon, the Clergy have juſt the ſame right to them ſince this Statute, as they had before. Tho' they cannot make and attempt a Canon, yet they may ſpeak the ſenſe of the whole Clergy of the Kingdom in matters proper for them to interpoſe in. They may petition, adviſe, addreſs, repreſent, give their judgment, where it may be deſired, or their cenſures either of men or books, where it may be needful; and ſuggeſt the fitteſt methods of ſecuring the Chriſtian Faith, and of preventing the revival of old hereſies and errors, and the growth of new ones. He attacks Dr. Wake in a great many points; and aſſerts that the præmunientes in the Biſhop's Writ is not an idle uſeleſs clauſe, inſerted only on a particular occaſion, and continued by accident, but a real and effectual Summons of the Clergy to Parliament; ſuch as they formerly made formal returns to, as often as it went out, and expreſly obeyed. He gives ſome inſtances of this till the time of Henry VIII; and then attempts to ſhew, that the Writ to the two Archbiſhops to convene the Clergy of their Provinces,

White Kennet informs us (b), it was freely owned in converſation. He endeavours to confute his Antagoniſts as well by reaſon as authorities drawn from authentic Acts and Conſtitutions of England. But having occaſionally made ſome critical remarks upon Dr. Burnet Biſhop of Saliſbury, that Prelate wrote a piece againſt him, intitled, Reflections on a book intitled, The Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation, &c. London 1700, in 4to [M]. Mr. Atterbury publiſhed the year following a ſecond edition of his Rights, &c. [N], with his name prefixed to it, and very conſiderable additions, which he printed ſeparately for the ſake of thoſe who had the firſt edition. But this work of his did not Provinces, tho' it does not expreſly mention a Parliament, yet has an immediate reference to it; the original deſign of its iſſuing out together with the Biſhop's Writ being only to ſecure an obedience to the premunitory clauſe of it, and to make the Clergy's parliamentary attendance the more full and certain. After having diſcourſed largely of the Right of the Clergy to meet and act in Convocation, he touches on the neceſſity of ſuch meetings, that they may preſerve their right; and promiſes to inſiſt diſtinctly upon it hereafter. Dr. Kennet tells us (42), that the bulk of this Book, the ſpecious preface to it, the number of citations, and above all the ſpirit of aſſurance, made people think this would determine the whole matter. And then the artificial giving a great and juſt character of the King, the many inſinuating addreſſes to the Commons, the pretty ways of ingratiating with the inferior Clergy, the high zeal for our Church, and pleading fundamental rights and liberties of it, with the briſkneſs of running down an adverſary into the utmoſt contempt and odium; all this was apt to create in many a kind reception of the Book; which when ſet off with the induſtrious applauſe of conſiderable people, who admire every thing of themſelves and their own, gave all poſſible advantage to the cauſe and this defence of it. But we ſhall give the reader ſome further account of this performance in the note [N], where we ſhall ſpeak of the ſecond edition of it.

(42) Ibid. pag. 31.

[M] That Prelate anſwered him in a piece intitled, Reflections on a Book intitled, The Rights &c.] Mr. Atterbury had not only criticiſed upon ſeveral paſſages in the Biſhop's Hiſtory of the Reformation, but likewiſe cenſured him for his forwardneſs upon all occaſions to be ſevere upon the Clergy. "My Lord of "Sarum, (ſays he in the Preface to his Rights &c.) "indeed may freely have taxed the vices of the Cler"gy even in Books where he was defending the or"ders of the Church of England, or the truth of "the Chriſtian Religion. His high ſtation is his "warrant for whatever he has done of this kind late"ly, and a bar to all manner of reply. And his "former reprehenſions, ſhould they have been ſome"what too free, are capable of this excuſe, that be"ing a Stranger, he might not then have throughly "acquainted himſelf with the ſtate of our Church, "or the character of its Members. And if he ſaw "faults in them, it was not to be expected that he ſhould "conceal them with the ſame tenderneſs, as if he "had his birth and breeding among them." Biſhop Burnet in his Reflections obſerves, that tho' the Author of the Rights &c. pretended to plead the cauſe of the Church, which is indeed the cauſe of Chriſt himſelf, yet he had ſo entirely laid aſide the ſpirit of Chriſt, and the characters of a Chriſtian, that without large allowances of charity one can hardly think, that he did once reflect on the obligations he lay under to follow the humility, the meekneſs, and the gentleneſs of Chriſt. So far from that, he ſeems to have forgot the common decencies of a man or of a Scholar. He ſays likewiſe, that a Book writ with that roughneſs and acrimony of ſpirit, if well received, would be a much ſtronger argument againſt the expediency of a Convocation, than any he brings or can bring for it. He declares, that a Convocation cannot be called a true Repreſentative of the Church, tho' it be now a legal one. In that for Canterbury there are twenty Deans or more, who pretend to ſit there; as many Proctors from the Chapters, and ſixty Archdeacons, and but thirty eight Clerks choſen by the Clergy. So that the Deans and Chapters, who had their authority at firſt by Papal Bulls, and have now exemptions and juriſdictions continued to them only by a proviſo in the Statute of 25 H. VIII. have more intereſt in the Convocation, than the whole body of the Clergy. He affirms that for above a hundred and forty years the Crown had been in poſſeſſion of a right of making uſe of a Convocation, or of ſettling matters of Religion without it, at diſcretion; and that this has been underſtood at leaſt by Divines and Lawyers in favour of the Prince. And that therefore it argued the fruitfulneſs of a man's imagination, who could make ſo great a Book, and ſuch heavy complaints for no other cauſe but this.

Mr. Atterbury takes notice of theſe Reflections of the Biſhop in the Preface (43) to the ſecond edition of his Rights &c. where having acquainted the reader what Alterations and Enlargements were made in that edition, he obſerves, that the number of theſe is not increaſed by any change made in thoſe few paſſages, which the Biſhop had ſingled out, as moſt liable to exception. For in thoſe, ſays he, I have not, upon a re-examination, found myſelf obliged to alter any thing; but have left them juſt as they ſtood before his Lordſhip's Reflections came forth; for which I ſhall e'er long give his Lordſhip and the Reader my reaſons.... One change only his Lordſhip's Reflections have produced, that whereas before I ſent theſe papers abroad without a name, I have now yielded to his Lordſhip's Reproofs ſo far as to act more freely and openly; the rather, becauſe his Lordſhip has been pleaſed to impute that part of my management to a principle of not engaging paſt retreat (*), and to a proſpect of being taken off, as his Lordſhip is pleaſed to expreſs himſelf. Had any perſon of lower rank than his Lordſhip ſaid this, I ſhould have taken the liberty to reply, that ſuch motives could not have occurred ſo readily, but where they had been of familiar uſe and application. But I know my diſtance too well to make his Lordſhip ſuch a return, whatever occaſion he ſhall give me for it. However ſince it was ſo eaſy to ſet this matter right by adding a word or two in the title-page, I have upon his Lordſhip's exhortation done it; being indeed perſuaded that this was ſuch a cauſe, as no man ought to be either aſhamed or afraid to appear in.

(*) Reflections on the Rights of an Engliſh Convocation, p. 2, 3.

[N] A ſecond Edition of his Rights.] He dedicated it to the Archbiſhops of the Provinces and the Preſidents of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, and tells them, that he doubted not but they would find, that he had aſſerted the Rights of the Clergy within that circle only, which the law has mark'd out for them,.... and upon principles, which every good Engliſhman muſt approve, and with ſuch a moderation and deference to the civil power, as can diſguſt none of the temporalty, but the profeſſed enemies of Religion and the Order. He obſerves in his Preface (45), that the Letter to a Convocation-man, with the Replies to it, had led him to conſider the point in debate with a particular care and attention. That he came to Dr. Wake's Book with expectations of finding there whatever was neceſſary to ſet this matter in a clear light. The bulk of the work, the appearance of learning it carried, and the great authority by which it endeavoured to recommend itſelf, all ſeemed to promiſe exactneſs. But that upon peruſing it to his ſurprize he found that it was a ſhallow, empty performance, written without any knowledge of our conſtitution, any ſkill in the particular ſubject of debate, upon ſuch principles as are deſtructive of all our civil as well as eccleſiaſtical liberties, and with ſuch aſperſions on the Clergy both dead and living, as were no leſs injurious to the body, than his doctrine. He aſſures us afterwards (46), that he had undertaken that work, "not led ſo much by inclina"tion to ſtudies of this kind, ſays he, as puſhed on by "an hearty concern for the intereſts of Religion and "of my Order (as far as the latter of theſe is ſub"ſervient to the former) and by an eager deſire of "doing ſomewhat towards ſupporting the good old "conſtitution I live under; which Dr. W. has both "in Church and State done his beſt to undermine." His blow indeed is directly levelled at the rights and liberties of the Church only; but it glances often on not continue long without a reply; for Dr. White Kennet, afterwards Biſhop of Peterborough, under the countenance of Archbiſhop Teniſon (i), undertook a particular reply to it in his Eccleſiaſtical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the Church of England hiſtorically ſtated and juſtly vindicated from the Miſrepreſentations of Mr. Atterbury. Part I. London 1701 in 8vo. He vindicates Dr. Burnet Biſhop of Saliſbury, Dr. Wake, and other Writers

thoſe of the State, and wounds them ſore, as far as his arm was capable of putting ſtrength into it. The argument of his Book throughout turns upon ſuch maxims and grounds as equally affect both of them. Dr. Atterbury endeavours to fix theſe imputations upon Dr. Wake by alledging ſome paſſages from his Book; and proceeds (47) with an uncommon ſeverity of expreſſion to ſhew, that the Clergy are not the only perſons concerned in this diſpute; the Laity too have their ſhare in it. For beſides that, if ſlavery be once eſtabliſhed in the Church, it will quickly ſpread itſelf into the State. Dr. Wake's principles, we ſee, are ſuch as have an immediate tendency toward ſubverting liberty in general; and would, if purſued thro' their juſt conſequences, give the Prerogative as high an aſcendant over Parliaments as Convocations. And when ſuch things are ſaid therefore, not the men of the Church only, but every free-born ſubject of England ought to take the alarm; for their birth-right is endangered. "The very "beſt conſtruction, that has been put upon Dr. W.'s "attempt even by candid readers, is, that it was an en- "deavour to advance the Prerogative of the Prince in "Church-matters as high, and to depreſs the intereſt of "the ſubject as low as ever he could with colour of "truth. But ſurely this itſelf is no very creditable ac- "count of it. Thoſe Caſuiſts, that have taken pains to "inſtruct men, how near they may poſſibly come to a ſin "without actually ſinning, have not been reckoned "the honeſteſt part of their profeſſion. And thoſe "Divines, who read leſſons to Princes how to ſtrain "their eccleſiaſtical power to the utmoſt without ex- "ceeding it, and oppreſs their Clergy legally, are not "ſurely the beſt men of their Order. They are "Church Empſons and Dudleys, and uſually find the fate "of ſuch wretched inſtruments to be deteſted by the one "ſide, and at laſt abandoned by the other." He vindicates himſelf from the ſuſpicion of being diſaffected to the government (48). Diſaffection, ſays he, to the government, as the charge is commonly managed, is a word only made uſe of by thoſe, that are in favour, to keep others out. It is a reproach taken up on purpoſe to juſtify premeditated deſigns of oppreſſing men; for ſo the ſoldier ſaid, that the countryman whiſtled treaſon, when he had reſolved to plunder him. For my part, I am not ſhy of owning to Dr. Wake my naked thoughts on this head; and he may make what uſe he thinks fit of them. If then to be a true Lover of England, its Monarchy and Epiſcopacy; if to have the utmoſt eſteem for the Heroic Qualities and matchleſs Merits of our Prince, and to think that no inſtance of Reſpect and Duty that ſubjects can pay him too great, while they take care to preſerve their own rights and privileges; if to prefer the true intereſts of the Proteſtant Religion and the preſervation of our civil Liberties to all other conſiderations, and for theſe (among other) ends to pray heartily for the continuance of our preſent government both in Church and State; if theſe be inſtances and marks of diſaffection, then the author of theſe papers muſt own himſelf diſaffected, and not otherwiſe. His apology for the ſeverity of his ſtyle is as follows (49). "If un- "der a ſenſe of theſe injuries, I have not ſo tem- "pered my pen every where, but that an hard word "may now and then have eſcaped me, I need no "excuſe for it. Dr. Wake's way of dealing, would, "I am ſure, have juſtified much rougher returns than "any I have made him. But whatever of this kind "the Reader meets with, he may aſſure himſelf, that "it ſprang not from any the leaſt mixture of private "prejudice or reſentment; for I have no quarrel with "Dr. Wake, but upon a public account." On the contrary the good ſervices he did againſt Popery, enclined me always to wiſh well to him, and to eſteem him. Or had I wiſhed him ill, yet I would never have taken this way of expreſſing it; for Petavius (†) has taught me long ago, that to write againſt ſome men, is the way only to have their penſions doubled. And the experience of later times than his has ſhewed, that it is poſſible to write a man out of reputation into preferment. Much leſs can I be ſuſpected to have engaged in this deſign out of intereſt. The way to that is not by appearing in behalf of councils; which (as Johannes Major (†) well obſerved) meet but ſeldom, and have no dignities to diſpoſe of. Dr. Atterbury immediately after aſſerts that the author of the Letter to a Member of Parliament, has in a page or two ſaid more for the cauſe, than Dr. Wake has done throughout his mighty performance, which is really nothing more than a ſeries of long, flat, impertinent accounts, attended with ſuitable reflections; but without one wiſe word ſpoken, or true ſtroke ſtruck in behalf of his point from the beginning of the book to the end of it. And were it not therefore on ſome other accounts beſides the mere merit of the work, it would have deſerved no anſwer but what the Fryar in one of our hiſtories gave in a certain conteſt with his Prior; & frater Salamon de Ripple ad monitiones dicti Prioris reſpondit, ſic dicendo (*) Trufeles! Trufeles! Trufeles (†)! He tells us (54), that he had enlarged the ſecond Edition of his book in ſeveral reſpects, and in ſome that are very material; and he obſerves (55), that he was not ignorant what menaces had been given out, nor what meaſures had been actually taken towards cruſhing him and that work; "but I do not find, ſays he, my reſolutions in "the leaſt ſhaken on that account. I have only taken "occaſion from thence to aſk myſelf a few queſtions, "which, I thank God, I have been able to anſwer "to my own ſatisfaction; and am, I hope, prepared "for any event, that ſhall befall me." In his fourth Chapter he gives us ſome general reflections on Dr. Wake's way of managing the controverſy, and endeavours to ſet aſide a conſiderable part of his book as foreign to the point in debate. Upon this occaſion he indulges his uſual talent of raillery; and obſerves, that the Doctor had kindly prepared us in his preface to expect digreſſions; but withal promiſed us in his nice manner, that they ſhould be rather not directly to the purpoſe, than altogether diſtant from it.... The Doctor muſt forgive me, if I tell him, that theſe hiſtorical unedifying accounts of his put me in mind of the honeſt confeſſion of William Caxton the Chronicler; the words of which will become Dr. Wake's mouth as well every whit as they did his; and I cannot help thinking that I hear him in the cloſe of his firſt Chapter thus addreſſing himſelf to his Reader; If I cowde, ſays he, have founde moo ſtoryes, I wolde have ſette in it moo; but the ſubſtaunce that I can fynde and know I have ſhortly ſette theim in this boke; prayeinge all theym that ſee this ſymple worke of myne to pardon me of my ſimple writinge. And indeed I for my part ſhould have been very ready ſo to do, had it been as harmleſs as it is ſimple; and were it not likely, as ſimple as it is, to be produced hereafter for a teſtimony againſt the Church's rights, if it be not now oppoſed and diſowned. Theſe extracts will give the Reader an idea of the particular genius and manner of writing of our author in his polemical treatiſes. He was attacked the ſame year by Dr. Kennet in his Eccleſiaſtical Synods &c. who tells us in his Preface, that upon a review of Mr. Atterbury's book, compared with ſome collections of his own, and with the beſt of his underſtanding, he grew ſenſible, that the hiſtorical part of the argument was very falſely repreſented, and that the zeal for our Church was indeed without any knowledge in the conſtitution of it. That upon hearing Mr. Atterbury deſigned a more correct edition of his State of Convocations, he laboured to ſupply him with ſome amendments and additions, that he might have uſed or rejected at his own diſcretion. That he concluded Mr. Atterbury's ſecond Edition would render it a more accurate and uſeful work; ſince he knew the author to be a man of great parts, and a ſharp pen, and a wonderful ſagacity in faults and imperfections. But when he came to run over his additions to the Preface, to the body of the book, to the Appendix, and after all the Addenda, to ſupply and complete the new edition, he found, that it was not only one of the moſt disjointed pieces, which he ever yet

Writers from the attacks of our Author. Soon after this came out a pamphlet in 4to, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Richard Weſt, and intitled, The Principles of Mr. Atterbury's book conſidered, and his Arguments againſt Dr. Wake and others ſtated and examined [O]; and another in 4to with the title of Mr. Atterbury's Arguments for the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation conſidered. Dr. Hody, Chaplain to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, publiſhed likewiſe the ſame year his Hiſtory of Engliſh Councils and Convocations, &c. in 8vo, and an anonymous Writer appeared on the ſame ſide in a pamphlet in 8vo intitled, The Regal Supremacy in Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, &c. Mr. Hill abovementioned defended himſelf from the objections of his Antagoniſts, and particularly from thoſe of Dr. Wake, in his Rights, Liberties, and Authorities of the Chriſtian Church aſſerted againſt all oppreſſive Doctrines and Conſtitutions, &c. London 1701 in 8vo. yet ſaw, but ſtill the moſt imperfect. For he obſerved with ſurprize, that he had made very few corrections of his moſt material errors; and thoſe, which he dared not repeat, he had corrected in ſuch a clandeſtine manner, that the very amendment was more deceit upon the Reader, than the fault itſelf. For tho' he had profeſſed to the world, ſays Dr. Kennet, that all the alterations of moment were printed together in ſeparate ſheets, I found them not ſo. I found very conſiderable alterations, not in a few words only, as he would excuſe it, but in ſenſe of Hiſtory and Law ſo notorious, that I could not but bring ſome of them together to confront the author, or at leaſt themſelves. I found alſo, that he was ſo far from repenting of the liberty and rudeneſs with which he had treated his Brethren and his Fathers, that he confirmed his perſonal reflections, and improved them, and perfectly inſulted more and more. Nay, and when he perceived his former ſtrictures to be downright ſlanders; yet there he turned them, with ſuch an air of illuſion, that I profeſs, I never ſaw ſuch artifices in writing. He has done ſo in ſeveral inſtances by my Lord Biſhop of Sarum, by Dr. Wake, by Mr. Archdeacon Nicholſon, by the author of Occaſional Thoughts on a Convocation, &c. I perceived farther, that he had made his whole ſubject in effect new, under the pretence of enlarging his former volume. Dr. Kennet gives ſome inſtances of this; and then tells us, that when he ſaw theſe and many other inſtances of diſingenuity and dangerous errors, he thought really it would be a reproach to the Engliſh Church and Nation, if ſuch a book were judged to be the ſenſe of the Clergy, or of any other ſerious men of letters. He afterwards mentions the motives of his own writing, the firſt of which was "to re-"prove that deriding and inſulting way of raillery "and wrath, that wounds religion, and does but wea-"ken that Church, whoſe Prieſts ſhall ſo attempt to "vindicate her rights and powers." He concludes with aſſuring us, that his view was likewiſe to promote the peace of our Mother Church, by the King and Parliament's conſtant protection of her; and to requeſt his Brethren, not to ſet up for independence and another fatal ſeparation; which none but our enemies can project or wiſh. "My deſigns, ſays he, are no worſe, "and therefore I fear no ill treatment for them. As "to Mr. Atterbury, he and I may reſt content, that "our ſuperiors will not eſpouſe a cauſe without full "ſatisfaction in it; and much leſs will they bear "down us little men, or ſhew any indignation at us, "if we write contrary to their firſt ſenſe of things; "and therefore I dare not ſubſcribe to his murmurs "and complaints, I am not ignorant, what menaces "have been given out, &c." We have mentioned in the Note [L] a paſſage from Dr. Kennet concerning the reaſons why our author's book was ſo highly applauded; after which Dr. Kennet proceeds to examine the performance more particularly, and obſerves, that Mr. Atterbury ſhews himſelf in it an aſſuming writer (56); that he denies himſelf to have written in haſte, when the very form and compoſition of his book are the ſtrongeſt proof of it; that he appeals to manuſcripts and records, while he is a ſtranger to them; that he is intolerably ſevere in his perſonal reflections, and abuſes Dr. Wake, tho' he owns that he has no quarrel with him, but on a publick account; and that he is trifling and childiſh in correcting ſmall miſtakes, and inſults other perſons for errors, which are merely his own. He ſhews (57) our Author's miſtake with regard to the ſtory of Solomon de Ripple quoted above, ſince Solomon was no Fryar but a regular Canon, nor had he any conteſt with his Prior, but with the Prior of another houſe in defence of his own Abbot. Nor did he cry out Trufeles, but Truthleſs, Truthleſs, Truthleſs; to deny the Truth of the Prior's allegation of a pretended Bull; not a Triſle, but of very great importance; only not a true and authentic Bull, but all forgery and falſhood. In his Appendix he obſerves again, that Mr. Atterbury in his ſecond Edition had altered ſeveral paſſages notoriouſly falſe in the former, without the leaſt notice in the Addenda, that in theſe inſtances he had been miſtaken before. Theſe hints, ſays he, together with the temper of the Author, as it has diſcovered itſelf in the management of this controverſy gave me reaſon to ſuſpect the ſame kind of ſecret Retractation in other parts of the Book. And upon the comparing the two Editions, I found my ſuſpicion very well grounded; as the reader alſo will underſtand by and by from a number of material alterations in points of Hiſtory and Law, not one of which he has mentioned in the Addenda.

(57) Pag. 153, 154.

[O] Soon after this came out a Pamphlet in 4to intitled, The Principles of Mr. Atterbury's Book conſidered, and his arguments againſt Dr. Wake and others ſtated and examined.] The Author of it tells us, that it was Mr. Atterbury's main deſign to abuſe and miſrepreſent his antagoniſt, to ſtate his arguments unfairly, and anſwer what he never ſaid. He aſſerts, that whatever cuſtom there may be for the Clergy's being called to Convocation when the Parliament ſits, there is not the ſame right for their ſitting and acting. Not one inſtance is brought to prove that the King ſince the Reformation was ever denied the power of proroguing the Convocation, while the Parliament continued ſitting, or that when he exerciſed his authority in denying them to ſit and act, the legality of it was ever diſputed. He charges Mr. Atterbury with a groſs miſtake about the Præmunire in the caſe of the Clergy in the time of King Henry VIII; and he confronts him with Mr. Smalridge's Animadverſions on Church Government. He ſays, that ſuch faults as Mr. Atterbury's were, are (God be thanked) to be found in few other Writers; and that he diſcovered none ſuch in any of thoſe Authors, whom with all the ſtock of ſpite and ingenuity he was maſter of, he ſets himſelf to defame. He charges him likewiſe with falſely interpreting the Act of Submiſſion; and obſerves, that Mr. Atterbury has this very particular way of managing controverſy, that he is well aware what authorities oppoſe his notions. If they are downright enemies, he denies them to be legal evidence. If by fraud or perverting their plain ſenſe, he can reduce them to his opinion, he takes that method for impoſing upon his readers credulity. And if confidence of being in the right can have any influence, his readers are ſure never to want a biaſs. He enlarges upon the petition of the Convocation in Edward VI's time to that King for a licence; and expreſſes his reſentment that ſuch a ſtorm ſhould be raiſed againſt the Royal Supremacy in the days of King William, to whom the nation had been ſo much obliged.

[P] The ſame year were publiſhed Some Remarks upon the Temper &c.] The Author of this Pamphlet complains, that the Writers on the oppoſite ſide to Mr. Atterbury,

This was followed by An occaſional Letter on the Subject of Engliſh Convocations; by the Author of Eccleſiaſtical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the Church of England, &c. London 1701, in 8vo. In this letter Dr. Kennet obſerves, that he ſhall not condeſcend to take notice of the Remarks upon the Temper, &c. abovementioned, but leave it to the world to judge on which ſide the temper lay. He vindicates his reflections on Dr. Atterbury, and ſays, that he had not exhauſted his ſubject, and mentions many other errors, which he might have pointed out in the chapters, which he had conſidered. The ſame year there was publiſhed a pamphlet in 4to, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Edmund Gibſon, the preſent Biſhop of London, intitled, A Letter to a Friend in the Country, concerning the Proceedings of the preſent Convocation; in which the Author argues from inſtances for the Archbiſhop's right to prorogue the Lower Houſe of Convocation as well as the Upper, and anſwers the inſtances alledged againſt it. This was ſoon replied to by a pamphlet, ſaid to be written by Dr. Atterbury, and intitled, The Power of the Lower Houſe of Convocation to adjourn itſelf, vindicated from the Miſrepreſentations of a late paper, intitled, A Letter to a Friend in the Country, &c. 4to, 1701. This was followed with a pamphlet, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. George Hooper, afterwards Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and intitled, A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower Houſe of Convocation relating to Prorogations and Adjournments, from Monday Feb. 10, 1700 (Engliſh Account) to Wedneſday June 25, 1701. Drawn up by the Order of the Houſe. London 1701 in 4to. The Author reflects with great freedom upon the Letter to a Friend in the Country, which he charges with falſe aſſertions, and inconcluſive arguments, as well as prevarications. Soon after this appeared a pamphlet written by the ſame hand as the Letter to a Friend in the Country, and intitled, The Right of the Archbiſhop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, aſſerted in a ſecond Letter, by way of reply to a pamphlet, intitled, The Power of the Lower Houſe, &c. and alſo a late book, intitled, A Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower Houſe, &c. with the Publiſher's preface, as far as they relate to the point of Continuation. London 1701, in 4to. The Author charges thoſe whom he writes againſt with being inconſiſtent in their principles; and obſerves (k), that it will be more eaſily believed for the future, that the meeting of the Clergy is not an equal bleſſing to the Church at all ſeaſons and under all diſpoſitions. A letter ſoon after was publiſhed to the Author of the Narrative, containing A Vindication of the Proceedings of ſome Members of the Lower Houſe with relation to the Archbiſhop's prorogation of it, May the 8th 1701, 4to. This was followed by a piece, ſaid to be written by Dr. Atterbury, and intitled, A Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, concerning the choice of Members, and the execution of the Parliament-Writ for the enſuing Convocation, 4to, dated Nov. the 17th 1701 [Q]. This was followed by a ſecond Letter upon the ſame ſubject, 4to, Decemb. the 10th 1701, in which the Author endeavours to clear and confirm the entry of the Archbiſhop's Parliament-Writ in the Convocation-Acts of both Provinces. In anſwer to theſe two Letters appeared The Caſe of the Præmunientes conſidered, 4to, 1701 [R]. The Author anſwers the motion about ſtrictly executing the Præmunientes clauſe, which was Dr. Atterbury's, out of Dr. Kennet's Reply to him; and in anſwer to his Atterbury, notwithſtanding their pretences to moderation, have failed in that point in their writings; and particularly Dr. Wake, and Dr. Kennet; tho' he owns, that his deſign is not to defend Mr. Atterbury, but only to deſire his readers to paſs righteous judgment every where alike, and afford every Writer a due degree of reſentment, according as he is found to tranſgreſs the rules of temper and moderation (58).

(58) Pag. 62.

[Q] A Letter to a Clergyman in the country concerning the choice of Members &c.] The Author recommends a particular care in the election of new Members of the Convocation, in conſideration of the diſputes on foot between the two Houſes; and intimates, that when they are determined to the prejudice of the lower Clergy, there will be an end of the rights and liberties of their Houſe, and that they will be from that moment an uſeleſs and inſignificant part of the conſtitution (59). He obſerves, that the late pleas for the authority of Metropolitans had not been advanced with any view of perpetuating the preſent Church eſtabliſhment; and that a temporal Government founded in liberty, as the Engliſh is, can never incorporate kindly with a ſpiritual Society, which is ſupported by ſlavery, but will either reduce it to ſome kind of conformity with itſelf, or quickly deſtroy it. He intimates, that it had been reſolved, that the not executing of the clauſe Præmunientes in the Biſhop's Writ, but ſuppreſſing the ſame, after that the right of the Clergy to meet in their Parliamentary Convocations hath been publickly diſputed and denied, and the encouraging books and papers written againſt the rights and authority of Convocations, is a grievance. He inſiſts upon the Clergy's demanding the execution of that clauſe, which he obſerves would fix their meeting ſo cloſe to thoſe of the Parliament, that neither the malice of their enemies, nor treachery of their falſe friends, would ever be able to diſſolve the union. He concludes with this text of Scripture; Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people and for the cities of our God; and the Lord do that which ſeemeth him good.

(59) Pag. 1. Col. 1.

[R] The caſe of the Præmunientes conſidered.] The Author obſerves (60) that thoſe, who oppoſed the Biſhops, had begun the diſpute, and carried it on with a manifeſt violation of charity and good manners; for which he appeals to the Letter to a Convocation-man, and Dr. Atterbury's Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an Engliſh Convocation, and to every one of their later Pamphlets; in which, ſays he (61), there are ſo many inſinuations, colours and ſtories, as even Martin Mar-Prelate did not more effectually affront the Biſhops of the Church of England. He remarks then, that they had been inconſiſtent with each other; that the Author of the Rights, Powers, and Privileges &c. came in for a ſecond to the Writer of the Letter to a Convocation-man, and yet recedes from him in one of his three principal points, and in many other matters of opinion and fact. That this ſecond came in ſoon after to relieve himſelf in a new Edition of his Rights, Power, &c. owning his name and titles; and then he differs from himſelf more than he had differed from his friend. He builds the Hiſtory of our Reformation upon another model, and raiſes pretenſions abſolutely new. Then comes The power of the Lower Houſe to adjourn itſelf, &c. which, tho' juſtly ſuppoſed to come from the ſame hand, is clearly another ſcheme; for it was all before calculated to reſtrain the King's Supremacy; and 'tis now all to advance it beyond the Act of Submiſſion, and above all appearance of authority in the Archbiſhop and Biſhops.

his ſecond Letter [S] tells him, that the ſight of that had confirmed him in the opinion, that his cauſe was now capable of nothing but hardy countenance, and ſlight of hand (l), and that it would have been given up for loſt with all honeſt men, when it could be no longer ſupported with ſincerity and plainneſs, and when the laſt reſort was to great untruths, ambiguous reſerves, and the artifices of deceiving (m). Another paper likewiſe appeared againſt the Letter to a Clergyman, &c. intitled, The late pretence of a conſtant practice to enter the Parliament as well as Provincial Writ, in the front of the Acts of every Synod, conſidered in a Letter to the Author of that Aſſertion, &c. 4to, December the 11th 1701 [T]. This was followed with a Reply to Dr. Atterbury's Second Letter to a Clergy-Man, intitled, The late Pretence, &c. further conſidered and diſproved in a ſecond Letter, &c. 4to, December the 16th 1701 [U]. This occaſioned another pamphlet of Dr. Atterbury, intitled, A third Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, &c. in defence of the two former, 4to, January the 8th 1701 [X]; which was replied to in An Anſwer to a third ſhops. Then follows, continues the Author, the Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower Houſe, and perfectly contradicts the former principles; in denying the Lower Houſe an inherent power of adjourning at diſcretion, and confining them not to go beyond the Biſhop's day; in denying the Members to abſent themſelves without leave of the Preſident; in making other conceſſions, and laying down poſitions wholly repugnant to them, that had gone before. Which uncertainty in their principles ſhews clearly enough, that they begun theſe new claims before they had fixt either upon the grounds or extent of them. He tells us afterwards, that the managers of the cauſe againſt the Biſhops had not been ingenuous and fair in their relation of things. They have told, ſays he (62), matters of fact directly wrong; they have charged falſhood on their adverſaries, that has turned purely upon their own heads. They have over and over repeated ſome ſlanders, when the world knew them to be ſuch. They have been ſo groſs in thoſe ways of inſincerity, that ſolemn proof has been made of it under the atteſtation of a Publick Notary. And 'tis ſaid, there will be other convictions of the like kind, when they pleaſe to call for any further ſatisfaction.

[S] His ſecond Letter.] He obſerves (63), that the Author of the Letter to a Clergyman in the country having been ſufficiently told by his friends, that he had run into very foul miſtakes in that firſt Letter, reſolved in ſome ſecond paper to bring himſelf off as well as he could. He tells us then, that he had aſſerted in the firſt place a direct falſhood, and points out three other egregious miſtakes in his ſecond Letter; under the laſt of which he remarks a way of reflecting, that directs us, ſays he, to the Author of both Letters; for none but Dr. A. could have taken ſuch a liberty. You could not cloſe, continues he, your laſt Letter, without telling a piece of news, as you call it; that notwithſtanding a late ſolemn Atteſtation under the hand of a Public Notary concerning the want of a certain clauſe in ſeventy Archiepiſcopal Mandates, yet in the very Regiſters of the Archbiſhop, to which this Atteſtation refers, there is more than one Mandate with this very clauſe in it. I muſt tell you, this news of yours is falſe and ſcandalous..... You don't believe yourſelf, when you make your friend believe ſo; for you immediately throw it upon a proverbial Lyar, Fame. Yet Fame ſays that ſuch Mandates there are in thoſe very Regiſters.

[T] The late pretence of a conſtant practice to enter the Parliament as well as Provincial Writ &c.] The Author of the Letter to a Clergyman in the country had ſaid, that it was the conſtant practice ever ſince the Act of Submiſſion, in the front of the Acts of every Synod to enter the King's Parliament-Writ with the clauſe Præmunientes, as well as that to the Archbiſhop for calling the Clergy of his Province. And in proof of this he appealed to the original Acts of the Convocations of the Province of York, and the authentic Extracts of the Province of Canterbury. The Writer of the late Pretence &c. proves the contrary by a certificate from York, and by evidence from thoſe Extracts of Canterbury; and then ſignifies his concern at ſo bold a ſtroke to ſerve a turn, before the falſity of it could be detected; and at that Author's ſo ſhamefully impoſing on his brethren, and his profaneneſs in applying a text of Scripture in the cloſe of his Letter to the ſupport of what was contrary to religion and truth. And that Author having in this caſe offered in ſo many words, that if he deceived his readers herein, he was content to forfeit all his credit with any good man for ever; this animadverter tells him, that he could not ſee how he could avoid in that reſpect falling under his own ſentence. He adds, that he could not help being in pain for the Church, when they, who made moſt noiſe about maintaining it, put its defence upon ſuch an iſſue as this. And here, upon occaſion of Dr. Atterbury's declaring, that if he deceived his readers, he was contented to forfeit all his credit with any good man for ever, we ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from a Pamphlet, intitled, The preſent State of Convocation in a Letter, giving the full relation of Proceedings in ſeveral of the late Seſſions &c. correcting the miſtakes and ſlanders of the pretended Faithful Accounts, Numb. 1, 2. London 1702 in 4to. "After the Form of Prorogation had been this day, "February 12th, read and ſigned in the Upper-Houſe, "as the Clergy were departing out of the Jeruſalem "Chamber, Dr. A. toward the door was earneſtly "puſhing on ſome Members, and crying, Away to "the Lower-Houſe, to the Lower-Houſe. The Ch. of "L. turning back to him, aſked, If he were not a-"ſhamed to be always promoting contention and diviſion? Dr. A. anſwered to this effect, That he was "not aſhamed to be for the rights of the Clergy; that "there never was an inſtance before the laſt year, where "the Clergy were diſmiſſed by a Prorogation in the Up-"per-Houſe. The Ch. replied, I am afraid, Sir, you "are not to be believed; for I think by your own con-"feſſion you have forfeited your credit with all good "men for ever (64)."

(64) Pag. 27.

[U] The late Pretence &c. further conſider'd and diſproved in a ſecond Letter.] The Author here freely tells the Writer of the Letter to a Clergyman in the Country, that a complication of falſhoods put together with ſo much management could not be the effect of ignorance, tho' even that would not be pardoned at the end of ſo ſolemn an appeal. But that an intended deceit (as this has all the appearance of being) was of a blacker complexion, and required a ſolemn recanting. That explaining would not be ſufficient; and that he had taken ſuch lengths in his aſſertion, that if he could keep up his credit under ſuch a cloud of witneſſes, that ſo fully impeach it, he muſt conclude there is not encouragement enough for ſincerity in this world. But that he could not ſuppoſe his brethren would ſet aſide their regard to publick Records, rather than queſtion the integrity of one, who kept his concluſion, even when he was forced to take notice himſelf that his premiſes failed. That he hoped he himſelf would repent of that, which upon the ſtricteſt enquiry appeared to him to be the greateſt prevarication he ever met with, except his Poſtſcript; which refers to a clauſe in the Archiepiſcopal Mandate.

[X] A third Letter to a Clergyman in the Country &c.] He complains of his anſwerers, that their chief talent and merit lay in darkening diſputes, and wearying readers by an endleſs repetition of the ſame baffled arguments, without any new turn of art or improvement. He obſerves, that the art of ſpreading ſcandal is in our time grown to an high pitch of perfection; and that ſome of the Order are extremely improved of late in their ſkill this way. That for his part he is eaſier under the reproaches of his antagoniſt, than he ſhould be under his panegyrics. He aſſerts his own innocence; and declares that he had repreſented facts truly, and that the Author or

In 1702 was publiſhed Dr. Atterbury's Caſe of the Schedule ſtated, wherein an account is given of the riſe and deſign of that Inſtrument, and of the influence it hath on the adjournments of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation; and all the authorities urged in behalf of the Archbiſhop's ſole power to prorogue the whole Convocation, are occaſionally examined. By a Member of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation. London 1702, in 4to. To this was oppoſed The Schedule reviewed, or the right of the Archbiſhop to continue or prorogue the whole Convocation, cleared from the exceptions of a late Vindication of the Narrative of the Lower Houſe; and of a book, intitled, The Caſe of the Schedule ſtated. London, in 4to, 1702. This piece is ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Edmund Gibſon, who complains in it, that the manager of the cauſe of the Lower-Houſe had betrayed ſuch an unſteadineſs in his opinions, and had recourſe ſucceſſively to ſuch a variety of ſhifts, as would tempt one to think, that he firſt reſolved upon his point, and then ſet himſelf to find out ways to maintain it; and that the foundations of the defence were ſo often changed, that it was a ſign the cauſe had not been well conſidered by the firſt undertaker. This was followed with The Parliamentary Original and Rights of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation cleared, and the evidences of its ſeparation from the Upper-Houſe produced on ſeveral heads, particularly in the point of making ſeparate applications (as a diſtinct body of men) to other bodies or perſons, in purſuance of an argument for the Power of the Lower-Houſe to adjourn itſelf; in 4to 1702. The year following Dr. Gibſon publiſhed A ſhort ſtate of ſome preſent queſtions in Convocation, particularly of the Right to continue or prorogue; by way of Commentary upon the Schedule of Continuation. London 1703, in 4to, to which Dr. Geo. Hooper replied in his Summary Defence of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation, particularly concerning Adjournments, in anſwer to a pamphlet, intitled, A ſhort State, &c. in 4to 1703. This was anſwered by Dr. Gibſon in his Marks of a defenceleſs cauſe in the proceedings and writings of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation, particularly in their third and laſt ſyſtem of principles invented by the Vindicator of their Narrative, and repeated in a pamphlet, intitled, A ſummary defence of the Lower-Houſe; in 4to, 1703. The ſame Author likewiſe publiſhed, The pretended independence of the Lower-Houſe upon the Upper, a groundleſs Notion, &c. being a Vindication of Synodus Anglicana, and the Schedule Reviewed; together with the integrity of their Author from the cenſures and reflections of a late pamphlet, intitled, The Parliamentary Original and Rights of the Lower-Houſe, &c. in 4to, 1703. But the moſt conſiderable work againſt Dr. Atterbury was Dr. Wake's State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Councils, Synods, Convocations, Conventions, and other public Aſſemblies, hiſtorically deduced from the converſion of the Saxons to the preſent time; occaſioned by a book intitled, The Rights, Powers and Privileges

Authors, whom he was engaged with, had denied it upon mere frivolous conjectures and reaſonings. He produces a certificate of five Parliament-Writs to the Archbiſhop inſerted in the Extracts of five Convocations for Canterbury, and another certificate in oppoſition to the aſſertions of his antagoniſts. He ſays, that the wiſhes of thoſe who wrote againſt him, to find the facts he alledged falſe, were exceeding ſtrong, and that they miſtook thoſe wiſhes for arguments. That his antagoniſt uſed his words more like an executioner than a fair anſwerer, and put what he ſaid upon the rack to make it confeſs a meaning, which he could not but know in his conſcience it was never intended to imply. He gives alſo a further account of the affair of the Archbiſhop's Mandate, and charges his antagoniſt with a very groſs and wilful prevarication about it, and calls upon him either as publickly to diſprove the charge, or to own it. He confeſſes in the cloſe, that his taſk had been tedious, but that it was abſolutely neceſſary in order to clear his own integrity, and detect the Artifice of thoſe men, who, he ſays, make lies their refuge, and in falſhood hide themſelves.

[Y] An Anſwer to a third Letter to a Clergyman &c.] The Writer complains that the Author of that Letter had confounded him with two other Authors in ſeveral of his Reflections (65); and obſerves (66), that tho' he might with more decency reſent the treatment, which other better Writers had found from him, than that abundance of ſcorn, with which, ſays he, you honour myſelf; yet I ſhall make no returns of that kind, either upon my own or their account. To be ſure not on my own, who have deſerved the uſage I have met with, if I have done you any injuſtice; and I ſhall think myſelf ſufficiently revenged, if I have ſhewn, that I offered you none. This, I think, I have done; but I muſt leave the reader to determine between us, when I have ſummed up the cauſe. He then recapitulates what he had urged againſt his antagoniſt's aſſertion, "that it was the conſtant practice, in the front of "the Acts of every Synod, to enter the King's Par-"liament-Writ with the premoniſhing clauſe, as well "as that to the Archbiſhop for calling the Clergy of "his Province, undoubtedly to ſhew, that the Clergy "then aſſembled in Synod met no leſs in virtue "of the one than of the other." And he calls upon him to try again if five ſuch inſtances as he had brought from the Province of Canterbury from 1614 to 1625, and two from that of York, with the circumſtances that attend them all, will ſupport his aſſertion, and juſtly preſerve that credit, which he had pawn'd with any good and conſidering man. I do not pretend, continues he, to equal abilities in thoſe matters with you; but hope the goodneſs of my cauſe may ſo far make up the diſproportion between us, as to keep me from being thought to go out of my depth. . . . . If you ſhall think fit to make trifling exceptions only to things incidentally mentioned, and that with ſo much ſcorn and contempt as you have ſhewn in this Letter, I ſhall think myſelf at liberty to ſit ſtill, as I am ſure ſuch uſage will not provoke me to write. However I wiſh for your own ſake, as well as for the intereſt of the Church, that your expreſſions had leſs virulency in them, and your arguments more of ſincerity, plainneſs, and ſtrength. Were they no otherwiſe pointed, they would go farther in the minds of good men a great deal, and the Church might receive great advantage from your miniſtry in it. But as your abilities have been employed, I doubt the ſearch you may have made and occaſioned, will not compenſate for the breach of the order and peace of the Church, and the ſcandal given both to the enemies and friends of Religion by our unhappy diviſions.

vileges of an Engliſh Convocation. Fol. 1703 [Z]. We find little after this of any importance upon the Convocation-diſpute till the year 1708, in which Dr. Atterbury publiſhed, without his name, Some proceedings in the Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully repreſented. To which is prefixed an Account of the ſeveral ineffectual attempts at divers times made by the lower Clergy towards quieting all Diſputes, and proceeding upon Synodical Buſineſs. London in 4to. This was anſwered in a pamphlet intitled, Partiality detected, or a Reply to a late pamphlet, intitled, Some Proceedings in the Convocation, &c. diſcovering the many partial repreſentations and unjuſt reflections contained in the ſaid pamphlet, [Z] Dr. Wake's State of the Church and Clergy of England &c.] He begins his Preface by obſerving, that there is ſomething in the nature of controverſial writing ſo corruptive of morality, ſo apt to deſtroy ſome of the nobleſt graces of a Chriſtian life, that he looks upon the caſe to be much the ſame in that, as it is in other wars, and that nothing leſs than an abſolute neceſſity ought to engage a good man in either. What temptations, continues he, it miniſters to pride and paſſion, to malice and uncharitableneſs, to falſeneſs and inſincerity; and what occaſions it too often affords to thoſe, who do not come with a large portion of calmneſs and integrity to the management of it, for the moſt indecent miſcarriages in ſome or all of thoſe particulars, I ſhall not need to ſay. I would to God our own times had not given us too many inſtances of it, to the ſcandal of Religion, as well as to the juſt cenſure of thoſe, who have allowed themſelves ſuch liberties as nothing can excuſe; and it is to be hoped, when they ſhall ſeriouſly reflect upon what they have done, they will be themſelves the moſt forward of any to condemn. He afterwards profeſſes his zealous concern for the rights, powers, and privileges of the Biſhops and Clergy, and tells us, that he is verily perſuaded, that he has done more to aſſert and ſecure them, than Dr. A. after all his loud pretences, has endeavoured, or, without forſaking the principles which he has laid down, will ever be able to do. He obſerves, that he had begun and finiſhed his Anſwer to the Letter to a Convocation-man in about three months time; that after three years labour and application an anſwer to it came out under the ſpecious title of The Rights, Powers, and Privileges, &c. "The diſtance of the time, ſays he, the bulk of the "book itſelf, and the number of its quotations, the "familiar references which it every where made to "our manuſcript records, as well as to our printed "Hiſtorians, raiſed in me at firſt view a more than "ordinary expectation from it, and prompted me to "conclude, that in it I ſhould certainly meet with "ſomewhat to inſtruct as well as much to correct me, "and have my own wiſh thus far accompliſhed as to "ſee the ſubject fully exhauſted by another hand, "which I had freely acknowledged, as I had good "reaſon to do, I wanted both leiſure and materi-"als to finiſh." In this opinion I was the more confirmed upon my firſt peruſal of the Preface to it. I ſaw a ſpirit of wrath and uncharitableneſs accompanied with ſuch an aſſurance of the then unknown Author's abilities for ſuch an undertaking, as I had hardly ever met with in the like degree before. I perceived that he deſired in the direct reverſe of what I had profeſſed, to be look'd upon to have written with care and deliberation, to have fully ſearched into his ſubject, and to have been no leſs plentifully ſtored with materials of all kinds for the perfect clearing of it. And tho' I do not think a man of pride and arrogance, full of himſelf, and a deſpiſer of all others, to be generally the beſt qualified to know either himſelf or the truth, yet I hoped I ſhould here find ſomewhat to clear the one, and thereby to atone for, if not to juſtify, the other. . . . "What the reſult of my examination of this "Book was, the following treatiſe will abundantly ſhew. "I found in it enough to commend the wit, tho' "not the ſpirit of him, who wrote it. Life and vi-"gour, quick thoughts expreſſed in a briſk turn of "words, ran thro' the moſt part of it. One thing "indeed I deſired, (and even that too, for ought I "knew, was not the leaſt evidence of the artifice "of its Author,) that a general darkneſs and obſcu-"rity was ſpread over the whole performance; ſo "that it was not eaſy, even upon a careful reading, "to determine either what his principles were, or by "what arguments or authorities he ſupported thoſe "principles." He obſerves then that he was reſolved upon a confutation of it, with this perſuaſion, ſays he, which neither prejudice nor indignation at the rudeneſs or confidence of my adverſary, but the mere juſtice I owe to truth, obliges me to declare, that in all my life I never met with ſo many or ſuch groſs miſtakes (for I am unwilling to call them by any harder name) of matters of fact, as well as errors in all kind of principles, as I found in this Book; ſcarce a leaf of which will bear a rigorous ſcrutiny, and but a few that will ſtand the moſt favourable examination. But ſo it muſt needs be, where an Author writes in the dark out of other mens Collections; and appeals to Regiſters and Records, not only without ever ſeeing of them, but from ſuch ſhort hints, which tho' the firſt tranſcriber may poſſibly have underſtood, yet a raw compiler, who knows nothing at all of the matter, can hardly be ſuppoſed capable of making any wiſe or pertinent uſe of them. This is an excuſe which Dr. A. I confeſs has no right to, becauſe he pretends to have been himſelf the gatherer, as well as digeſter, of the materials of his Book. But I am well aſſured that this was truly the caſe; and 'tis the moſt favourable apology I know how to make for a great many of his errors. Dr. Wake however tells us (66), that "to pay what is due to "an adverſary, it muſt be allowed, that Dr. A. has "done all that a man of forward parts and a hearty "zeal could do to defend the cauſe which he had "eſpouſed. He has choſen the moſt plauſible topics "of argumentation; and he has given them all the "advantage, that either a ſprightly wit, or a good "aſſurance could afford them. But he wanted one "thing; he had not truth on his ſide; and error, "tho' it may be palliated, and by an artificial ma-"nager, ſuch as Dr. A. without controverſy is, be "diſguiſed ſo as to deceive ſometimes even a wary "reader, yet it will not bear a ſtrict examination. And "accordingly I have here ſhewn him, notwithſtanding "all his other endowments, (in which, if he pleaſes, "he ſhall have my free conſent to ſtand above me,) "to have deluded the world with a mere romance; "and from the one end of his diſcourſe to the other "to have delivered a Hiſtory, not of what was really "done, but of what it was his intereſt to make it "believed had been done." He vindicates himſelf afterwards from the imputations caſt upon him by Dr. Atterbury, that he had written againſt his conſcience; and that in order to ſet up an unreaſonable authority in the Prince, he had eſpouſed ſuch notions as naturally tend to the overthrow of our conſtitution both in Church and State. Were I now minded, ſays he, to recriminate, and ſhew in how many inſtances this pretended Church-Advocate has ſet up ſuch notions, as, being fairly purſued, muſt tend to the deſtruction not only of our Synodical Rights and Liberties, but of our very Epiſcopal Conſtitution itſelf, I ſhould not need to look far for them. The doctrine of Attendance, which he is ſo fond of, and builds the greateſt part of his Book upon, is itſelf a principle of ſlavery, recommended under the name of Right and Liberty, and equally injurious to the Clergy on either ſide, both as it obliges them to a conſtant attendance whenever the Parliament meets, and as long as it ſhall continue to ſit, and deprives them of all power to aſſemble or act at any other times, when that great Council is not held. And how far that Preſbyterian notion maintained by him, that mere Preſbyters have by primitive practice and inſtitution an equal right of place and voice with Biſhops in the Councils of the Church, may be improved to confound the powers and authorities of both, I ſhall leave it to every real friend of our Eccleſiaſtical Polity to conſider. Many other principles there are ſcattered up and down in his Book, which I might here bring together, were I diſpoſed to take the like method with him, which he has done to prejudice his reader againſt me.

phlet, particularly as to what concerns the proceedings of the Convocation in Ireland. London 1708, in 4to [AA]. Biſhop Burnet in the ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of his own Times (n), and other writers take notice of our Author's conduct in theſe diſputes in very ſevere terms [BB], which we ſhall give the reader, who will conſider us in this as well as in all other articles as mere Hiſtorians, who endeavour only to give a candid repreſentation of perſons and things, and therefore not accountable for the prejudices or partiality of others. However the vigour with which he appeared in defence of the Lower-Houſe of Convocation, diſtinguiſhed him in ſuch a manner, that he received the thanks of that houſe. For we are informed in the Hiſtory of the Convocation, which met Feb. the 6th 1700, publiſhed in 4to, 1702, that on April the 8th, when Dr. Finch returned from the Upper-Houſe to the Lower, with an account that no meſſage would be received from them for want of the Prolocutor's preſence, the Dean of Gloceſter took occaſion to ſay, that ſince the Upper-Houſe denied this correſpondence with them, it was now time for the Houſe to return their thanks to Mr. Atterbury for his learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating the rights of Convocation. Upon which it was warmly debated, and the form of thanks being propoſed to be changed from learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating, into his endeavours to aſſert and vindicate, upon a diviſion of the houſe, it was carried as deſigned in the affirmative. And then the Prolocutor ſaid, Mr. Archdeacon of Totneſs, I and this Houſe, (which the Author of the Hiſtory obſerves to be no parliamentary phraſe) return you our thanks, &c. Upon this vote a letter was afterwards ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford, that whereas Mr. Francis Atterbury, late of Chriſt Church, had ſo happily

[AA] Partiality detected, or a Reply to a late Pamphlet entitled, Some Proceedings, &c.] The Author obſerves in his Preface, that he has taken things in order as they lay both in his antagoniſt's Preface and Book, and endeavoured to ſhew that the facts referred to in both are in many particulars very greatly miſrepreſented, and that the things attempted by the majority of the Lower-Houſe have not been for peace. That the repreſentation which that Writer has given us of them, after above two years chewing upon them, is, he confeſſes, ſo extremely artificial, and wrought up with ſo many guarding expreſſions, where there was any room for them, in preparation for a defence, if he ſhould be called to account, that it had taken up a good deal of time ſo to detect the partiality of it, as to make it evident to thoſe, who are ſtrangers to the proceedings of the two Houſes of Convocation. But I verily believe, continues he, that even ſuch will ſee thro' all his diſguiſes; that he has not followed truth in the accounts he has given, and that neither he nor his friends have laboured for peace. That the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, and many Members of the Lower-Houſe acting with them, who are charged as the diſturbers and hinderers of it, have made real approaches towards it, and managed the diſputes that remained with a decent regard to thoſe that oppoſed them. And that on the other hand the patrons of the Lower-Houſe's claims have fallen very ſhort of that reſpect they owed to their fathers and brethren in the manner of treating this controverſy, and advanced every new Convocation in their pretenſions and practices upon them; and to ſupport their pretences have brought in at laſt an evidence from Ireland, which has as little relation to Right, as it has tendency to Peace. I am not aware that I have expreſſed myſelf ſo as to miſlead my reader in any particular; and tho' I will not for all this pretend to ſay there is no one miſtake in my paper, as much care as I have taken to avoid making any, yet I do promiſe, that if this Writer, or any for him, does ſhew me any ſuch error, I will readily retract it; as I deſire nothing but that the truth ſhould be known. But if this Writer or any of his friends ſhould treat this Anſwer with ſcorn and diſdain, without making any fair reply to the arguments and facts it contains, as has been formerly done, I ſhall not think myſelf obliged to take any notice of ſo unſincere and haughty a Writer. Having remarked likewiſe upon what his antagoniſt had ſaid with relation to a Pamphlet intitled, Proceedings in the preſent Convocation (67) relating to the danger of the Church &c. which had been voted by the Lower-Houſe to be diſingenuous, partial, falſe, and ſcandalous (68); and obſerved (69), that "he cannot tell whether the world will "be contented with this, and allow that Houſe ſo "aſſembled to be ſuch competent Judges in a caſe, "that ſo nearly related to them, as to ſubmit to their "ſentence, which appears without any evidence to "ſupport it, only becauſe it was pronounced in a "place that ought to have had greater influence on "the minds of thoſe that met in it, than we have "hitherto found;" he proceeds thus: I ſhall not enter much into the perſonal reflections, which this Writer makes on the perſon he ſuppoſes to have been the Author of the fore-mentioned account, and which I think a man that makes ſuch profeſſions of regard to truth and peace ſhould have wholly forborn. And the rather becauſe it has put people upon gueſſing at this Writer alſo, and ſaying that the perſon ſuppoſed has the leaſt reaſon of all men to reproach others with Fabulous Hiſtory, had there been any occaſion given him here, where no inſtance of falſhood being produced, there is no reaſon to think it is the truth of this Hiſtorian, that has drawn ſo much diſpleaſure upon him. But it has been the practice of this Writer and his friends from the very beginning to call the accounts of thoſe that oppoſed them, falſe and ſcandalous, without ever ſhewing any particular, wherein they were ſo, as they were told in the Preface to the Account of the Convocation in 1702.

[BB] Biſhop Burnet . . . and other Writers take notice of our Author's conduct in this diſpute in very ſevere terms.] The Biſhop obſerves, that thoſe, who began then to be called the High-Church Party, being diſappointed of their views of preferment, ſet up a complaint over England of the want of Convocations, that they were not allowed to ſit nor act with a free liberty to conſider of the grievances of the Clergy, and of the danger the Church was in. "This, ſays he, was a new "pretenſion, never thought of ſince the Reformation. "Some Books were writ to juſtify it with great a-"crimony of ſtyle, and a ſtrain of inſolence, that "was peculiar to one Atterbury, who had indeed "very good parts, great learning, and was an ex-"cellent Preacher, and had many extraordinary things "in him; but was both ambitious and virulent out "of meaſure; and had a ſingular talent of aſſerting "paradoxes with a great aſſurance, ſhewing no "ſhame, when he was detected in them, tho' this "was done in many inſtances. But he let all theſe "paſs without either confeſſing his errors, or pre-"tending to juſtify himſelf. He went on ſtill vent-"ing new falſhoods in ſo barefaced a manner, that "he ſeemed to have outdone the Jeſuits themſelves. "He thought the Government had ſo little ſtrength, "or credit, that any claim againſt it would be well "received. He attacked the ſupremacy of the Crown "with relation to eccleſiaſtical matters, which had "been hitherto maintained by all our Divines with "great zeal. But now the hot Men of the Clergy "did ſo readily entertain his notions, that in them "it appeared, that thoſe, who are the moſt earneſt "in the defence of certain points, when theſe ſeem "to be for them, can very nimbly change their "minds upon a change of circumſtances." And here it may not be improper to quote a paſſage from a Pamphlet in 4to, intitled A Reconciling Letter upon the late differences about Convocational Rights and Proceedings, as managed by thoſe, who have maintained the Liberties of the lower Clergy; which paſſage, if happily asserted the rights and privileges of an English Convocation, as to merit the solemn thanks of the Lower-House of it for his learned pains upon that subject; it might be hoped that the University would be not less forward in taking some publick notice of so great a piece of service to the Church. And that the most proper and seasonable mark of respect to him would be to confer on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity by diploma, without doing exercise, or paying fees; which was accordingly done. We find him likewise engaged in a warm contest with Mr. Nicholson, then Archdeacon, and afterwards Bishop of Carlisle, on account of a passage in his English Historical Library relating to Convocations [CC]. But to view our Author apart from these disputes, in the year 1698 he preached a Sermon of the Usefulness of Church Musick on St. Cecilia's day; and December the 4th the same year another upon the wretchedness of living in a wavering state of mind, at the Rolls Chapel, of which he was appointed Preacher by Sir John Trevor Master of the Rolls. In 1700 he was made Archdeacon of Totness by Sir Jonathan Trelawny then Bishop of Exeter, and was installed January the 29th (o); and the same Bishop likewise appointed him Canon-Residentiary of Exeter. In 1701 he preached a Sermon before the House of Commons on the 29th of May concerning the wisdom of Providence manifested in the Revolution the allegations in it be well-grounded, reflects very severely upon the sincerity of Dr. Atterbury as a Writer in this controversy. The Author of it having observed that a certain number of Members in the Lower-House of Convocation, who were represented by their friends as wise and good men, espoused the Episcopal cause, and all along opposed the majority of their brethren, proceeds thus: These few men, and some others of the like opinion, have objected hard things against the Writers on our side. They say, Dr. Atterbury and Mr. Hill, who join in the same cause or defence of Convocations, are as wide in their principles as East and West, never to be reconciled. They say, that Dr. Atterbury made two editions of the same Book, directly contradicting one another in many material points. That in both Editions he kept to the one design of lessening the King's Prerogative in convocational affairs. And yet that he is since engaged in a mere opposite argument of advancing the Royal Prerogative much beyond the Act of the Clergy's Submission, and much beyond the claims of any former reign, by making the Synod purely subsist by the King's Writ; by rendering the Archbishop an instrument only of the King, and wholly ministerial to him. For they presume Dr. A. to be the Author of the three sheets, intitled, The Power of the Lower-House of Convocation to adjourn itself &c. wherein they pretend he has brought the Church to a kind of absolute subjection to the State; has released the Presbyters from all canonical obedience to the Archbishop and Bishops; has set up for a power in the Lower-House, which was never before imagined, and cannot be now exercised without destroying the constitution of an Episcopal Church. That he has attempted to prove this by reasons, which they call mere fallacies, and by facts, which they assert to be perfect falsehoods. That he has set off the action with such turns and reflections as they complain of, to be anger and bitterness of spirit. And especially that he has took occasion to be unjust to Dr. K. in charging him with the want of sincerity about omitting a clause in the Archiepiscopal Mandates, when yet another, who has replied in The Right of the Archbishop to continue and prorogue the whole Convocation, &c. does justify the care and integrity of Dr. K. and throws back the charge of falsehood upon him that made it; and this under the attestation of a Public Notary, to make the fact more apparent, and the conviction more undeniable. The Author then mentions the inconsistences, which he had observed between three of the principal Tracts in defence of the Lower-House of Convocation, the two former of which were either known or supposed to have been written by Dr. Atterbury, viz. The Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation, 2d Edit. The Power of the Lower-House to adjourn itself; and The Narrative of the Proceedings of the Lower-House of Convocation, with Notes in the margin, and the Preface of the Publisher. "I must confess, says he, upon collating of them, I "do find some matters of opinion and some of fact "so variously stated, that I must beg the benefit of "your judgment how to extricate myself out of some "doubts and difficulties; which to reject, and which "to believe."

[CC] Engaged in a contest with Mr. Nicholson, on account of a passage in his English Historical Library relating to Convocations.] Mr. Nicholson (71) had defined from Bishop Stillingfleet (72) Convocations to be only occasional assemblies of the Bishops and inferior Clergy for such purposes as the King shall direct, when they meet; which drew upon him the censures of Dr. Atterbury in the Preface (73) to his Rights, Powers, and Privileges &c. who tells us in another place of his Preface (74), that Mr. Nicholson in a little Book of his had taken upon him to be Umpire in that controversy. By what secret motive, says he, he was invited to undertake this office, he best knows. Sure I am, that it was not out of any peculiar skill and ability he had to discharge it. Since he has gone out of his way to mix in a dispute that did not belong to him, he must excuse me, if I have not gone out of mine, to avoid seeing his mistakes; which I have taken notice of no otherwise than as the course of my reflections and the particular matter I was upon, led me to observe them. And even at this rate the crop was plentiful. In the Book itself he treats Mr. Nicholson with great severity; and particularly where says (75); Whether all this evidence put together may be allowed to outweigh our Librarian's new guess, must be left to the reader. If it does, it will be apt to raise in him no very advantageous opinion, either of Mr. Nicholson's skill in these particular matters, or of his modesty in any. He tells us afterwards (76), that the only thing that can keep Dr. W. in countenance, is that a certain Brother-Author of his, a Member of Convocation, knows as little of these things as he does. . . . . "I remember, continues he, his (Mr. Nicholson's) words of Bale, (such another rash and rude "Writer) who has misjudged of a certain piece; "The character might be true, for any thing perhaps that he knew; but 'tis that Writer's way to give "accounts of men and their labours at random ‖: "Words, which had Mr. Nicholson carried in his "eye throughout the course of his work, it would "have been much shorter, and much better than it "is at present. The three parts of his Historical "Library would have shrunk into the compass of "one, had he confined himself to say nothing of "Books, but what he knew of them. And this I "assure him is a character not given at random." But Dr. Kennet in a passage quoted * above from his Preface to his Ecclesiastical Synods has asserted, that our Author had dealt very unfairly with Mr. Nicholson, as well as with several other eminent Writers. And Mr. Nicholson himself published A Letter to Dr. White Kennet in defence of the Historical Library against Mr. Francis Atterbury's Objections; 1702, in 4to. He vindicated himself likewise in the Preface to his Scottish Historical Library (77), in the conclusion of which Preface (78) he observes, that the man who should dare to publish such a new and false exposition of a Statute-Law, as Mr. Atterbury has ventured to give us of the 25th of Henry VIII, would immediately be adjudged guilty of leasing-making; and I need not, says he, inform so knowing a person, as he pretends to be, what would follow upon such a sentence. The Laws of England are perhaps a little better humoured; but neither will they long endure such a load of Jest and Poetry as this Explainer seems to be bringing upon them.]

volution of Government, in which he gives a noble deſcription of the conſtitution of England, and King William's character [DD]. The ſame year he was engaged with Dr. Jane Dean of Gloceſter, Dr. Aldrich Dean of Chriſt-Church, Dr. Sherlock Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Cave, Dr. Alſton, Dr. Lancaſter, and Mr. Duke, in reviſing an edition of the Greek Teſtament in folio, with Greek Scholia upon the whole, collected from the Fathers, &c. by Mr. Archdeacon Gregory, which was deſigned to be publiſhed at Oxford (o). Queen Anne upon her acceſſion to the throne appointed him her Chaplain. In the year 1703 May the 30th he preached a Sermon upon the terrors of Conſcience before the Lord Mayor at St. Paul's, which is a ſtrong repreſentation of the horrors attending guilt [EE]. In 170$\frac{4}{5}$ March the 8th he preached before the Houſe of Commons on the duty of publick interceſſion and thankſgiving for Princes, and gave a beautiful Panegyric upon the Queen [FF]. [DD] In which he gives an admirable deſcription of the Conſtitution of England, and King William's Character.] He tells us (79), that we of this Iſland enjoy a conſtitution, wiſely moulded out of all the different forms and kinds of Civil Government, into ſuch an excellent and happy frame, as contains in it all the advantages of thoſe ſeveral forms, without ſharing deeply in any of their great inconveniences. A conſtitution, ſays he, nicely poized between the extremes of too much liberty and too much power, the ſeveral parts of it having a proper check upon each other by the means of which they are all reſtrained or ſoon reduced within their due bounds; and yet the peculiar powers, with which each is ſeparately inveſted, are ſure always in dangerous conjunctures to give way to the common good of the whole. A conſtitution, where the Prince is cloathed with a prerogative that enables him to do all the good he hath a mind to, and wants no degree of authority, but what a good Prince would not and an ill one ought not to have. Where he governs tho' not abſolutely, yet glorioufly, becauſe he governs men and not ſlaves; and is obeyed by them chearfully, becauſe they know, that in obeying him they obey thoſe laws only, which they themſelves had a ſhare in contriving. A conſtitution, where the external Government of the Church is ſo cloſely interwoven with that of the State, and ſo exactly adapted to it in all its parts, as that it can flouriſh only, when that flouriſhes, and muſt, as it hath always hitherto done, decline, die, and revive with it. In a word, where the intereſt of Prince and Subject, Prieſt and People are perpetually the ſame; and the only fatal miſtake, that ever happens in our politics, is, when they are thought to be divided. He afterwards proceeds to the character of King William in this manner: To the influence of this day (that of the Reſtoration) it is owing, that we have now at the head of our troops and our councils a Prince, who hath happily joined together the extremes of martial and political virtues, and knows as well how to govern a free people by their own laws and cuſtoms, as to command legions; who, whether in the cabinet, or in the field, is equally in his ſphere; and is always indifferent either to war or peace, any further than the one or the other ſhall conduce to the good of his people and the general intereſt of mankind (80).

[EE] A ſtrong repreſentation of the horrors attending guilt.] He has given us in that Sermon a character of Mr. Hobbs, with an idea of the perpetual fears and apprehenſions, which he was ſubject to, and which our Author accounts for from the conſciouſneſs of his attempts to deſtroy the very firſt principles of all Religion, notwithſtanding his own inward conviction of it. And he illuſtrates his ſubject by Tiberius's Letter to the Senate from his infamous retreatment at Capreæ, with Tacitus's Reflections upon that Letter. Believe it, ſays Dr. Atterbury (81), the tales of ghoſts and ſpectres were not (as is commonly ſaid) the mere inventions of deſigning men to keep weak minds in awe; nor the productions only of a religious fear, degenerated into melancholy and ſuperſtition; but wicked men, haunted with a ſenſe of their own guilt (as the cruel Tetrarch here in the text with the Baptiſt's murther) were uſed to affright themſelves with ſuch phantoms as theſe, and often miſtook ſtrong and terrible imaginations for real apparitions. He afterwards obſerves (82), that "the diſorders and reprehenſions of conſci- "ence are not a continued but an intermitting diſeaſe, re- "turning upon the mind by fits, and at particular "ſeaſons only; in the intervals of which the patient "ſhall have ſeeming health and real eaſe. The e- "ruptions of burning mountains are not perpetual, "nor doth the ſmoak itſelf aſcend always from the "tops of them; but tho' the ſeeds of fire lodged in "the caverns may be ſtifled and ſuppreſſed for a "time, yet anon they gather ſtrength, and break "out again with a rage great in proportion to its diſ- "continuance. 'Tis by accidents and occaſions chiefly "that the power of this principle is called forth into "act; by a ſudden ill turn of fortune, or a fit of "ſickneſs, or our obſervation of ſome remarkable in- "ſtance of divine vengeance, which hath overtaken "men in like caſes."

[FF] A beautiful Panegyric upon the Queen.] A Queen, ſays he (83), who wears the crown of her forefathers, to which ſhe is entitled by blood, and which was placed on her Royal Head, not only with the free conſent, but with the univerſal joy and acclamations of her ſubjects. Who rules a willing people, not by the terrors of rods and axes, but with the indulgent tenderneſs of a common parent. Who deſires rather to be beloved than feared by them, and takes the trueſt way toward ſecuring their utmoſt love, by ſhewing in every ſtep of her gracious conduct, that ſhe entirely loves them. Who hath no intereſt, can have no intereſt ſeparate from theirs; and upon whom malice itſelf could never faſten a ſuſpicion of her purſuing any meaſures, which aimed rather at her own glory or advantage, than the common good of England. The Law is as much a rule to her, as to the leaſt of thoſe who obey her; the fixt meaſure, not only of her governing power, but even of her will to govern; and ſhe makes no other uſe of that power, with which the Laws have inveſted her, than to give life and force to them. The bleſſings of her mild and merciful Government deſcend from the Throne upon her people, as the ſmall rain cometh down into a fleece of wool, without vehemence or noiſe, like the drops of rain, that water the earth gently and inſenſibly. She draws up the free offerings of our love and duty only to return them back again in ſhowers of Royal Bounty; which make glad the land, and produce a mighty increaſe. He tells us afterwards, that "ſhe "deſerved the Throne, as well by her virtue as by "her birth; who in that publick and exalted ſtation "preſerves all the innocence and ſanctity of a private "life; who is ſuperior to all the temptations, which "a great power ſuggeſts, and which nothing but as "great goodneſs ever overcomes; and to whom there- "fore her ſubjects ſeem to be almoſt as much oblig- "ed for the ſhining pattern of unaffected piety which "ſhe ſets them, as for all the other bleſſings of her "proſperous reign."

[GG] Preſented to the Deanery of Carliſle.] Upon this occaſion we are obliged by the impartiality, which is neceſſary to ſuch a work as ours, to take notice of a very extraordinary piece of conduct in our Divine, mentioned in a little piece, intitled, A Letter from the South by way of Anſwer to a Letter from a Northern Divine, &c. Upon the nomination of Dr. Grahme from the Deanery of Carliſle to that of Bath and Wells, Dr. Atterbury was appointed to ſucceed him; who took out the inſtruments for his inſtallation before his predeceſſor had reſigned. Dr. Nicholſon Biſhop of that See told him therefore, when he came to wait upon him, that he could not admit him for Dean without a formal Reſignation from Dr. Grahme; ſo that Dr. Atterbury was detained a whole on Mr. Thomas Bennet the bookſeller engaged him in a diſpute with Mr. Hoadly the preſent Biſhop of Saliſbury, concerning the advantages of virtue with regard to the preſent life. Dr. Atterbury had inferred from this paſſage of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable, that if there were no life after this, men would be more miſerable than beaſts, and that the beſt of men would often be moſt miſerable, ſince their principles do not give them leave to taſte ſo freely of the pleaſures of life, as other men's do, and expoſe them more to the troubles and dangers of it. Mr. Hoadly examined theſe concluſions in a Letter to Dr. Francis Atterbury, concerning Virtue and Vice [HH], publiſhed in the year 1706. This was anſwered by Dr. Atterbury in the Preface to his volume of Sermons, in which he endeavours to ſupport his opinion, and by a long induction of great authorities to ſhew the world, that the general current of Divines, eſpecially thoſe of our own country, agreed with whole month at Carliſle unadmitted and ſlightly regarded, till the Reſignation inſiſted upon was produced. This Reſignation however upon examination was found to have a flaw in it; which upon his return he endeavoured to rectify in a very unuſual manner. He ſaw that the date of it was almoſt a month ſubſequent to that of his Collation, which rendered the latter null and invalid; and therefore took the following method to amend it. On the 10th of January 1704-5 by the intereſt of Mr. S—d he met his predeceſſor and deſired him to antedate his Reſignation; and inſtead of the 5th of Auguſt to date it on the 8th of July, that ſo it might be reconciled to his Letters-Patents of Collation. The Dean of Wells required a day's time to conſider of the affair, and conſulted an able civilian and other friends, who told him, that as Dr. Atterbury's Letters-Patents were regiſtered, and his own Reſignation inrolled in Chancery, to offer at any alteration of them, when they ſtood upon record, would be a very ill and ſcandalous, as well as dangerous practice. The Dean of Wells therefore ſent the next morning a Letter to Dr. Atterbury, and excuſed himſelf from meeting on that occaſion that day, becauſe he could not poſſibly comply with his requeſt of altering the date of his Reſignation. When the Doctor ſaw that this deſign failed, another ſtep was taken; for a friend of his on the Saturday following made a motion to a conſiderable Officer in the Chancery, that the date of the Reſignation might be altered in the Roll itſelf. But this propoſal was likewiſe rejected; and ſo the publick inſtruments continued irregular.

[HH] Mr. Hoadly examined theſe concluſions in a Letter . . . concerning Virtue and Vice.] He endeavours to ſhew, that Dr. Atterbury has extremely miſtaken the ſenſe of his text, and advanced ſeveral poſitions of dangerous conſequence to Religion. He obſerves (84), that the Apoſtle ſpoke only with reſpect to the ſevere ſufferings, to which the profeſſion of Chriſtianity then expoſed its profeſſors. "The Apoſtle, "ſays he to Dr. Atterbury (85), ſpeaks of Chriſtians "profeſſing faith in Chriſt; you ſpeak of perſons "practiſing the moral precepts of Religion. The "Apoſtle ſpeaks of the condition of ſuch Chriſtians "in a ſtate of the moſt bitter perſecution; you ſpeak "of the condition of virtuous perſons in the ordinary "courſe of God's Providence. The Apoſtle deſigns "nothing by his aſſertion and ſuppoſition, but to "ſhame thoſe ignorant unwary profeſſors of Chriſtia-"nity out of the denial of a general Reſurrection; "you on the contrary draw from your ſuppoſition and "aſſertions an abſolute argument for the Certainty of "a future State. So that upon the review it ſeems "evident, that you have miſtaken the aſſertion it-"ſelf, which the Apoſtle layeth down in the text, "the perſons concerning whom he intends it, the "times, to which he manifeſtly limits it, and the con-"cluſion which he deſigned ſhould be drawn from "it." He then examines the following aſſertion of our Author: "Were there no life after this . . . . "the beſt of men would be often the moſt miſerable; "I mean, as far as happineſs or miſery are to be "meaſured from pleaſing or painful ſenſations. And ſup-"poſing the preſent to be the only life we are to lead, "I ſee not but that this might be eſteemed the true "meaſure of them." Mr. Hoadly tells us, that theſe words expreſly aſſert, that ſuppoſing there were no future State, the practice of virtue would not be the happineſs of man, but the purſuit of bodily pleaſures, which the beaſts are capable of enjoying; and that the beſt of the Heathen Philoſophers would have deteſted ſuch an opinion, nay and even the worſt too, ſince Epicurus was far from ſpeaking in that manner concerning virtue, tho' he abſolutely denied a future State and a Providence. Whereas Dr. Atterbury had maintained that poſition, without once ſuppoſing ſuch a ſtate of perſecution, as the Apoſtle pointed at. Mr. Hoadly obſerves, that it is very ſtrange, that he ſhould take ſuch a notion for granted without attempting any proof of it, tho' it was the main point in the diſpute. That in making the compariſon firſt between men and beaſts, and then between the beſt and worſt of men, he ſhould not once mention any ſingle inſtance of the excellence of the former above the latter. One would have thought, ſays he, that even ſuppoſing no ſtate after this, it were ſome advantage to be made capable of knowing God; of imitating him; of ſeeing him in his works; of ſtudying and finding out truth. One would have thought, that the pleaſures of friendſhip and honeſt ſociety; of interchanging mutual good offices; of contributing to the eaſe and happineſs of our fellow-creatures; and of the practice of many virtues, which are happineſs itſelf, might have been worth the mentioning; not to ſay, might have been accounted by you far beyond the pleaſures of ſenſe, even in this ſtate. "It is again wonderful, that you "ſhould not think it worth your while to mention "any ſingle diſadvantage either of beaſts in their "being made wholly uncapable of theſe God-like ſa-"tisfactions; or of wicked men in the proſecution "of their luſts and paſſions." What? Is it of no account, that wicked men follow their inclinations, even upon your own ſuppoſition, in contradiction to their reaſon? Or is this an happier ſtate than to follow reaſon, and imitate God, in contradiction to inclination? Doth not the latter neceſſarily leave the man in a more happy ſtate than the former? Or are thoſe laſhes of conſcience, under which you ſuppoſe the wicked, of no manner of conſideration? Is it of no account, that the intemperate purſuit of the pleaſures the wicked chooſe, deſtroys even their own deſign, and leads them into a thouſand ſickneſſes, diſturbances, perplexities, deaths; which the virtuous keep off by their temperance, and chaſtity, and command over their appetites? Is it of no account, that envy, malice, revenge, inſatiable deſire of riches or honours, are preſent unhappineſs in themſelves; and that the virtues contrary to them are inward peace and harmony and quiet? Is it of no account, that many vices impair the health, deſtroy the vigour of the mind, haſten death, ruin eſtates, diſturb families, render men the ſcorn and contempt of the good part of the world? And are not theſe certain inconveniences and unhappineſſes in this preſent eſtate, and ſuch as were fit to be mentioned? Is it of no account, that wicked men are as liable to ſickneſs and afflictions, as the good; and want thoſe ſupports in them, which the good and upright, upon your own ſuppoſition, enjoy? Nay that their very ſucceſſes in this world are frequently the occaſions and inſtruments even of their preſent ruin and unhappineſs? And why, I pray, ſhould all this be overlooked for the ſake of thoſe brutiſh pleaſures, in which they indulge themſelves even beyond the example of beaſts? Mr. Hoadly urges ſeveral other objections againſt our Author's doctrine, with the ill tendency of it. Your poſitions, ſays he (86), deprive the cauſe of virtue of a very good and proper argument to recommend it to the trial of any perſons, who are ſtrangers to it, viz. that it will contribute even to their preſent happineſs much more than vice; that it will more conſult the eaſe of their minds, the health of their bodies, the preſervation and increaſe of their eſtates, the eſtabliſhment of their good name; all which doctrine, with him in the point conteſted. This vindication of himſelf was written in ſo ſevere and ſatyrical a manner [II], that Mr. Hoadly publiſhed in 1708 A ſecond Letter to him in anſwer to the Doctor's Preface [KK]; and he tells us in the Preface to his Collection of Tracts printed in 1715, that theſe two Letters againſt Dr. Atterbury were deſigned to vindicate and eſtabliſh the tendency of virtue and morality to the preſent happineſs of ſuch a creature as man is, which he eſteems a point of the utmoſt importance to the Goſpel itſelf. In 1707 April the 9th he preached a Faſt-Sermon before the Lord Mayor at St. Paul's. His obligations to Sir Jonathan Trelawney, now promoted to the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, induced him to dedicate to that Prelate the firſt volume of his Sermons [LL]. His Latin Sermon to the Clergy of London at Sion-College, upon Rom. xiii. 1. preached May the 17th 1709, with a paſſage in a pamphlet publiſhed by him in 1708, engaged him in a diſpute with Mr. Hoadly about Paſſive Obedience [MM]. In 1710 he was ſuppoſed to have are in their ſeveral degrees preſent happineſs. Your doctrine robs even Chriſtianity itſelf of an argument, viz. that the moral virtues it recommends, are in themſelves infinitely preferable to the vices contrary to them; and much more conducive to the preſent happineſs of man, as well as to his future. It ſeems to contradict ſeveral texts of Scripture, which declare at leaſt thus much, that in the ordinary courſe of God's Providence, the virtuous man doth more truly enjoy happineſs even in this life than the wicked. And it gives a wide encouragement to men, who have no faith, or a very weak one, concerning future rewards, to diſturb human ſociety by their inordinate purſuit of the beſtial pleaſures.

[II] This vindication of himſelf was written in ſo ſevere and ſatyrical a manner, &c.] He tells us in that Preface (87), that he might well have ſpared himſelf the trouble of reviewing and defending, what appeared not to him to have been blamed by any wiſe or good men. "For whether, ſays he, the Writer of the "Letter be ſuch, till I know who he is, I may "have leave to doubt. All he ſays of himſelf is, "that he is an obſcure perſon; one, I ſuppoſe, he "means, that is in the dark; and thinks it proper "to continue ſo, that he may take advantage from "thence to attack the reputation of others without "hazarding his own. There may be ſomewhat of "wiſdom perhaps, but ſure there is little of goodneſs "or fairneſs in this conduct. Several ſuch obſcure perſons "as theſe we have had of late, who have inſulted "men of great abilities and worth, and taken plea-"ſure to pelt them from their coverts with little "objections. The ill ſucceſs of their attempts hath "juſtified their prudence in concealing themſelves." He concludes his anſwer to the Letter with theſe words (88): "Theſe are ſuch manifeſt indications of "inſincerity and malice, as all his grave pretences of "concern for the cauſe of virtue will not cover or "elude. If after all he pleads ignorance for his ex-"cuſe; ſince I have ſhewn him his foul miſtakes "and injurious miſrepreſentations, it will become "him publickly to own and retract them; and I "now call upon him in my turn to do it. [KK] A ſecond Letter to him in anſwer to the Doctor's Preface.] Mr. Hoadly obſerves with regard to the ſuſpicions which Dr. Atterbury would have raiſed concerning his being a Chriſtian, that if his own profeſſions can do any thing towards the removal of thoſe ſuſpicions, which the Doctor would willingly appear to entertain himſelf, and laboured to infuſe into his readers, that he might be aſſured that he is one who firmly believes the truth of the Chriſtian Religion, and that plain revelation in it of a future ſtate, in which good men ſhall be rewarded, and the wicked puniſhed. "But I cannot, ſays he, think it "of much importance to any argument, whether the "world knew the Writer or not, unleſs it be, as it "often proves, to lay prejudices in the way of the read-"ers, who, I think, can better judge of the force of any "reaſoning, when it is removed as much as poſſible "from every thing perſonal. If precedents can be "of any force to prove that nameleſs Writers may "be wholly free from all evil deſigns, I could appeal "to your own example, who began that controverſy, "in which you have ſince gained ſo great a reputa-"tion with a book deſtitute of the name of its Au-"thor. [LL] To whom . . . he dedicated the firſt volume of his Sermons.] This dedication is greatly admired for the exquiſite addreſs and elegance of it. He deſires the Biſhop to accept of that publick teſtimony of gratitude from a man, who ſtands, ſays he, indebted to your Lordſhip for many favours, great in themſelves, but made much greater by your generous manner of conferring them. For they were not the effects of importunity, on the juſt rewards of domeſtick ſervice; they ſprung not from dependance or acquaintance, being beſtowed on one, who was (at the firſt) little known to your Lordſhip otherwiſe than by his honeſt endeavours to retrieve thoſe ſynodical rights of the Clergy, whereof you, my Lord, have been all along, to your great honour, the avowed patron and defender.

[NN] Engaged him in a new diſpute with Mr. Hoadly about Paſſive Obedience.] Our Author in a Pamphlet of his abovementioned, intitled Some Proceedings in Convocation, A. D. 1705, faithfully repreſented, &c. in which, Mr. Hoadly tells us (90), he had been careful to impreſs every character peculiar to himſelf, has the following paſſage p. 25. Even the modeſt and moderate Mr. Hoadly . . . . hath ventured to treat the body of the eſtabliſhed Clergy with language more diſdainful and reviling, than it would have become him to have uſed towards his Preſbyterian antagoniſt upon any provocation, charging them with rebellion in the Church, whilſt he himſelf is preaching it up in the State. Mr. Hoadly therefore was induced to examine very particularly Dr. Atterbury's Sermon at Sion-College, which, ſays he to the Doctor (91), I take for the utmoſt ſtretch of your judgment and wit united, in order to prove your charge, and compaſs your ends againſt one, who hath neither given ground for ſuch a charge, nor deſerved ſo much of your zeal. At the cloſe of his Examination he gives a Review of Dr. Atterbury's Management of his cauſe; and obſerves, that it is very ſtrange, that he ſhould uſe ſo much art in his Sermon, as not to declare in poſitive words his own judgment concerning the main queſtion in the whole debate; that, whilſt he is raiſing Trophies upon the performance of another, he ſhould run himſelf into ſuch a multitude of inconſiſtencies; and that he ſhould be ſo ſevere upon another, and repreſent him as ſounding the trumpet of ſedition, and yet ſhould himſelf in the

have been very assistant to Dr. Sacheverell, and to have had a great share in drawing up of his speech [N N]. The Convocation of the Clergy of the Province of Canterbury having met November the 15th the same year, chose our Author for their Prolocutor in the

the very same Sermon give the greatest commendation to other men, who had sounded the same trumpet. (92) Ibid. p. 181. "Upon the review of the whole, continues he (92), the "art of some men will plainly appear. Alas! every man of the lowest capacity can speak his mind "openly, and declare his true judgment. But to "manage a controversy after such a manner as to "deceive many, to make that appear a darling "doctrine, which one believes to be false; to seem "to differ much where one hardly differs one hair's "breadth; to speak so as to be esteemed an Advocate for one cause; and yet to drop what really pleads "for the contrary; hæ tibi erunt artes: this is a management worthy of a great genius, and above the "attainment of every vulgar head." Mr. Hoadly likewise tells us in his Preface to his Original and Institution of Civil Government discussed, that he had added a large Answer to Dr. Atterbury's charge of rebellion, in which he had examined his Latin Sermon, because after he had been contending against the hearty opposition of those, who truly and really differed from him, he thought proper fully to consider the attacks of one, who would only seem to do so. "In this part, "says he, it was impossible to avoid several per- "sonal observations; because my business was to de- "fend against a particular method of controversy, so "peculiar to one person, as that I know not that it "hath ever been practised or attempted by any other "Writer. . . . If I have in the least matter mistaken "or misrepresented this Author, I am ready upon the "first notice to set it right again. All I pretend to, "in what I produce out of his Sermon, is to let the "reader into his true meaning and design; not to "come up to the beauty of his expression; which I "think in many places to be almost inimitable." At the end of his Answer he has subjoined an Appendix, in which, that the reader might the better judge of Dr. Atterbury's conduct in that controversy, and of the treatment, which himself in particular had received from him, he transcribes some remarkable passages out of his Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation, which he confronts with others from his Latin Sermon; and he observes, that he should not have done this, if the Doctor had "given the world the "least reason to think, that upon mature consideration his judgment was really altered; since every "man hath a right to declare upon all good oc- "casions against it, when he is convinced of any "error." (93) Appendix, pag. 203, 204. But when a Writer, says he (93), is carrying on two different causes upon two sets of contradictory principles, and is gaining himself applause amongst the same persons at the same time, by standing up for and against liberty; by depressing the Prerogative and exalting it; by lessening the executive power, and magnifying it; by loading some with all infamy for pleading for submission to it in one particular, which he supposeth an encroachment, and by loading others with the same infamy for pleading against submission to it in cases, that touch the happiness of the whole community; when a Writer, I say, is carrying on two causes after so unparallel'd a manner; nothing can be more proper than the method which I have here taken, to open the eyes both of himself and his readers. This Sermon of his was likewise taken notice of in Dr. Sacheverell's Tryal, by Lieutenant General Stanhope, afterwards Lord Stanhope, who having observed, that it is allowed by the most strenuous Advocates for passive Obedience, that there is a latitude left to subjects in extreme cases, when their rights and liberties are invaded, proceeds thus: I shall on this occasion quote to your Lordships the Sermon of a Reverend Divine, who, I am sure, is not thought to be a favourer of anti-monarchical principles, nor to deserve any of those pretty Epithets, which the Doctor so liberally bestows on those, who differ from him in opinion. 'Tis the Latin Sermon of Dr. Atterbury preached to the Convocation *. The scope and drift of that Discourse, my Lords, was to preach up absolute Obedience; yet such is the invincible force of truth, and such the nature of this argument, that the Doctor, not to betray his conscience, after having well thought upon it, is obliged to express himself in the following words, which your Lordships will give me leave to read to you out of his Sermon, which I have here in my hand. "Quando autem quibusque de cau- "sis Magistratuum imperia detrectare, nosmetipsos "in libertatem vindicare liceat, ne verbulo quidem "indicant; nisi cum aliquid ab hominibus forte im- "peratum fuerit, latis à Deo legibus contrarium; "id ubi acciderit, quid agendum sit, Petri vox illa "declarat: Obedire oportet Deo magis quam homini- "bus." The sense of this passage, my Lords, if I mistake not, is this: But when, and upon what causes it may be lawful to oppose the power of the Prince, and assert our liberties, the Scriptures do not declare; unless in cases, when men shall command things contrary to the laws of God. When that shall happen, St. Peter tells us what we must do, "We must obey God "before men." The General then applies this to the case of the Revolution, and appeals to the memory of their Lordships, whether King James did not command things contrary to the Laws of God; and whether the whole course of his reign was not a series of illegal commands, calculated to destroy our holy Religion, and to violate all our religious and civil rights. "But "to return, says he, to Dr. Atterbury's Sermon, he "goes on thus: Petenda sunt ista . . . a jurisconsultis, à "thesium politicarum tractatoribus; è legibus, è rerum "publicarum formis suæ cuique genti propriis, tanquam "è fonte suo, sunt haurienda. In English thus: "But in such cases you must advise with the Lawyers, "and those learned in Politics, and have recourse to "the laws and constitutions peculiar to each several "country, as to the springs and fountains of this "knowledge." And here it may not be improper to quote a passage from a Pamphlet printed at London in 8vo, 1710, 5th Edit. entitled, The Managers Pro and Con, or an Account of what is said at Child's and Tom's Coffee-houses for and against Dr. Sacheverell. The Author tells us (94), that "Mr. Hoadly, who to his (94) Pag. 21. "honour had incurred the malice of the whole par- "ty, and been recommended by their Satyr to the "Parliament, and by the Parliament in a very ho- "nourable manner to the Queen, had admirably ex- "posed the self-contradictions of one of them in the "Appendix to his last Book." There he brings in the Dean, continues the Author, desiring, that the Clergy may be put in heart and be at hand always to stand up with them, (viz. the Laity,) and to resist a growing tyranny either in Church or State ‡. Mr. Hoadly is not able to reconcile this doctrine with that contained in the Latin Sermon. But tho' such inconsistent principles are irreconcileable, yet if we consider the circumstances of time, we may account for them; because it seems to be much the same design, that made him print that doctrine then, that has made him preach this doctrine now. That Book was printed in 1700, when King William was upon the throne, and the Hanover Succession upon the anvil. Then Mr. Dean was ready to resist the growing tyranny in Church and State. The Latin Sermon I hear was first preached in English about 1708; then it was a damnable sin to resist their hereditary right, who was about that time on board the Mars.

[N N] Had a great share in drawing up of his Speech.] Bishop Burnet in the second volume of the History of his own Time (95) tells us, that it was very plain the (95) Pag. 542. Speech was made for Dr. Sacheverell by others; for the style was correct, and far different from his own. And we find a passage in a Pamphlet published in the year 1712 in 8vo, entitled, The Nation vindicated from the Aspersions cast on it in a late Pamphlet, entitled, A Representation of the present State of Religion, &c. Part. II. which passage insinuates in very gross terms, that our Author had a hand in that Speech; and is as follows (96): "If one sees a vile wretch striking (96) Pag. 40. "at the foundation of the Government, and arraign- "ing the administration; and the better to do this, "manifestly perverting the sacred Writ, and before "the most august Assembly in the world solemnly in- "voking God's Name to a most notorious falshood; "how can one believe that this man has a grain of "Religion; or that his abettors had much more? But Mr. Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford, being apprehenſive leſt the former diſpute between the Archbiſhop and the Lower-Houſe of Convocation might be revived, uſed his utmoſt efforts to eſtabliſh a good correſpondence between them; for which purpoſe he invited Dr. Atterbury to dine with him, and procured a letter from the Queen to the Archbiſhop (q); and her Majeſty ſent a licence to the Convocation, empowering them to enter upon ſuch conſultations, as the preſent ſtate of the Church required; but the management of affairs in the Lower-Houſe was principally directed by our Author [P P]. May the 11th 1711, he was appointed among other members of the Upper and Lower-Houſes of Convocation to compare Mr. Whiſton's doctrines with thoſe of the Church of England; and in June following he drew up the Repreſentation of the preſent ſtate of Religion; which

" not MAKE his Speech, could not but be ſenſible of all his abominable prevarications; yet " with lifted up eyes, and all other actions and geſtures, ſeemed to be as much affected with all he " ſaid, as any of thoſe fooliſh women, whom this holy Farce had ſet a crying. Such a conduct as this " is apt to make people ſuſpect there are in the world " (to borrow an expreſſion from this repreſentation) " determined enemies of all religion and goodneſs, " and that none but ſuch, tho' to get the D---y of C--- " C--- * or C--e †, would have acted ſo ſcandalous a " part." The Author of the Memoirs of Queen Anne (97) having obſerved, that Dr. Sacheverell's Council did all that was in their power both in the Anſwers to the articles of impeachment, and in their pleadings, to clear his intentions from the imputation of diſloyalty to the Queen, and diſreſpect to the Government, tells us, that " the like care was taken of his " Speech, which made ſo great noiſe; in compoſing " of which, beſides his Council, ſome Clergymen " were thought to be concerned, viz. Dr. ATTERBURY, " Dr. Moſs, and Dr. Smalridge, becauſe they were " frequently with him in Weſtminſter-Hall, and at " his apartments in the Temple. Atterbury was a " proud obſtinate man, and a hot ſtickler againſt men " of moderate principles, which cauſed him to be " much cried up by ſome ſort of people, tho' he " was no friend to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, " as has ſince been made manifeſt." And Mr. Boyer in his Hiſtory of the Life and reign of Queen Anne (98), informs us, that it was generally believed, that Dr. Sacheverell's Speech was not of his own compoſing, but the joint Work of Dr. ATTERBURY, Dr. Smalridge, and Dr. Freind, ſupervis'd and corrected by Sir Simon Harcourt and Mr. Phips.

[OO] Dr. Smalridge afterwards Biſhop of Briſtol . . . made . . . an elegant Speech in Latin.] He ſtiles his friend Dr. Atterbury a man, who was a ſtranger to no branch of Literature, and had been long and ſucceſsfully exerciſed in moſt arts and ſciences, and was moſt accompliſhed and perfect in the moſt perfect kinds of learning: Vir in nullo literarum genere hoſpes, in pleriſque artibus & ſtudiis diu & feliciter exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum diſciplinis perfectiſſimus. With regard to his conduct in points of controverſy, he allows him to have been too ſevere in his treatment of his antagoniſts; but alledges that this was not to be aſcribed to any determined ill-nature, or envy, or pride in him, but to a temper of itſelf too warm, or perhaps to a degree of paſſion eaſily pardonable in a ſoldier, who fought for every thing dear to him, in a ſon endeavouring to reſcue his mother from injury and violence. But if there be a greater number of excellencies in his writings; if he has treated of things in themſelves difficult, uſeful and agreeable; if he has confirmed them with the ſtrongeſt arguments; if he has impreſſed them upon the minds of his readers by a pure and perſpicuous ſtyle; it is reaſonable that he ſhould receive the applauſe due to learning from men of letters; from the eloquent the honour due to eloquence. Si quid forte aſperius, ſi quid ardentius, ſi quid liberius effuderit; lector paulo humanior id non odio, non livori, nec arrogantiæ tribuit, ſed aut ingenio ſuapte natura aliquantum præfervido, aut fortaſſe iracundiæ, in milite pro aris ſociſque acriter dimicante, in filio ab injuria & vi matrem ſuam eripiente, facile ignoſcendæ. Quod ſi plures in illius ſcriptis effulgent virtutes; ſi res tractaverit cognitu difficiles, utiles, jucundas; ſi eas validiſſimis argumentis firmaverit; ſi puro ac dilucido ſermone in ipſis legentium animis inſcripſerit, eruditioni apud eruditos, eloquentiæ apud diſertos ſuus conſtet honos.

[P P] The management of affairs in the Lower-Houſe was principally directed by our Author.] Biſhop Burnet tells us (99), that ſoon after the meeting of the Convocation the Queen ſent a Licence to the Convocation, empowering them to enter upon ſuch conſultations, as the ſtate of the Church then required, and particularly to conſider of ſuch matters as ſhe ſhould lay before them; limiting them to a Quorum; and that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop of London, or the Biſhop of Bath and Wells ſhould be preſent, and agree to their reſolutions. With this Licence there was a Letter directed to the Archbiſhop, in which the Convocation was ordered to lay before the Queen an account of the late exceſſive growth of infidelity and hereſy in the nation; and to conſider how to redreſs abuſes in excommunications; how rural Deans might be made more effectual; how Terriers might be made and preſerved more exactly; and how abuſes in Licences for marriages might be corrected. In this whole matter, continues the Hiſtorian, neither the Archbiſhop nor any of the Biſhops were ſo much as conſulted with; and ſome things in the Licence were new. The Archbiſhop was not named the Preſident of the Convocation, as was uſual in former Licences; and in theſe the Archbiſhop's preſence and conſent alone was made neceſſary, except in caſe of ſickneſs, and then the Archbiſhop had named ſome Biſhops to preſide as his Commiſſaries. And in that caſe the Convocation was limited to his Commiſſaries, which ſtill lodged the Preſidentſhip and the Negative with the Archbiſhop. This was according to the primitive pattern to limit the Clergy of a Province to do nothing without the conſent of the Metropolitan. But it was a thing new and unheard of to limit the Convocation to any of their own body, who had no deputation from the Archbiſhop. A report of this being therefore made by the Committee, that was appointed to ſearch the Records, it was laid before the Queen; and ſhe ſent the Convocation a meſſage to let them know, that ſhe did not intend, that thoſe whom ſhe had named to be of the Quorum, ſhould either preſide or have a negative upon their deliberations, tho' the contrary was plainly inſinuated in the Licence. The Archbiſhop was ſo ill of the gout, that after the firſt meetings he could not come any more, and the Biſhop of London was in the ſame circumſtance; upon which the Biſhop of Bath and Wells ſeeing how invidiouſly he was diſtinguiſhed from his brethren, in which he had not been conſulted, pretended ill health; ſo that the reſt of the Biſhops were at a ſtand, till a new Licence was ſent them, in which the Biſhops of Wincheſter, Briſtol, and St. David's, were added to be of the Quorum. The two laſt were newly conſecrated, and had been in no functions of the Church before. And thus the Queen not only paſſed over all the Biſhops made in King William's reign, but a great many of thoſe named by herſelf, and ſet the two laſt in a diſtinction above all their brethren. All this, ſays Biſhop Burnet, was directed

Aug. the 27th the year following he was made Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford (r), which preferment had been vacant ever ſince the deceaſe of Dr. Aldrich, who died December the 14th 1710. He maintained the moſt exact diſcipline in that College, according to ſome perſons; though others affirm that his haughty and deſpotic humour raiſed a prodigious confuſion there, as it had done before at Carliſle, while he was Dean of that Cathedral; ſo that Dr. Smalridge his ſucceſſor in Chriſt-Church uſed to complain of his own hard fate, in being obliged to carry water rected by Atterbury, who had the confidence of the chief Miniſter; and becauſe the other Biſhops had maintained a good correſpondence with the former Miniſtry, it was thought fit to put marks of the Queen's diſtruſt upon them, that it might appear with whom her Royal favour and truſt was lodged.

[22] He drew up the Repreſentation of the preſent ſtate of Religion, which was extremely excepted againſt.] The Committee named to draw up this Repreſentation were the Biſhops of Peterborough, Bangor, Landaff, St. Aſaph, and St. David's, and Dr. Stanhope, Mr. Blomer, Dr. Godolphin, Dr. Altham, Dr. Brideoak, Dr. Smalridge, Dr. Aſheton, Dr. Gaſtrel, Dr. Willis, and Dean Atterbury; but Dr. Sydal was afterwards put in the room of Mr. Blomer. After many ſittings they reduced it to the form in which it was publiſhed. But we are told (100), that this Repreſentation was not unanimouſly approved by all the Members of the Joint-Committee, for ſome of them diſſented to ſome parts of it; and ſome things were inſerted in it by the Lower-Houſe, not agreed to in the Committee. The draught being laid before the Upper-Houſe for their approbation, ſeveral exceptions were made to it. For beſides the ſtile, which was thought by ſome too florid and rhetorical, as well as ſome expreſſions too warm for ſo grave and venerable an Aſſembly, the majority were of opinion, that ſome facts aſſerted in it, and reflecting on the laſt Miniſtry, were not ſufficiently and clearly proved; and that other matters were mentioned in it, which were not cognizable by the Convocation, but only by the Civil Power. Upon which the Biſhops thought fit to model the Repreſentation in another form. The Biſhops having tranſmitted it to the Lower-Houſe for their approbation, the inferior Clergy adhered to the Draught made by the Joint-Committee, after they had added other matters to it, and particularly the paſſage which acknowledged the Queen's care to tranſmit the ſucceſſion of the Crown in the Proteſtant line, as eſtabliſhed by Law; which important clauſe was omitted by the perſon who made that Draught. Thus neither of the Repreſentations was preſented to the Queen, and the Convocation roſe with the diſreputation of doing nothing in a point of ſuch conſequence, and which had been recommended ſo earneſtly by the Queen. The fault of this was laid upon the Biſhops by the Author of the Examiner (101), who in another paper (102) paid a very great compliment to Dr. Atterbury upon his being choſen Prolocutor. If we may gueſs, ſays he, the temper of a Convocation from the choice of a Prolocutor, as it is uſual to do that of a Houſe of Commons by the Speaker, we may expect great things from that Reverend Body, who have done themſelves much reputation, by pitching upon a Gentleman of ſo much piety, wit, and learning for that office; and one who is ſo throughly verſed in thoſe parts of knowledge, which are proper for it. However it appears, that the former Miniſtry had entertained different thoughts of his qualifications for that poſt, as is evident from the Earl of Sunderland's letter to Dr. Chetwood Dean of Gloceſter, dated Nov. 11, 1708, wherein he obſerves, that there were two competitors for the chair, Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Willis, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter. As for the firſt, ſays the Earl, his character is too well known for me to ſay any thing to it. The latter, I will venture to ſay, is qualified with all the abilities neceſſary for ſuch a poſt, as well as of known zeal for her Majeſty's Government, and the eſtabliſhed Church, and of ſuch a temper and prudence as would tend towards healing the diviſions in the Church, rather than widening of them. But let us hear Biſhop Burnet's account of this affair of the Repreſentation. He tells us (103), that the Convocation entered on the conſideration of the matters referred to them by the Queen. And a Committee was appointed to draw up a Repreſentation of the preſent ſtate of the Church and of Religion in the Nation; "but after ſome heads were agreed on, Atterbury procured, that the drawing up of this might be left "to him. And he drew up a moſt virulent declama- "tion, defaming all the Adminiſtration from the "time of the Revolution. Into this he brought "many impious principles and practices, that had "been little heard of or known, but were now to be "publiſhed, if this ſhould be laid before the Queen. "The Lower-Houſe agreed to his Draught, but the "Biſhops laid it aſide, and ordered another Repreſen- "tation to be drawn in more general and more mo- "deſt terms. It was not ſettled which of theſe "Draughts ſhould be made uſe of, or whether any "Repreſentation at all ſhould be made to the Queen. "For it was known, that the deſign in aſking one "was only to have an aſperſion caſt both on the "former Miniſtry and on the former reign. Several "proviſions were prepared with relation to the other "particulars in the Queen's Letter; but none of theſe "were agreed to by both Houſes." There is a paſſage to the ſame purpoſe in The Memoirs of Queen Anne (104), wherein the Author having obſerved, that the Lower-Houſe of Convocation had appointed a Committee, who, with the concurrence of ſome of the Biſhops, might draw up a Repreſentation of the State of Religion, tells us, that "the leading men "among the Clergy, eſpecially thoſe who ſought "after honour and preferment, were zealous to go "hand in hand with the new Miniſtry, and to "ſtrengthen the Houſe of Commons in all their hot "proceedings. Among others Dr. Atterbury had a "deep ſhare in this buſineſs, and led moſt of the "Clergy by his pretended zeal for their intereſts. "This Repreſentation was very long, and contained "a great deal concerning the Atheiſm and Irreligion "of the times, which they aſcribed chiefly to the late "growth of hereſy and ſchiſm, and to the printing "of wicked and atheiſtical Books, which tended to "promote many dangerous opinions, the fault being "laid chiefly on thoſe, who had been lately in pow- "er." But this Repreſentation of the Lower Clergy was never preſented. For ſeveral of the Members of the ſame Houſe, and even ſome, who were of the Committee, found great fault with it, while it was under deliberation; and when it was brought up to the Biſhops for their concurrence, none of them objected againſt ſuch a Repreſentation, had it been done purely with an honeſt zeal, that Judges and Magiſtrates might have the Royal Injunction to put a ſtop to irreligion and profaneneſs ſo far as they came within their cognizance. But they obſerved there was too much of deſign to be ſeen in this Repreſentation, and ſome of the Biſhops complained both of the matter and manner of it; the ſtyle being too florid for a ſubject of ſuch ſerious conſideration. And as to the matter, continues that Author, they took notice, that it contained ſeveral things, which came only within the cognizance of the Civil Power; and that there were alſo ſeveral expreſſions of too much zeal and warmth, which ſeemed to be applied to the late Miniſtry, whereunto they could not agree, ſeeing it did by no means become Miniſters of the Goſpel, while they complained of vice and immorality to apply any thing directly or indirectly to particular perſons, before there was ſome proof brought againſt them, as that might be the means only to influence theſe jealouſies, which were already too much rivetted in the minds of the common people, and which in the end might be found to be ill-grounded. He tells us likewiſe, that the Biſhops obſerved, that the Lower-Houſe had omitted the mention of the Houſe of Hanover. They reduced the Repreſentation therefore to a much ſhorter compaſs, and returned it to the Lower-Houſe. But thoſe who bore a ſway among the inferior Clergy, were very refractory upon this occaſion, as they had been at other times in oppoſing the Biſhops. For theſe drew up a new Repreſentation, but altogether upon their firſt model, wherein they indeed ſupplied their own defect in mentioning the Proteſtant Succeſſion in this, which they had

ter after him to extinguiſh the flames which he had raiſed. In 1712 he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the diſpute between the two Houſes of Convocation [RR]. In the beginning of June 1713, upon the deceaſe of Dr. Thomas Spratt, he was promoted to the See of Rocheſter and Deanery of Weſtminſter, and was conſecrated at Lambeth the 4th of July following (s). He had a very conſiderable intereſt in the Miniſtry at that time, and would probably have been raiſed to the Archbiſhopric of Canterbury, if the Queen's death had not prevented it. It is ſaid that Dr. John Sharp Archbiſhop of York apprehending that Dr. Atterbury might entertain hopes of ſucceeding him, uſed his endeavours to procure his Archbiſhopric for Sir William Dawes, and to exclude the other. However our Biſhop had ſo powerful an intereſt, that it was reported he would be made Lord Privy-Seal. He officiated at the coronation of King George I. as Dean of Weſtminſter; and it is ſaid, that when the ceremony was over, he offered to preſent the King with the Chair of State and Royal Canopy, which were his perquiſites as Dean; but that the offer was rejected with ſome marks of diſlike towards him. During the rebellion in Scotland, when the Pretender's declaration was diſperſed, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhops in and near London had publiſhed a Declaration of their abhorrence of the preſent rebellion; and an exhortation to the Clergy and People under their care to be zealous in the diſcharge of their duties to his Majeſty King George. But the Biſhop of Rocheſter refuſed to ſign this declaration [SS], and engaged Biſhop Smalridge in the ſame refuſal. In ſome of his Sermons which he preached a few years before his commitment, we find ſeveral excellent paſſages had omitted in the other, and changed ſome words and phraſes for others that were more decent; but they could not abate any thing of their zeal againſt the late Miniſtry; and therefore the Biſhops refuſed to join with them; ſo that the Convocation broke up without doing any buſineſs. The Repreſentation of the Lower-Houſe was ſoon after attacked in a Pamphlet, intitled The Nation vindicated from the aſperſions caſt on it in a late Pamphlet, intitled A Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion, &c. The firſt part of The Nation vindicated was publiſhed in 1711, and the ſecond part with ſome Remarks on the Repreſentation of the Iriſh Convocation was printed in 1712. The Author tells us (104), that "a paper which labours to make the "Nation appear black and odious ought not in cha- "rity to be ſuppoſed to have paſſed the Lower-Houſe "of Convocation, ſince 'tis publiſhed without any au- "thority or any name beſides that of John Morphew, "for whom 'tis ſaid to be printed. They ſurely "could not be guilty of ſo inconſiſtent a thing, as to "frame a Repreſentation againſt Printing without au- "thority, and yet publiſh their own without any. "Nor can I well ſuppoſe, after what has been uſually "ſaid by Eccleſiaſtics againſt appealing to the mob, "that they would chooſe to make them judges of the "diſagreement between the two Houſes concerning "the preſent State of Religion. And therefore one "ſhould rather conclude, that the publiſhing this un- "authorized paper as theirs was owing to ſome of "their mortal enemies, who took this opportunity of "playing them the moſt ſpiteful trick imaginable." Had this Repreſentation, adds he (105), ſuitable to the nature of the ſubject, and agreeable to that ſtate of grief the Repreſenters pretend to lie under, been writ after a grave and ſerious manner, and aſſerted inconteſtable facts only, and concluded with deſiring the Magiſtrate to proceed with the utmoſt ſeverity againſt immorality, or any opinions, which conſiſtently with the laws of Chriſtianity he has a right to puniſh, none ſhould more heartily applaud their deſign, or more readily come into it than I. The Author therefore undertakes to prove, 1. That the publiſhers of that paper, inſtead of charging the Church and Kingdom with a prodigious increaſe of impiety and licentiouſneſs, had reaſon to bleſs God, that they were ſince the Revolution much amended even in thoſe things, which are on purpoſe mentioned, to ſhew how much worſe they are ſince that time, than they were in the preceding reigns. 2. That with regard to the account they give of the various ſteps, which they ſay have been taken to infect the minds of the people with Atheiſm, Deiſm, Hereſy, and every monſtrous and deſtructive error, there never was ſo diſingenuous, unfair, and partial a paper offered to the publick; and that there is ſcarce a paragraph relating to that matter, but what is falſe either in whole or in part; and that whilſt it complains of the increaſe of Popery, it advances ſuch notions, as, were they true, would oblige the Nation to return to the Church of Rome; and while it condemns other writings for expoſing the creeds, is ſo unfortunate, as to fall under the ſame fault itſelf. And in proving all this, ſays he, I ſhall do juſtice to the Lower-Houſe of Convocation; for then ſure every one will be convinced they could not be the compilers of ſuch a Repreſentation. 3. That they have omitted the chief cauſe of Atheiſm, Deiſm, Hereſy, and every pernicious and deſtructive Error; and that it is next to a miracle, that the Laity, conſidering the conduct of too many of their guides, are ſo good and virtuous as they are at preſent.

[RR] Diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the diſpute between the two Houſes of Convocation.] We are obliged to have recourſe again to Biſhop Burnet, who tells us (106), that in this Convocation there was a doubt ſuggeſted, whether the Queen's Licence ſtill ſubſiſted after a prorogation by a Royal Writ. The Attorney General gave his opinion, that it was ſtill in force; upon which the Biſhops went on with the reſolution, in which the former Seſſions had ended, and ſent back to the Lower-Houſe a paper, which had been ſent to them from that Houſe in the former Seſſion, with ſuch amendments as they thought proper. But then Dr. Atterbury ſtated a new notion, that as in a Seſſion of Parliament a prorogation put an end to all matters not finiſhed, ſo that they were to begin all a-new; the ſame rule was to be applied to Convocations, in purſuance of his favourite notion, that the proceedings in Parliament were likewiſe to be obſerved among them. The Biſhops did not agree to this; for upon ſearching their Books they found a courſe of precedents to the contrary. And the Schedule, by which the Archbiſhop prorogued them, when the Royal Writ was ſent him, did in expreſs words continue all things in the ſtate, in which they were then, to their next meeting. "Yet this, continues the Biſhop, did not "ſatisfy Atterbury and his party; ſo the Lower- "Houſe ordered him to lay the matter before the "Attorney-General for his opinion. He did that "very partially, for he did not ſhew him the paper "ſent down by the Biſhops; he only gave him a "very defective abſtract of it; whereupon the At- "torney-General gave him ſuch an anſwer as he de- "ſired; by which it was very plain that he was not "rightly informed about it. The Biſhops reſolved "to adhere to the method of former Convocations, "and not to begin matters afreſh, that had been for- "merly near finiſhed. By this means they were at "a full ſtop, ſo that they could not determine theſe "points, which had been recommended to them by "the Queen.

[SS] The Biſhop of Rocheſter refuſed to ſign this declaration.] The reaſon, which he alledged for his refuſal, was on account of ſome reflections caſt upon a party, which he ſaid were not inferior to any in point of loyalty. The paſſage was this: "We are "the more concerned, that both the Clergy and "People of our Communion ſhould ſhew themſelves "hearty friends to the Government upon this occa- "ſion, to vindicate the honour of the Church of "England; becauſe the chief hopes of our enemies paſſages againſt the Popiſh religion [TT], as well as upon other ſubjects. He appeared generally among the proteſtors againſt the meaſures of the Miniſtry under the late King, and drew up the reaſons for ſome of the proteſts with his own hand. On Friday Auguſt the 24th 1722 about two a-clock in the afternoon he was apprehended [UU] at his houſe in Weſtminſter by two Officers, the under Secretary and a Meſſenger, who carried him before a Committee of the Lords of the Privy-Council, who having examined him [XX], committed him priſoner to the Tower of London for High-Treaſon, where he complained of having met with very ſevere treatment [YY]. His commitment having occaſioned a great deal of noiſe, in order to prevent the effects of it among the Clergy, there was publiſhed a pamphlet in 4to, intitled, A Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England on occaſion of the commitment of the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter

" tion of ſuch practices.

[TT] Several excellent paſſages againſt the Popiſh Religion.] In his Sermon at Weſtminſter-Abbey, November 5th 1718, upon Acts xxvi. 26, (107), he explodes, in a very elegant manner, the pretences which are made to miracles in the Romiſh Communion. But as confidently and publickly, ſays he, as they make theſe boaſts of miracles, we may obſerve, that the miracles themſelves are ſaid to have been done very privately in religious houſes and places of ſecrecy and retirement; in remote regions of the world, whither no body will go to diſprove them; in ſuperſtitious countries, where no man hath a mind or leave to examine them. And theſe are circumſtances which ſmell ſtrongly of impoſture and contrivance; for why ſhould things deſigned for publick uſe and influence be thus tranſacted in the dark without witneſſes? A miracle is in the nature of it, ſomewhat done for the converſion of Infidels; it is a ſign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not. And yet it ſo happens, that Popiſh miracles are generally done at home before believers, where there is little or no need of them, or doubt concerning them; or if abroad, yet they are placed at ſuch a convenient diſtance, as not to lie within reach of confutation. " In " China and Japan theſe wonder-workers may pre" tend to have done as many miracles as they pleaſe,
" without the fear of a diſcovery; in Spain and Italy
" they may venture now and then to ſet up for " them, where there are ſo many always ready to " favour their pretences, and to run into any pious " fraud, that can be contrived for them. But in he-" retical countries, (as they term ours) they are very " ſhy, and ſparing of their talent this way; and
" ſtill the more hereſy there is in a country, the " fewer miracles are heard of there." He afterwards obſerves, that the moſt abſurd pretence of this kind, is that famous miracle of the corporal preſence in the Euchariſt, which is done ſo much in the dark, that no body ever did or can ſee it, either before or after it was done, or even while it is doing; no, not the doer himſelf, as loudly as he may boaſt of it. " The miracles of the Goſpel are ſo many appeals " to the ſenſes of men; but this is a ſtrange new kind
" of miracle, which is perfectly inviſible. To ſay,
" that it muſt be received by faith, that we muſt
" believe it to be a miracle, is to deſtroy the very " end and deſign of miracles; which are works done
" in order to procure the belief of ſomewhat elſe,
" and are not therefore themſelves to be believed and
" taken for granted. In a word, it is a miracle,
" the doing of which is ſo utterly a ſecret, that it " wants another miracle to prove it to be one. And
" yet of all things in the world, it is the moſt inca" pable of being proved this way; for miracles be" ing, as I ſaid, appeals to the ſenſes, and Tranſub-
" ſtantiation a plain contradiction to them, the cal" ling in of a miracle to evince the truth of this doc" trine would be (as one very juſtly reaſons) to prove " to a man by what he ſees, that he doth not ſee
" what he ſees. Either therefore the pretended cor" poral preſence is no miracle; or, if it be one, we " are ſtill excuſeable in not admitting it, ſince it " comes to us in a way ſo very ſingular, and demands
" our aſſent againſt the teſtimony of ſenſe, upon the " reports of which all other miracles are founded."
And in his Sermon preached at Weſtminſter-Abbey on Whitſunday 1716 to ſhew that miracles are the moſt proper way of proving the divine authority of any Religion, he calls the Church of Rome the moſt groſs and impoſing Church in the world (108).

[UU] He was apprehended.] Two Officers, with the Under-Secretary and a Meſſenger went to his houſe at Weſtminſter with orders to bring him and his papers before the Council. We are told (109), that he happened to be in his night-gown when they came in, and being informed of their buſineſs deſired time to dreſs himſelf. In the mean while his Secretary came in, and the Officers went to ſearch his papers; in the ſealing of which the Meſſenger brought a paper, which he pretended to have found in his cloſe-ſtool, and deſired that it might be ſealed up with the reſt. The Biſhop obſerving it, and believing it to be a forged one of his own, deſired the Officers not to do it, and to bear witneſs that the paper was not found with him. However they did it; and tho' they behaved themſelves with ſome reſpect towards him, yet the Meſſengers treated him in a very rough manner, and threatened him, if he did not make haſte to dreſs himſelf, to carry him away naked as he was. Upon which he deſired his Secretary to ſee his papers all ſealed up, and went himſelf directly to the Cock-pit, where the Council waited for him. But theſe circumſtances are very contrary to the account, which we find in the Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. I take the liberty, ſays the Author of that Letter, to affirm, becauſe I may do it with truth, that the diſtinction of a private and a publick character was well obſerved upon this occaſion, and that he met with all the civility, I may ſay, tenderneſs, which could poſſibly be ſhewn to any one under circumſtances reſembling his. For the perſons directed by order of King and Council to ſeize his Lordſhip and his papers, received a ſtrict command to treat him with great reſpect and reverence.

[XX] Having examined him.] The Author of the Letter quoted in the preceding note tells us, that when he was examined by the Committee he was permitted to ſit down, and was heard with patience and reſpectful attention in all that he had to offer on his behalf. And what was more unuſual, he was allowed, after he had withdrawn himſelf, to enter twice into the Council-room, and there either alledge or requeſt ſomething in his favour. And that when he was committed, no marks of triumph on the ſide of the Government attended him to the Tower; but as the heart of an unhappy man would wiſh, he paſſed privately and without any guards to that, which is the moſt honourable place of confinement. We are likewiſe informed by another Writer (110), that it was reported, that while he was under examination, he chanced to make uſe of our Saviour's anſwer to the Jewiſh Council, while he ſtood before them; If I tell you, you will not believe me, and if I alſo aſk you, you will not anſwer me, nor let me go (111); and after three quarter's of an hour's ſtay at the Cock-pit, he was ſent to the Tower privately in his own coach, and without any manner of noiſe or obſervation.

[YY] Where he complained of having met with very ſevere treatment.] I have been, ſays he in his Speech to the Houſe of Lords, under a long and cloſe confinement; and have been treated with ſuch ſeverity and ſo great indignity, as I believe, no priſoner in the Tower of my age and function and rank ever was; by which means what ſtrength and uſe of my limbs I had, when I was firſt committed in Auguſt laſt, is now ſo far declined

Rocheſter to the Tower of London [ZZ]. What ſhare he was charged to have had in the conſpiracy appears from the Report of the Secret Committee of the Houſe of Commons [AAA]; which occaſioned a reſolution in that Houſe on March the 11th 1723, that Francis Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter was principally concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on a wicked and deteſtable conſpiracy, for invading theſe Kingdoms with a foreign force, and for raiſing inſurrections and a rebellion at home, in order to ſubvert our preſent happy eſtabliſhment in Church and State, by placing a Popiſh Pretender upon the Throne. In conſequence of this a Bill was brought in to inflict certain pains and penalties upon him, which was read for the firſt time on the 23d of March, and ordered to be ſent to the Biſhop. His trial being appointed for the fourth of April, he ſent a letter to the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, acquainting him with the reaſons which had determined him not to give that Houſe any trouble concerning the Bill depending againſt him, but that he ſhould be ready to make his defence and plea againſt it, when it came to be argued in another Houſe, whereof he had the honour to be a Member. One of the Members of the Houſe of Commons (t) oppoſed the Bill againſt him, by alledging, that it was plain the Pretender had none but a company of ſilly fellows about him; and it was to be feared, that if the Biſhop, who was allowed to be a man of great parts, ſhould be baniſhed, he might be ſollicited and tempted to go to Rome, and there be in a capacity to do more miſchief by his advice, than if he was ſuffered to ſtay in England, under the watchful eye clined that I am very unfit to make my defence againſt a Bill of ſuch an extraordinary nature. The great weakneſs of body and mind, under which I labour, ſuch uſage, ſuch hardſhips, ſuch inſults, as I have undergone, might have broken a more reſolute ſpirit and much ſtronger conſtitution, than falls to my ſhare.

[ZZ] There was publiſhed a pamphlet in 4to, intitled, A Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England &c.] The Author of it obſerves, that it is a thing both reaſonable in itſelf, and highly for the intereſt of the publick, that the welfare of the Church of England, and the ſafety of all its Teachers in particular, ſhould be the conſtant aim and endeavour of our Government. "This, ſays he, our Civil Governours are, I am perſuaded, firmly ſatisfied in..... As it is therefore "their intereſt and duty, ſo I verily believe it is "their inclination and endeavour carefully to ſupport "it, and it would be highly unreaſonable in us to "think, that whenever their cenſures fall upon any "of our order, they act, notwithſtanding theſe two "powerful motives, to the contrary, upon either paſſion and prejudice, or miſrepreſentation." He ſhews then the regard which the King had for the Order of Biſhops, and the great influence which they had at Court; and remarks, that the other conſideration, which inclines him to believe that only juſtice and the neceſſity of the State moved the Civil Government in that important affair of the Biſhop of Rocheſter, is, that till the time of this diſcovery his Lordſhip had a full weight of regard and reſpect paid to his merit at Court, and in the great Council of the nation. Whatever applications he has made to his preſent Majeſty, (and ſome he has made) have been always received and anſwered favourably. Whenever in the honourable aſſembly of the Peers he delivered his opinion about the publick affairs of the Nation, even when he oppoſed all the meaſures and endeavours of the Miniſters of State, they were always obſerved to anſwer his arguments with candour and good manners; and tho' he uſually expreſſed himſelf with all the elegance of language, with all the juſtneſs of delivery, and in the moſt decent geſture of an Orator, yet was it the civility of his audience more than the weight of his eloquence, which gained him attention. For eloquence is a blunt tool with men's reaſon, when it comes from a ſuſpected perſon. It is indeed a ſharp arrow and a poiſoned one too, when it is in the hands of him, whoſe deſigns are evil and not known to be ſo; and therefore as it is what ſcarcely one in a thouſand can ever arrive at, ſo ſcarcely one in ten thouſand can ſafely be truſted with it. He then adds another conſideration, which ſhould diſpoſe even the moſt diſaffected ſubject to think, that this commitment had a juſt and even neceſſary foundation, which was the unpopular view, in which ſuch an action uſes to appear among us; and he remarks, that the commitment of the Biſhop of Rocheſter was very different in the nature of the charge from that of the ſeven Biſhops and of Dr. Sacheverell; and therefore if he had been diſcovered to have contributed any way to deſigns of ſubverting the conſtitution, and placing upon the throne one grown under the very wing of the Papal See, there is no good ſubject but muſt ſee clearly not only the juſtifiableneſs, but even the neceſſity of his commitment. I preſume, continues he, that there is no Proteſtant among us, who believes that a Biſhop, as a Biſhop, is or ought to be exempt from civil enquiries. That erroneous notion was baniſhed from our Iſle with Popery long ago; and the King's Supremacy over all his ſubjects is not doubted by any Member of our Church. Indeed while a Prelate acts within his proper ſphere, a larger portion of reſpect is his due. The Government, as well as private men, ought not raſhly to ſuſpect or take up an accuſation againſt him; for the integrity of his character is the beſt ſupport of that authority, which he ought to have in order to govern all thoſe, who are in his Dioceſe and under his Epiſcopal Juriſdiction. This he has a right to from Scripture and by the reaſons of State. But whenever any one of that high ſtation acts contrary to his religious character, and foments civil wars, and ſtrikes at the eſtabliſhment of his country, it is his intereſt that his ſacred office be not regarded in the queſtion, leſt it ſerve only to aggravate the crimes proved upon him, or (to ſpeak the language of the great St. Paul) to make his ſin exceeding ſinful. The Author afterwards addreſſes himſelf to the friends of the Eſtabliſhment among the Clergy, and repreſents to them, that with too many they lie under the ſcandal of being a reſtleſs and ungovernable body. He reminds them of their having ſolemnly dedicated themſelves to the miniſtry of holy things, and therefore that it is improper for them to interpoſe in publick affairs; that their function obliges them to promote peace; that they are in ſome ſort penſioners of the ſtate, in which they live, and obliged by the moſt ſacred oaths to allegiance to the Government. He concludes his diſcourſe with an expoſtulation addreſſed to thoſe, who wiſh for a change, and not only deſire, but attempt a rebellion; and ſhews them the fatal conſequences, which would inevitably attend the ſucceſs of their deſigns.

[AAA] What ſhare he was charged with having had in the conſpiracy, appears from the report of the ſecret Committee of the Houſe of Commons.] The Committee obſerve, that they find themſelves obliged to mention the Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter as principally aiding, directing, and employing George Kelly, Clerk, in the proſecution of his deſigns. As Mr. Kelly's correſpondencies ſeem'd to derive their weight and ſignificancy chiefly from his being employed by the Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Committee mention the ſeveral reaſons that induced them to believe, that he was ſo employed. What the Biſhop is chiefly charged with is, carrying on a traiterous correſpondence abroad, in order to raiſe an inſurrection in the Kingdom, and to procure foreign forces to invade it. To ſupport this accuſation three Letters were produced, which were thought to be written to General Dillon, a Roman Catholic Officer at Paris, to the late Lord Mar, and the Pretender himſelf under the feigned names of Chivers, Muſgrave, and Jackſon. We ſhall refer the reader to the Report itſelf for the circumſtances and evidence of this charge.

eye of thoſe in power. He was brought to trial before the Houſe of Lords on Monday the 6th of May, and on Saturday following he made his defence [BBB]. This was replied to by the King's Council, Mr. Reeve, and Mr. Wearg. His own Council were Sir Conſtantine Phipps, and William Wynne, Eſq; The Bill was read for the third time upon Wedneſday the 15th of May, and a motion being made that it ſhould paſs, it occaſioned a very warm and long debate. The Earl Poulet, who opened the debate, ſpoke to the nature of the Bill, ſhewed the danger of ſuch an extraordinary proceeding, and [BBB] He made his defence.] He complains at firſt of the ſeverities which he had ſuffered in the tower, and tells the Lords the reaſon why he did not defend himſelf before the Commons, becauſe both by the reſolution of that Houſe, and the preamble of the Bill, he found himſelf prejudged. He enumerates ſome particular hardſhips under which he had laboured, and ſome reaſonable requeſts which had been denied him during his trial. He proceeds then to confute the charge againſt him from the want of evidence to ſupport it, and from its improbability. He obſerves that the charge in general is a wicked deſign to ſubvert the Government by depoſing the King, and placing the Pretender on the Throne, and in order to this traiterouſly conſulting with perſons at home to raiſe a rebellion, and traiterouſly correſponding with perſons abroad to procure an invaſion. With regard to the traiterous conſultation at home, it muſt be between him and the perſons ſuſpected and named in the Report. But with them he declares that he was very far from having had any great familiarity, or they any traiterous conſultations with him, having ſeen ſome of them not in one, others not in two years before; and having never dined with one at all, and but once with another. As for the traiterous correſpondence abroad, it conſiſted in three Letters ſent to General Dillon, the Lord Mar, and the Pretender, which the Biſhop dictated to Mr. Kelly; and two intercepted Letters from Mar and Dillon in anſwer to theſe, and in a foreign correſpondence carried on by Kelly with the Biſhop's knowledge and approbation. With regard to the three Letters, ſuppoſed to be dictated on April the 20th 1722, he aſſerts, that he could not be concerned in them, becauſe the concurrent teſtimonies of his ſervants, that no ſtranger came near him about that time, and the incompetent evidence of the Poſt-Office Clerks, who at ſuch a diſtance of time might not remember Mr. Kelly's hand-writing, ſeem to clear him. As for the two intercepted Letters from Mar and Dillon in anſwer to theſe, he inſiſts upon it, that they were ſent on purpoſe to be intercepted, and to fix the other upon him, becauſe they deſcribe him and his circumſtances in ſuch a plain and open manner, as, were they genuine, muſt have been inconſiſtent with the rules of reſerved writing. With regard to the foreign correſpondence, carried on by Mr. Kelly with the Biſhop's knowledge and approbation, he owns, that Mr. Kelly was no ſtranger to him; but denies, that he was in any degree intimate with him, or frequently ſaw him. He affirms, that he had no ſhare in his correſpondence, as Mr. Kelly himſelf had declared in the Houſe of Lords, and his ſervants teſtified upon oath, that they neither knew his name nor face, becauſe he came ſo ſeldom. And therefore it was hardly to be thought, that he would enter into ſecrets of ſo dangerous a nature with a perſon, with whom he had ſo ſlight an acquaintance. The only thing then that the charge reſts upon, is Neynoe's evidence; and an hear-ſay evidence, ſuch as his was, is (as he ſhewed from a paſſage in Sir John Fenwick's Bill of Attainder) of ſmall weight and conſideration in caſes of this nature. He then repreſents Neynoe as a pragmatical pretender to ſecrets which he knew nothing of, as a cowardly corrupt creature, who would ſwear backward or forward, ſay or unſay any thing for fear or pay; and as a profligate wretch, who had thrown away his life rather than venture to ſtand to the truth of what he had owned before his death. The Biſhop proceeds next to the improbability of the charge with regard to him. For if he had been concerned in any traiterous deſigns againſt the Government, 'tis reaſonable to think, that he would have made the late Duke of Ormond, whom he always highly regarded, his correſpondent, and not the Earl of Mar, whom he never converſed with, except when he was Secretary of State, and who had left the Pretender's intereſt ſeveral years, or Mr. Dillon, a military man, whom he never ſaw. That he would have ſent his Letters by ſome ſecret way, and not committed them to the common poſt; and that ſome traces at leaſt of ſuch a correſpondence would have appeared, either among his papers that were ſeized, or from the teſtimony of ſome credible witneſs. But for a man of his recluſe and retired manner of life, unacquainted with the arts of war, and active only in his proper ſphere, to engage in a conſpiracy, when his heart was full of grief for the loſs of a wife, and his head buſied in buildings and books, and engaged in a correſpondence with learned men about ſettling an important point of Divinity, thoſe, ſays he, that entertain ſuch thoughts without reaſon, may condemn me without argument. "Here is a plot, continues he, of a year or "two ſtanding to ſubvert the Government with "an armed force; an invaſion from abroad; an inſurrection at home; juſt when ripe for execution it "is diſcovered; and twelve months after the contri"vance of the ſcheme no conſultation appears, no "men correſponding together, no proviſion made, no "arms, no officers provided, not a man in arms; "and yet the poor Biſhop has done all this." What could tempt me to ſtep thus out of my way? Was it ambition, and a deſire of climbing into an higher ſtation in the Church? There is not a man in my office further removed from this than I am. Was money my aim? I always deſpiſed it, too much perhaps, conſidering what occaſion I am now like to have for it. For out of a poor Biſhoprick of five hundred pounds per annum, I have laid out no leſs than a thouſand pounds towards repairs of the Church and Epiſcopal Palace; nor did I take one ſhilling for dilapidations. The reſt of my little income has been ſpent as is neceſſary, as I am a Biſhop. Was I influenced by any diſlike of the eſtabliſhed Religion, &c. (112)? Once more; can I be ſuppoſed to favour arbitrary power? The whole tenor of my life hath been otherwiſe. I was always a friend of the liberty of the ſubject, and to the beſt of my power conſtantly maintained it. I may have been thought miſtaken in the meaſures I took to ſupport it. It matters not by what party I was called, ſo my actions are uniform. In the concluſion he ſets before the Lords the grievouſneſs of the penalties to be inflicted upon him; the inſufficiency of the evidence to prove him in the leaſt degree guilty; and the fatal conſequences of making precedents in ſuch extraordinary proceedings. My ruin, ſays he, is not of that moment to any number of men to make it worth their while to violate, or even to ſeem to violate their conſtitution in any degree, which they ought to preſerve againſt any attempts whatſoever. But where once ſuch extraordinary ſteps as theſe are taken, and we depart from the fixed rules and forms of juſtice, and try untrodden paths, no man knows where this ſhall ſtop. "Though I am worthy of no regard; though what"ſoever is done to me may for that reaſon be looked "upon to be juſt; yet your Lordſhips will have ſome "regard to your own laſting intereſt, and that of "poſterity. This is a proceeding, with which the "Conſtitution is unacquainted; which under the pre"tence of ſupporting it, will at laſt effectually de"ſtroy it. For God's ſake, lay aſide theſe extraor"dinary proceedings; ſet not up theſe new and dan"gerous precedents. I for my part will voluntarily "and chearfully go into perpetual baniſhment, and "pleaſe my ſelf that I am, in ſome meaſure, the occaſi"on of putting a ſtop to ſuch precedents, and doing ſome "good to my country, and will live, wherever I am, "praying for its proſperity; and do with the words "of Father Paul to the State of Venice, ſay, Eſto "perpetuo. It is not my departing from it I am con"cerned for. Let me depart, and let my country "be fixed upon the immoveable foundation of law "and juſtice, and ſtand for ever." Some part of my charge hath been diſproved by direct and full evidence, particularly that of writing the letters of the 20th of April, and urged, that the ſwerving from the fixed rules of evidence, and conſequently from juſtice, muſt inevitably be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences to our excellent Conſtitution. Dr. Willis, then Biſhop of Sarum, in anſwer to that alledged, that as extraordinary diſeaſes require extraordinary remedies, ſo in caſes of extreme danger and neceſſity, when the very being of the State lies at ſtake, if the common Law cannot reach great April, or that I knew who wrote them; which I utterly deny that I ever did, or as yet do know. Other parts of the charge there are, which are not capable of ſuch diſproof, nor indeed require it. There I reſt. But, my Lords, there is a way allowed of vindicating my ſelf. It is generally negative; that is, by proteſting and declaring my innocence to your Lordſhips, in the moſt deliberate, ſerious, and ſolemn manner, and appealing to God, the ſearcher of hearts, as to the truth of what I ſay, as I do it in what follows. I am charged in the Report with directing a correſpondence to Mr. Kelly; but I ſolemnly deny that I ever directly or indirectly ſaw a ſingle line of any of their letters till I met with them in print. Nor were the contents of any of them ever communicated to me. I do in the next place deny that I was ever privy to any memorial to be drawn up to be delivered to the Regent. Nor was I ever acquainted with any attempt to be made on the King's going to Hanover, or at the time of the Elections. Nor did I hear the leaſt rumour of the plot to take place after the breaking up of the camp till ſome time after Mr. Layer's commitment. I do with the ſame ſolemnity declare, that I never collected, remitted, received, or asked any money of any man to facilitate thoſe deſigns; nor was I ever acquainted with, or had any remittances whatſoever from any of thoſe perſons. I never drew any declaration, minutes, or paper, in the name of the Pretender, as is expreſly charged upon me. And I never knew of any commiſſion iſſued, preparation of arms, officers, or ſoldiers, or methods taken to procure any in order to raiſe an inſurrection in theſe Kingdoms. All this I declare to be true, and will ſo declare to the laſt gaſp of my breath. And I am ſure, the further your Lordſhips examine into this affair, the more you will be convinced of my innocency. Theſe contain all the capital articles, of which I am accuſed in the Report of the Houſe of Commons. " Had the charge " been as fully proved as aſcertained, it had been " vain to make proteſtations of my innocency, tho' " never ſo ſolemn. But as the charge is only ſup- " ported by the ſlighteſt probabilities, and which can- " not be diſproved in any inſtance, without proving " a negative; allow the ſolemn aſſeverations of a " man in behalf of his own innocence to have their " due weight, and I aſk no more, than that they " may have as much influence with your Lordſhips, " as they have truth." If on any account there ſhall ſtill be thought by your Lordſhips to be any ſeeming ſtrength in the proofs againſt me; if by your Lordſhips judgments ſpringing from unknown motives, I ſhall be thought to be guilty; if for any reaſons or neceſſity of State, in the wiſdom and juſtice of which I am no competent judge, your Lordſhips ſhall proceed to paſs this Bill againſt me, I ſhall diſpoſe my ſelf quietly and tacitly to ſubmit to what you do; God's will be done. " Naked " came I out of my mother's womb, and naked " ſhall I return; and whether he gives or takes a- " way, bleſſed be the name of the Lord." Mr. Wearg, in his reply to the Biſhop's defence, pays a fine compliment to the admirable eloquence, which that Prelate had exerted in his ſpeech. It muſt be allowed, ſays Mr. Wearg, that the Reverend Prelate at the bar has made his defence with the utmoſt force and beauty of eloquence. Was I capable of anſwering it in the like manner, which I own I am not, yet I ſhould not think my ſelf at liberty to do it under the preſent circumſtances. For though it may be excuſable in a perſon upon his defence to make uſe of that powerful inſtrument of error and deceit, which always impoſes upon the reaſon, and miſguides the judgment in proportion as it affects the paſſions; yet I can't think the ſame methods juſtifiable in a perſon employed to carry on the proſecution. I ſhall therefore examine the force of what has been offered on behalf of the Reverend Prelate, ſtripp'd of the ornaments and colours of Rhetoriek. We have an account of the effect, which the Biſhop's eloquence had upon the Houſe of Lords, in the following paſſage of the ſame Speech of Mr. Wearg. Theſe things, ſays he, will ſeem incredible to one, who ſhall read this catalogue of complaints in his Lordſhip's Speech; and yet theſe are ſome of thoſe complaints, which with the aſſiſtance of a warm and maſterly ſtyle drew tears from ſome of your Lordſhip's eyes. But when ſtripp'd of that falſe beauty, and examined by the ſure and unerring rules of reaſon, appear to be without foundation, and to have been made without that ſtrict regard to truth, which, I preſume by ſome parts of his Lordſhip's Speech he would be thought always to have. Mr. Wearg replies very particularly to all the allegations in favour of the Biſhop, and in the concluſion of his Speech has this paſſage. " The laſt thing preſſed by the Reverend " Prelate, is a ſolemn proteſtation, I cannot ſay of " innocence, becauſe it ſeems to me to be conceived " in ſuch terms as not to contradict any part of the " charge inſiſted upon by the Council for the Bill. It " is chiefly calculated to anſwer ſome particular cir- " cumſtances of times, without any denial of the " general charge, or the leaſt declaration of affection " or loyalty towards his preſent Majeſty. But if his " proteſtations amounted to a direct and poſitive de- " nial of the charge, they ought not to have any weight " with your Lordſhips, ſince this is a defence equally " in the power of the moſt guilty as well as the in- " nocent. A little proof is better than many prote- " ſtations. And I can't help obſerving upon this " head, and I hope his Lordſhip won't impute this " obſervation to ill nature, but a ſenſe of my duty, " which obliges me to make all proper obſervations, " that it appears his Lordſhip has not always that " ſtrict regard to truth, which he ought to have, by " the papers taken upon his ſervant at the Tower." The Duke of Wharton in his Speech againſt the Bill, took notice of an obſervation made by ſome of the Lords, and likewiſe by Mr. Wearg, that the Biſhop had made no declaration of affection or loyalty towards the King. It has been ſaid in the debate, ſays the Duke, that the Biſhop ought to have made proteſtations of his zeal for his Majeſty and his family. But I think he took the moſt ready way of performing his duty, when he ſhewed himſelf innocent of the crimes laid to his charge. If he had made uſe of any expreſſions, which thoſe Lords blame him for omitting, the ſame good nature would have called it hypocriſy; and thoſe who are diſpleaſed with his ſilence, would have accuſed him of inſincerity. The ſevereſt anſwer to the Biſhop's defence was publiſhed in ſeveral Letters in the London Journal for September 1723; two of which Letters profeſſedly treated the argument about the inherent right of the ſupreme authority of the Nation to proceed againſt a perſon by Bill in Parliament, and the prudence of making uſe of that right upon juſt and proper occaſions, in oppoſition to that part of the Biſhop's defence of himſelf relating to the method of proceeding againſt him by Bill. The Author obſerves in his Letter of Sept. 28. N°. 218. that the right itſelf is conſtantly allowed upon ſome occaſions by all thoſe, who have oppoſed the making uſe of it upon that. And with regard to the perſon here particularly concerned, it is ſufficient to remark, that the only ground of his complaints upon that head muſt be, that he had vainly flattered himſelf with the imagination, that he was ſafe in the prodigious care he had made uſe of to guard himſelf againſt the reach of all evidence in the common courſe of juſtice in inferior Courts; and from thence inferred, how very hard it was that one, who had given himſelf ſo much trouble in order to contract the guilt of treaſon, and ſo much more to hide it, ſhould be at laſt taken in the wilineſs of his own cunning, and brought to that puniſhment in an extraordinary method, which in the ordinary courſe of things he hoped to avoid. He proceeds then to the laſt part of the Biſhop's Defence, his ſolemn aſſeverations and concluſion of the whole. He calls this the melancholy part of his defence; and ſo, ſays he, muſt every man think it, who has any regard laſt to the ſimplicity of words, or the ſacredneſs of oaths. For in ſuch a caſe as this, it makes but a ſmall dif-

great offenders, the Legiſlature ought to exert itſelf. He was replied to by Dr. Gaſtrell Biſhop of Cheſter, who urged, that this was very far from the preſent caſe, ſince the conſpiracy, in which the Biſhop of Rocheſter was charged to have had a ſhare, had been diſcovered and diſappointed long before. He was anſwered by Dr. Gibſon, Biſhop of London, to whom the Duke of Wharton replied in a long ſpeech, wherein he ſummed up, with a great deal of ſkill, judgment and oratory, the whole evidence that had been produced againſt the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and endeavoured to ſhew the inſufficiency of it to prove the charge. His Grace was ſtrongly ſupported by the Lord Bathurſt [CCC].

ference in my account, whether a perſon in direct poſitive words perjures himſelf, or whether he artfully chooſes ſuch a manner of expreſſion, and ſuch particular matters to ſpeak of, as plainly ſhew the ſole intention of the man to be the avoiding every honeſt declaration that could be to the purpoſe. The Author obſerves then, that when a perſon, accuſed of a particular crime, after having ſaid what he thought proper in his own vindication, or in anſwer to the evidence againſt him, changes his tone, and voluntarily offers his ſolemn aſſeverations in order to clear himſelf, he does in effect take an oath to ſpeak to the main point, to ſpeak to it plainly, explicitly, without artifice; and is in much the ſame condition with any one, who is formally ſworn to ſpeak the truth, and the whole truth, as well as nothing but the truth. For the only uſe of voluntary aſſeverations in criminal caſes muſt ariſe from their plainneſs, their openneſs, their comprehenſiveneſs, and their fitneſs to the ſingle purpoſe, at which they would appear to aim. Otherwiſe they can have no weight but againſt the perſon who has recourſe to them. And this effect they muſt neceſſarily have. For when a perſon ſtands forth, and declares to the Judges, that he is ready to purge himſelf of the charge brought againſt him by ſolemn appeals to God, the ſearcher of hearts; and after this moving declaration is obſerved to avoid the direct charge laid againſt him, to pitch upon ſome nice particular circumſtances of facts, which were not made any part of that charge at the Bar where he now ſtands; and to mix up his moſt ſolemn words with that cunning and art, which ought to be far diſtant from them; it cannot be, but that his own method and form of proteſtation muſt itſelf recoil upon him, and be itſelf an argument of that guilt, which it was officiouſly brought to hide. This, continues the Author, is the caſe here. The late Biſhop, to whoſe profeſſion ſuch a procedure little agrees, is expreſly charged with dictating ſome particular letters to Mr. Kelly; with correſponding with the Pretender; with breach of his repeated oaths of fidelity to King George, &c. After other inſufficient anſwers he deſires to have recourſe to the method of clearing himſelf by the moſt ſolemn appeals to God, as the ſearcher of hearts. In this method, and throughout the courſe of all theſe appeals to heaven, he carefully avoids the mention of King George's name, or that of any belonging to his family. He never once declares himſelf to have any ſenſe of his oaths to King George and the Proteſtant Eſtabliſhment, upon his mind, or once acknowledges King George's right to theſe Kingdoms. He never once, ſo much as in words, diſowns the Pretender's right to this crown, or diſclaims all correſpondence with him; or declares even the coldeſt reſolution againſt him. Theſe particulars, conſidering the charge laid againſt him of breaking through the ſacred ties of repeated oaths, could not be forgot, could not be omitted through haſte, or inadvertence, or defect of memory, but muſt be deſignedly, wilfully, and deliberately paſſed over. And then, when he comes to the main particular, he runs off from that, as it was laid againſt him in the Bill, and inſtead of denying in the preſence of God that he ever communicated or dictated any letters to Mr. Kelly, or the like; he dextrouſly, by I know not what figure of oratory, or what rule of art, ſolemnly denies that he ever ſaw any ſuch letters of Kelly's, or that the contents were ever communicated TO him BY Kelly. Such an uſe of words as this, and ſuch a change of language, are bad every where, but are inſupportably bad in a ſentence, uſhered in with a ſolemn appeal to Heaven, and ſanctified with the awful name of God. " After having thus " put a cheat, as he hoped, upon the ears of his au- " dience, and after having ſeemed to deny (what he " did not at all deny) his dictating letters to Kelly " in the correſpondence laid to his charge; after " this he concerns himſelf only with other particu- " lar circumſtances, which were not the ſubject of " the charge againſt him, but lay ſcattered in the " Report of the Houſe of Commons; and moſt of " them only there mentioned, as matters related by " perſons examined concerning what they had heard " about the conſpiracy. Some of theſe particulars, " with very peculiar circumſtances of time and " place, (though as I have obſerved, not made any " part of the charge againſt him,) he has taken up- " on him more expreſly to deny, whilſt he was con- " ſcious, he avoided the true points laid upon him, " and might ſafely deal about his proteſtations, where " there was nothing particular ſo much as alledged " in his trial to confront and invalidate them. This " is the method he thought fit to take in ſo ſerious " and ſolemn a matter as that of appealing to God, " the ſearcher of hearts. And if the careful omiſſion " of all that was truly proper for the declaration of " his innocence upon ſuch an occaſion; the artful " evaſion of what he would ſeem to ſpeak to by a " ſubtle change of the main charge, and the dextrous " running away from the real accuſation againſt him " in the Bill, to ſeveral wandering particulars in the " Report not alledged againſt him; if all this be not " ſufficient to ſatisfy any unprejudiced perſon, that " guilt was the real ground of ſuch a behaviour, as " guilt alone could make neceſſary, I know not " what to add. This I am ſure of, that ſuch hid- " ing and concealing of truth; ſuch avoiding of all " plain language; ſuch prevarication and mental re- " ſervation, after having made a ſolemn ſhew of ap- " peal to God, can be thought to differ very little " from the guilt of perjury, or the greateſt diſreſpect " to the ſacredneſs of an oath. Better a thouſand " times had it been for one of his character never to " have entered into a method of defence, which was " not forced upon him, than to have entered into it " with ſuch ſolemnity, and to have come out of it " with ſuch a blot of falſhood and ſuch a mark of " guilt added to all the reſt." The concluſion of his whole defence, adds the Author, is of a piece with this part of it. It is a concluſion, not only very moving, but which would very well become the mouth of a good, upright, and innocent man, ſubmitting himſelf to injuſtice and wrong under a ſenſe of God's over-ruling Providence. But, conſidered in the mouth of one ſo conſcious to himſelf of his own inward guilt, as not to be able plainly to diſown the charge; of one, proved by a multitude of convincing circumſtances to have brought himſelf to this condition by breach of ſolemn vows and oaths; and of one, whom all his own art and cunning could not cover from the light of evidence; it then becomes rather an aggravation of his crime, than an argument of his innocence, and is found to move the indignation and zeal of mankind much more than their pity and compaſſion. It is at beſt no otherwiſe eſteemed than it would have been, had it come from a perſon, whoſe characteriſtic and diſtinguiſhing mark, through his whole life of controverſy, was well known to have been a peculiar knack and dexterity of calling in the holy Scripture into all his private quarrels, and of applying the ſacred words of it to all the purpoſes of his own perſonal paſſions and reſentments.

[CCC] His Grace was ſtrongly ſupported by the Lord Bathurſt.] He took notice firſt of the ungracious diſtinctions, which were fixed upon the Members of that noble and illuſtrious Aſſembly, who differed in opinion from thoſe, who happened to have the majority. That for his part, as he had nothing in view but truth and juſtice, the good of his country, the honour of that Houſe, and the diſcharge of his own conſcience, he would freely ſpeak his thoughts, notwithſtanding all diſcouragements. That he would not complain of the ſiniſter arts that had been uſed of late to render ſome perſons obnoxious, and under pretence

The Earl of Strafford ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and likewiſe the Lord Trevor, who declared, that he had all along, and would ſtill oppoſe theſe extraordinary proceedings, which tended to lodge an exorbitant power in their fellow-ſubjects. That if he were to loſe his liberty, he had rather give it up to one ſingle Tyrant, than to many; for a Tyrant, if a man of common underſtanding, would, for his own ſake, be tender of the lives of his ſubjects; whereas many Tyrants would endeavour to deſtroy one another, to get one another's preferments. He was replied to by the Earl of Finlater and Seafield. The Duke of Argyle run through and confuted the moſt eſſential parts of the Biſhop's defence, and aggravated his offence, by which he had debaſed his holy function and character, and acted contrary to the moſt ſolemn and repeated oaths which he had taken. The Lord Gower ſpoke afterwards againſt the Bill; but what ſurpriz'd moſt perſons, was that the Lord Lechmere, who on ſeveral occaſions had expreſſed his diſlike of theſe extraordinary proceedings, declared it as his opinion, that there was ſufficient evidence to ſupport the charge. He was anſwered by Earl Cowper in a very remarkable ſpeech [DDD]. The Earls of Peterborough and Cholmondley ſpoke in favour of the Bill, which at laſt paſſed pretence of their being ſo, to open their letters about their minuteſt domeſtick affairs. For thoſe ſmall grievances he could eaſily bear; but when he ſaw things go ſo far, as to condemn a perſon of the higheſt dignity in the Church, in ſuch an unprecedented manner, and without any legal evidence, he thought it his duty to oppoſe a proceeding ſo unjuſt and unwarrantable in itſelf, and ſo dangerous and diſmal in its conſequences. To this purpoſe he begged leave to tell their Lordſhips a ſtory, which he had from ſeveral Officers of undoubted credit, who ſerved in Flanders in the late war. A Frenchman, it ſeems, had invented a machine, which would not only kill more men at once, than any yet in uſe, but alſo diſable for ever any man who ſhould be wounded by it. Big with hopes of a great reward he applied to one of the Miniſters, who laid his propoſal before the late French King; but that Monarch conſidering, that ſo deſtructive an engine might ſoon be turned againſt his own men, did not think proper to encourage it; whereupon the inventor came over into England, and offered his ſervice to ſome of our Generals, who likewiſe rejected the propoſal with indignation. The uſe and application of this ſtory, added his Lordſhip, is very obvious. For if this way of proceeding be admitted, it will certainly prove a very dangerous engine. No man's life, liberty, or property will be ſafe. And if thoſe, who were in the adminiſtration ſome years ago, and who had as great a ſhare in the affections of the people as any that came after them, had made uſe of ſuch a political machine, ſome of thoſe noble perſons, who now appear ſo zealous promoters of the Bill, would not be in a capacity to ſerve his Majeſty at this time. His Lordſhip added, that if ſuch extraordinary proceedings went on, he ſaw nothing remaining for him and others to do, but to retire to their country-houſes, and there, if poſſible, quietly enjoy their eſtates within their own families, ſince the leaſt correſpondence, the leaſt intercepted letter might be made criminal. To this purpoſe his Lordſhip quoted a paſſage out of Cardinal de Retz's Memoirs, relating to that wicked Politician Cardinal Mazarin, who boaſted, that if he had but two lines of any man's writing, with a few circumſtances atteſted by witneſſes, he could cut off his head when he pleaſed. His Lordſhip likewiſe animadverted with great ſeverity upon the majority of the Bench of Biſhops, turning towards whom he ſaid, that he could hardly account for the inveterate hatred and malice, which ſome perſons bore the learned and ingenious Biſhop of Rocheſter, unleſs it was that they were intoxicated with the infatuation of ſome of the wild Indians, who fondly believe they inherit not only the ſpoils, but even the abilities of any great enemy they kill (112).

[DDD] He was anſwered by Earl Cowper in a very remarkable Speech.] He obſerved, that the ſtrongeſt argument, which had been urged for the Bill, had been neceſſity; but that for his part he ſaw no neceſſity, that could juſtify ſo unprecedented and ſo dangerous a proceeding. That, as already had been ſuggeſted, the conſpiracy had above a twelve month before been happily diſcovered, and the effects of it conſequently prevented. That beſides the intrinſic weight and ſtrength of the Government by the numerous offices and employments civil and military, and the wealth and intereſt of the well-affected to his Majeſty's Perſon, and the preſent happy Eſtabliſhment, the hands of thoſe at the helm had been ſtill fortified by the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus Act and the additional Troops; ſo that, in his opinion, there could be no danger to the Government, if Plunket and Kelly were not priſoners for life, nor the Biſhop of Rocheſter ſent into baniſhment. That on the contrary, if that Prelate's talent and genius lay in contriving and carrying on State-intrigues, he thought him leſs dangerous at home than abroad. That the other reaſons alledged to ſupport this extraordinary proceeding, had no more weight in them than the firſt. That the known rules of evidence, as laid down at firſt, and eſtabliſhed by the law of the land, were the birth-right of every ſubject of this nation, and ought to be conſtantly obſerved, not only in the inferior Courts of Judicature, but alſo in both Houſes of Parliament, till altered by the Legiſlature. That much had been ſaid of the power of Parliaments, which he owned was very great; but that, in his opinion, their abſolute power conſiſted only in making and repealing laws; and till ſuch time as a law was repealed, every ſubject had a right to it. That the admitting the precarious and uncertain evidence of the Clerks of the Poſt-Office, was a very dangerous precedent. That in former times it was thought very grievous, that in capital caſes a man ſhould be affected by ſimilitude of hands; but here the caſe was much worſe, ſince it was allowed, that the Clerks of the Poſt-Office might carry the ſimilitude of hands four months in their minds. That thoſe men might be honeſt, and ſwear to the beſt of their knowledge; but he was ſure they were at leaſt very willing and forward evidence; for when he aſked one of them, how he knew ſuch a paper to be Mr. Kelly's hand? he readily anſwered, that he had ſeen the ſame four months before, and he was ſure it could be no other; whereas any man, who has been ever ſo little converſant in the world, knows that hands may be ſo well counterfeited as not to be diſtinguiſhed. His Lordſhip then commended the Biſhop's noble and brave behaviour in not anſwering before the Houſe of Commons, whoſe proceeding in this unprecedented manner againſt a Lord of Parliament was ſuch an incroachment on the prerogative of the Peerage, that if ſubmitted to by paſſing this Bill, they might well be ſaid to be the laſt of Lords. Ultimus Romanorum, my Lords, (ſaid his Lordſhip in the concluſion,) was a character of honour and praiſe; but to be the laſt of Britiſh Peers, by giving up our ancient privileges, will never, I doubt, admit of ſuch a conſtruction; and therefore I am for rejecting this Bill (113). Some months after the tryal there was publiſhed a paper (114), intitled, A Speech made by a noble Peer, (Earl C—r) in the Houſe of Lords, upon the third reading of the Bill for inflicting pains and penalties on Francis Lord Biſhop of Rocheſter. This Speech was aſcribed to Earl Cowper, tho' it appears to have been eſſentially different from that, of which we have given the ſubſtance above. But the true account of this pretended Speech is as follows: Mr. Jeremiah Griffith, a Gentleman of the Law, having written a Defence of the Biſhop of Rocheſter in order to be publiſhed in the True Briton, ſeveral months after the baniſhment of that

paſſed by a majority of eighty three to forty three, and received the Royal Aſſent the 27th of May. It is ſaid, that the King ſigned this Bill with ſome regret, being much concerned, as he ſaid, that there ſhould be any juſt occaſion of dooming to perpetual baniſhment a Biſhop of the Church of England, and a man of ſuch eminent parts and learning, and one, who had been ſo nearly attendant on him at his Coronation. However to mitigate in ſome meaſure the ſeverity of this ſentence, his daughter was permitted to attend him in his travels, and through the hands of her huſband, Mr. Morrice, he was allowed a correſpondence and intercourſe with his native country. On Tueſday the 8th of June he embarked on board the Aldborough Man of War, and landed the Friday following at Calais, where being informed that the late Lord Viſcount Bolingbroke, who had obtained his pardon, was juſt arrived to embark for England, he ſaid very facetiouſly, Then I am exchanged. He went thence to Bruſſels, where it is ſaid that he intended to pay a viſit to the Earl of Ayleſbury, a Roman Catholick Nobleman, who refuſed it, intimating, that though his own religion might be an excuſe for his being in an oppoſite intereſt to the Government of England, yet, he could not countenance a Proteſtant Clergyman, who acted inconſiſtently with the obligations of his religion and his oaths. The Author of the True Briton, a paper, which was publiſhed ſoon after, and in which the late Duke of Wharton is ſuppoſed to have had a conſiderable ſhare, has reflected in many paſſages with great ſeverity upon the Adminiſtration on account of the Biſhop's baniſhment, and has drawn a character of him which is extremely advantageous [EEE]. He ſoftened the rigours of his exile by ſtudy and converſation with men of learning, and kept a conſtant correſpondence by letters with the moſt eminent ſcholars and perſons of genius. We ſhall preſent our readers with the extracts of ſeveral original letters [FFF] written by the Biſhop about the year 1727, to an ingenious French Gentleman, that Prelate, changed his reſolution of printing it in that manner, and thought proper to excite the curioſity of the publick by caſting it into the form of a Speech, and giving it the ſanction of Earl Cowper's name; which procured it very great ſucceſs, and many thouſand copies of it were ſold upon that account. We ſhall tranſcribe but one paſſage from it, which appears very incompatible with that Earl's known ſentiments with regard to Church-affairs. The Author of that paper introduces him as obſerving, that he expected to have heard from the Bench of Biſhops many arguments of another kind againſt the Bill, which were properly within their Sphere, and which he was ſure they were perfect maſters of. That the old Champions of our Church uſed to argue very learnedly, "that to make or degrade Biſhops, was not the buſi- "neſs of the State; that there is a ſpiritual relation "between a Biſhop and his flock, derived from the "Church, with which the State has nothing to do." But that this Bill deprived the Biſhop of that ſpiritual relation without the concurrence of the Church. That the Parliament alone did it; and that it muſt be owned, that if the Parliament can do it, they can as well make a new one in his room; and a clauſe for that purpoſe added to the Bill would as effectually do the one as the other. What the thoughts of our Reverend Prelates are upon theſe points does not yet fully appear. Something of their conduct intimates as if our old Divines were miſtaken. But be that as it will, as the judgment of our Prelates will carry great weight, and as the reaſons for ſuch their judgment muſt needs be convincing, I do not doubt but they will give your Lordſhips full ſatisfaction, before this debate comes to a period. In the mean time I ſpeak my concern, that if Acts of Parliament are made to interfere with Church-affairs; if Biſhops are to be put in or turned out at pleaſure; and all this be done without the concurrence of the Church, the world abroad may, tho' unjuſtly, look upon our Church as a creature only of the State, and treat our Biſhops as if they were no more than State-Officers. I hope however from the courage, zeal, and conduct of our preſent Reverend Prelates, whatſoever becomes of this Bill, that they will be able to wipe off any ſuch ſcandal. They certainly have the honour, the dignity and authority of our Church always at heart, and every thing tending to her intereſt, they will moſt zealouſly promote. But whether the paſſing of this Bill will promote her intereſt, or be of any ſervice to her, they beſt know. For my part, I cannot even gueſs at any advantage ſhe poſſibly can receive by it, unleſs it be this, that it will make the Biſhoprick of Rocheſter, and the Deanery of Weſtminſter to become vacant.

[EEE] Has drawn a character of him, which is extremely advantageous.] The Author tells us (115), that he could wiſh to have that Prelate's ſtyle, in order to paint a true character of ſo great and learned a man, But that the qualifications that adorned him were ſo conſpicuous, that no flowers of Rhetorick are required to illuſtrate them. The firſt inſtance, continues he, which diſtinguiſhed him and entitled him to the favours of the Court and eſteem of mankind, was, the early proof he gave of his juſt pretenſions to holy Orders by the excellent Book, which he publiſhed in defence of the Reformation. And he could ſay the firſt of June laſt, he was the only Biſhop of the Church of England, who had wrote in defence of Martin Luther, the great Patron of the Proteſtant intereſt. This behaviour was juſtly valued in former reigns; and, it is preſumed, cannot be judged a crime in this. In the reign of Queen Anne he was advanced to the Deanery of Chriſt-Church, and afterwards created Dean of Weſtminſter and elected Biſhop of Rocheſter. His behaviour, in every ſtation of his life, has ſhewn him to be a perſon of the greateſt wit, built upon the foundation of good ſenſe, and directed by the ſtricteſt rules of Religion and Morality. He was always for maintaining the Dignity and Privileges of the ſeveral offices he bore in the Church; and this juſt way of behaviour, inforced by that ſteadineſs, which was natural to him, created him many enemies among the Canons of Chriſt-Church and Prebends of Weſtminſter, who generally muſt by their own intereſt be obliged to oppoſe any Dean, who ſhould maintain the undoubted rights, which he ought to enjoy. . . . "His "piety towards his children, and his ſincerity to his "friends, made him juſtly beloved and reſpected by "both. No other crime can be laid to his charge, "but that for which he now ſuffers, which over- "ballances all his virtues. The malice of his ene- "mies inſinuated, that he would change his Religion "when he came into foreign countries, and be delud- "ed into the errors of the Church of Rome. But "he declared in his defence before the Houſe of "Lords with the ſtrongeſt aſſeverations, that he would "die at a ſtake, rather than abandon the principles "of the eſtabliſhed Church of England." The Author concludes with this paſſage: The chearfulneſs with which he indured his fate ſhewed him to be ſuperior to all the calamities of life, and would induce every man to believe him innocent, had not ſo great, ſo independent, and ſo incorrupt a majority in both Houſes of Parliament declared him guilty.

[FFF] The extracts of ſeveral original letters.] The Biſhop ſpeaking of the Memoires & Reflexions ſur les principaux Evenemens du Regne de Louis XIV, ſays, "That I now return, gave me pleaſure when I read "it. The turn is natural and familiar, and there is "an air of truth in all he ſays; but not, I think, "the hand of a maſter. He tells his tale, not like "a man who knows any thing of the rules of writing "well, but as an eaſy companion at a table. I ſay "of

" My figure, which did not diſpleaſe, tho' I could not " be ranked among handſome people of the firſt claſs." " Tho' not of the firſt (or even ſecond) order of good " writers, he is yet agreeable. . . . I cannot poſſibly " digeſt his taking notice, p. 145. of the Chevalier " de Rohan's fine legs. An obſervation, that I " ſhould have expected rather from the pen of a " fine Lady, and which ſhews that the Marquis was " in his nature a little too intent on ſuch trifles. He " is ſenſible of it, and excuſes himſelf in the words " that follows: but that excuſe ſerves only to ſhew " the ſtrength of the impreſſion he was under in " this reſpect, ſince he had judgment enough " to ſee the fault, and commits it notwithſtand- " ing. . . . . Though I ſee he is manifeſt- " ly piqu'd againſt Lewis XIV and his Miniſter " Louvois, yet I am apt to believe him in all he " ſays of both of them. His reſentment ſeems to " carry him no farther than to give him the privi- " lege of ſpeaking what he knew to be true; and, as " the world goes, he that allows himſelf to cenſure " the Great even thus far, muſt ſay a great deal of " ill of them. . . . . " Of ſeveral French Poets he ſpeaks thus. " Rouſſeau appears to me ſtill a " greater Poet, the more I conſider him. His ta- " lents are unconfined, and enable him in every ſort " of writing to which he turns himſelf equally to " excel. But the old hard words he makes uſe of " puzzle me often (who care not to conſult a Dicti- " onary) and chiefly in his allegories. . . . Chaulieu, " La Fare and Chapelle, have many graces of the " eaſy and natural ſtyle, but I do not think them ſo " perfect in their way as Rouſſeau is in his; nor (to " tell you the truth) do I take ſuch pleaſure in read- " ing them. The letters particularly of Chaulieu, " &c. are not maſter-pieces in their kind, and many " of his little copies of verſes have nothing extraor- " dinary in them. The copy which touched me " moſt is the Ode on Fontenay,

" I cannot but obſerve, that under all Chaulieu's " ſeeming gaiety, there is an air of melancholy, " which breaks out by fits, and ſhews he was not at " eaſe in his own mind. He endeavours to conceal " it, and acts the brave; but his readers, with a " little penetration, may ſee through the diſguiſe. " The fears of death haunt him perpetually, and ap- " pear even in thoſe places, where he ſays, he is not " afraid of it. I ſhould be glad to know how he " died, whether with the ſame courage he commends " in Lady Mazarine. I ſhould gueſs, not, by the " obſervations I have made of him." After peruſing a diſſertation of Mr. de Boze, the Biſhop makes the following remark. " This book, I find, was written " two and thirty years ago, and therefore it is no " wonder that it ſhould not be equal to the later per- " formances of the ſame Author. One may ſay of " it as Tully ſpeaks of his Collection of Paradoxes: " Non tale eſt hoc opus, ut in arte poni poſſit, quaſi illa " Minerva Phidiæ; ſed tamen, ut ex eâdem officinâ " exiſſe appareat. Though it be not of the ſame va- " lue with his other works, yet it is ſuch, as that one " may perceive the ſame workman's hand and ſkill in " it. He choſe a little contracted ſubject; and had " not room therefore to ſhew his talents at full length " in managing it. And yet, narrow and dry as his " ſubject is, he has, by making ſeveral little digreſſi- " ons, and by taking occaſion to ſay many things " which were not neceſſary to his point, rendred it, " not only inſtructive but entertaining.

" In tenui labor, at tenuis non gloria, ſi quem " Numina læva ſinunt, auditque vocatus Apollo.

" Whether his fourth Gordian be a reality or a phan- " tom; whether he owes his very being to this Gen- " tleman, or is only reſcued from oblivion, and " brought again to life by him, let the Antiquaries " determine: I am ſo eaſy and indolent as not to " think it of much moment, which way ſuch facts " are ſettled; nor ſhould I have thought what is writ- " ten on this point worth reading, if this Author " had not writ it. In all he writes, one ſees the " ſame candor and impartiality; the ſame learning, " good ſenſe and exactneſs. If the argument he " handles be not of importance, he makes it ſo by " his manner of handling it. So that I could wiſh, " inſtead of four books, he had written forty: as old " as I am, and as many other things as I have to " do, I ſhould read all of them." . . . " I have perus'd " (ſays the Biſhop in another letter) the book about " (116) Poverty and Painting with attention. It is " written in a very good Goût, and has excellent " things in it. I have been pleaſed with no book " ſo much that has fallen in my way, ſince I came " into France. However, I could wiſh thoſe philo- " ſophical reaſonings had been omitted; they belong " rather to a Member of the Academy of Sciences, " than to one of the Forty, and perhaps will neither " convince nor pleaſe in ſuch a performance. The " Author ſeems to have gone too deep in that ſort of " reflections, and ſometimes not to have gone deep " enough in others, which relate more immediately " and naturally to his ſubject. Forgive this freedom, " but it is my real ſenſe of the matter. Beſides, " there is, I think, a want of method in the (117) " whole; and the 19th ſection, which is ſo long, " is to me a little obſcure. The many learned cita- " tions there do not clear, but cloud the Author's " meaning. I am apt to imagine that in the muſi- " cal part of it, he ſpeaks of what he does not him- " ſelf thoroughly underſtand; for if he does, he " would probably have expreſſed himſelf ſo, that " his reader alſo would have underſtood it, which, " (as to me at leaſt) is not the caſe. In one " thing I differ from him eſſentially; my fixed opi- " nion is, that the reputation of all books which " is perfectly well writ, comes originally from the " few, and not from the many; and I think I " could ſay a good deal in defence of that opi- " nion. . . . I ſee him here, and every where, under " the image of

" . . . . Urbani, parcentis viribus, atque " Extenuantis eas conſultò. . . . . .

" He ſeldom ſpeaks out, where he is likely to of- " fend; but contents himſelf oftentimes rather to in- " ſinuate, than affirm; and makes uſe of other men's " words to expreſs his own ſenſe, where he is unwil- " ling too openly to own it, or too ſtrongly to preſs " it. Ab arte ſuâ non receſſit, as Tully ſays of Ariſ- " toxenus. Even in his judgment of the Belles Let- " tres he plays the Politician. . . . I could not but " obſerve how in the laſt ſection but one, he has fur- " niſhed Mr. de Voltaire with the hint of his Poem " on the Ligue. . . . . Upon the whole, I repeat my " thanks to you for the great ſatisfaction which the " reading of theſe (118) two volumes has given me. . . " As to Mr. Arnauld's piece, intitled, Reflexions ſur " l'Eloquence, though what he ſays there be ſenſible " and juſt; yet I do not ſee much of the great man " in it, and had no great pleaſure in peruſing it. . ." The following remarks are made upon Mr. Fonte- nelle's manner of writing, &c. " I return you (Sir) " the two Eloges, which I have peruſed with pleaſure. " I borrow that word from your language, becauſe we " have none in our own that exactly expreſſes it. By " the account I had of thoſe pieces, I imagined them " very different from what I find them. Mr. Fonte- " nelle's talents, as to the knowledge of Nature, Ma- " thematicks and the Belles Lettres, are ſufficiently " underſtood. But I take notice particularly of the " art and addreſs with which he conducts himſelf in " nice points, and the prudent and political views by " which his pen is guided; a quality, that does not " often belong to men who have ſpent ſo much of " their time in ſtudying the Arts and Sciences. He " has been miſinformed as to one little particular, in " the

" the ſhort draught he has given us of Sir Iſaac New" ton's figure. The (119) œil fort vif, & fort per- " çant, which he gives him, did not belong to " him, at leaſt not for twenty years paſt, about which " time I firſt came acquainted with him. Indeed, in " the whole air of his face and make, there was no" thing of that penetrating ſagacity which appears in " his compoſures. He had ſomething rather languid
" in his look and manner, which did not raiſe any " great expectation in thoſe who did not know him.
" I ſee Mr. Fontenelle ſpeaks warily as to the MSS.
" relating to Antiquity, Hiſtory and Divinity, which
" Sir Iſaac left behind him: I wiſh, for the honour " of our country, that they may be as excellent in " their kind as thoſe he publiſhed. But I fear the " caſe is otherwiſe, and that he will be found to have " been a great maſter only in that one way to which " he was by nature inclined. It is enough for us " poor limited creatures, if we remarkably excel in " any one branch of knowledge. We may have a ſmat-
" tering of more; but it is beyond the lot of our na" ture, to attain any perfection in them. Mr. Fonte" nelle's praiſe of Sir Iſaac's modeſty (and of modeſty
" in general) is to me the moſt pleaſing part of that
" deſcription he has given us of him. It is that modeſty
" which will teach us to ſpeak, and think of the Anti-
" ents with reverence, eſpecially if we happen not to be " throughly acquainted with them. Sir Iſaac certainly " was, and his great veneration for them was one diſtin" guiſhing part of his character, which I wonder, (or " rather, I do not wonder) that Mr. Fontenelle has " omitted. His opinion of them was, that they " were men of great genius and ſuperior minds, " who had carried their diſcoveries (particularly in " Aſtronomy and other parts of Mathematicks) much " farther than now appears from what remains of their " writings. One may apply to them, what was ſaid
" by an old learned man, to one of leſs knowledge and " fewer years, who inſulted him, I have forgot more
" knowledge than ever you had. More of the anci" ents is loſt, than is preſerved, and perhaps our new " diſcoveries are not equal to thoſe old loſſes. --- But " this was not what I had in my thoughts, when I
" ſat down to write: my intention was only to ex-
" preſs the ſatisfaction I had in the peruſal of what
" I return, of which I could ſay more, if the end " of the page did not admoniſh me to tell you how " much I am &c. . . . . The Book (entitled, Diſſer-
" tation ſur la Muſique des Anciens (120), ſays the Biſhop
" in his 13th Letter) I ſend you back, is written in " a very ſenſible and agreeable manner, with a fine
" turn of thoughts and words, as far as I am able to " judge. I could wiſh only that the Writer had " been a greater maſter of his ſubject, ſo as to have " given us diſtincter and fuller accounts of it, which " would have left no doubts upon the minds of his " readers. I am ſatisfied that a pen like his would " have been able to expreſs the moſt nice and diffi" cult points of which he treats in a way equally in" ſtructive and pleaſing, and have opened to us in
" dialogue the myſteries of Muſic, as eaſily and fa" miliarly as Monſieur Fontenelle has done thoſe of " Aſtronomy. The picture of Leontium, with which " the reflections conclude, is exquiſitely drawn; not " only con Studio, but con Amore, as the Italians
" ſpeak of the favourite pieces of their beſt maſters.
" One would think the Book was written on pur" poſe for the ſake of the character at the end of it:
" as the moſt material part of a letter is ſometimes
" carelеſly thrown into a poſtſcript. . . . . I dare ſay
" Mademoiſelle (121) Lenclos was of the Author's " acquaintance. Hearſay could not have furniſhed
" him with ſo lively a deſcription of her. There is
" ſomething in the picture, that ſhews, it was paint" ed by the life, and not copied from another. . . .
" One thing he ſays of her p. 9. (pardon the remark)
" ſeems in ſome degree applicable to himſelf. His " words are very good, and therefore I tranſcribe
" them. " Son gout en le conduiſant de fleur en fleur,

" C. 1. Sure he does not mean the ancient Varro,
" who writ nothing that I know of, under that title.
" . . . He is beholden, I find, to the long chapter of " Abbé du Bos, where the ancient authorities, relat" ing to his ſubject, are collected; and he has made " a free uſe of them. But my intention was, to tell " you rather what pleaſed me in the Book, than " what I diſliked. I thank you &c. . . . ." The 14th Letter goes on thus: " From what I have read
" (in theſe Books) and other pieces, ſince I came on
" this ſide of the water, I have conceived a much " greater opinion of the Biſhop of Meaux, than I had
" while in England, and give him readily the pre" ference to all thoſe Writers of the Church of France
" which I am acquainted with. He is an univerſal
" genius, and manages every thing he takes in hand,
" like a maſter. Good ſenſe and ſound reflections
" attend all he ſays; which is expreſſed in the moſt
" agreeable and beautiful manner, without any of the " pomp or paint of falſe oratory. He has particu" larly the ſecret of knowing, not only what to ſay,
" but what not to ſay; the hardeſt taſk even of the
" moſt exact and excellent Writers! . . But you know " him, Sir, better than I; and I ſhould be to blame
" therefore in attempting any part of his character,
" did not gratitude forbid me to return your books,
" without giving you an account of the pleaſure I " had in peruſing them. Even the Lady's Memoirs,
" relating to our Engliſh Princeſs, gave me a good deal;
" particularly that part of them, where the ſtory of " her death is told, in as natural and affecting a " manner, I think, as is poſſible. It has ſuch a " melancholy air of truth in it, as, at the ſame
" time that it gives conviction, moves compaſſion;
" and one can no more read it, than one could have " been preſent at the ſad ſcene of it, without tears.
" . . . I really prefer Monſieur de Meaux's funeral O" ration to thoſe of Flechier or Bourdaloüe; tho' I " think he would have writ ſtill better, had he imi" tated them leſs; for, by that means, he now and
" then heightens his expreſſion a little too much,
" and becomes unnatural. I gave you one inſtance
" of that when I ſaw you laſt. . . ." Another Letter ſays thus: " The more I read of the Biſhop of " Meaux, the more I value him, as a great and " able Writer, and particularly for that talent of " taking as many advantages of an adverſary, and " giving him as few as any man, I believe, that ever
" entered the liſts of controverſy. There is a ſerious
" warmth in all he ſays, and his manner of ſaying
" it is noble and moving; and yet I queſtion after " all, whether he ſometimes is in good earneſt. Par" don that freedom, Sir, I have read him with at" tention, and watched him narrowly. . . . . I have " read all the Biſhop [de Meaux's pieces] that have

ſhould afterwards be copied ſingly, without any of the embelliſhments that accompanied it in the original. As moſt of theſe letters are critiques on ſeveral eminent French Writers, we do not doubt but they will prove agreeable to our readers. The ſentiments are as ſtrong and judicious, as the diction is polite and natural; and are ſo much the more worthy of the preſs, as they ſeem, by the great eaſe and unaffectedneſs with which they are written, not deſigned for it. Though ſome particulars may appear not very material, they yet ought to be conſidered as the cuttings of a diamond, the ſmalleſt of which are of value. The Biſhop ſeems to have been a greater maſter of the French tongue than one would have imagined (as he learnt it ſo late) by ſome very juſt remarks he makes on certain delicate idioms of it. It is ſaid that he tranſlated Virgil's Georgics into Engliſh [GGG], and wrote an Harmonia Evangelica in a new and more perſpicuous method than any yet publiſhed. Not long before his death he was obliged to vindicate himſelf againſt Mr. Oldmixon with relation to Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, which he, together with Dr. Aldrich and Dr. Smalridge, was charged with having altered and interpolated in a variety of places [HHH]. He died at Paris the 15th of February 1732, and his body

" been procured for me; and will wait for the reſt, " till I can have them from your hands. In the mean " time, I will read worſe Books, that I may reliſh " his the more, when I return to them; tho', to ſpeak " the truth, I know no Writer in your tongue, that " has leſs need to have his reader ſo prepared for " him. . . . . Do you hear nothing from your friend " Voltaire? Is England as well pleaſed with him, as " it was? and is he as well pleaſed with England? " Or, does the ſatisfaction on one ſide abate, in pro- " portion as it leſſens on the other? When will the " ſecond edition of his Henriade come out? Will it " afford us a better monument to the memory of that " Prince, and a nobler likeneſs, than the ſtatue on " Port-neuf? It will, if it be as well finiſhed as it " ſhould be. For

Clarorum apparent.

" But the ſpirit of Pedantry is coming upon me, and " it is time therefore that I tell you, that I am &c."

" I find the very laſt works of that great man, [the " Biſhop of Meaux] (ſays the Biſhop in his laſt Letter " but one) are inferior to the reſt; but, nevertheleſs, " I would be maſter of all he certainly wrote. It is " uſeful to obſerve even the defects of firſt-rate " Writers, as well as their excellencies. There is an " ill-natured pleaſure in finding, that, as far exalted " above us as they are, they ſometimes ſink down " to our level. . . . . Mr. de Meaux ſtudied Critical " Knowledge late, with reſpect to the interpretation " of Scripture; and was never therefore ſo true a " maſter of it, as he was of the way of interpreting " it by the ſtream of tradition. But the older he " grew, the more admired he was; and that led " him to think himſelf equal to every man, in every " thing; and particularly to write books in Latin, and " Comments on Scripture, in both which ways I find " him unequal to himſelf; and I dare ſay, that is the " opinion of candid and judicious perſons in your " communion."

We find by the Biſhop's laſt and ſome other Letters, that he was acquainted with Father Courayer. " Our " friend, Pere Courayer, has been purſued with " mandements, cenſures and arrêts; nor have they, " I fear, yet done with him. I am concerned for " the fate of ſo valuable a Man, and ſo excellent a " Writer, whoſe views, I am perſuaded, were inno- " cent and good, however in the manner of execut- " ing them, he comes to have given ſo much offence. " The twenty Biſhops that have cenſured him, ſeem " to decline that part of the diſpute which relates " to the validity of our Engliſh ordinations. How- " ever, they have not ſpared the Church of England, " on other accounts, but have repreſented her in a " more diſadvantageous light than ſhe deſerves; " purely, I ſuppoſe, for want of knowing her. They " cite the Biſhop of Meaux, and cite thoſe works " of his, which were written expreſly againſt us; " which ſurely is a very odd way of repreſenting " our ſentiments; juſt as if I ſhould quote Monſr. " Claude's words, from any pieces of his written a- " gainſt the Church of France, to prove what ſhe " held in any doctrine of importance. I ſhould think " it became me rather to produce the Writers of that " Church, and the Acts and Monuments of it, for my " vouchers. The twenty Biſhops have taken this me- " thod, once, or twice; and if they had taken it " always, they would have been leſs liable to miſ- " takes in their repreſentations of us. What the Bi- " ſhop of Meaux ſays, with regard to our polity and " affairs, is not always to be relied on; for he was " not a maſter of that ſubject. He was a very great " man; nor would he have leſſened his character, " not to have aimed ſometimes at ſeeming to know, " what he really did not, in matters that lay a little " out of his compaſs. Excuſe the freedom I take " with the cenſurers, and the authority on which they " build, in relation to our matters; becauſe I have " good reaſon to think, that they have paid a defe- " rence to it, at the expence of truth. My know- " ledge is very limited; and yet it would be no pre- " ſumption in me to ſay, that I know better than " the Biſhop of Meaux did, what is the Conſtitution, " and what are the Principles and Tenets of the Church " of England. But enough of theſe reflections, into " which the mention of Pere Courayer has led me &c."

Theſe verſes have been tranſlated as follows:

" ——— Thus on the banks of Seine,
" Far from my native home, I paſs my hours,
" Broken with years and pain; yet my firm heart

We have likewiſe another verſion of them, which is a little more paraphraſtical:

" Thus where the Seine thro' realms of ſlavery ſtrays,
" With ſportive verſe I wing my tedious days;
" Far from Britannia's happy climate torn,
" Bow'd down with age, and with diſeaſes worn;
" Yet e'en in death I act a ſteddy part, body was brought to England, and interred on the 12th of May following in his vault in Weſtminſter-Abbey in a very private manner, attended only by William Morice, Eſq; who had married his daughter, and his two late Chaplains, Dr. Savage and Dr. Moore. Upon the urn, which contained his bowels, was inſcribed, In hac urnâ depoſiti ſunt cineres Franciſci Atterburi Epiſcopi Roffenſis; i. e. "In this urn are depoſited "the aſhes of Francis Atterbury Biſhop of Rocheſter." However the world may be divided about his moral and political character, it is univerſally agreed, that he was one of the greateſt men of the age for genius and ſkill in polite Literature, and that he wrote in the deciſion of another very honourable perſon, whether there is not to his knowledge ſuch an Hiſtory in manuſcript ſtill extant; and to a Reverend Doctor now living, whether he did not ſee the Oxford copy, by which the book was printed, altered, and interpolated, while it was at the preſs. He has publiſhed likewiſe a Letter from a Gentleman of diſtinction both for merit and quality (123), as he ſtiles him, wherein he declares, that Mr. Edmund Smith, of Chriſt-Church Oxford, Author of the Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolytus, had frankly told him juſt before his death in the year 1710, that there had been a fine Hiſtory written by Lord Clarendon, but what was publiſhed under his name was only patch-work, and might as properly be called The Hiſtory of ALL-SMALL and ATTERBURY: "for to his "knowledge, 'twas altered; nay that he himſelf was "employed by them to interpolate and alter the ori-"ginal." That Mr. Smith turned to the character of Mr. Hampden, in the folio Edition of the Hiſtory, where is that expreſſion, He had a head to contrive, a heart to conceive, and a hand to execute any villany (124), and declared, that it was foiſted in by thoſe Reverends. In ſhort, ſays the Gentleman, he not only underlined this paſſage as a forgery, but gave, during the ſhort time he lived with me, the ſame remark to ſome hundreds more. Mr. Oldmixon likewiſe in his Hiſtory, p. 227, expreſſes himſelf thus: "In the character of this great "and excellent man, Mr. Hampden, which we could "wiſh had eſcaped his (Lord Clarendon's) drawings, "or the drawings of theſe clumſy Painters, into whoſe "hands his work fell, there is ſomething ſo very "falſe and baſe, that ſuch coin could only come from "a College-Mint. . . . . There are not words to ex-"preſs the infamy of this ſlander and impoſture, nor "the unparallel'd wickedneſs of thoſe Doctors, who "foiſted ſo horrid a reflection into that character." He obſerves then, that Mr. Smith confeſſed to the Gentleman in whoſe houſe he died, that among a great number of Alterations and Additions, which he himſelf made in the Hiſtory of the Rebellion, by order of Dr. ALDRICH, Dr. ATTERBURY, and Dr. SMALLRIDGE, ſucceſſive Deans of Chriſt-Church, this very ſaying of Cinna, applied to Mr. Hampden, was one; and that when he read it to one of thoſe Doctors, he clapp'd him on the back, and cried with an aſſeveration, It will do. The Confeſſion Mr. Smith made, and the remorſe he expreſſed for being concerned in this impoſture, were his laſt words. A great part of the paſſage from Mr. Oldmixon's Preface, including the Letter, was tranſlated verbatim into French, and publiſhed in the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée des Ouvrages des Savans de l'Europe for July, Auguſt, and September 1730, Tom. V. part I. Art. 5, p. 154, &c. and the Author of that Journal obſerved upon it, that if Dr. Atterbury was ſilent with regard to this accuſation, there could be no doubt but the falſification was proved; and ſhould he not be ſilent, what he ſhould ſay to clear up this matter muſt be very ſtrong to deſtroy the credit of ſuch a teſtimony. Dr. Atterbury therefore thought himſelf obliged to defend himſelf; and accordingly wrote a piece, dated from Paris October 26th 1731, and entitled, Biſhop Atterbury's Vindication of Biſhop Smallridge, Dr. Aldrich, and himſelf from the ſcandalous Reflections of Oldmixon, relating to the publication of Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory. He declares that the account publiſhed by Mr. Oldmixon, in all its parts, as far as he was any ways concerned, is entirely falſe and groundleſs; ſince he never ſaw Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory in manuſcript, either before or ſince the edition of it; nor ever read a line of it but in print. That it was impoſſible therefore, that he ſhould deal with Mr. Smith in the manner repreſented, with whom (as far as he could recollect) he never exchanged one word in all his life; and whom he knew not that he ever ſaw, till after the edition of that Hiſtory. That with regard to Biſhop Smallridge, no ſuſpicion of that kind can poſſibly reſt upon his memory, becauſe he was not any ways concerned in preparing that Hiſtory for the preſs, but as much a ſtranger to the contents of it as himſelf was, till it came forth in print. That the reviſing of the manuſcript, which is ſaid to have been written not very correctly, was committed to the care of Biſhop Spratt and Dean Aldrich by the late Earl of Rocheſter, who himſelf alſo aſſiſted in that reviſal from the beginning to the end of the work; ſo that any changes made in it muſt have had the conſent of thoſe three perſons; who were men of probity and truth, and incapable of conſpiring in a deſign to impoſe on the publick. That the Biſhop and Dean had occaſionally more than once aſſured him, that no additions whatſoever were made to the manuſcript Hiſtory; and that even the Earl himſelf in his Preface to the firſt volume had publickly proteſted his innocence in that reſpect, where he declares, that they who put forth the Hiſtory, (he means himſelf and his brother, as appears from what follows,) durſt not take upon them to make any alterations in a work of this kind, ſolemnly left with them to be publiſhed, whenever it ſhould be publiſhed, as it was delivered to them. That if the Earl and the other two perſons employed could be ſuppoſed to have made any additions, notwithſtanding ſuch aſſurances to the contrary, yet their good ſenſe (if not their integrity) would have prevented at leaſt their retouching thoſe characters, which are allowed to be the moſt diſtinguiſhed and beautiful part of the work, and to have ſomething of original in them, that is not to be imitated. The after-ſtrokes of any leſs able pencil intermixed with thoſe of the firſt maſterly hand, would ſoon be diſcovered. And yet the moſt diſcerning eye can find out no traces of ſuch a mixture; no, not in the character of Mr. Hampden, even in thoſe words, at the cloſe of it, againſt which Mr. Oldmixon ſo warmly declaims. They are perfectly in the ſtyle and manner of my Lord Clarendon; they contain nothing new in them, but only ſum up in ſhort what he had ſcattered thro' different parts of the two firſt volumes. Let the reflections there made be never ſo ſevere, they may naturally be ſuppoſed in the warmth of compoſure to have come from the pen of an Hiſtorian, who had himſelf with zeal oppoſed Mr. Hampden's meaſures, and both ſeen and felt the ſad conſequences of them. But that the editors of his Hiſtory no ways concerned in thoſe tranſactions ſhould ſixty years afterwards coolly and deliberately make ſuch a needleſs inſertion, is not to be imagined. The Biſhop urges, that this complaint ſhould have been brought againſt theſe editors, while it was capable of being thoroughly examined. That their very characters to thoſe who knew them, and the nature of the evidence to thoſe who did not, will be judged a ſufficient confutation of it. For what is this evidence? It conſiſts in an hear-ſay from a perſon ſuperior to all ſuſpicion, but too illuſtrious to be named; in an appeal to another very honourable perſon, to a Reverend Doctor now living, and to a Gentleman of Diſtinction both for merit and quality; none of whoſe names are thought fit to be owned. The only one produced in the caſe is that of Mr. Smith, the Author of an excellent Tragedy. "Of what uſe can his te-"ſtimony, ſays the Biſhop, be to this purpoſe (even "ſuppoſing the account of it exact,) when it is un-"doubtedly falſe, as to two of the three perſons it is "levelled at, Dr. Smallridge and myſelf; and may "therefore be juſtly preſumed alike falſe, as to the "third, Dr. Aldrich? Mr. Smith appears to have been "ſo little in the ſecret of the edition of that Book, "as not to have known even the hands thro' which "it paſſed; and is not therefore to be relied upon in "his accounts of any other circumſtances relating to it, "eſpecially with regard to Dr. Aldrich, his Governor at "Chriſt-

the Latin tongue with a purity and elegance worthy of Cicero himſelf, and in his own language in a manner ſuperior to moſt of his Contemporaries. He was an excellent ſpeaker in the Houſe of Lords; and his character as a Preacher will appear to the greateſt advantage from the admirable repreſentation of it publiſhed in the Tatler [III]. Mr. Gordon, who cannot be ſuſpected of the leaſt partiality towards him, allows him to be a great maſter of the Engliſh Language; and having excepted againſt Biſhop Spratt's ſtyle, obſerves, that with much greater juſtice has the ſtyle of

" Chriſt-Church; for whom his perſonal averſion, " and the true reaſons of it, are too well underſtood " to need explaining. I forbear ſaying any thing " harſh of one, not able to anſwer for himſelf; but " many now alive who knew them both, know how " improbable and altogether incredible it is, that Mr. " Smith ſhould have had the leaſt ſhare in Dr. Al- " drich's confidence on ſo nice, or indeed on any oc- " caſion. The Gentleman, who ſeems to be convinced " of the truth of Mr. Smith's aſſertions, by his having " pointed out and underlined the paſſages in print, " which he ſaid he was employed (by the three ſuc- " ceſſive Deans) to interpolate and alter in manuſcript, " muſt ſurely have been very willing to be convinced; " otherwiſe he would not have taken a mere aſſerti- " on for a proof in ſuch a cauſe, and from ſuch a " perſon." This Vindication of the Biſhop was ſent by him with a Letter dated from Paris Nov. 19th 1731 to the Author of the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée, who has publiſhed them both in French in the Journal for the months of October, November and December 1731, Tom. VII. Part. I. Art. IX. p. 457 & ſeq. The Biſhop procured a copy of this Vindication to be ſent over to Mr. Pope, a Gentleman, with whom he had the firmeſt friendſhip, and whom he extremely admired among his other valuable qualifications for his excellent talent in Poetry. At the ſame time he wrote him the following Letter dated from Paris November 23d, 1731. " Dear Sir, You will wonder to ſee me " in print; but how could I avoid it? The dead " and the living, my friends and my foes, at home " and abroad, call upon me to ſay ſomething; and " the reputation of an Hiſtory, which I and all the " world value, muſt have ſuffered, had I continued " ſilent. I have printed here, in hopes that ſomebody " afterward may venture to reprint in England, notwith- " ſtanding the two frightning words at the cloſe of it. " Whether that happens or not, it is fit you ſhould have " a ſight of it, who I know will read it with ſome de- " gree of ſatisfaction, as it is mine, tho' it ſhould " have (as it really has) nothing elſe to recommend " it. Such as it is,

" Extremum hoc munus morientis habeto.

" For that may well be the caſe, conſidering that within " a few months I am entering into my ſeventieth year; " after which even the healthy and the happy can- " not much depend upon life, and will not, if they " are wiſe, much deſire it. Whenever I go, you " will loſe a friend, who loves and values you ex- " tremely, if in my circumſtances I can be ſaid to be " loſt to any one, when dead, more than I am alrea- " dy whilſt living. I expected to have heard from " you by Mr. M——, and wondered a little, that I " did not; but he owns himſelf in a fault for not " giving you due notice of his motions. It was not " amiſs that you forbore writing to me on an head, " wherein I promiſed more than I was able to per- " form. Diſgraced men fancy ſometimes, that they " preſerve an influence, where, when they endeavour " to exert it, they ſoon ſee their miſtake. I did " ſo, my good friend, and acknowledge it under my " hand. You ſounded the coaſt, and found out my " error, it ſeems, before I was aware of it. But " enough of this ſubject. What are you doing in " England to the honour of Letters? And particularly " what are you doing?

" Do you purſue the moral plan you marked out, " and ſeemed ſixteen months ago ſo intent upon? Am " I to ſee it perfected e'er I die? And are you to en- " joy the reputation of it whilſt you live? Or do you " rather chooſe to leave the marks of your friend- " ſhip, like the legacies of a will, to be read and en- " joyed only by thoſe, who ſurvive you? Were I as " near you as I have been, I ſhould hope to peep into " the manuſcript even before it was finiſhed. But alas! " there is and will ever probably be a great deal of " land and ſea between us. How many Books have " come out of late in your parts, which you think " I ſhould be glad to peruſe? Name them; the Ca- " talogue, I believe, will not coſt you much trouble. " They muſt be good ones indeed to challenge any " part of my time, now I have ſo little of it left. " I, who ſquandered away whole days heretofore, " now huſband hours, when the glaſs begins to run " low, and care not to miſpend them on trifles. At " the end of the lottery of life our laſt minutes, like " benefit-tickets in the wheel, riſe in their valuation. " They are not perhaps of ſo much worth in them- " ſelves, as thoſe, which preceded, but we are apt to " prize them more, and with reaſon. I do ſo, my " dear friend, and yet think the moſt precious mi- " nutes of my life are well employed in reading what " you write. But this is a ſatisfaction I cannot much " hope for; and therefore muſt betake myſelf to o- " thers, which are leſs entertaining. Adieu, dear " Sir, and forgive me engaging with one, whom you, " I think, have reckoned among the Heroes of the " Dunciad. It was neceſſary for me either to accept " of his dirty challenge, or to have ſuffered in the " eſteem of the world by declining it. My reſpects " to your mother; I ſend a paper for Dean Swift, if " you have an opportunity, and think it worth your " while to convey it. My country at this diſtance " ſeems to me a ſtrange ſight. I know not how it " appears to you, who are in the midſt of the Sun, " and your ſelf a part of it. I wiſh you would tell " me. You may write ſafely to Mr. M—— by the " honeſt hand, that conveys this, and will return to " theſe parts before Chriſtmas. Sketch out a rough " draught of it, that I may be able to judge whether " a return to it be really eligible, or whether I ſhould " not like the Chymiſt in the bottle upon hearing " Don Quevedo's account of Spain, deſire to be cork'd " up again. After all I do and muſt love my coun- " try with all its faults and blemiſhes; even that " part of the conſtitution, which wounded me unjuſtly " (and itſelf thro' my ſide) will ever be dear to me. " My laſt wiſh be like that of Father Paul, Eſto per- " petua; and when I die at a diſtance from it, it " will be in the ſame manner as Virgil deſcribes the " expiring Peloponneſian,

[III] His character as a Preacher will appear to the greateſt advantage from the admirable repreſentation of it publiſhed in the Tatler.] The Author having obſerved (124), that the Clergy of Great Britain, whom he believed to be the moſt learned body of men now in the world, too much neglected the Art of Speaking, with the proper ornaments of voice and geſture, tells us, that he owned there are exceptions to this general obſervation, and that the Dean, whom, ſays he, we heard the other day together, is an Orator. That he has ſo much regard to his congregation, that he commits to his memory what he is to ſay to them; and has ſo ſoft and graceful a behaviour, that it muſt attract your attention. His perſon, continues he, it is to be confeſſed, is no ſmall recommendation; but he is to be highly commended for not loſing that advantage, and adding to the propriety of ſpeech (which might paſs the criticiſm of Longinus) an action, which

Dr. Fiddes, in the preface (aa) to the firſt volume of his Body of Divinity, acknowledges the aſſiſtance which he received from the Biſhop in the compoſition of that work, and ſtiles him a perſon who had all the great talents, from which proper directions might be expected in any part, whether of theological, or of human and polite Learning; and in his Introduction to his Life of Cardinal Wolſey, he acknowledges the Biſhop's offer of aſſiſtance in that work, which that Prelate had once deſigned to have written himſelf [KKK]. We ſhall conclude with the character of him by Mr. Dart, the Author of The Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Abbey-Church of St. Peter's Weſtminſter, which work the Biſhop had promoted. That Gentleman tells us (bb), that as he was among the greateſt Judges, ſo he was among the greateſt Encouragers of Learning; and in another place (cc) he ſtiles him a man, "whoſe controverſial and "other writings for accuracy, ſolidneſs, ſtrength of argument, and happineſs of "Language, have made him famous, as a church-man; and whoſe excellent taſte of "the fine Letters, familiarity with antient and modern Writers, ſublime fancy, nice "judgment, elegance of ſtyle, and manner of converſation, have and will diſtinguiſh "him throughout all the learned part of Europe."

which would have been approved by Demoſthenes. He has a peculiar force in his way, and has many of his audience, who could not be intelligent hearers of his diſcourſe, were there not explanation as well as grace in his action. This art of his is uſed with the moſt exact and honeſt skill. He never attempts your paſſions, till he has convinced your reaſon. All the objections which you can form are laid open and diſperſed, before he uſes the leaſt vehemence in his Sermon; but when he thinks he has your head, he very ſoon wins your heart, and never pretends to ſhew the beauty of holineſs, till he hath convinced you of the truth of it. The Author of a piece, intitled, Some Rules for ſpeaking and action to be obſerved at the Bar, in the Pulpit, and the Senate, and by every one that ſpeaks in public, in a Letter to a Friend, conſiders our Divine as an excellent model for that purpoſe. "In town, Sir, ſays he (125), you "have ſo many examples worthy imitation both in "the Senate, on the Bench, at the Bar, and in the "Pulpit, that if you well attend to them, you can "want little other direction; as Cowper and Har-"court, Hanmer, and Stonehouſe, and Lechmere, Par-"ker and Price, Powis and Vernon, Canterbury and "York, Ely and ROCHESTER, Stanhope and Moſs; "and therefore I ſhall laſtly refer you to thoſe Liv-"ing Rules, to make up the deficiency of theſe."

ATTICUS (TITUS POMPONIUS) is conſidered as one of the moſt honourable men of antient Rome. He underſtood the art of managing himſelf with ſuch addreſs, that without leaving his ſtate of neutrality, he preſerved the eſteem and affection of both parties [A]. The ſtrict friendſhip which he had with Cicero, did not hinder him from having a great intimacy with Hortenſius; and he was the cauſe that theſe two rivals not only did not treat each other with any reproaches, but even lived together upon very good

[A] He preſerved the eſteem and affection of both parties.] He ſent money to Marius's ſon, who had been declared an enemy to the commonwealth, and he inſinuated himſelf in ſuch a manner into the favour of Sylla, that this Roman General would always have him with him, and was not at all offended, that Atticus deſired to be excuſed from attending him to Rome, by alledging that he was willing to continue neuter between both parties (1). Noli, oro te, inquit Pomponius, adverſum eos me velle ducere, cum quibus ne contra te arma ferrem, Italiam reliqui (2): i. e. "I deſire you "ſays Pomponius, not to urge me to attend you againſt "thoſe perſons, ſince I left Italy, that I might not bear "arms with them againſt you." He kept himſelf quiet at Rome during the war between Cæſar and Pompey; which did not in the leaſt offend Pompey (3), and prodigiouſly pleaſed Cæſar. After the death of the latter, he ſent money to Brutus, when the party of liberty began to decline, and he did a thouſand kind offices for Mark Anthony's wife and friends, while their party ſeemed to be loſt without any hopes of recovery. Mark Anthony was not ungrateful to him; for tho' he extended his furious reſentment to all Cicero's friends, he wrote with his own hand a very obliging Letter to Atticus (4). He uſed his intereſt afterwards to procure the marriage between Atticus's daughter and Agrippa the favourite of Auguſtus (5). At laſt notwithſtanding the cruel diviſions, which aroſe between Mark Anthony and Auguſtus, our Atticus preſerved the friendſhip of them both. One of them (6), when he was upon his journies, wrote him an exact account of all that he did, of what he read, and whither he was going; and when he was at Rome, he wrote to him almoſt every day to conſult him upon ſome queſtion or other. The (7) other gave him a full account of his affairs. It was undoubtedly a very difficult taſk to preſerve at the ſame time the friendſhip of theſe two antagoniſts. Hoc quale ſit facilius exiſtimabit is qui judicare poteſt, quantæ ſit ſapientiæ eorum retinere uſum benevolentiamque, inter quos maximarum rerum non ſolum æmulatio, ſed obtrectatio tanta intercedebat, quantum fuit intercidere neceſſe inter Cæſarem atque Antonium, cum ſe uterque principem non ſolum urbis Romanæ, ſed orbis terrarum eſſe cuperet (8).

good terms [B]. He never had any conteſt either with his mother or ſiſter [C]. He always ſhewed his generoſity to his friends, whenever they had any occaſion. His circumſtances enabled him to do this; for beſides the great eſtate which he ſucceeded to [D], he found out methods to employ his money, which produced him a very conſiderable profit. The conteſts which aroſe at Rome between Cinna's party and that of Marius, induced him when he was young to go to Athens, where he continued for a long time. He gained the affections of the Athenians in ſuch a manner, that the day on which he left their city was in ſome meaſure a day of mourning [E]. He was extremely fond of polite learning,

It was not ſufficient for Pomponius Atticus to inſinuate himſelf agreeably into their affections; but it was likewiſe neceſſary that they ſhould obſerve in him ſuch qualities, as would inſpire them with eſteem and reſpect for him. The paſſage which I am going to quote, is very proper to ſhew the peculiar merit of him. Utebatur intimè Q. Hortenſio, qui iis temporibus principatum eloquentiæ tenebat, ut intelligi non poſſe uter eum plus diligeret Cicero an Hortenſius, & id quod erat difficillimum, efficiebat ut inter quos tantæ laudis eſſet æmulatio, nulla intercederet obtrectatio, eſſetque talium virorum copula (9). i. e. "He was very intimate "with Q. Hortenſius, who was the moſt eminent O"rator of that time; ſo that it could not be known "whether Cicero or Hortenſius loved him moſt; and "what was the moſt difficult point of all, he manag"ed it in ſuch a manner, that no reproaches paſt "between thoſe two men, who were rivals for the "ſupreme honour of eloquence, but they were unit"ed in a ſtrict friendſhip?

(9) Cornel. Nepos, cap. 5.

[C] He never had any conteſt either with his mother or ſiſter.] At the age of ſixty ſeven years he loſt his mother, who was then ninety; and he had then a ſiſter living, who was almoſt of the ſame age with himſelf. Upon the day, when the funeral of his mother was performed, he declared that he never had any occaſion to be reconciled to her, and that there never had been any quarrel between his ſiſter and him. "Hoc ipſum verè gloriantem audierim in funere matris ſuæ, quam extulit annorum 90, cum eſſet ſeptem & 60, ſe nunquam cum matre in gratiam rediiſſe, nunquam cum ſorore fuiſſe in ſimultate, quam prope æqualem habebat; quod eſt ſignum aut nullam unquam inter eos querimoniam interceſſiſſe, aut hunc eâ fuiſſe in ſuos indulgentiâ, ut quos amare deberet, iraſci eis nefas duceret (10). I do not mention this circumſtance of the time, in order to encreaſe the bulk of my book, and to fill up the page. Every one will ſee, that this is the eſſential part of this note; for if the good nature of Atticus appears here as a very remarkable circumſtance, it is chiefly on account of the great number of years, which he lived with his mother and ſiſter without any conteſt. It is a pity, that the Hiſtory did not likewiſe inform us how he acted with regard to his wife. He did not boaſt any thing upon that point (11); and this might lead one to ſuſpect that his addreſs or patience were not exerted ſo remarkably towards his wife as towards his mother and ſiſter, who perhaps on their part contributed very much to this harmony between them, and did not oblige him to make any conſiderable advances. The fact in this caſe would appear much leſs remarkable with regard to Atticus; but to take all the circumſtances together would not loſe any thing, but appear more extraordinary. We ſhall ſee in the following note, that Atticus always ſtood upon good terms with an uncle, whoſe temper was ſo extremely perverſe, that none of his relations could bear with it. But to return to Atticus's wife. It is ſtrange that Cornelius Nepos does not mention any thing either good or bad of her; and that we muſt have recourſe to other authors to learn, that her name was PILIA, and that Atticus married her in the year of Rome 697 (12). He was not young then; he was three and fifty years of age. He was in no haſte to liſt himſelf in the ſervice of matrimony. We may collect from a paſſage in one of Cicero's Letters (13), that Pilia was fond of her huſband; for with regard to the other paſſage (14), from which ſome Writers have imagined, that ſhe deſigned to procure a divorce from him, it is evident that it ought to be read in a different manner, and that it ſignifies, that ſhe was threatned with the Palſy. Mr. Sarrazin aſſures us in his tranſlation of the Life of Pomponius Atticus, that the city of Athens erected likewiſe ſtatues to Pilia the wife of Atticus; but it is plain, that he made uſe of a bad edition; for we muſt not read Pilia in Cornelius Nepos. Atticus's marriage was too long after his return from Athens, for the Athenians to think of erecting ſtatues to his wife. Would Cornelius Nepos have been ſo abſurd as to mention the ſtatues of Pilia, without acquainting us who ſhe was? The family of Pilia makes no manner of figure in the ancient Roman Hiſtory.

[D] The great eſtate which he ſucceeded to.] Quintus Cæcilius was his uncle by the mother's ſide. He was a perſon of an intolerable perverſe temper; but Atticus humoured it in ſuch a manner, that he continued in his favour without any interruption to the laſt. He found his account ſufficiently in this compliance of his; for Cæcilius made him his chief heir, and left him almoſt a million of money. Atticus's own patrimony was almoſt two hundred thouſand livres. In ſeſtertio vicies quod à patre acceperat (15). Cæcilius having adopted his nephew in his Will, Atticus was obliged to take upon him after that the name of Q. Cæcilius Pomponius Atticus. Let us ſee what Cornelius Nepos ſays of the four diſpoſition of this uncle. Habebat avunculum Q. Cæcilium, equitem Romanum, familiarem L. Luculli (16), divitem, difficillimâ naturâ, cujus ſic aſperitatem veritus eſt, ut quem nemo ferre poſſet, hujus ſine offenſione ad ſummam ſenectutem retinuerit benevolentiam; quo facto tulit pietatis fructum. Cæcilius enim moriens teſtamento adoptavit eum, hæredemque fecit ex dodrante. Ex quâ hereditate accepit circiter centies LLS (17). i. e. "He had an uncle "by the mother's ſide, whoſe name was Q. Cæci"lius, a Roman Knight, an intimate acquaintance "of L. Lucullus, rich, but of a very perverſe tem"per, which Atticus was ſo cautious of offending, "that tho' no perſon elſe could bear with him, yet "he maintained his good will without any offence "till he died extremely old. By this means he "reaped the advantage of his dutifulneſs, for Cæci"lius at his death adopted him in his Will, and "made him his heir to three parts in four of his "eſtate; ſo that he received from this inheritance "a hundred thouſand ſeſterces."

The inhabitants were not ingrateful, but ſhewed him all the publick honours imaginable. He refuſed the offer of the freedom of the city, and the raiſing of a ſtatue to him; but after he was gone ſeveral ſtatues were erected to him. His departure was extremely regretted. *Quo factum eſt, ut huic omnes honores, quos poſſent, publicè haberent, civemque facere ſtuderent, quo beneficio ille uti noluit; quod nonnulli interpretantur amitti civitatem Romanam aliâ adſcitâ. He never attempted to raiſe himſelf above the rank of life, in which he was born, which was that of a Knight. He might have obtained the moſt conſiderable poſts in the Republic; but he choſe rather to renounce all pretenſions to them [G], becauſe in the corruption which then prevailed, he could neither gain them nor diſcharge them according to the laws. He never had any law-ſuit, or appeared as an accuſer againſt any perſon, or ſeconded any one, who was an accuſer. The Emperor Auguſtus was related to him in this manner. Atticus had married his daughter to Agrippa; from which marriage came a daughter, whom Auguſtus betrothed to Tiberius almoſt as ſoon as ſhe was born (b). I am not of opinion, that Atticus's wife was deſcended from any conſiderable family (c). He ought to be ranked among the good Authors [H]. He reached the age of ſeventy ſeven years, almoſt without ever knowing what ſickneſs was. He had for thirty years together

" dom of the city of Rome would have been loſt, if " he had accepted that of any other. While he contiued at Athens, he prevented any ſtatue from being " raiſed to him, but when he left that city, he " could not any longer hinder the citizens from paying him that compliment. . . . . The Roman affairs being reduced to a ſtate of tranquillity he returned to Rome. . . . Upon the day of his departure the whole city of Athens was thrown into the " deepeſt concern imaginable, and ſhewed by their " tears their ſenſe of the loſs they ſhould ſuſtain of " him." He ſpoke the Greek language with ſuch propriety, that he might have been taken for an Athenian (20). Some Writers were of opinion, that the ſurname of Atticus was given him on that account. Volaterranus aſſures us of this as of a thing mentioned by Cornelius Nepos (21); but he is miſtaken. The Abbé de Saint Real tells us, that Atticus was called ſo, becauſe he underſtood Greek extremely well, and lived the greateſt part of his time at Athens (22). It has been repreſented to him (23), that he ſhould have ſaid only, that it was on account of having lived for a conſiderable time at Athens in his youth; ſince it is certain that he continued the greateſt part of his life in Italy or Epirus, where he had a large eſtate, as appears from his Life written by Cornelius Nepos and from divers paſſages in Cicero's Letters.

[F] He always ordered ſome Book to be read at his table, even when he treated his friends.] If he had kept an open table for all perſons promiſcuouſly, who would come to it, he would have done a very diſagreeable thing to a great many people by this cuſtom; but he only invited thoſe, who were of the ſame taſte with himſelf. Nemo in convivio ejus aliud acroama audivit quam anagnoſten. . . . . Neque unquam ſine aliquâ lectione apud eum cœnatum eſt, ut non minus animo quam ventre convivæ delectarentur; namque eos vocabat, quorum mores à ſuis non abhorrerent (24).

[G] He might have obtained the moſt conſiderable poſts in the Republick; but he choſe rather to renounce all pretenſions to them.] This is evidently the ſtrongeſt proof, which he gave of his virtue. There was no poſſibility at that time of being advanced to ſuch poſts but by diſhonourable methods; nor of executing them according to the laws of juſtice and for the advantage of one's country, without expoſing one's ſelf to the violence of a great number of ill men. Atticus choſe rather to continue in a private ſtation of life, than to gain the higheſt dignities at the expence of his conſcience. How excellent a conduct was this! But how uncommon at the ſame time! If all the world reſembled Atticus, there would be ſome reaſon to apprehend a ſtate of anarchy; but we may reſt ſatisfied in that reſpect; for there will always be a greater number of diſhoneſt perſons ready to take poſſeſſion of employments by all kinds of unlawful methods, than there will be places for them to receive. I have been told, that a man, who had ſpent his whole life in travelling, replied to thoſe, who reproached him with his ambulatory humour, that he ſhould have been glad to have ſettled in ſome city, but that he could never find any one, where the power and credit were in the hands of men of integrity. Another traveller declaring that he would put an end to his travels as ſoon as he ſhould find a city governed by thoſe perſons, who had the greateſt merit, was told thus, THEN YOU WILL DIE IN YOUR TRAVELS. Honores non petiit, cum ei paterent propter vel gratiam vel dignitatem: quod neque peti more majorum, neque capi poſſent conſervatis legibus in tam effuſis ambitûs largitionibus, neque geri è republica ſine periculo, corruptis civitatis moribus (25). i. e. " He " was not ſollicitous after publick offices, tho' they " lay open to him either on account of his intereſt " or dignity, becauſe they could neither be applied " for after the cuſtom of our anceſtors, nor obtained " conſiſtently with the laws amidſt ſo much bribery, " nor diſcharged without danger while the manners " of the city were ſo corrupt." Compare this with what has been ſaid above in the article of ALEXANDER ab ALEXANDRO, Note [C].

(25) Idem cap. 6.

[H] He ought to be ranked among the good authors.] He wrote Annals, in which he obſerved a very exact chronology, and cleared in the moſt perſpicuous manner imaginable, the genealogies of the Roman Magiſtrates. This work contains ſeven centuries; from whence we may eaſily conjecture, that it related principally to the Roman Hiſtory; I ſay principally, for we muſt not doubt, but that the author gave a ſhort hiſtory of ſeveral other ſtates in a chronological order. Cicero does not permit us to heſitate about this: Cognoſcat etiam, ſays he (26), rerum geſtarum & memoriæ veteris ordinem maximè ſcilicet noſtræ civitatis; ſed & imperioſorum populorum & regum illuſtrium; quem laborem nobis Attici noſtri levavit labor, qui conſervatis notatiſque temporibus nihil cum illuſtre prætermitteret, annorum ſeptingentorum memoriam uno libro colligavit. i. e. " Let him underſtand likewiſe the ſeries of the ancient hiſtory, eſpecially that of our city, and alſo " of other conſiderable nations and illuſtrious Kings. " This taſk has been made eaſy by the labour of " our friend Atticus, who has given us an account of " every thing important for ſeven hundred years, in " a chronological order in one book." Theſe Annals ſeem to have contained chronological tables. Habuit iſte liber Attici & nova quidem multa, & eam utilitatem quam requirebam, ut explicatis ordinibus temporum uno in conſpectu omnia videbam (27). i. e. " That " book of Atticus had among many other new things " this advantage, which I particularly wanted, " that by laying down a chronological ſeries of the " times, I ſaw all things at one view." I have remarked above that Atticus obſerved the genealogical order in a very clear manner; and I ſhall add here, that he wrote Inſcriptions of four or five verſes each, to be placed under portraits of illuſtrious men, and that his ſkill was greatly admired for being able to comprehend ſo many things in ſo few words. Attigit quoque poeticen, credimus ne jus expers eſſet ſuavitatis. Namque verſibus, qui honore rerumque geſtarum amplitudine cæteros Romani populi præſtiterunt, expoſuit ita ut ſingulorum imaginibus facta magiſtratuſque eorum non amplius quaternis quiniſve verſibus deſcripſerit, quod vix credendum ſit tantas res tam breviter potuiſſe declarari (28). . . . *Moris etiam majorum ſummus imitator fuit antiquitatiſque amator, quam adeo diligenter habuit cognitam, ut eam totam in eo volumine expoſuerit, quo magiſtratus ornavit. Nulla enim lex, neque pax, neque bellum, neque res illuſtris eſt populi Romani, quæ non in eo ſuo tempore ſit notata, & quod difficillimum fuit, ſic familiarum originem ſubtexuit, ut ex eo clarorum virorum propagines poſſimus cognoſcere. together had no occaſion to make uſe of any medicines. At laſt he fell ſick. His ſickneſs was very ſlight for three months, but after that the pains became extremely ſevere. He ſent for Agrippa his ſon-in-law, and two other perſons, and declared to them, that he was reſolved to put an end to his life by abſtaining from food. He deſired them to approve of his reſolution, and not to oppoſe it, ſince all their exhortations would be to no purpoſe. Agrippa however could not refrain from making uſe of tears and entreaties to induce him to ſubmit to live; but it was all in vain. After two days abſtinence the fever left him, and the diſeaſe abated. But notwithſtanding this Atticus perſiſted in his deſign, and died three days after (d). This happened in the year of Rome 721. He has fallen in our time into the hands of a very ſevere Cenſor [I]; but he has not been abandoned to the rigour of his cenſure [K]. There are ſome corrections to be made in Moreri's Dictionary [L]. I have omitted to obſerve, that Atticus was of the Sect of Epicurus (e), and we might challenge the moſt zealous aſſertors of the opinion, which maintains, that without the fear of a Providence, it is impoſſible to equal in the practice of morality thoſe who have acknowledged a Jupiter and a Neptune, &c. to ſhew a perſon of greater integrity than Atticus among the greateſt bigots among the Pagans.

Scipionis Cornelii & Fabii Maximi, de Corneliorum & Æmiliorum quoque, quibus libris nihil poteſt eſſe dulcius iis, qui aliquam cupiditatem habent notitiæ clarorum virorum (29). i. e. "He engaged alſo a little in poetry; I preſume, that he might not be entirely a "ſtranger to the charms of it. For he wrote an account of the actions and offices of the moſt eminent men among the Romans, in four or five verſes under their pictures, ſo that it was incredible, that "ſo many conſiderable facts could be related in ſo narrow a compaſs.... He was a great imitator of "the cuſtoms of our anceſtors, and very fond of antiquity, which he was ſo well ſkilled in, that he has given a full account of it, in that volume, which he wrote concerning Magiſtrates. For there "is no law, nor peace, nor war, nor any great action of the Roman people, which is not related there in its proper order, and what was the moſt difficult taſk, he has traced the original of families in ſuch a manner, that we may readily ſee from what ſtock our great men are deſcended. He performed this likewiſe ſeparately in other books, as particularly at the deſire of Marcus Brutus he gave an account of the Junian family from the firſt riſe of it to the preſent time, remarking from whom every one ſprung, and what offices he bore, and when. He did the ſame alſo for the family of the Marcelli at the requeſt of Marcellus Claudius, and for that of the Cornelii, and Fabii, and Æmilii at the deſire of Scipio Cornelius, and Fabius Maximus. Nothing can be more agreeable than theſe books to thoſe perſons, who have any taſte for the knowledge of the hiſtory of famous men." It is a pity, that theſe books are loſt. They would give us light into a multitude of particulars, which are now obſcure. I ſhall not ſay any thing concerning the Hiſtory of the Conſulſhip of Cicero, which Atticus wrote in Greek (30), and without any ornaments (31).

[I] He has fallen in our time into the hands of a very ſevere Cenſor.] It is the Abbé de Saint Real. See his Book entitled, Ceſarion ou Entretiens divers. It was printed at the Hague from the copy at Paris in 1685. It is divided into four days, the third of which is a very ſevere criticiſm upon Pomponius Atticus and his panegyriſt Cornelius Nepos. I am informed, that the author of that piece has perſiſted in the ſame opinion, and that this appears from the remarks which he has added to his tranſlation of the firſt book of Cicero's letters to Atticus. This tranſlation is mentioned in a book, which is well known (32), and I am ſurprized that the Bookſellers of Amſterdam have not reprinted it; for I do not doubt but that a great deal might be learned from reading that book.

The author of the apology has not put his name to it; but it is well known, that he was the late Mr. Reinſſant Keeper of the King of France's Cabinet of Medals. The Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (33), enlarged upon this piece of Mr. Reinſſant in ſuch a manner, as was by no means agreeable to the Abbé Saint Real.

[L] There are corrections to be made in Moreri's Dictionary.] I. It is falſe, that Cicero married Atticus's ſiſter. It was Cicero's brother, who married her. II. It was a miſtake to mention the intimate friendſhip between them, which was the reſult of this marriage; ſince Cornelius Nepos expreſly remarks, that Atticus's friendſhip was never ſo ſtrong for Quintus Cicero his brother-in-law, as it was for Cicero. Erat nupta ſoror Attici Q. Tullio Ciceroni, eaſque nuptias M. Cicero conciliârat, cum quo à condiſcipulatu vivebat conjunctiſſimè, multo etiam familiarius, quam cum Quinto, ut judicari poſſit plus in amicitia valere ſimilitudinem morum quam affinitatem (34). i. e. "Atticus's ſiſter was married "to Quintius Tullius Cicero, which marriage was procured by Marcus Cicero, with whom he had lived "in greateſt intimacy ever ſince they had been ſchool-fellows, even greater than he maintained with "Quintus, ſo that it was eaſy to judge from hence, "that a ſimilitude of diſpoſition has more influence "in friendſhip than affinity has." Pomponia, Atticus's ſiſter, was not always upon very good terms with her huſband (35); therefore ſhe was not a proper perſon at all to heighten the friendſhip between him and her brother. III. Cicero did not dedicate a volume of his letters to Atticus. Moreri ſhould have ſaid, that he kept a continual correſpondence with him by letters, and that we have a collection of the letters, which he wrote to him, divided into ſixteen books. Cornelius Nepos mentions this (36), and tells us, that we find in them the hiſtory of thoſe times, and in ſome meaſure a prophecy of what was to happen. Ut nihil in iis non appareat, & facile exiſtimari poſſit prudentiam quodammodo eſſe divinationem. Non enim Cicero ea ſolum, quæ vivo ſe acciderunt, futura prædixit, ſed etiam quæ nunc uſu veniunt cecinit ut vates. IV. It is extravagance to ſay, that Atticus had no ſervants, but thoſe, who were capable of reading to him. Moreri ſhould have only ſaid, that he had a great many ſervants, who were converſant in learning, able to read and write well, and bind books, and that all his footmen were capable of doing this (37). Cornelius Nepos ſays no more than this: how comes it then, that in the 17th Century any perſon ſhould preſume to affirm twenty times as much as he has done? Has not he expreſly obſerved, that beſides his ſervants, who were readers and librarians (38), Atticus had others all well inſtructed, and every one of them born and bred in his own houſe? In eâ (familiâ) erant pueri literatiſſimi, anagnoſtæ optimi & plurimi librarii, ut ne pediſequus quidem quiſquam eſſet, qui non utrumque horum pulchrè facere poſſet. Pari modò ARTIFICES CÆTERI, quos cultus domeſticus deſiderat apprimè boni. Neque tamen horum quenquam niſi domi natum domique factum habuit (39). i. e. ATTICUS Patriarch of Conſtantinople in the beginning of the fifth Century, was born at Sebaſtia, now Souſtia, a city of Armenia. He was firſt educated by the Macedonian Monks in the principles of their Sect; but being come to riper years, he embraced the faith of the Catholick Church (a). St. Chryſoſtom having been deprived of the See of Conſtantinople, Arſacius [A] was made Patriarch in his ſtead in the year 404; but he dying the next year (b), the See remained vacant for ſome months, becauſe there were a great many pretenders to it. At laſt Atticus, who was then a Prieſt, was choſen in the year 406, under the Conſulſhip of Arcadius for the ſixth time and Probus (c). The friends of St. Chryſoſtom at Conſtantinople, and all the Biſhops of the Eaſt refuſed to communicate with the new Patriarch, becauſe, as they thought, Chryſoſtom had been unjuſtly condemned. Atticus therefore procured an edict from the Emperor, to oblige them to communicate with him [B]. Palladius, who tells us this (d), adds, that Atticus had been one of the contrivers of the whole conſpiracy againſt Chryſoſtom; but as he does not alledge one inſtance of it, nor the leaſt proof of his aſſertion, we cannot much depend upon his teſtimony, eſpecially ſince he was ſo much an admirer of the deprived Biſhop, that he right or wrong condemns all thoſe who oppoſed him. However we muſt obſerve that Sozomen alſo tells us (e), that Atticus was one of the conſpirators againſt Chryſoſtom. But after the death of this Prelate, Atticus being uneaſy at the diviſions, which reigned in his church, a great many perſons refuſing to communicate with him, and holding private congregations, he ordered at laſt that Chryſoſtom's name ſhould be put in the Diptychs [C], and mentioned in Divine Service with thoſe of the other Biſhops, who were dead (f). He alſo wrote to St. Cyril Biſhop of Alexandria, earneſtly entreating him to do the ſame. But Cyril anſwer'd that this was not proper, becauſe by this means they ſhould ſeem to condemn thoſe who had depoſed Chryſoſtom, and alſo to diſgrace themſelves, if they ſhould admit among the Clergy and the Biſhops, one, who, by being depoſed, had been ranked amongſt the Laity. Both theſe letters are extant in Nicephorus Calixtus's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (g). The Ancients ſpeak very differently concerning Atticus's learning. Palladius ſays (h), that he was quite ignorant in the holy Scripture; and Sozomen tells us (i), he was more prudent and wiſe from the ſtrength of his natural parts, than from any learning he had acquired, and his Sermons were but indifferent, ſo that they were not thought worth tranſcribing, though they were not altogether deſtitute of learning. However, as he had ſome taſte for polite Literature, he uſed, when he was at leiſure, to ſtudy the beſt ancient Greek Authors; but not having begun ſoon enough to lay a good foundation, he appeared dark and obſcure even to the Learned, whenever he ventured to diſcourſe upon the ſubjects treated of by the Ancients. [A] ARSACIUS.] He was the brother of Nectarius, St. Chryſoſtom's predeceſſor in the See of Conſtantinople. While he was yet but a Prieſt, he acquired by his behaviour the reputation of a pious and moderate man; but when he came to be a Biſhop, the great liberty, in which he indulged his Clergy, ſoon blemiſhed his character; for whatever they did amiſs was aſcribed to him; but what has been the greateſt blot in his reputation, was his hatred againſt Chryſoſtom and all his adherents, who were ſeverely treated at Conſtantinople, in all probability by Arſacius's means, at leaſt not without his knowledge and conſent (1). He procured, it ſeems, an Edict from the Emperor, to the following effect; If any Biſhop refuſes to communicate with Theophilus, Arſacius, and Porphyrius, let him be depoſed, and if it appears that he has any eſtate either real or perſonal, let it be confiſcated. There was another Edict to this purpoſe: If any one hides a Biſhop or a Clerc, or only receives in his houſe any other perſon of thoſe, who communicate with John (Chryſoſtom), he ſhall forfeit his houſe (2). It is certain that ſuch Edicts would not have been publiſhed, if the Primate of Conſtantinople, who had always a very great power, had not petitioned for, or at leaſt conſented to them. Palladius gives us a very ill character of this Prelate. He was, ſays he (3), more mute than a fiſh, and leſs fit for buſineſs than a frog . . . . He broke the oath he had made upon the Goſpel; for when Nectarius, his brother, upbraided him for having refuſed the Biſhoprick of Tarſus, as tho' he waited for his death in order to ſucceed him (in the See of Conſtantinople), Arſacius ſwore to him, that he would never accept any Biſhoprick. The cauſe of his perjury was firſt his ambition, which made him covet the wife of his brother, if I may ſay ſo; and ſecondly the ſhame he was filled with at his brother's prophetical cenſures. He died fourteen months after his promotion to the See of Conſtantinople. How far Palladius, the moſt partial of all Writers in favour of his Hero, is to be credited, when his account is not ſupported by any other Author, we leave our readers to judge.

[B] He procured an Edict from the Emperor to oblige them to communicate with him.] That Edict was very ſevere againſt the Biſhops as well as againſt the Laity. With regard to the former the Emperor decreed, that if any Biſhop refuſed to communicate with Theophilus, Porphyrius (4), and Atticus, he ſhould be ejected out of his Church, and all his eſtate confiſcated. This Edict obliged ſome of the richeſt to comply, tho' much againſt their will; and ſome of the moſt indigent were by gifts and preſents prevailed upon to communicate with Chryſoſtom's enemies; but others, who were more conſcientious, and preferred their faith before worldly riches, left all their eſtates, and fled to ſome other country. The Laity was not treated with leſs ſeverity; the Edict declared, that "they, who were promoted to honours and dignities, ſhould be deprived "of them, the ſoldiers be caſhiered, and the reſt of "the people, artificers, and others, be fined and baniſhed (5)." Thus for the ſake of one man, not only Conſtantinople, but ſeveral other Cities ſuffered a very heavy perſecution, tho' it was not on the account of Religion, but only to ſatisfy the ambition of ſome haughty and perhaps revengeful Prelates.

[C] Diptychs.] Theſe were Eccleſiaſtical Books or Tables. There were two ſorts of them; the firſt contained the names of the Patriarchs, Popes and Biſhops, who preſided over the largeſt Churches, and were ſtill alive: in the other were written the names of thoſe, who died in the peace and communion of the Church. The Deacon uſed to read thoſe names at the altar during divine ſervice. As the admitting of any Biſhop's name into theſe publick Tables was a token and pledge of communion, ſo the eraſing any one's name out of them was a denial of communion with him, and a kind of excommunication. The uſe of theſe Diptychs is very ancient, and can be traced up to the fourth Century at leaſt, if not higher. They contained ſometimes, beſides the names of Biſhops, thoſe alſo of other men, famous for their holineſs and piety, and eſpecially thoſe of the orthodox Emperors, nay even of General Councils; as appears by the Emperor Juſtinian's Letter to Epiphanius Patriarch of Conſtantinople (6). Theſe Diptychs are very often mentioned by the Fathers, Councils, and Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians (7).

is Sozomen's account of Atticus's learning. Socrates, who in one place tells us (k), that this Prelate had but a very moderate ſhare of learning, and excelled chiefly by his natural wiſdom and prudence, ſays in another (l), that he was very learned, and ſpent much labour in ſtudying the books of the Ancients, paſſing whole nights in the reading of them, ſo that he was no ſtranger to the writings of the Philoſophers and Sophiſts. I do not know how to reconcile Socrates with himſelf and with Sozomen; for as there are but a few fragments of Atticus's writings extant [D], we are not able by them to form a true judgment of his learning. But whatever they may have been, his moral character, according to Socrates and Sozomen, was very amiable. He was very eminent for his piety attended with prudence; and though he ſometimes appeared in his words a little ſevere againſt the Hereticks, it was only to terrify them, for he ſoon behaved with great mildneſs towards them (m), though we are not told whether it was only after they were converted to the Orthodox faith, or even while they perſiſted in their hereſy. Yet from a letter of his to Calliopius we may infer, that his charity extended even to the Heretics [E]; nor was he inclined to perſecute the Novatians [F], though they were Schiſmaticks. He alſo abhorred ſuperſtition, particularly that which conſiſts in worſhiping the dead [G]. It is ſaid that he foretold the time of his death; for being upon his return from Nice, where he had been upon ſome particular occaſion, he ſaid to Calliopius, a Prieſt of that city, Take care to come and ſee me at Conſtantinople before the Autumn, if you would find me alive, for if you come later I ſhall be dead. He was not miſtaken in his prophecy, for he died the tenth of October in that very year, viz. 425, the nineteenth after he had been promoted to the Patriarchal See of Conſtantinople (n).

We ſhould entertain but a very indifferent opinion of his learning, if we were to judge of it by the fragments of his Homily.

[E] His charity extended even to the hereticks.] As his Letter to Calliopius, which contains the proof of this aſſertion, is not very long, we ſhall inſert a tranſlation of it here. I have heard, ſays he (11), that there are in your city a thouſand indigent perſons, who ſtand in need of the charity of pious and well-diſpoſed men: when I ſay a thouſand, I mean a great many, and not that number exactly. Now, as I have received ſome money of him, who is uſed to give it with a liberal hand to thoſe, who know how to make a good uſe of it; and permits that ſome be in want, in order to try thoſe, who tho' they have wherewithal to aſſiſt them, yet are not inclined to do it; accept, my dear friend, theſe three hundred pieces of gold, and diſpoſe of them as you ſhall think proper. I know, that you will chuſe to give to thoſe, who are aſhamed to aſk, rather than to thoſe, who make a trade of begging. Only I beg, that in the diſtribution of this money you may have no regard to their Religion, minding only to feed the hungry, without conſidering, whether or not they be of our Religion. This is certainly a noble and exalted ſentiment, worthy of a Chriſtian, who, if he be obliged to do good, eſpecially to thoſe who are of the houſhold of faith, is yet at the ſame time commanded to do good unto all men (12).

[F] Nor was he inclined to perſecute the Novatians.] As ſome body was repreſenting to him, that the Novatians held religious aſſemblies within the city of Conſtantinople, Don't you know, anſwered he, how much they ſuffered with us, during the perſecution of Conſtans and Valens? And beſides, they bear witneſs to our faith; for tho' they have long ago ſeparated themſelves from the Church, yet they have not made the leaſt innovation in matters of faith (13). This ſhews that Atticus was for allowing the Novatians a liberty of conſcience; and yet he did not approve their ſeparation from the Church, as will appear by what follows. Being gone to Nice in order to conſecrate a Biſhop, he met there Aſclepiades, Biſhop of the Novatians, a venerable old man, and aſked him how long he had been a Biſhop; Aſclepiades anſwered, fifty years. "Happy "man, replied Atticus, for having been ſo long em- "ployed in ſo good a work (14)." By which it appears, that Aſclepiades, tho' a Separatiſt, was look'd upon by Atticus as a real and true Biſhop. He alſo told him, I approve Novatus, but I blame the Novatians. At which Aſclepiades, being aſtoniſhed, aſked him the reaſon of this; I approve him, anſwered Atticus, for having refuſed to communicate with thoſe, who had offered incenſe to the Idols, for in his place I would have done the ſame: but I cannot but blame the Novatians, who deprive laymen of the Sacrament for very ſlight offences. Beſides the offering ſacrifices to the Idols, replied Aſclepiades, there are a great many other ſins unto death, as the Scriptures call them (15), for which you excommunicate only the Clergy, and we alſo the Laity, leaving to God alone the power of remitting them (16).

[G] He abhorred ſuperſtition, particularly that, which conſiſts in worſhipping the dead.] Socrates tells us (17), that Atticus laboured much to aboliſh ſuperſtition among men; and gives us the following inſtance. Some Novatians had transferred the corps of Sabbatius from the Iſland of Rhodes, where he died in exile, and having buried it (at Conſtantinople, I ſuppoſe), uſed to pray upon his tomb, which Atticus hearing, he ſent ſome perſons in the night time, who carried off the corps and buried it in ſome infame ſecret place; by which a ſtop was put to this ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Novatians, who left off worſhipping that tomb. It were to be wiſhed, that all the Biſhops had been equally careful to ſuppreſs this ſuperſtition in its infancy. P.

ATTILA, King of the Huns, ſurnamed the Scourge of God, lived in the fifth Century. He may be ranked amongſt the greateſt conquerors, ſince there was ſcarce any Province in Europe, which did not feel the weight of his victorious arms. This King of the Huns was of a low ſtature (b); but this did not prevent him from caſting a terror upon the moſt intrepid by his lofty carriage and fierce countenance. He underſtood very well how to join policy with force [B]. Superſtition was one of his artifices [C]. The ſame author tells us, that Attila having ſeen at Milan a picture, which repreſented an Emperor upon his throne, having under his feet the Scythians in chains, he ordered it to be removed, and another to be placed in the room of it, in which himſelf was drawn ſitting upon a throne, ſurrounded with Emperors loaded with bags of gold and ſilver, which they came to empty at his feet in a very humble poſture; intimating by this, that as he had obliged Theodoſius ſeven or eight years before to pay him tribute, he would force the Emperor Valentinian to do the ſame, in order to ſave his life and the miſerable remains of his Empire (2).

[B] He underſtood very well how to join policy with force.] This is evident from his management in the expedition againſt the Gauls. He endeavoured to divide the Romans, who were commanded by Aetius, from the Wiſigoths, whoſe King was Theodoric. For this purpoſe he told the Emperor Valentinian, that he did not intend any act of hoſtility againſt the ſubjects of the Empire; that he only propoſed to chaſtiſe the Franks and Wiſigoths, the former of whom had preſumed to invade the territories of the Empire, and the latter were only ſlaves to Valentinian. He informed Theodoric at the ſame time, that he had made the King of the Vandals believe, that he was come into Gaul againſt the Wiſigoths, but that this was only a pretence to deceive the Emperor; that his real deſign was to divide the Empire between the Huns and the Wiſigoths, and that he would invade Italy, if Theodoric would attack the Gauls (3). Valentinian and Theodoric eaſily diſcovered this ſnare, and united to repel this artful conqueror. Homo ſubtilis, antequam bella gereret, arte pugnabat, cætera epiſtolas blandimentis oppleverat, ſtudens fidem adhibere mendacio (4). i. e. [C] Superſtition was one of his artifices.] "He "found means to poſſeſs the minds of his ſoldiers "with a ſuperſtitious notion, that there was ſome"thing in him divine, upon which his good fortune "depended; for whether he thought ſo himſelf, or "rather pretended to be perſuaded of it, he made "them believe that he had found the ſcymitar of Mars, "which was adored among thoſe people, and that "the fates had promiſed the Empire of the whole "world to him, who ſhould be maſter of that fatal "ſword (5)." It is one of the moſt powerful ſtratagems, which a General can make uſe of, to be able to manage and work up the minds of his ſoldiers by the ſprings of a myſterious ſuperſtition, which fills them with reſolution or fear according as the occaſion requires; with reſolution, when it is neceſſary to fight; and with fear, when they begin to incline to mutiny. It is very uſeful for a ſoldier to be perſuaded, that his General has a familiar ſpirit, who can extricate him out of every difficulty (6). Attila was ſuperſtitious himſelf: Religioni perſuaſionibuſque de Diis à ſuâ gente ſuſceptis uſque ad ſuperſtitionem addictus (7). i. e. "He was ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to thoſe notions "of Religion and the Gods, which were received a"mong his countrymen." For a little before the battle of Chalons "he conſulted his Diviners, who "told him, that indeed all their obſervations did not pro"miſe any ſucceſs to the Huns; but that they predicted, "that the General of the enemies would be killed in "the battle. This was ſufficient to deceive Attila. "He imagined that Aetius's death was certain, and "that if this man was no longer an obſtacle to him, "the conqueſt of the Empire would be eaſy. He "did not value the loſs of his ſoldiers, and he "perſuaded himſelf, that he ſhould always have "a ſufficient number, if he did but ſurvive that great "General (8)." He was deceived; for Aetius was not even wounded in that battle.

[D] That he was ſuffocated by the bleeding of his noſe the night of his marriage.] It is ſaid, that after he was prevailed upon by the prayers of Pope Leo to ſpare the reſt of Italy, he returned to Pannonia, loaded with his ſpoils; and that tho' he had a great number of concubines, yet he would take a new one, who was the daughter of the King of the Bactrians. She was a perfect beauty, and he fell ſo deeply in love with her, that he reſolved to do her the honour of marrying her in form, in order to give her the firſt rank among his Ladies. He ſolemnized his marriage with a great deal of pomp; but he drank ſo liberally, and afterwards heated himſelf ſo exceſſively in the embraces of his new ſpouſe, that at laſt falling aſleep, he was ſeized with a bleeding at the noſe, which ſuffocated him. Ildico puellæ ei fuit præ cæteris gratiſſima, Bactrianorum regis filia, miræ pulchritudine & incomparabili venuſtate, cujus amore ſuccenſus eam primariæ uxoris loco habere conſtituit. Baccho ac Venere corpus ita ea nocte confecit, ut inter dormiendum ſupino corpore, profluvio ſanguinis è naribus continuò ſuffocatus interierit (9). There would be no improbability in this ſtory, if it was not added that Attila was then one hundred and twenty four years of age. It is difficult to conceive that at ſuch an age a man ſhould be in a condition to commit any great exceſſes with the ſex. An Hiſtorian of Frieſeland has quoted this fact as an argument in favour of the Hiſtorians of his Nation, who repreſent their ancient Kings as very long lived. He has borrowed it not from Bonfinius, but from Michael Rithius. His adde teſtimonium Michaelis Rithii, qui Libro de Regibus Hungariæ primo ſcribit, Atthilam Italicâ prædâ opimiſque ſpoliis onuſtum in Pannoniam ſe recepiſſe, uxoremque ſuperduxiſſe regis Bactrianorum nomine Milzoth, etſi plures alias haberet in matrimonio, eumque cum nuptiales epulas apparatiſſimè celebraſſet, liberius ſolito crapulatum in cubiculum recepiſſe, erumpenteque è naribus ſanguine in os dormientis extinctum eſſe, anno ætatis ſuæ 124, regni ſui 44. Si tantam ætatem in hoc libidinoſo tauro Scythico credimus, cur non & eandem Friſiis accidere potuiſſe cenſeamus (10)? i. e. "Add to theſe the teſtimony of Michael Ri"thius, who in his firſt Book concerning the Kings "of Hungary tells us, that Attila being loaden with "the rich ſpoils, which he had gained in Italy, went "to Pannonia, where he married the King of Bactria's "daughter, whoſe name was Milzoth, tho' he had "many other wives beſides, and that having made a "very magnificent feaſt on account of his marriage, "and drank more freely than uſual, he retired to his "chamber, where as he lay aſleep he was ſuffocated "by an eruption of the blood from his noſe, in the "124th year of his age, and the 44th of his reign. [E] Others have written it ſince that time.] Nicholas Olahus, Archbiſhop of Strigonium, wrote a Life of Attila much more compleat than that of Callimachus Experiens. He wrote it while he was Counſellor to Mary of Auſtria, Queen of Hungary, Governeſs of the Low-Countries. We may ſee there the Speech, which Attila made to his army a little before the battle of Chalons. All the common topics are introduced into this Speech, as we may perceive by the marginal notes. Sambucus has inſerted this work of Olahus and that of Callimachus Experiens in his edition of Bonfinius. Otrokocſi (12), who publiſhed a Book concerning the Origin of the Hungarians, has ſpoken very fully of Attila, and principally made uſe of the relation of Priſcus, who attended the Embaſſadors ſent by Theodoſius to this King of the Huns in 448. He extracts ſeveral remarks from this relation, to ſhew that Attila was a man of great probity. He does not omit the reproaches, which that Prince caſt upon the Emperor Theodoſius on account of the Eunuch Chryſaphius's attempt to engage Edeco, Attila's Envoy at the court of Theodoſius, to kill his maſter. The Envoy pretended to engage in this deſign, and procured the promiſe of a very conſiderable ſum of money, and then diſcovered the whole affair to Attila. The money was brought; the plot proved: the King of the Huns expoſtulated with Theodoſius like a great man, and with an air, which renders the character probable, which is given of him, that he was gentle to thoſe, who ſubmitted to him, and faithful to his word. Supplicibus prope ad mollitiem facilis, & qui in fidem ſemel receptos, in perniciem uſque ſuam tueretur (13). i. e. John de Medicis who was Pope under the name of Leo X is introduced ſpeaking in the following manner: In Bibliothecâ noſtrâ aſſervatur liber incerti Autoris Græcè ſcriptus de rebus à Gotis in Italiâ geſtis. In eo memini me legere Attilam regem, poſt partam victoriam tam ſtudioſum fuiſſe Goticæ linguæ propagandæ, ut edicto ſanxerit ne quis linguâ Latinâ loqueretur, magiſtroſque inſuper è ſuâ provinciâ accivisſe, qui Italos Goticam linguam edocerent (14). i. e. ATTILIUS, a Latin Poet, lived in all probability in the beginning of the ſeventh Century of Rome. Volcatius Sedigitus gives him the fifth rank among the ten Comic Poets. However he was a bad Author; his ſtyle was as hard as iron (a), not only according to Cicero's taſte, but likewiſe that of Licinius, whoſe ear was not near ſo exquiſite as Cicero's. Attilius's tranſlation of the Electra of Sophocles was extremely ill performed; however Cicero thought it worth reading (b). Suetonius remarks that ſeveral paſſages were extracted from it to be ſung during the funeral pomp of Julius Cæſar, becauſe they might be applied to the aſſaſſins of that Emperor (c). Caſaubon and Torrentius have in vain attempted to alter this paſſage of Suetonius [A]. They have only given us an inſtance of the diſorders, which criticiſm may ſometimes introduce.

[A] Caſaubon and Torrentius have in vain attempted to alter this paſſage of Suetonius.] Caſaubon having found in all the copies of Suetonius, ex Electrâ Attilii alia ad ſimilem ſententiam, imagined, that we ought to read Attii inſtead of Attilii. Sic emendavimus, ſays he, corruptam omnium librorum lectionem Attilii. i. e. "Thus have we corrected the corrupt "reading of Attilii in all the copies." Torrentius was not ſatisfied with ſubſtituting Attius in the room of Attilius; but he removed likewiſe the word Electra, and pretended, that Suetonius ſpoke only of a piece of Attius, which was intitled like that of Pacuvius, which he had juſt before mentioned, Armorum judicium. Torrentius's reaſon is, that the manuſcripts differ extremely with regard to the Poet's name; but that they have moſt frequently Accius or Attius. In this manner the Criticks diſagree with regard to the readings of the manuſcripts, which is a matter of fact. Caſaubon acknowledges that he found Attilius in all of them. Torrentius on the other hand affirms, that he met leſs frequently with that reading than any other. Peter Crinitus complained that the Grammarians had inſerted Accius inſtead of Attilius in this paſſage of Suetonius (1). But let us proceed to ſomething of more importance. Tho' Caſaubon has not told us, why he altered the text, yet there is no doubt, but that he had the ſame reaſon for it as Torrentius. Now Torrentius's reaſon is as follows: He did not remember that he had ever read any thing relating to the Electra of Attius, nor concerning a Poet, whoſe name was Attilius. It is leſs ſurprizing, that a man of learning ſhould be induced by ſuch a principle to deny a fact, than to ſee that theſe two excellent Criticks knew nothing, that Cicero has mentioned the Electra of Attilius; that he has treated Attilius as a very harſh Poet; that Volcatius Sedigitus makes an honourable mention of him in Aulus Gellius; and that Varro has quoted him in the Vth and VIth Book concerning the Latin tongue (2). I ſhall ſay nothing of Crinitus or Gregory Gyraldus, who have mentioned him in the Lives of the Latin Poets by ſuch marks, that the latter has falſly charged Cicero with having ſtiled him a Tragic Poet (3). I ſhall not touch upon the complaints, which have been publiſhed againſt thoſe, who alter the readings of manuſcripts juſt as they underſtand or do not underſtand any point. This would be an improper place to introduce this, conſidering the great ſervice, which Caſaubon has done to the Republick of Letters by his learning, which was as extenſive as judicious. Torrentius's merit is not of equal importance; but it has its value, which I ſhall not pretend in the leaſt to leſſen.

AUBERI (N.) Author of the History of Cardinal Richelieu [A], and of Cardinal Mazarin. See the Journal des Savans (a). If some particular reason did not prevent, I should always make use of such a reference as this, when the book referred to is easy to be found, and contains only a short account of the life of a person.

[A] AUBERI, Author of the History of Cardinal Richelieu.] It was printed at Paris in folio in 1660, with two other volumes, which contain Letters, Instructions, and Memoirs. Anthony Bertier, Bookseller of Paris, who printed them, had collected with great care the pieces, which are contained in the two last volumes; but he represented to the Queen Mother, that he could not venture to publish them without the particular authority and protection of his Majesty, because there were divers persons, who were restored to favour at Court, whose past conduct not having been regular, and being represented extremely to their disadvantage in those memoirs, would infallibly bring him into some trouble. Go, says the Queen to him, proceed in your work without any apprehension, and cast such an infamy upon vice, that nothing but virtue may remain in France (1).

AUBERTIN (EDMUND) (a) in Latin Edmundus Albertinus, a Minister of the Church of Paris in the seventeenth Century, was a man of eminent learning. He was born at Chalons upon the Marne in the year 1595. He was admitted a Minister at the Synod of Charenton in 1618, and promoted to the Church of Chartres, from whence he was removed to Paris in 1631 (a). He wrote, properly speaking, but one book [A]; but he gained more reputation by that single book, than other learned men have done by printing an hundred volumes. This work turns upon the controversy concerning the Eucharist. It was published in the year 1633, under the title of The Eucharist of the ancient Church. The Agents of the Clergy of France complained of Mr. Aubertin before the King's Council [B], and obtained a warrant to take him into custody, because he had called himself Pastor of the Reformed Church of Paris. This process had no consequences, for the times were not then proper to push such things very far (b). Now whether it was the excellence of the book, which without the assistance of this incident occasioned it to be sought for, or whether it was concluded to have been written with great strength of argument, since the Clergy only attacked it by way of the secular arm, it is certain, that the Author had great reason to be pleased with the success of his work [C]. This obliged him to revise, enlarge, and perfect it with so much application, that he seems to have devoted his whole labour and study to it. He composed his new work in Latin, but he had not the satisfaction to see it published. It was printed at Deventer after

(b) I have been informed, that after this, on account of some word, which escaped him in the Pulpit, the Court suspended him from preaching two or three years.

[A] He wrote properly speaking but one Book.] For the Essay, which he published upon St. Augustin, to shew that the sentiments of this Father with regard to the Eucharist were not agreeable to those of the Church of Rome, but to those of the Protestants (1), ought not to be considered but as a little specimen of the Book, which he published in folio in 1633. I say this after the learned Blondel. Augustinum, quem obtorto collo in partes trahere conabatur Perronius, abducenti fortiter extorsit, vindicatumque in Dei castra feliciter reduxit. Hoc insigni virtutis specimine, & tirocinio, ut sic dicam, posito, de patrum universorum causâ asserendâ serio cogitans, Antiquæ Ecclesiæ Eucharistiam nobis accuratiore studio repræsentavit (2). i. e. "He valiantly rescued St. Augustin from the hands of "Cardinal Perron, who endeavoured by violence to "draw him over to his party, and he brought him back "to the camp of God with great success. Having "given this noble specimen of his abilities, and gone "thro' the probation of his studies, if I may be allowed the expression, he resolved seriously upon a "Defence of the cause of all the Fathers in general, "and compiled a more complete account of the Eucharist of the ancient Church." I have never seen the observations which he made out of regard to the Abbé de Marolles, upon a Book of Mr. de la Milletiere, who importuned him to answer some difficult questions; but I have been informed, that it is a Book of 226 pages, printed in 1648, and relating to the controversy concerning the Eucharist. The Abbé des Marolles mentions it in the Catalogue of the Presents, which he received from Authors.

[B] The Agents of the Clergy of France complained of him before the King's Council.] They represented in their petition, that Mr. Edmund Aubertin, Minister of the pretended Reformed Religion at Charenton, had published a Book, in which he took upon him the title of Pastor of the Reformed Church at Paris, and addressed his Preface to the faithful of the Reformed Church of the said city of Paris; and that in the approbation of that Book the other Ministers of Charenton took upon themselves the title of Pastors of the Churches of the Isle of France, Champagne, and the Country of Chartres, and their Subscriptions call themselves Maistrézat and Drelincourt, Pastors of the Reformed Church of Paris, and Daillé (3), Minister of the holy Gospel in the said Church. The same Agents complained, that the Cardinals Bellarmin and Du Perron were stiled Adversaries of the Church in the title of the work. The King ordered that Aubertin should be taken into custody, and carried to the prison of Fort l'Evesque, if he could be apprehended; and if not, that he should be summoned by the publick Crier with three short days warning, his goods seized and an inventory made of them according to the Decree, in order to proceed to his trial; and that the said Maistrezat, Drelincourt, and Daillé should be summoned to appear in person to be heard and interrogated with relation to the facts mentioned in the petition. His Majesty enjoined the Ministers and others professing the pretended Reformed Religion to use the titles given them in the Edicts, and no others, prohibiting them to stile the Catholicks Adversaries of the Church (4). This Decree was made in the privy Council of the King the 14th of July 1633 (5). The Author of the History of the Edict of Nantes informs us (6), that this affair, which made a great deal of noise, and had very little effect, was terminated almost as soon as it began, and produced nothing at that time but verbal prohibitions (7). He adds, that the Book was the more sought after upon that account, and that the success encouraged the Author to revise and enlarge it, and treated of that subject more accurately in a large volume in Latin, which was not published till after his death, and that the Catholick Divines, who were unsuspected, never ventured to return a particular answer to it.

[C] He had great reason to be pleased with the success of his work.] We have just seen the judgment of the Author of the History of the Edict of Nantes. He has only conformed himself to the judgment of Mr. Daillé the younger, whose words are as follows: The name of Mr. Aubertin is immortal here below, and will always live in the great and incomparable work concerning the Eucharist, which hitherto has continued superior to all the attacks of those of the other Communion, in which not one Writer has ventured to attack him fairly, or to oppose him face to face, if we may so express after his death by the care of David Blondel (c). When this book began to be forgot, there aroſe a conteſt between the Divines of Port-Royal and Mr. Claude, which made known the name of Aubertin and the character of his work [D] to an infinite number of people who had never heard of it before, or did not remember it. Mr. Claude had a thouſand opportunities of ſpeaking of the merit of this book [E]. Mr. Aubertin died at Paris the fifth of April 1652, being fifty ſeven years of age. He was expoſed in his laſt agony to the inſults of the Rector of St. Sulpice [F]; and notwithſtanding his drouſineſs, which was one of the chief ſymptoms of his diſtemper, he had his mind free enough to declare, when this Miſſionary interrogated him, that he died in the perſuaſion of thoſe truths which he had always profeſſed. He had a very eaſy acceſs to the Duke de Verneuil, who was at that time Abbot of St. Germain des Prez. This Prince often invited him to his table, and found him to be a man of agreeable converſation, of univerſal preſs it. Even thoſe, who are conſidered among them as pillars and heads of the party, have been able to do nothing elſe but touch ſometimes upon him in an oblique manner, according to the rules of this new art, which they have invented, and which the deſpair of their cauſe has obliged them to put in practice under the ſpecious name of a Method of Preſcription (8). Mr. Daillé means by this the Divines of Port-Royal, who in their Book concerning the Perpetuity of the Faith did not attack any part of the whole work of Mr. Aubertin except the Hiſtory of the Alteration of the Faith (β). Beſides they did attack this Hiſtory but by reaſonings, and not by oppoſing facts to facts. See the ſecond Chapter of the firſt Book of the large Anſwer of Mr. Claude, in which he ſhews, that the Author of the Perpetuity of the Faith attacked Mr. Aubertin's Book in an oblique and indirect manner.

(8) Life of Mr. Daillé, pag. 28.

(β) The Hiſtory of the Alteration of the Faith.] It is a matter of ſurprize, that Mr. Bayle was ſo little acquainted with what he mentions here. Daillé, who wrote in 1671, might very well ſay, the Author of the Perpetuité, printed in 1669, attacked nothing in Aubertin's whole work, but his hiſtory of the alteration, which happened in the belief of the Church. Daillé, who was no Prophet, could not foreſee that the ſame Author would ſhortly publiſh two other volumes, in which the whole work of Aubertin, with all the evaſions of the Miniſter Claude, who came to his aſſiſtance, would be cloſely examin'd and confuted. The ſecond volume of the Perpetuité was publiſhed in December 1671, and the third in December 1674. Mr. Bayle ſhould not have been ignorant of this, yet he ſays (Rem. D), that the Author of the Perpetuité owns, it were to be wiſhed, that ſome able perſon would confute the Book of Aubertin. Mr. Nicolle, who made that wiſh in the Preface to his firſt volume, accompliſhed it himſelf in the two following. Beſides, Mr. Bayle ought to have known that Aubertin's French work had been entirely confuted as early as the year 1646, by a new convert, whoſe name was Theophilus Brochet de la Milletiere. Mr. Bayle had ſeen Aubertin's Latin work, and even quotes ſome paſſages out of the Preface; but it appears that he never dipped into the book itſelf; for if he had, he would have ſeen in almoſt every page the name of la Milletiere, as of a man who had confuted Aubertin, and to whom the latter endeavours to reply. See the article MILLETIERE (2). CRIT. REM.]

(2) Crit. Rem. at the end of the Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

[D] A conteſt between the Divines of Port-Royal and Mr. Claude made known the name of Aubertin and the character of his work.] The Author of the Perpetuity of the Faith choſe to confute no part of this Miniſter's large work but the Hiſtory of the Innovation. This furniſhed opportunities enough of bringing upon the ſtage Aubertin's name and work. Here follows a paſſage from the Perpetuité de la Foi. "Aubertin "likewiſe perceiving very well, that he was not "able to maintain ſo plain an abſurdity (9), thought "himſelf obliged to change the plan. And here is "the ſubſtance of what that Miniſter, who unhappily "ſpent his life in ſearching among the writings of "the ancients ſomewhat to obſcure the truth, found "moſt plauſible, in order to render it probable, that "there was ſuch a prodigious alteration in the ancient faith, as he is obliged to admit of, that he might "appear himſelf to be an innovator." Mr. Arnaud has treated him in a manner much leſs favourable, tho' he owns (10), that it were extremely to be wiſhed, that ſome learned man would undertake to confute the writings of the new Miniſters, and among the reſt AUBERTIN'S BOOK and thoſe of Daillé. He aſſerts, "that "Aubertin's Work is a very contemptible one; that "this Miniſter was a man of little genius, who was "only maſter of a low criticiſm without elevation or "judgment; who had read a great deal, becauſe nothing elſe was wanting for that purpoſe but eyes "and leiſure, but that he had read without any taſte "or diſcernment; that he does not at all diſtinguiſh "between good and bad reaſons; who makes a clamour every moment upon the ſlighteſt proofs; who "had corrupted common ſenſe by uſing himſelf to repeat "perpetually the ſame abſurdities; and that he is "ſo far from having gained a conſiderable victory of "the School of Rome, that he has only diſcovered the "weakneſs of the Calviniſts (11)."

(9) The Author means the ſuppoſition of Blondel, that Tranſubſtantiation came into the world a long time after Berengarius.

[E] Mr. Claude had a thouſand opportunities of ſpeaking of the merit of this Book.] Out of regard to thoſe, who would be glad to know the plan of Aubertin's Book without any other pains but that of reading this article, I ſhall tranſcribe the following words of Mr. Claude. "The whole Book of Mr. Aubertin is a "body of the controverſy relating to the Euchariſt, "which is divided in three parts. In the firſt he "treats of that ſubject from the ſcripture and human "reaſon. He produces his own quotations and arguments, and confutes objections; he mentions the "quotations and arguments of thoſe of the Romiſh "Communion, and replies to them; and he anſwers "almoſt all that is conſiderable, which has been urged by the controverſial Writers upon this ſubject. "In the ſecond part, he examines the belief of the "Church for ſix hundred years by an exact diſcuſſion "of all the paſſages on both ſides; and he ſhews, "that Tranſubſtantiation and the real Preſence were "Doctrines unknown during all that time. In the "third he gives the Hiſtory of the Introduction of "theſe doctrines (12)." Mr. Claude had obſerved before in his former Anſwer, that Mr. Aubertin, after having treated with the utmoſt accuracy all the queſtions relating to the Euchariſt from the holy Scripture and reaſoning, and having gained a noble victory over all the ſubtleties of the School of Rome, examines at length all the paſſages of the Fathers, which had till then been produced upon that ſubject on both ſides; ſhewing by this means to all the world the alteration, which the Church of Rome had introduced, which he did by making a perpetual compariſon between the ancient belief and the modern; to which he added the Hiſtory of the origin and progreſs of Tranſubſtantiation and the real Preſence (13).

[F] He was expoſed in his laſt agony to the inſults of the Rector of St. Sulpice.] He came to the door of the ſick perſon with the Bailiff of St. Germain at nine a clock in the evening. The mob to the number of forty people followed him with arms. He that knock'd at the door, counterfeited the voice of the Phyſician, that it might be opened. When this was done, the whole body of them broke violently into the houſe, and cried out, that the ſick man wanted to make his abjuration to the Rector, but that he was hindered; and therefore they were come to deliver his conſcience from that yoke. The eldeſt ſon of the Miniſter, who lay at the point of death, defended the ſtairs as well as he could; but at laſt, to prevent the mob from breaking the chamber-doors, it was agreed, that the Rector and Bailiff ſhould go alone into the ſick man's chamber. The cries and noiſe of the people, which attended them, awakened Mr. Aubertin a little out of his lethargic ſlumber, ſo that that he declared very diſtinctly, that he ſtill perſevered in the Reformed Religion [γ]. The Rector and Bailiff departed, and took a great deal of pains to perſuade the mob to retire. But they returned ſoon after, and cried out, that the Rector had been obliged by force to go away, and they would have broke into and plundered the whole houſe, if two men had not entreated them to deſiſt. *Viciniam non latuit extrema hæc calamitas, quæ pii viri ſpirans adhuc ſpolium cujuſvis illudere parati injuriæ exponebat. (γ) His perſeverance in the Proteſtant Religion.] It has been reported, that Aubertin, at the time of his death, was extremely irreſolute and diſturbed in his mind; and the violence of his ſon, and the cries and clamours of his wife, and of the other Proteſtants who attended him, were the only reaſons that prevented his converſion. The ſame fact is alſo to be found in Mr. le Maire's Book (3) againſt Mr. Claude. "Aubertin, ſays le Maire (4), lying at the point of death, "aſked for a Prieſt. Mr. Aulier (5) went to viſit him; "but the Proteſtants, fearing the conſequence of ſuch "an interview, barred the doors. Yet they were afterwards opened, and Mr. Olier being gone in, was "ſeized by Aubertin's ſon; .... but getting rid of "him he paſſed, not without danger of his life, to "the Miniſter's bed, which was ſurrounded by a great "many Proteſtants. The Prieſt no ſooner began to "ſpeak, but the Miniſter's wife clapt her arms about "her dying huſband's neck, crying with tears in her "eyes, What will you do? Will you ruin us all? "Will you ruin your wife and children? So that the "Miniſter, wavering between oppoſite paſſions, cried "out ſeveral times with a terrible voice, I wiſh I "were dead: oh! that I were dead! and expired "with theſe ambiguous words in his mouth, which "expreſſed the perplexity and irreſolution of his mind." Mr. le Maire was at Paris, and already a Prieſt and an Author, when Aubertin died in 1652. So that whatever the Proteſtants might alledge againſt Mr. le Maire's teſtimony, the Catholicks may alledge the ſame againſt David Blondel (6). Here follows another fact, which, I preſume, Mr. Bayle did not know, and which renders the former very credible; I take it from Mr. Arnauld's Apology for the Catholicks, printed in 1682. That Author having ſaid, that the bare reading of the Fathers is enough to convince any one, that they admitted the worſhip of the Saints, and the veneration of their Relicks, adds (7), "Therefore "I have not been much ſurprized at what Mr. "Ouvrard .... told me formerly of Mr. Aubertin, "who was, without doubt, one of the moſt learned Miniſters of this age. But on occaſion of "theſe diſputes I deſired, that Mr. Ouvrard would "confirm in writing, what he told me by word of "mouth; and I ought, I think, to give here the anſwer he made me January the 22d, of this year "1682; I remember, ſaid he, the diſcourſe I had with "Mr. Aubertin concerning the worſhip of the Saints, "and the veneration of their Relicks as well as if it "had paſſed but two days ago. It was on occaſion "of the authority of the Fathers, whom he told me he "had read twice, but only curſorily, thoſe paſſages, "which were not to his purpoſe. I aſked him, whether he had ſome faith in them, or only read them to "confute them. His anſwer was, that he was of their "opinion; and paſſing to the worſhip of the Saints and the "veneration of their Relicks, he told me theſe very words: "That there was no truth better eſtabliſhed in all antiquity, and that he never preached nor wrote againſt "that truth. This he repeated ſeveral times in preſence of Mr. Corneillau, ancient Counſellor to the Chaſtelet; who can bear witneſs of it. People may "think what they pleaſe of this converſation, adds "Mr. Arnauld; we don't expect that the Miniſters "will own it to be true; but we doubt very much, "whether men of honour will be able to perſuade "themſelves, it is only a piece of forgery. An account ſet out with ſo many circumſtances by a conſcientious man, who cannot be ſuppoſed to have had "any reaſon to tell a lye, does ſeldom fail of being "credited. It makes upon our minds ſuch an impreſſion "as is natural, and can hardly be prevented." It is ſcarce poſſible, that a man, who like Aubertin, thought that a doctrine, which his Church ſtiled a damnable error, that came from Satan's ſhop (8), was nevertheleſs true and apoſtolick, ſhould not have now and then ſome doubts and ſcruples againſt his Religion, and eſpecially at the approach of death, at which time men are moſt apt to be perplexed with ſuch kind of ſcruples (9).

AUDEBERT

AUDEBERT (GERMAIN) Preſident in the Election or Court of Aſſeſſors at Orleans, was a perſon of great merit, and an excellent Latin Poet in the ſixteenth Century. He was a ſcholar of Alciat at Bologna ſeveral years, and he returned from Italy ſo well pleaſed with the country and the people, whom he had converſed with there, that he employed all his ſkill in Poetry in the Deſcription of Rome, of Venice, and of Naples (a). Theſe three Poems are inſerted in the firſt volume of the Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum. We ſhall ſee below in what manner the Venetians rewarded him for the deſcription of their city. He wrote other Poems, which might have been publiſhed, if his ſon, who was Counſellor in the Parliament of Bretagne, had ſurvived him much longer (b). Scævola Sammarthanus wrote an Elogium upon our Audebert with his uſual eloquence. He has aſcribed to him the moſt eſſential qualities of a good man. Moreri has faithfully given us the ſubſtance of that Elogium. I do not doubt but that he was ignorant of the favourable conſequences, which the Proteſtants have drawn from that chapter of Scævola Sammarthanus, in order to juſtify one of their moſt illuſtrious Miniſters from an horrid accuſation. We cannot ſufficiently lament the malice or the ignorance of mankind, when we conſider that Theodore Beza has been accuſed of an abominable crime upon ſo ſlight a foundation as his Epigram de ſuâ in Candidam & Audebertum benevolentiâ. Mr. Maimbourg revived this accuſation in his Hiſtory of Calviniſm. He has been very ſolidly confuted by an examination of the piece itſelf, without omitting to confirm the apology, by alledging the great merit of Audebert (c). Theodore Beza had before made uſe of that reaſon [A]. Mr. Graverol the Miniſter had a deſign of publiſhing the Epitaphs upon this famous Magiſtrate, in a Latin Diſſertation, which he printed at that time (d); but he received them too late. He has communicated them to me, and this is a very proper opportunity for publiſhing them [B]. We ſhall ſee in them the Hiſtory of our Audebert, ſuch as an Hiſtorical Dictionary ought to furniſh us with.

ſcarce, and was printed at London; that he wrote his own life, of which there is a manuſcript at Paris, written with his own hand; and that it is a curious piece. The Marquis de Tigni, Brother of the Biſhop of Noyon, is the head of the eldeſt branch of the family of d'Aubigné. He is father to the count d'Aubigné, to whom the King gave the Royal Regiment (4).

[A] Without omitting to confirm the Apology by alledging the great merit of Audebert. Theodore Beza had before made uſe of that reaſon.] It is in the ſecond Apology againſt Claude de Sainctes. He tells us, that when he wrote the Epigram, Audebert was Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. The paſſage is in Latin as follows: Qui quum eouſque proveheris, ut meam cum honeſtiſſimo viro, & qui jam tum in Senatu Pariſienſi Advocato, quem vocant, nunc verò in civitate Aurelienſi magnâ cum dignitate verſanti, amicitiam & familiaritatem ſummam ad nefarium & execrandum illud ſcelus transferas, quod à vobis ne nominari quidem ſine horrore poteſt, à vobis autem in veſtris illis gurguſtiolis, ut omnes norunt, pro ludo & joco ducitur, quis te ipſum vir honeſtus non execretur (1)? i. e. "But ſince you "proceed ſo far, as to repreſent my intimate friend- "ſhip and familiarity with a man of great honour, "at that time Advocate in the Parliament, and now "poſſeſſed of an eminent poſt at Orleans, under the "imputation of the moſt ſhocking and execrable crime, "which cannot be named by us without horror, but "is treated of by you in your little cells as a mere "jeſt and ſport, as is notorious to every body, what "perſon of character muſt not deteſt you?"

(1) Beza, Operum, tom. 1. pag. 360.

[B] This is a very proper opportunity for publiſhing them.] That it may not be loſt, I ſhall inſert here word for word what the perſon, whom I have mentioned above, wrote and ſent to me. I deſire you to accept of a faithful copy of the Epitaphs of Germain Audebert and his ſon. If I had received them at the time when they were promiſed me, I ſhould have added them to the little Apology, which I drew up in Latin in defence of Theodore Beza, and which a particular occaſion obliged me to publiſh. So authentic a piece appears to me to be the only method capable of putting an end to the ſhocking calumny, with which the memory of that excellent ſervant of God has hitherto been loaded, whatever evaſion may be made uſe of to elude the force of it; and you will do a ſignal ſervice to the truth by publiſhing this new method of vindicating him.

" Here lies Meſſire Germain Audebert, born in the " city of Orleans, the Prince of the Poets in his time, " who merely on account of his virtue was ennobled " with all his deſcendants by the Moſt Chriſtian King " of France and Poland Henry III, and was made " a Knight. And to compleat his honour, his Maje- " ſty gave him two flower-de-luces of gold to be born " in his arms as an ornament to them. Our holy " Father Pope Gregory XIII, and the Duke and " Seignory of Venice made him likewiſe a Knight, " and the latter ſent him into France by their Embaſ- " ſador the Order of St. Mark. And yet notwith- " ſtanding theſe great honours, he continued ſtill to " act as an aſſeſſor in this juriſdiction for the ſpace " of fifty years, ſo great a reſpect had he for his " country. In conſideration of which his ſaid Ma- " jeſty having created and erected a Preſident and " Lieutenant in every juriſdiction of France, exempt- " ed the ſaid Meſſire Germain Audebert, and appoint- " ed him to preſide over and precede both the one and " the other. He wrote three Books of the city of " Venice, one of Rome, and one of Naples, and two " Books of Miſcellanies. He died in the year 1598 " the 24th of December, aged about eighty years. " And under the ſame marble lies Meſſire Nicholas Au- " debert, Counſellor of the King in his Court of Par- " liament of Bretagne, ſon of the ſaid Meſſire Ger- " main Audebert, a great imitator of his father's vir- " tues, who died five days after his father in the forty " ſecond year of his age. May their ſouls reſt among " the bleſſed."

Theſe three Epitaphs are written in Letters of gold upon a table of black marble fixed to the wall of the gallery in the church-yard belonging to the Church of the holy Croſs at Orleans, on the left hand about ſixty paces in the gallery. They were copied word for word from the original by a perſon, who may be depended upon. Here ends the extract of Mr. Graverol's Letter. We may conclude from what is ſaid concerning Audebert's office in the former of theſe Epitaphs, that Mr. Jurieu is miſtaken in aſſerting that Audebert died after he had paſſed thro' all the moſt conſiderable offices of the long Robe (2). Sammarthanus might have prevented him from falling into this miſtake; for he has expreſly remarked, that Audebert was ſo modeſt, that he contented tented himſelf with a poſt much below his merit. Nec ſibi quicquam, ſays he (3), de ſolitâ modeſtiâ detraxit, contentus eâ, quam apud ſuos jamdudum exercebat, vectigalium indictionumque præfecturâ, humili fortaſſe illâ & obſcurâ, ſi hominis dignitatem reſpicias, ſed quam eo tantum animo ſuſceperat, ne nullam Reipublicæ partem attigiſſe, ſibique ſoli vixiſſe diceretur. i. e. " Nor did he abate the leaſt of his uſual modeſty, " being content with the poſt, which he had held for " a long time of Preſident in the Court of Aſſeſſors of " the Taxes and Subſidies, which was a low and ob- " ſcure one, if we conſider his dignity, but he ac- " cepted of it with this view, that he might not be " ſaid to have avoided having any ſhare in the pub- " lick ſervice, and to have lived only for himſelf."

(3) Sammarthan. in Elogiis.

[C] Konig has divided our Author into two.] He gives us one Germanus Audebertus and one Aurelius Audebertus. He refers us for the former to the 191ſt page of the Elogia of Sammarthanus, and he tells us with regard to the latter, that he wrote three Poems in the year 1603. Scripſit Venetias, Romam, Parthenopen, carmine, A. 1603. i. e. " He wrote three Poems " upon the Cities of Venice, Rome, and Naples in " 1603." This date is a new error, ſince Audebert died in 1598. It is true, theſe three Poems were printed at Hanaw in 1603; but this was not the firſt edition. We may perceive from hence, that it is not ſo eaſy a taſk as it is imagined to compile a Bibliotheca of Authors in a proper manner. Thoſe, who are not ſkilled in the chronology of editions, or in the difference between Chriſtian names and the names of the country, are very liable to be miſtaken, Germanus is Audebert's Chriſtian name; Aurelius is his name from his country. What is wonderful is to ſee, that Mr. Konig refers us to an Author, whom he had not ſeen himſelf; for if he had taken the pains to caſt his eyes upon the paſſage, which he quotes from Sammarthanus, he would have ſeen there, that Germanus Audebert was he, who wrote the three Poems of Venice, Rome, and Naples; Venetias, & Romam, & Parthenopen . . . . ea carminis majeſtate deſcripſit. When a Writer refers his reader to any Book, he ought to ſet him the example, and conſult it firſt himſelf.

[D] Sammarthanus is not the only perſon, who has written an Elogium upon this Gentleman.] An Advocate in the Council, who ſtiles himſelf in Latin Rodolphus Botereius, has extolled Audebert highly in his Hiſtory of France (4). He does not mention the honours, which the Popes and the Republick of Venice conferred upon him; but whereas the Epitaph aſcribes to Pope Gregory XIII the honour, which Audebert received from the Court of Rome, he aſcribes it to Gregory XII. He tells us where the Embaſſador of Venice conferred the honour of the Order of St. Mark upon him, and before what concourſe of people. Gregorius XIV ac Veneti illum civitatis jure & equeſtris ordinis dignitate donârunt; effuſius Veneti, qui per Oratorem ſuum in ſuburbano Tybure Gentiliaco, aſſidente ſpectaculo & convivio longâ coronâ hominum literatiſſimorum, Audebertum torque aureo Divi Marci inſigniverunt. i. e. " Pope Gregory XIV and the Venetians made " him free of their Cities, and honoured him with " the Order of Knighthood. But the Venetians " more magnificently, for their Embaſſador inveſted " him with the golden collar of St. Mark at Gentilli " near Paris before a large aſſembly of men of the great- " eſt eminence in learning, who were likewiſe preſent " at the feaſt."

AUDIGUIER (N. D') (α), Author of ſeveral books [A], which were very much read when they were firſt publiſhed, but are abſolutely neglected now, flouriſhed in the beginning of the reign of Lewis XIII. Sorel having obſerved that the Author of the Po- with

(α) N.] His Chriſtian name was Vital. He was of a noble family; and Lord, or Sieur de la Menor en Rouergue, as he is ſtiled in the Privilege of his Pourtrait du Monde, a moral work, printed at Paris in 1604, in 12mo. We find in his dedication to Queen Margaret, that ſome years before, and while ſhe was in the caſtle of Uſſon, Audiguier had been one of her domeſticks. He was born in Rouergue, and probably at Menor, about the year 1565. His father, who was one of the King's Magiſtrates, was reſolved that his ſon ſhould ſucceed him, and made him perform ſome functions of that Magiſtracy in the year 1590. He enjoyed that poſt when he was aſſaulted and wounded by eleven men February the 26th 1591; and the 8th of April following, the firſt time he went out after he had been wounded, he was again aſſaulted and wounded with his father by the ſame men, who endeavoured to raiſe the Burghers againſt Henry IV, and in favour of the Leaguers (1).

(1) Paris edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

(γ) [A] The Author of ſeveral Books.] He publiſhed at Paris The true and ancient cuſtom of Duels printed in 1617 by Peter Billaine. It is a Book of 532 pages in 8vo, and deſerves a place in Libraries. He publiſh-

ed likewiſe ſome French verſes, the Loves of Lyſander and Calliſta, thoſe of Ariſtander and Cleonice, Flavia, Minerva, &c. Theſe are Romances, which were very well received (1). He tranſlated into French the Novels of Miguel de Cervantes. Sorel's judgment of this Author in a work of his, which was publiſhed a long time after his Berger Extravagant, is as follows: " I do not think, ſays he (2), that we ought abſo- " lutely to deſpiſe the Sieur d'Audiguier, Author of the " Adventures of Lyſander and Calliſta. Tho' he was " not a man of any conſiderable learning, he wrote " in a ſprightly and neat ſtyle for that time, as ap- " pears from ſeveral Romances which he wrote, and " from his Letters and ſome Tranſlations of his. At " firſt when he wrote a Book, intitled, La Philoſophie " Soldade, he had a little of the Gaſconade, but he " improved himſelf ſo much by his tranſlations of the " Novels of Cervantes, and the Book of Chriſtian Per- " fection written by Rodriguez, that he may be con- " ſidered as one of our valuable Tranſlators. His " laſt work, which was the Loves of Ariſtander and " Cleonice, was not the worſt performance of that " time."

(1) Obſerve that Sorel has criticis'd the two former in his Remarks upon the Berger Extravagant, eſpecially in the 13th book of theſe Remarks.

(2) Biblioth. Franç. p. 261.

(γ) The Author of ſeveral Books.] Beſides thoſe mentioned by Mr. Bayle, he wrote the following: Le Pourtrait &c. of which we ſpoke above (4); Epitres Françoiſes & libres Diſcourſe, i. e. " French Epiſtles " and free Diſcourſes" in 12mo, 1608. Another with the the ſame title, but very different, 8vo, 1625. Les diverſes fortunes de Pamphile & de Niſe; i. e. " The various adventures of Pamphilus and Niſa," taken from Lopez de Vega, 8vo, 1614. There is an edition of Amiot's French tranſlation of Heliodorus's Ethiopic Hiſtory, reviſed by d'Audiguier, printed in 1609 with a Privilege dated October the 28th, 1608, and reprinted in 1616 with a Privilege granted in 1613. One may diſcover d'Audiguier's ſtyle and genius in the Dedication, in which he ſubſcribes himſelf only thus, Votre Valet, i. e. " Your Servant." He looks upon that work as beneath him, and I believe that he was already dead, when his name was put to the edition of 1626. There is another French tranſlation of that Hiſtory, with cuts, 8vo, 1622, different from that which d'Audiguier reviſed. Mr. Bayle does not give us the date of d'Audiguier's works, which he mentions, except only of one; we will here ſupply this defect. His Lyſander was firſt printed in 1616, and reprinted in 1620, 1622. His Ariſtander in 1625. His Minerva in 1625. The ſix Nouvelles of Cervantes are in three volumes, 8vo, 1623. To what Mr. Bayle has borrowed from Sorel, we may add, that when the French Academy began in 1638 to draw up a catalogue of the moſt famous books written in French, which might be conſulted on occaſion, and quoted in the Academy's Dictionary, d'Audiguier's works in proſe were put in that Catalogue (5).

lixena might ſome time or other have produced ſome performance of more value, if he had not been as unfortunate as Audiguier, adds, that they were both killed by thoſe whom they took for their friends (b). " I am of opinion, ſays he in another place (c), that Audiguier " had a good genius; but he was rather a ſoldier than a ſcholar, as he obſerves in the " dedications of his books, where he ſpeaks almoſt always of his ſword, or ſomething " to that purpoſe; and it is reported, that in order to ſhew that he wrote negligently, he " ſaid one day out of a Gaſcon bravado, that he made his pen with his ſword. Some " perſons affirm, that he was anſwered, that this then was the reaſon why he wrote ſo ill; " but it was wrong to be ſo ſatyrical. There is no manner of doubt, but that this boaſt " of his has a great deal of elegance, and deſerves a place among the French Apothegms." Audiguier had a nephew who paſſed for the Author of the tranſlation of Stratonice, an Italian Romance; but it was Malleville who made it, and being one of his moſt intimate friends, gave it to him (d). There was one AUDIGUIER, an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, who publiſhed ſome pleadings (e). I cannot tell whether he was the ſame with the nephew of the other Audiguier (β), and Malleville's intimate friend; but I know that he lived in the ſeventeenth Century (g), and I believe that this nephew is the Author who was called Audiguier the Younger, and who publiſhed among other works the Eromene. A paſſage which I ſhall quote below, inclines me to think, that our Audiguier was killed in the year 1630 [B].

[B] A paſſage, which I ſhall quote below, inclines me to think, that our Audiguier was killed in the year 1630.] This paſſage is taken from a Letter of Mr. Balzac dated the 20th of Auguſt 1630. Audiguier is not named there, and there are ſtars put inſtead of the perſon's name, which Balzac had mentioned. But I do not doubt but it was the Author, whoſe article we are writing (δ). I think that his character is not ill repreſented in the following words (3). " And yet it is " better to be innocently merry in the Hotel of Ve- " nice, than to be killed in the Temple Marſhes, " like poor . I lament the fate of him, both as " he is dead and as he was unfortunate, and I am " ſorry, that he had not time to think of the ſalva- " tion of his ſoul, and aſk pardon of God. But as " for imagining, that one of the great lights of France " is extinguiſhed, and that we have loſt a great man, " I knew him too well to have ſo high an opinion of " him. He was really a man of ſpirit, and had cer- " tain ſallies of fancy, which would not have been " diſagreeable, if they had not been printed. But " he does not deſerve a place among the modern Au- " thors, and in a collection of the Poems of the pre- " ſent age. However he did not value himſelf up- " on his courage and all his military virtues, but " piqued himſelf entirely upon the elegance of his " converſation and writings. He was ſo ſtrongly poſ- " ſeſſed with the notion of his merit in that reſpect, " that becauſe I attempted one day to cure him of " that troubleſome diſtemper, he never loved me af- " terwards, and died, I am perſuaded, with this re- " ſentment againſt me."

(δ) But I do not doubt but it was the Author, whoſe article we are writing.] I think that Mr. Bayle is miſtaken, for what Balſac ſays does not agree with Audiguier's character (6), as appears by the following verſes, taken from the Dedication of his Libres Diſcours, i. e. " free Diſcourſes:"

" To ſhake the world, again I'd ſeize my Arms,
" And prove my ſword ſuperior to my pen.

This is directly oppoſite to what Balſac ſays of the Poet he mentions, who reckoned his courage for nothing, and valued himſelf only upon his ſpeaking and writing well. D'Audiguier died unmarried (7).

☞AVENPACE [ABU BECR MOHAMMED EBN BAJAH], commonly known among the Arabian Writers by the ſurname of Ebn al Sâyegh, the moſt ſubtil of the Mohammedan Philoſophers, was born in Spain; and his anceſtors, it is ſaid, were Jews (a). He was poiſoned at Fez, in the year of the Hejira 533 (b), A. C. 1137, or, according to others, 525 (c), A. C. 1129, and dying young, his Works are therefore very imperfect [A]. Avenpace ſpent a great deal of his time in ſtudying and commenting on Ariſtotle, and wrote ſeveral things, which having been tranſlated into Latin, were well known to St. Thomas Aquinas, and the old Schoolmen (d). He has been highly commended by moſt Writers for his acuteneſs and judgment [B], and cenſured by ſome as guilty of unſound notions

[A] Avenpace dying young, his works are therefore very imperfect.] This is the judgment of Abu Becr Ebn Tofail. " Avenpace, ſays he, was too much ta- " ken up with worldly buſineſs, and died before he " had time to open the treaſury of his knowledge, " ſo that moſt of thoſe pieces of his which are extant, " are imperfect; particularly his book about the Soul, " and his Tadbîr almotawahked, i. e. ' How a man " ought to manage himſelf that leads a ſolitary life." " So are his Logics and Phyſics. Thoſe pieces of his " which are compleat, are only ſhort tracts and ſome " occaſional letters. Nay, in his Epiſtle concerning " the Union [with God], he himſelf confeſſes that he " had wrote nothing compleat, where he ſays, That it " would require a great deal of trouble and pains to expreſs " that clearly which he had undertaken to prove; and, " that the method which he had made uſe of in explain- " ing himſelf, was not in many places ſo exact as it " might have been; and, that he deſigned, if he had " time, to alter it (1).

notions in religion, and even of infidelity [C]; his ſuperior merit having raiſed him a great many enemies, who gratified their envy by aſperſing him (e). At their inſtigation he was impriſoned by the father of Averroes, then Kadi of Corduba, (who little thought, ſays one (f), that his own ſon would prove much worſe) but was releaſed at the interceſſion of a great many perſons of dignity (g). It may be obſerved, by the way, that Averroes was one of his ſcholars (b). Avenpace was not only a great Philoſopher, but was alſo well ſkilled in Phyſic, the Mathematics, and Poetry (i). Thoſe who make him to have been Wazîr or prime Miniſter to Ziyâdat Allah, the laſt Prince of the race of Aglab, commit an anachroniſm of two hundred years (k). AVENTINE (JOHN) famous for his Annals of Bavaria, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century [A]. He was born of mean parentage, and ſon of an inn-keeper at Abenſperg in Bavaria [B]. He ſtudied at firſt at Ingolſtad, and afterwards in the Univerſity of Paris under James Faber Stapulenſis and Joſſe Clictou. Upon his return to Germany in 1503 he ſtaid ſome time at Vienna, where he taught in his chamber Eloquence and Poetry. He went to Poland in the year 1507, and taught publickly the Greek Grammar at Cracow. He returned to Germany, and ſpent ſome time at Ratiſbon, from whence he removed to Ingolſtad in 1509, and explained there ſome books of Cicero. As he paſſed for a man of great learning, he was ſent to Munich in 1512 to be Preceptor to Prince Lewis and Prince Erneſt (a). He travelled with the latter of theſe two Princes (b). After this he undertook to compile the Annals of Bavaria [C], and was encouraged in his deſign by the hopes which the Dukes of that name gave him, that they would bear the charges of it. He neglected nothing in order to anſwer the expectation of his maſters. He conſulted with the utmoſt care the Records of Germany, and he applied himſelf entirely to this work. He did not loſe his pains, for he has gained a great reputation by it. He received an affront in the year 1529, which gave him an uneaſineſs, that

[A] He flouriſhed in the XVIth Century.] He was born in 1466, and died in 1534; from whence Voſſius concludes with a great deal of reaſon, that Genebrard is miſtaken in affirming, that this Hiſtorian flouriſhed in the year 1366 (1). Father Gaultier has followed Genebrard in this miſtake. In the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca Aventine's death is erroneouſly placed in the year 1529.

[B] He was ſon of an Inn-keeper at Abenſperg in Bavaria.] Jerom Zieglerus tells us, that his father's name was John Thurmair, and that it was upon this account that Leonard d'Eckh in an epigram gave the name of Thurniomarus (2) to John Aventine. He adds, that the Author of the Annals of Bavaria called himſelf Aventinus, becauſe the ancient name of Abenſperg was Aventinium. The Emperor Antoninus, continues he, calls it Abuſina in his Itinerary. Mr. Bullart did not underſtand this. The city of Abenſperg, ſays he (4), is ſufficiently celebrated in the Roman Hiſtory, eſpecially by the Emperor Antoninus, who in his Itinerary calls it Aventinum. This Author would be extremely perplexed, if he were required to prove, that this city is very famous in the Roman Hiſtory. The learned Lambecius is of opinion, that we cannot find, that it bore any other name than that of Abuſina, which is given it in Antoninus's Itinerary, upon which account he cenſures the Author of the Annals for not calling himſelf Abuſinenſis. Patria ejus fuit Abuſina; unde falſo, cum ſe nominare debuiſſet Abuſinenſem, cognomine uſus eſt Aventini (5). But would that name have been agreeable as that of one of the hills of Rome?

(2) It does not ſeem that one of theſe names was derived from the other. There is perhaps in one or other of them an error of the preſs.

[C] He undertook to compile the Annals of Bavaria.] He had a penſion ſettled upon him for that purpoſe. He began it a little before the death of the Emperor Maximilian. The work conſiſts of ſeven Books, and is continued down to the year 1533. Voſſius remarks all theſe particulars. Annales Bojorum Libris VII reliquit . . . . Terminatur ejus hiſtoria anno CIↃ IↃ XXXIII. Extremis Maximiliani temporibus jam cæperat Hiſtoriam ſuam ſcribere auſpiciis & liberalitate fruens Guilielmi & Ludovici Bavariæ Ducum, qui patri ſuo Alberto ſucceſſerunt anno 1508 (6). i. e. "He left the "Annals of Bavaria in ſeven Books. . . . His Hiſtory "ends in the year 1533. He began to write it in "the latter end of the reign of the Emperor Maximilian, being ſupported by the patronage and generoſity of William and Lewis Dukes of Bavaria, "who ſucceeded their father Albert in the year 1508." Theſe Annals were not publiſhed till the year 1554; which was done by Jerom Zieglerus, Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Ingolſtad; but, as he acknowledges himſelf, he retrench'd the invectives againſt the Eccleſiaſtics, and ſeveral ſtories, which had no relation to the Hiſtory of Bavaria. Multa ſine dubio emendaſſet (Aventinus), pleraque forſitan mutâſſet etiam, ſi per fata licuiſſet. . . . Invectivas quaſdam contra eccleſiaſticas perſonas, item fabuloſas narrationes nihil quidquam ad Hiſtoriam facientes non fraude ſed judicio omiſimus (7). i. e. "Aventine would undoubtedly have corrected a great "many things, and perhaps the greateſt part of his "work, if he had not been prevented by death. . . . . "I have omitted with no ill deſign, but upon mature "deliberation, ſome invectives againſt the Eccleſiaſtics, and ſeveral fabulous ſtories, which had no "connection with the Hiſtory." Zieglerus's precaution, and his frankneſs in confeſſing the mutilations which he made in this work, were two things not very conſiſtent with each other; for this acknowledgment of his excited the curioſity of the Proteſtants, and induced them to endeavour to recover what had been ſuppreſſed; and they were ſo aſſiduous in ſearching for a manuſcript of theſe Annals, which had not been caſtrated, that they found one. It was publiſhed at Baſil in 1580 by Nicholas Ciſner. The title of this edition is as follows: Joannis Aventini Annalium Bojorum Libri VII, ex authenticis manuſcriptis codicibus recogniti reſtituti, aucti, diligentiâ Nicolai Ciſneri. i. e. that troubled him all the reſt of his life after. He was taken by force out of his ſiſter's houſe at Abenſperg, and put into priſon. The true reaſon of this violence offered to him was never known; but it would have been carried to a much greater length if the Duke of Bavaria had not taken this learned man into his protection. The incurable melancholy which attended Aventine from that time was ſo far from engaging him in a reſolution to continue unmarried, as he had done till he was ſixty four years of age, that it induced him perhaps to think of marrying. This new inclination was not ſo ſtrong, but that it left him the liberty of conſulting the holy Scriptures and his friends how he ſhould act. The advice given him was full of uncertainty [D], for which reaſon he was obliged to reſolve this problem himſelf, and he determined upon marriage [E]. The only point now remaining was to ſeek out for a wife, and he was imprudent enough to apply to a crafty old woman, who deceived him ſcandalouſly [F]; for ſhe brought to him a woman of the country of Suabia, who had three great defects; ſhe was poor, ugly, and ill-tempered, and gave him an opportunity of making a great many experiments [G]. He hired an houſe at Ratiſbon after his marriage, from whence he was ſent for to Ingolſtad in 1533 to be Tutor to the ſon of a Counſellor of the Duke of Bavaria (c).

" cholas Ciſner." Coeffeteau could not refrain from expreſſing his reſentments againſt Ciſner's Edition. He ſpeaks as follows: Aventine is an Author, who deſerves no credit in theſe affairs relating to the Church, ſince he had no other view in his Annals than to diſgrace the Clergy; and he is particularly to be rejected with regard to the Hiſtory of Gregory VII. . . . The intemperance of his pen in theſe points was the reaſon, that Zieglerus in the firſt edition retrenched a great many ſpurious accounts and a great many reflections upon the Clergy; but the Proteſtants, who turn their ears away from the truth, in order to give themſelves up to fables, could not bear his correction, and have publiſhed his Annals with all their filth (8).

(8) Coeffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité du Sieur du Pleſſis, pag. 673.

[D] The advice given him was full of uncertainty.] Here is what Mr. Bullart relates concerning the Anſwers, which he had from Books. " Socrates left him " in doubt, becauſe of the diſcourſe which he had an- " ciently with a young man, who was in the ſame " ſuſpence. Whether you marry or not, you will cer- " tainly repent. He would have had no occaſion for " any other counſel, if he had regarded that of Dio- " genes, who told the young men, that it was not " time for them to marry, and the old, that it was " too late. Euripides flattered his inclination, by " obſerving that a wife is a comfort to her huſband in " his ſickneſs and adverſity. But he perplexed him " by a great many other ſentences, which he pro- " nounced againſt that ſex (9)." This is a mere romance, and nothing but affecting an opportunity of introducing a common place; for the life of Aventinus ſhews expreſly, that he only examined with two of his friends ſeveral paſſages of Scripture. Sæpius multos locos ex ſacris literis ſuadentes & diſſuadentes matrimonium protulit.

(9) Bullart, Academié des Sciences, pag. 148.

[E] He determined upon marriage.] Let us continue to hear the ſame Mr. Bullart. " Aventine wea- " ry of conſulting the dead and the living, and hop- " ing to meet with a wife agreeable to his wiſhes, " cried out at once, I am an old man; I have need of " a companion to aſſiſt me, and to ſerve me in the de- " cline of life." Zieglerus expreſſes himſelf as follows: Senectutem ſuam omnino conſiderans, tandem prorumpens in hæc verba dixit; " Senex ſum, mihi miniſtrari opus " eſt." i. e. " Reflecting upon his old age, he broke " out into theſe words; I am an old man; and have " occaſion for ſome perſon to aſſiſt me." His concluſion was agreeable to the rules of Logic, Concluſio ſequitur debiliorem partem; i. e. " The concluſion fol- " lows the weaker part." On the one hand his books and friends adviſed him to deliberate upon it all his life; and on the other his infirmities adviſed him to marry. By this concluſion he determined upon the weaker part. But it will be ſaid, had he not two children within a few years; and this even tho' the ugline's and noiſe of his devil of a wife were by no means proper incentives for that purpoſe? He was in the wrong therefore to ſay, that he wanted a wife becauſe of the infirmities of old age, ſince he had occaſion for one on account of the remains of youth, which he was ſtill ſenſible of.

[F] Who deceived him ſcandalouſly.] The writer of his Life does him a great injury in this point; for he expreſſes himſelf as follows: Duxit Suevam, moroſam mulierem, illepidam, & omnino pauperem, deceptus ab anu quadam, quæ ei illam ut famulam ſaltem adduxerat. i. e. " He married a woman of Suabia, " who was ill-temper'd, ugly, and extremely poor, " being deceived by an old woman, who brought " her to him as a ſervant." The old woman did not bring him this Suabian for a wife, but merely as a ſervant. In what manner then did ſhe impoſe upon him? Zieglerus ought to have told us this; for if we underſtand his expreſſions in the proper ſenſe of them, we can eaſily acquit the old woman of any imputation, and throw the whole blame upon the old man. It will be imagined, that having taken a reſolution to marry, and having loſt too much time already conſidering his age, he took the firſt woman whom he met with, and that happened to be his own maid. And thus we have another inſtance very proper to be added to the liſt of the Colletes and a great many others, who married their maids (10).

(10) See the Menagiana, p. 252. and the note [E] of the article BRISEIS.

[G] Gave him an opportunity of making a great many experiments.] " Having broken thro' all obſtacles, and " determined all his deliberations by his marriage, he " had nothing to do but to reflect upon the alteration " of his manner of life, and to conſider whether it " was better to maintain a poor wife, than to bear " the haughtineſs of a rich one; to have ſuch an one, " as no body would have any inclination for, than to " be at the pains of guarding a beautiful one. As " his wife was every whit as bad as Socrates's Xan- " tippe, the example of that great Philoſopher might " likewiſe ſerve for ſome conſolation to him (11)." To ſpeak the truth, our learned German was extremely unhappy; he imagined that he ſhould enter into a ſafe port, and ſecure himſelf from a thouſand inconveniences; and he expoſed himſelf to a continual ſtorm, even tho' his wife had been handſome and rich; whereas ſhe had no other portion but uglineſs and ill temper. Aventinus vir doctus, magni judicii integritatiſque, ſed fortuna admodum tenui, quam corrupit ulterius ductâ uxore rixosâ & malorum morum, ut cum duobus malis; paupertate & uxore malâ ipſi fuerit conflictandum (12). i. e. " Aventinus was a man " of learning, great judgment and probity, but of " a ſlender fortune, which he injured ſtill more by " marrying a wife, who was of a peeviſh temper; ſo " that he was obliged to contend with two misfor- " tunes, poverty and a bad wife."

We ſhall do him juſtice perhaps by ſuppoſing, that he did not marry this woman without having reaſoned with himſelf profoundly upon the inconveniences of it. She could not impoſe upon him with regard to her uglineſs; ſince he had the uſe of his eyes. She was brought to him only as a ſervant; and therefore he could have no expectations of finding her rich. Here are two defects, which he was very ſenſible of; one of them was, that ſhe was ugly, and the other that ſhe was poor. But this knowledge of his cannot oblige us to conclude, that he acted imprudently; for ſhe might have promiſed him an exemption from a thouſand inſupportable inconveniences. As he was a perſon of extenſive reading, he knew the maxims of the ancients with regard to beauty's being incompatible with chaſtity (13), and the haughtineſs which attends fine women (14), and which entirely poſſeſſes thoſe who bring good fortunes (15). Theſe maxims are learned at the college, and we meet with a thouſand occaſions to varia (c). He reſolved to remove his wife thither, for which purpoſe he took a journey to Ratiſbon during the Chriſtmas Holidays; but he came thither very ill of a diſtemper, of which he died the 9th of January 1534, being ſixty eight years of age. He left but one daughter, who was then but two months old (d). He was interred in the Church of St. Hemeran at Ratiſbon, where his epitaph tells us, that he was a good Catholic (e). However it appeared from the inquiries which the Jeſuits have made, that he was a Lutheran in diſguiſe [H]. This is the argument, which the adherents to the church of Rome to apply them. Hence they are imprinted deeply upon the memory, and this makes us more fearful of experiencing the truth of them, if we expoſe ourſelves to the hazard. We may therefore conclude with a great deal of probability, that Aventine conſidered, that by marrying an handſome young woman, he ſhould expoſe his fore-head to a ſhameful and ſhocking diſhonour. He knew undoubtedly that beauty does not exclude a very ſincere deſire of being chaſte; but on the other hand, he imagined that it renders the execution of that deſire very difficult. The courtſhip, which is almoſt inevitable in that caſe, has a wonderful power in overcoming his good reſolutions. When he conſidered his age, he muſt be ſtill more alarmed. His being in the ſixty fourth year of his age was a new reaſon for ſuch apprehenſions; and he ſaid perhaps to himſelf, If theſe things are done to the green tree, what ſhall be done to the dry? A young huſband is not ſecure from this misfortune; how then ſhall I eſcape, who am old? How natural ſoever it is to fear the real evils, which attend the ſtate of an old huſband, who has a young handſome wife; yet there is much leſs difficulty to avoid them than thoſe, which are imaginary. I mean, that ſuch an huſband has more reaſon to fear the torments of his jealouſy, than the treachery of his wife. It happens much oftner, that ſhe is faithful to him, without his being perſuaded of it, than that ſhe proves falſe to him, without giving him the leaſt pain. It is probable therefore, that Aventine was more diſtruſtful of himſelf, than of an handſome wife, and that he reaſoned in this manner: I allow, that ſhe may be really chaſte; but I am well aſſured, that I ſhall not be weak enough to be jealous, when I perceive that ſhe appears agreeable to my friends and neighbours, and that they endeavour to pleaſe her (16)? Tho' my jealouſy be ever ſo ill grounded, yet it will ſtill be a torment equally uneaſy and painful to me. The ſafeſt way is not to expoſe myſelf to it, but to marry my maid, whoſe uglineſs will ſecure me from this apprehenſion; for caſta eſt quam nemo rogavit, i. e. "ſhe "is chaſte, whom no body has ever ſollicited." Where can ſhe find any one to ſollicit her, tho' ſhe ſhould form a thouſand ill deſigns? And as on the other hand ſhe is poor, I ſhall have no ground to be fearful, that ſhe ſhould prove imperious to me. She will be a mere ſubmiſſive creature, who will not venture to clamour or contradict me. Do not I know well enough what the old Poets ſay (17)? If we ſuppoſe, that he reaſoned in this manner, we ſhall find that he was rather unfortunate than imprudent; for in ſhort the reaſons, which would have determined his choice, are ſpecious and plauſible. But we muſt ſuppoſe likewiſe, that the third fault was not known to him; and that his maid had addreſs enough to conceal her peeviſh, grumbling, moroſe, and ſcolding humour. She took care not to diſcover it; ſhe ſoon found out, that her maſter was reſolved to marry at all adventures; and without doubt it was not long before he gave her ſome intimations, that he would ſeek a wife out of his own houſe. As we ought not to judge of things by the event, we ſhould be cautious of charging him with imprudence upon pretence that his marriage proved unfortunate. The wiſeſt men are caught in it. Cato was deceived by his own maxims in a point of the ſame nature (18). In ſhort, in order to ſay that Aventine was imprudent, we ought to know two things; one is, that he did not ballance the reaſons above mentioned with thoſe on the contrary ſide; the other is, that if he had married a young, rich, and beautiful Lady, he would not have been involved in as many anxieties as he ſuffered by marrying his maid. Here are two ſprings of raſh judgments; we condemn perſons without knowing either the ſecret motives, which they had well conſider'd, and examined, and were determined by, or what would have been their caſe, if they had acted in any other manner.

[H] It appeared from the inquiries, which the Jeſuits have made, that he was a Lutheran in diſguiſe.] I ſay in diſguiſe; for ſince he was buried in a church belonging to the Catholicks with the uſual ceremonies, and ſince in his Epitaph there were theſe words Veræ Religionis amator, i. e. "a Lover of the true Religi-"on," we muſt conclude, that he did not declare himſelf publickly of the Proteſtant party, not even in the article of death, in that deciſive moment, when there is no longer any ground for diſſimulation. It is certain likewiſe, that the ſtyle of his Hiſtory is entirely agreeable to the character of a Roman Catholick, if we except thoſe paſſages, in which he ſpeaks ſo freely againſt the tyranny of the Popes, and againſt the vices of the Clergy (19). We ought not therefore to be ſurprized, that Mr. Du Pleſſis oppoſes him to the Roman Catholicks, as a witneſs who was of their own Religion. Mr. Du Pleſſis did not know any thing of the Anecdotes, which Father Gretſer had publiſhed. Here follows a paſſage from him: Addit Pleſſæus invectivæ Aventinianæ hanc clauſulam, Hæc quidem licet profeſſione Romanus, plura forte, ſi licuiſſet dicturus. Profeſſione Romanus, hoc eſt, Catholicus non fuit Aventinus, ſed hæreticus, cujus criminis ut alia probamenta deeſſent, id tamen ſatis ſuperque liqueret ex Epiſtolâ Melanchthonis ad Aventinum, quam ex ipſo Autographo recitavi lib. 2. contra Calvinianum Replicatorem cap. 19. (20). i. e. "Du Pleſſis adds to "the invective quoted from Aventine this Clauſe, He "ſays thus, tho' he was a Roman by profeſſion, and "would perhaps have ſaid more, if he had been at "liberty. Aventine was not a Roman, that is a Ca-"tholick, by profeſſion, but an heretick; of which "crime tho' other proofs were wanting, yet it is ſuf-"ficiently evident from the Letter of Melanchthon to "Aventine, which I have quoted from the original "itſelf in the ſecond Book, Chap. 19. againſt the "Calviniſtic Author of the Reply." Coeffeteau did not know this particular; however he aſſerted very confidently, that Aventine was an heretic: As for Du Pleſſis's repreſenting Aventine of the Romiſh profeſſion, ſays he (21), we ſhall never agree to that... His language diſcovers him, and we ſee every where in his Annals how violently his paſſion tranſported him againſt the holy See. Upon which account, in order to cut the matter ſhort, all that is objected to us from him ſignifies not the leaſt trifle imaginable, and we do not think, that he deſerves any anſwer any more than the impoſtor Benno, upon whoſe Memoirs he wrote the Life of that Pope (22). Aventine has been treated as a Lutheran Author in the Index of prohibited Books. However Fromond did not conſider him as an heretic, but only as ſuch a perſon as Eraſmus was, in ſpeaking too freely againſt the Vices of the Monks. Liberrimæ enim linguæ (hereticæ dicere non auſim, neque puto) & plane Eraſmicæ in Monachorum & Eccleſiaſticorum vitia fuit Aventinus. Plus etiam nimio faciens ſchiſmaticis, & parum integra fide res Romanorum Pontificum prodidiſſe perhibetur, ideoque meruit in claſſe Auctorum caute legendorum ab Indice Expurgatorio recenſeri (23). i. e. "Aventine took a great deal of "liberty, even as great as Eraſmus himſelf, in de-"claiming againſt the Vices of the Monks and the "Clergy; tho' I will not venture to ſay, that he was "an heretick, nor do I think ſo. He is likewiſe ſaid "to have been too great a favourer of Schiſmatics, "and to have given an unfaithful account of the ac-"tions of the Popes, for which reaſon he deſerved a "place in the Index Expurgatorius among the Au-"thors who are to be read with caution." Perſons of the moſt prodigious memory do not often know what is very common. I ſhall give an inſtance of this. Conringius had forgot, that thoſe who publiſhed at Ingolſtad the Annals of Aventine, retrenched what did not appear to them to be agreeable to the character of a good Catholick (24). Libri ejus, ſays he (25),

[I] The greateſt part of the other writings of the Author have never been printed.] Voſſius obſerves, that Aventine tells his readers in page 236 of his Annals, (that is in p. 344 of the edition of 1580.) that he had publiſhed the Hiſtory of Oetingen, a city in Suabia; publicatæ à ſe Hiſtoriæ Utinenſium meminit (27). Geſner does not mention this Hiſtory. He ſpeaks only of a Grammar publiſhed by Aventine in 1519, and of a Book concerning the manner of counting on the fingers, publiſhed at Ratiſbon in 1532, to which the Author had added the Summary of a great work, which wanted nothing but the aſſiſtance of a Mecænas in order to be publiſhed. The title of the Book printed in 1532 is as follows: Numerandi per digitos manuſque (quinetiam loquendi) veterum conſuetudines Abacus ſive Explicatio ex Beda cum picturis & imaginibus, unà cum capitibus rerum, quibus illuſtrabitur Germania ab Aventino, modo contingat benignus Mecænas. Geſner gives us the ſubſtance of this great work of Aventine. We find by it, that this Author had formed an excellent and very extenſive plan for explaining the Antiquities of Germany. Even the general view of the ſubjects, which it was to treat of, is ſufficient to aſtoniſh one. See the Letter which he wrote to Vadianus in the year 1530 (28). He deſigned to publiſh very ſoon a Chronicle like that of Euſebius, an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, from the beginning of the world to his own time, ſome ancient Grammarians, a Greek and Latin Dictionary, Notes upon Claudian (29) &c. It is not known what became of theſe works. That we may form a notion how he was capable of compoſing ſo many Books, we muſt know that he began to ſtudy at day-break, and that he often returned to his ſtudy a little after ſupper till midnight (30). As he broke the ice for thoſe, who have laboured upon the Antiquities of Bavaria (31), we ought not to wonder that there are ſome errors in his Annals (32). He would have found more in their works, if they had preceded him. Lambecius has criticized upon him in a great many points (33).

[K] Moreri has ſucceeded very ill in this article.] I. It was a pardonable miſtake to have ſpoken of Aventine in his firſt edition under the letter I; but to repeat the ſame error, juſtly expoſes him to cenſure. He could not but know, that every body complained of him for placing of the famous men according to their Chriſtian names. Why did not he then remove the cauſe of this complaint in the following editions? II. Aventine was born in the year 1466, and not in 1460. III. As he had once committed this miſtake, he ſhould have told us, that he was ſixty eight years of age, when he died in 1534. He ſhould have committed one error more by making him ſeventy four years of age; and by not adding this ſecond miſtake to the former, he has been guilty of an egregious blunder. He pretends, that from the year 1460 to 1534 there were but ſixty eight years. IV. It is not true, that Nicholas Geſner publiſhed the Annals of Aventine. He ſhould have ſaid Nicholas Ciſner (34). It would be a very improper manner of ſpeaking, that Nicholas Ciſner publiſhed theſe Annals with Additions; for it is plain that this would intimate, that he muſt have added ſomething of his own to them; which is contrary to the truth. What he did was only this, that he publiſhed theſe Annals from a manuſcript of Aventine, which had not been caſtrated; ſo that his edition is more compleat than that of Zieglerus, becauſe it contains all the paſſages which Zieglerus had ſuppreſſed. Voſſius's words, which occaſioned Moreri to miſtake, would not have miſled a perſon of any attention; for they intimate plainly enough, that Ciſner only reſtored to Aventine what had been retrenched in his work. Annales Bojorum libris VII reliquit; quos ex authenticis codd. reſtituit & auxit Nicolaus Ciſnerus (35). Voſſius is a little blameable for not having ſaid any thing concerning the edition, which had been mutilated; for if he mentioned it, what I have juſt quoted would have been more clear. VI. A Prieſt, as Moreri was, acts a very ſtrange part, when he calls the additions of Nicholas Ciſner conſiderable; for theſe additions conſiſt only of reflections againſt the Popes and the Romiſh Clergy. VII. The other pieces, which Aventine left behind him, are not thoſe, which did not appear orthodox to Cardinal Baronius. That Cardinal was diſpleaſed with the Annals of Bavaria. VIII. It is a miſtake to quote Baronius T. IX. Anni A. C. 772 (36); for this inſinuates as if Baronius had employed at leaſt nine volumes upon the year 722 only.

(34) In the Holland edition it is Nicholas Geſner.

[A] He flouriſhed about the end of the 11th or beginning of the 12th Century.] I take this latitude, becauſe I do not much rely on the dates of Leo Africanus, he being frequently miſtaken therein. If he is right here, Avenzoar died at ninety two years of age, in the 564th (1) year of the Hejira (2): but this ſeems not to agree ſo well with what he ſays before, viz. that Avenzoar was Phyſician to Joſeph Ebn Tâſefin, King of Morocco, and had before ſerved other Princes in the ſame capacity; for Joſeph Ebn Tâſefin died in the year 500; and Avenzoar, according to the account above, was then but eight and twenty. Dr. Freind writes that he lived to the age of 135; that he began to practice at forty, or as others ſay at twenty, and had the advantage of a longer experience than almoſt any one ever had; for he enjoyed perfect health to his laſt hour (3).

above practiſing altogether for gain: he therefore took no fees from the poor, or from artificers, though he refuſed not the preſents of Princes and Great Men. His liberality was extended even to his enemies; for which reaſon he uſed to ſay, that they hated him not for any fault of his, but rather out of envy (a). Avenzoar was contemporary with Averroes, who, according to Leo Africanus, heard the Lectures of the former, and learned Phyſic of him (b); this ſeems the more probable becauſe Averroes more than once gives Avenzoar a very high and deſerved encomium, calling him admirable, glorious, the treaſure of all knowledge, and the moſt ſupreme in Phyſic from the time of Galen to his own (c). Avenzoar notwithſtanding is by the generality of Writers reckoned an Empiric, though, as it ſhould ſeem, unjuſtly [B]. I ſhall take notice of his works in the note [C]. Our Phyſician left a ſon, known alſo by the name of Ebn Zohr, who followed his father's profeſſion, and became very eminent therein. This ſon was in great favour with al Manſûr Khalif of Morocco; and is the Author of ſeveral Treatiſes of Phyſic (d). He was one of thoſe who brought an accuſation of hereſy againſt Averroes, as may be ſeen elſewhere (e).

[B] Avenzoar is by the generality of Writers reckoned an Empiric.] Dr. Freind tells us, that he cannot imagine why they pitched upon Avenzoar for this character, which ſuits him leſs than any of the reſt of the Arabians. "He was bred, continues that Author, in a phyſical family, his father and grandfather being both practitioners, whom he always remembers with great gratitude and honour. We have his own teſtimony that he had a regular education, and that he not only learnt what properly belongs to a Phyſician, but, out of a great deſire of knowledge, every thing beſides which relates to Pharmacy or Surgery." Dr. Freind afterwards obſerves, "that he was averſe to Quackery, and rejects the idle ſuperſtitions of Aſtrologers; and throughout all his work profeſſes himſelf ſo much of the dogmatical or rational Sect, which was directly oppoſite to the empirical, that he has a great deal of reaſoning about the cauſes and ſymptoms of diſtempers; and as in his Theory he chiefly, if not only, follows Galen, ſo he quotes him upon all occaſions, oftener than the reſt of the Arabians do. Notwithſtanding he is ſo Galenical, there are ſeveral particulars in him which ſeldom or never occur in other Authors; and there are ſome caſes which he relates from his own experience, which are worth peruſing (4)."

[C] I ſhall take notice of his works in the note.] He wrote a Book intitled, Tayaſſir fi'lmadâwât w'alıadbir, i. e. "The method of preparing medicines and diet," which is much eſteemed, and ſhews him to have been a man of buſineſs and experience (5). This work was tranſlated into Hebrew, in the year of Chriſt 1280, and thence into Latin by Paravicius, whoſe verſion has had ſeveral editions (6). The Author added a Supplement to it, under the title of Jâmé, or a Collection. He alſo wrote a treatiſe Fi'ladwiyat wa'laghdiyat, i. e. AVERROES (a) one of the moſt ſubtle Philoſophers, who ever appeared among the Arabians, was of Corduba (b), and flouriſhed in the twelfth Century [A]. He was extremely attached to Ariſtotle, and he wrote Commentaries upon Works in ſo admirable a manner, that he was ſtiled the Commentator by way of Eminence. It is ſurpriſing that though he did not underſtand Greek, he ſhould be able to penetrate ſo well into the ſenſe of the original. And therefore it is reaſonable to think, that if he had been ſkilled in that Language, he would have been a perfect maſter of the ſentiments of Ariſtotle. Qui Græcè neſcius felicitèr adeo mentem Ariſtotelis, quid non feciſſet, ſi linguam ſciſſet Græcam (c)? This is what ſome learned men have ſaid of him; but others aſſure us, that he has extremely miſunderſtood that Philoſopher [B], not only from the want of genius, but of the

[A] He flouriſhed in the twelfth Century.] I know of no other proof than this, that his two ſons were ſeen by Ægidius Romanus at the Court of Frederic Barbaroſſa (1). Ætatem ex eo colligimus, quod Ægidius Romanus in nono Quodlibeto refert ſe duos ejus filios vidiſſe in aulâ Frederici Barbaroſſæ. Is verò regere cœpit anno CIↃ CLII, ac imperavit annos XXXVII. i. e. "We collect the age in which he lived, from Ægidius Romanus's mentioning in his ninth Quodlibet, that he ſaw his two ſons at the Court of Frederic Barbaroſſa. Now that Emperor began his reign in 1152, and reigned thirty ſeven years." Theſe are Voſſius's words in page 114 of his Book de Philoſophia, C. xiv. See likewiſe Chapt. xvii. of his treatiſe de Philoſophorum Sectis, p. 91. in which he proves by the teſtimony of Conciliator and the ſame Ægidius Romanus, that Averroes flouriſhed in the year 1150. He refers us to the Quodlibets of this Ægidius L. 2. Quæſtione de unitate Intellectus. Reineſius obſerves, that the death of Averroes is placed in the year 595 of the Hegira, which is the 1198th of the Chriſtian Æra (2). I wiſh that Mr. Konig, who refers us to Reineſius, had not placed it in 1225. He ought to have referred us to Hottinger, and corrected him; for that learned Swiſs having aſſerted after John Leo, that Averroes died in the year 603 of the Hegira, makes that year correſpond to the year 1225 of our Æra (3). This is a great miſtake; it correſponds partly with our 1206, and partly with our 1207. Bartolocci's Bibliotheca Rabbinica informs us, that Averroes flouriſhed from the year 1131 to 1216, which was that of his death; that his Commentaries upon Ariſtotle's Phyſics were finiſhed at Seville in 1187; and that his Commentaries upon the Metaphyſics of the ſame Author were written in the year 1192 (4).

the proper knowledge in polite Literature. He was Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Morocco [C], and made a great progreſs in Phyſic, but he underſtood the theory much better than the practice of it [D]. He is thought to have been the author of a notion which is

" leſs in his Explication of Ariſtotle, than explain that " Author. But this he could not have performed, " tho' he had been a maſter of a divine genius; " whereas he was of a very ordinary one. For what " qualifications had he for explaining Ariſtotle in a " proper manner? He had no acquaintance with an- " tiquity, or the ancient doctrines of Philoſophy, " nor any knowledge of the different ſects, which are " every where mentioned in Ariſtotle. Upon which " account we find, that he quotes all the old Philoſo- " phers very erroneouſly, having never read one of " them, as he was ignorant of the Greek and Latin " tongues. He puts Ptholemy for Polus, Pythagoras " for Prothagoras, Democritus for Cratylus, and " quotes Plato's Books by abſurd titles, and ſpeaks " of them in ſuch a manner, that it is evident even " to a blind man, that he never read a letter in them. " He preſumes very confidently to aſſert, that ſuch " or ſuch a thing was ſaid by them, or, what is ſtill " more impudent, not ſaid by them, while he had " ſeen only Alexander, Themiſtius, and Nicholas " Damaſcenus, and even theſe, as appears plainly, " tranſlated into Arabic very corruptly. For he " quotes them ſometimes, and contradicts and diſ- " putes againſt them; ſo that even the Writer him- " ſelf does not underſtand the points in queſtion. But " how does he read Ariſtotle? not in the original, ge- " nuine and entire; not tranſlated into Latin to leſs ad- " vantage; for he could not do this, ſince he knew no- " thing of thoſe languages; but tranſlated to ſtill great " diſadvantage from the Latin into Arabic." He ſhews afterwards by a particular inſtance how much this interpreter of Ariſtotle is miſtaken in his Author (6). See Celius Rhodiginus (7), who tells us in general almoſt the ſame thing. We muſt not truſt Father Rapin, who repreſents him as ſaying this of Avicenna (8). This Jeſuit did not always quote from the original. However we ought not to deſpiſe the following paſſage of his. " As Averroes knew nothing of Ariſto- " tle except from an incorrect tranſlation of him, he " has fallen into ſo many ſhocking miſtakes of his " ſenſe, that Bagolin a Philoſopher of Verona, Zi- " mara, and Mantinus have in vain attempted to " correct him (9)."

[D] He made a great progreſs in Phyſic; but he underſtood the theory much better than the practice of it.] His chief work in Phyſic is that, which is entitled Colliget. He treats in it of the Science in general. The reader will not be diſpleaſed to read the following paſſage from the Preface of it. Ex præcepto nobilis domini Audelach Sempſe, qui pro conſilio ſuorum Philoſophorum Avoſait & Avenchalit injunxit mihi ut conſcriberem opus, quod Arabico ſermone totam medicinæ ſcientiam contineret, ad approbandum judicandumve ſententias veterum, collegi hoc opus Colliget, id eſt, Univerſale, ſic inſcriptum propter ordinem doctrinæ obſervandum, qui paulatim ab univerſalibus ad particularia procedet. In hoc enim libro univerſales regulas inchoavi, & deinceps favente Deo alium librum de iis, quæ particularia ſunt inſtituam, &c. (11). i. e. " At " the deſire of the noble Lord Audelach Sempſe, who " by the advice of his Philoſophers Avoſait and Aven- " chalit enjoined me to write a Book in Arabic, which " ſhould contain the whole Art of Phyſic, in order " to approve and form a judgment of the opinions of " the ancients, I collected this work Colliget, that is, " Univerſal, which is intitled ſo, on account of the " order to be obſerved in teaching, which proceeds " by degrees from univerſals to particulars. For in " this Book I have begun univerſal rules; and here- " after thro' the mercy of God I ſhall undertake an- " other treatiſe upon particulars, &c." To ſhew, that he valued himſelf upon his ſkill in Phyſic, it will be ſufficient for me to obſerve, that he was a rival of the great Avicenna, and ſo zealous an enemy of him, that he avoids mentioning of him in his writings. Avicennæ Medici æmulus & inimiciſſimus fuit, ut eum nominare in ſuis libris vereatur (12). His affectation in that point is very evident. This was probably the reaſon why in refuting a doctrine maintained by Avicenna, he only attacked it as Galen's opinion. I mean the doctrine that the animal ſpirits, which occaſion joy, are bright, and that thoſe, which cauſe melancholy, are black. Mr. Petit did not take notice of this affectation of Averroes. Nunc quibus mentis penetrationibus Averrois hanc Avicennæ opinionem impugnat, videamus; quanquam eo loco directè Avicennam non petit, ſed Galenum, ſpontaneum melancholicorum metum ab humeris, qui in iis abundat, nigritudine repetentem; verum quæ ibi Galeno objicit, pari impetu in memoratum Avicennæ opinionem redeunt (13). i. e. " Let " us now ſee with what Arguments Averroes attacks " this opinion of Avicenna; tho' he does not directly " fall upon Avicenna in that paſſage, but upon Galen, " who aſſerts, that the ſpontaneous fear of melan- " choly perſons proceeds from the blackneſs of the " humours with which they abound. But what he " objects to Galen upon that point, falls with equal " force upon the abovementioned notion of Avicenna." Averroes, either out of deſign or forgetfulneſs, had acted in a very different manner with regard to Avenpace; for he mentions him as the Author of a Remark, which he might have read in Philoponus (14). This may be obſerved by the bye. Now it appears, that he was more ſkilful in the theory than in the practice of Phyſic from his own confeſſion, as Mr. Petit obſerves. Averrois fatetur de ſe ultro in ſeptimo eorum librorum, quos Colliget vulgus appellat, cap. 6. Ego, inquit, non ſtudui ei ſcientiæ (medicinæ,) ut videar mihi in eâ eſſe ſufficiens; & alibi negat ſe in eorum numero eſſe, qui ægris remedia adhibent (15). i. e. " Averroes acknowledges with regard to him- " ſelf in the ſeventh of thoſe Books, which are com- " monly called Colliget, c. 6. I, ſays he, have not ſtu- " died that art (Phyſic) that I might make myſelf perfect " in it; and in another place he declares, that he was " not one of thoſe, who gave medicines to the ſick." This paſſage of Mr. Petit is much more exact than the following words of Voſſius: Aver-roes Cordubenſis cognomento Commentator, Medicus non tam practicus, quàm theoreticus. Fuit Medicus Memarolini Regis (16), i. e. " Aver-roes of Corduba, ſurnamed the Commenta- " tor, was not ſo much a Phyſician in practice as in " theory. He was Phyſician to King Memarolinus." The laſt words weaken rather than confirm the former; for to be Phyſician to a Prince requires a great deal of practice. I ſhall ſay nothing of Memarolini (17), which was not a proper name, but that of a dignity, and conſequently by no means proper to be joined to the word Regis. Mr. Mercklinus did not reflect upon this, when he tells us, that he ſeems to have been Phyſician to King Miramolinus; videtur Medicus Regis Miramolini (18). Symphorian Champier was a very ill guide in this point. He tells us, that Averroes lived tempore Miramolini Regis apud Cordubam (19); i. e. " in the time of King Miramolinus at Corduba." We may obſerve that the Phyſicians of Paris, who are ſtrenuous partiſans for bleeding, will not readily agree, that Averroes was but indifferently ſkilled in the practice of Phyſic; for it is ſaid, that his example contributed very much to remove an error, which they diſapprove of. Read the following words of Stephen Paſquier. " How many Ages have we practiſed Phy- " ſic, imagining, that we ought not to bleed a child " till he comes to be fourteen years old; and that " bleeding before that time was not a remedy, but " certain death? This was an hereſy, in which we " ſhould have continued to this day, if it had not " been

[E] He is thought to have been the Author of a notion, which is very abſurd, and very contrary to the true Chriſtian faith.] It would be much more proper, in my opinion, to ſay that he explained and illuſtrated it, and that having maintained it with more application than had been done before, he in a manner revived it; for the ſame Pomponatius, who aſſures us in the ſecond chapter, that it was a monſter invented by Averroes, Figmentum & monſtrum ab Averroe confictum (21), had ſaid in the third chapter, that Themiſtius and Averroes taught the ſame thing. Averroes itaque & ut exiſtimo ante eum Themiſtius concordes poſuere animam intellectivam realiter diſtingui ab anima corruptibili, verum ipſam eſſe unam numero in omnibus hominibus, mortalem verò multiplicatam (22). i. e. " Averroes therefore, and, as I think, before him " Themiſtius agree in aſſerting, that the rational ſoul " is really diſtinct from the corruptible; but that it " is only one in all mankind; whereas the mortal " ſoul is multiplied." The Jeſuits of Coimbra go ſtill higher than this; for they affirm, that Theophraſtus underſtood the doctrine of Ariſtotle his maſter in this manner. Occurrit alia ſententia exiſtimantium in diſciplinâ Ariſtotelis ponendam eſſe unam duntaxat animam intellectricem, ſive unum intellectum, qui omnibus hominibus aſſiſtat, ut ſolis lumen univerſitati. . . . Sic enim Ariſtotelem interpretati ſunt ejus diſcipulus & ſcholæ ſucceſſor Theophraſtus, Themiſtius, Simplicius, Averroes, aliique non pauci, & ſi non omnes eodem modo de hujuſmodi intellectu locuti fuerint (23). i. e. " We " meet likewiſe with another opinion, which is that " of thoſe perſons, who imagine that according to " Ariſtotle's Philoſophy there is but one rational ſoul, " or one intellect, which ſerves all men, as the ſun " does the univerſe. For in this manner Ariſtotle is " explained by his ſcholar Theophraſtus, who ſuc- " ceeded him in his ſchool, and by Themiſtius, Sim- " plicius, Averroes, and many others, tho' all of " them have not expreſſed themſelves in the ſame " way concerning this intellect." They add that ſe- " veral moderns have acknowledged, that according to Ariſtotle's hypotheſes, the underſtanding of all mankind is but one and the ſame ſubſtance. Hoc quidem argumentum permovit etiam ad prædictam intellectus unitatem in Ariſtotelis doctrinâ aſſerendam non paucos è recentioribus Peripateticis, in quibus ſunt Thom. Anglicus, Achillinus, Odo Jandunus, Mirandulanus, Zimara, Vicomereatus, & quidam alii (24). i. e. " This ar- " gument likewiſe induced not a few of the modern " Peripatetic Philoſophers to aſſert, that the above- " mentioned unity of the intellect is contained in " Ariſtotle's Philoſophy; in which number were Tho- " mas Anglicus, Achillini, Odo Jandunus, Miran- " dulanus, Zimara, Vicomereatus, and ſome others." But that ſome among theſe moderns affirm that this intellect is in all men as an aſſiſtant form, and that others maintain, that it is only an informing form. The latter opinion is that of Mirandulanus (25), and Achillini (26). But here we may take notice of a miſtake like that of Pomponatius. The Jeſuits of Coimbra aſcribe to Averroes in another paſſage the invention of the doctrine of the Unity of the Intellect of all mankind. This will appear more ſurprizing, when we ſhall ſee the words, which precede the paſſage, in which they affirm this. Secunda (ſententia) fuit Avicennæ 9 Metaph. cap. quarto, & in lib. Natur. parte 5. Avempace in epiſtolâ de lumine, & Græci cujuſdam Marini, cujus mentionem facit hoc loco Philopanus, aientium intellectum agentem eſſe ſubſtantiam quandam ſeparatam, quam Avicenna Cholcodæam nuncupebat. Item placuit Averroi in libello de Beatitudine Animæ, cap. 5. & in Epitome Metaph. tractatu 4. qui errori errorem ſubnectens, aliorum veſtigia ſecutus, unum omnium hominum finxit communem intellectum, ut alibi retulimus (27). " The ſecond opinion was that " of Avicenna 9. Metaph. c. IV, & in Lib. Natur. part. 5. of Avempace in his Epiſtle de Lumine, and " of a Greek, whoſe name was Marinus, mentioned " by Philoponus in this place; who all aſſert that the " Intellectus agens, or acting Intellect is a ſeparate ſub- " ſtance which Avicenna calls Cholcodæa. The ſame " notion was approved of by Averroes in his book " de Beatitudine Animæ, c. 5. and in his Epitome Me- " taph. Tractat. 4. who adding one error to another, " and following the footſteps of others, pretended " that there is one common Intellect among all " mankind, as we have obſerved in another place." This ſignifies, that the unity of the underſtanding is a fiction, which Averroes added to the errors of others, and yet it is evident, that this fiction is not at all different from the doctrine, which was juſt before aſcribed to Avicenna, &c. We may recollect, that the human underſtanding, according to the ſentiments of Averroes, is the loweſt of intelligences, and holds the meaneſt place in the univerſe (28). Eſſe mentium infimam omnium & unicam. Nam ſicuti cæleſtes globi ſingulas habere mentes videntur, ita & orbis hic inferior unam, ut ipſe vult, habet, quæ non hujus hominis ſit, vel illius, ſed humanæ ſpeciei mens ſit, & dicatur, ut ſpeciei unicæ unicus ſit intellectus in hoc orbe inferiori, ut plerique intelligunt, ubique totus compingi (29). i. e. " That it is the loweſt of all intelli- " gences, and ſingle. For as the celeſtial ſpheres " ſeem to have each of them particular intelligences, " ſo this lower orb has one, according to his doc- " trine, which does not belong to this or that particu- " lar man; but it is the ſoul of the human ſpecies; " ſo that there may be ſaid to be one intellect to " one ſpecies in this lower orb, as moſt underſtand " it, that the whole is contained every where." However that be, when the Jeſuits confute this pretended unity of the underſtanding in all mankind, they only attack this Philoſopher, ſo firmly were they perſuaded, that he ought at leaſt to be conſidered as the principal defender of that Chimera. They obſerve that Scotus declares, that Averroes deſerved to be exterminated by mankind; and that others aſſert, that his doctrine is ſo ſhocking a monſter, that the Deſarts of Arabia never produced a greater. Hæc Commentatoris ſeu Commentitoris potius de unitate intellectus ſententia adeo ſtulta eſt, ut merito Scotus in 4. d. 43. q. 2. dixerit dignum eſſe Averroem, quo ob has ineptias ex hominum communione averruncetur. Alii verò hoc ejus figmentum monſtrum vocârint, quo nullum majus Arabum ſylvæ genuerint. Certè hoc unum ſat eſſe debuiſſet ad eos coarguendos, qui filium Rois tanti faciunt, & ejus animam Ariſtotelis animam eſſe dicant (30). The laſt part of this paſſage informs us, that among other compliments given to this Arabian, it was ſaid that he had the ſoul of Ariſtotle tranſmigrated into him. The Jeſuits of Coimbra affirm, that in order to confute this, it is ſufficient to fix only upon his notion of the unity of the underſtanding. This reflection is falſe; for this doctrine, as a great many of the moderns acknowledge, is only an improvement and illuſtration of Ariſtotle's principles. I could make ſeveral remarks to prove this; but I ſhall content myſelf with the following one; that according to the hypotheſis of this Philoſopher, the multiplication of individuals can have no other foundation but matter, from whence it follows, that the underſtanding is one, ſince according to Ariſtotle it is ſeparate and diſtinct from matter. Viderunt Ariſtotelem ſimpliciter probare intellectum poſſibilem eſſe immixtum & immaterialem (31). This is the obſervation of Pomponatius. Quod verò unicus ſit intellectus in omnibus hominibus ſive poſſibilis ponatur, patere poteſt ex eo, quoniam apud Peripateticos eſt celebrata propoſitio, multiplicationem individuam in eadem ſpecie non poſſe eſſe, niſi per materiam quantam, ut dicitur 7, & 12. Metaph. & 2. de Anima (32). i. e. " That there is but one intellect in all mankind, " and that it is poſſible to be ſo, appears from this, " that it is a celebrated propoſition among the Stoics, " that the multiplication of individuals in the ſame " ſpecies cannot poſſibly be unleſs by matter and " quantity, as is obſerved in 7 & 12 Metaph. 92. de " Anima." Whatever foundation there may be in Ariſtotle for this opinion of Averroes, it is at the bottom an impious and abſurd one. It is impious, becauſe it leads us to imagine, that the ſoul, which is properly the form of man, dies with the body (33). And it is abſurd, becauſe there can be nothing more ridiculous than to maintain, that two men who kill each

each other, being directed each of them by the ſame intellectual acts, have the ſame ſoul. What can be imagined more chimerical, than that two Philoſophers, one of whom denies, and the other affirms the ſame theſis at the ſame time, are but one with regard to their underſtanding. Let us examine what Pomponatius's antagoniſt anſwers to this extravagant aſſertion.

In the firſt place he confutes it, as it ſuppoſes, that the intellect is not in man, and then as it ſuppoſes, that all men have but one and the ſame intellect. Upon the firſt head he aſks why an intellect, which muſt unite its operations to that of a man, and this in the moſt intimate manner, which can be conceived in that kind, ſhould think itſelf diſhonoured, if it were to unite itſelf to the organs, in order to form one individual with them (34). It is eaſy to comprehend the intimate union, which is ſpoken of here, if we obſerve, that according to the Averroiſts the ſoul of man is not capable of underſtanding without the help of the aſſiſtant intellect. It is neceſſary therefore that this intellect ſhould ſupply by its own action what is wanting to the human ſoul; and conſequently our intellectual acts depend upon two principles, one of which is as the paſſive and imperfect ſubject, and the other an active and perfective principle. It is true therefore, that the concurrence of theſe two principles terminates in the ſame effect; and by this means the action of the intellect, according to the Averroiſts, unites itſelf in a very intimate manner with the ſoul, which underſtands. This difficulty is not of any great importance; for the union which is objected, is not more intimate than that of the operation of the Deity with the operation of a creature, according to the doctrine of co-operation; and yet it does not follow, that theſe two cauſes muſt perſonally be united. The Author pretends to obviate this anſwer, by alledging that the operation of the intellect of the Averroiſts is immanent and particular; which cannot be ſaid of the co-operation of God (35); but this may be replied to in a very ſtrong manner; ſo that the diſpute is not carried with advantage with regard to the firſt point, as it is with reſpect to the ſecond; for he preſſes Averroes in this manner: This Intellect which you ſpeak of is either God, or a creature. If it be God, I aſk you this queſtion; Does he act within or without himſelf? If he acts without, what an abſurdity muſt it be to ſuppoſe an act of intelligence, which is without the intellect, and in another perſon (36)? This proves too much; for we ought to conclude, that the divine Intellect cannot produce an act of intelligence in the human ſoul, without producing it in itſelf; which is falſe and abſurd. The other part of the queſtion reduces the Averroiſts to the laſt extremity. If God forms in himſelf the acts of intelligence, which are in man, what a variety of errors muſt he entertain? Sed neque intra Deum contineri poteſt (intellectio) quod immenſos in eum errores toties inveheret, quoties opinione ſua fallerentur homines; neque enim prorſus ulla valeret excuſatio, quin prima ac ſumma veritas à ſe ipſa monſtroſè deficeret, ſi aſſignanda ipſi eſſent, ſi in ſinu ejus & complexu reponenda quæcunque eſſe poſſunt falſa hominum judicia (37). i. e. "But neither can "it (the Intellect) be contained within God, ſince "this would involve him in very great errors as often "as men were deceived in their actions; for no ſalvo "can be made uſe of to prevent the conſequence, that "the firſt and ſovereign truth muſt differ monſtrouſly "from itſelf, if all the falſe judgments of mankind "are to be aſcribed to him, and ſuppoſed to be con-"tained in him." If they anſwer, that this Intellect is created, the Author replies, that a creature cannot be ſufficient to modify ſo effectually all the different ſouls of men at the ſame time (38). Beſides this, the contrary opinions, which are current among mankind, cannot be contained together in one ſingle intellect. Quomodo in unam & eandem intelligentiam ſimul cadet contrarietas illa opinionum & ſententiarum, quam toties in hominibus experimur, cum unus ait, alter negat de eodem idem? Quæ eadem quæſtio impedire poteſt adverſarium in reſponſione jam jam expoſita de intellectu divino. i. e. "How can ſuch a contrariety of opinions and "notions, as we meet with ſo often among mankind, "when one affirms and another denies the ſame thing, "be included in one and the ſame intellect? The "ſame queſtion may perplex an antagoniſt with re-"ſpect to the anſwer concerning the divine Intellect, "which has already been exploded." This latter objection is equally ſtrong againſt thoſe, who ſhould aſſert that this Intellect is God. It is likewiſe an invincible confutation of Spinoziſm (39). We may obſerve that the Author confeſſes, that the whole force of his objection conſiſts in this, that he pretends to have proved, that the operation of the Intellect of the Averroiſts upon the ſoul of man is immanent (40). I do not think, that they are obliged to allow, that he has proved this. As for what remains, he declares, that he ſhould not have any thing to except againſt Averroes's opinion, if that Philoſopher had not ſpoken of the operation of the divine Intellect conſidered as the firſt cauſe. Reſtat ergo, ut ſuum iſtud ſomnium integrum Averroes ſomnii loco & mendacii haberi ſinat, aut certè interpretetur ipſe de actione intellectus divini, quâ parte non intellectus quidem præciſè, ſed eſt prima cauſa, in omnes cauſarum ſecundarum, adeoque inferiorum intelligentiarum effectus ex virtute ſuâ influens aliquid (41). . . . An ita poſſet accipi non diſputo, illud contentus oſtendiſſe, quod niſi quid ſimile ſonet ejus doctrina, inanis ac ſtulta ſit, ſi quid autem ſimile, ne pilum quidem nobis adverſantem habeat (42). He tells us, that he has not mentioned the objections, which Thomas Aquinas has urged againſt the hypotheſis of this Arabian. I muſt inform the reader, that it is perfectly confuted in a work of Mr. Du Pleſſis Mornai (43).

It is ſurprizing that ſo ſublime genius's as Ariſtotle and Averroes ſhould invent ſo many chimera's with regard to the underſtanding; but I dare aſſert, that they never would have invented them, if they had not been men of ſuperior parts. It was their great penetration, which diſcovered to them ſuch difficulties as obliged them to go out of the common road, and to avoid ſeveral other paths, in which they could not meet with what they deſired. The moſt certain knowledge which they had of the nature of the ſoul, was, that it is capable of thinking ſucceſſively of a thouſand ſubjects; but they could not comprehend how it reduces that faculty into act. The operation of the objects, their ſpecies, their images in the brain, how refined ſoever, did not any of them ſeem capable of giving actual intelligence to the ſoul. See with what force Father Mallebranche refutes all that has been advanced concerning the manner, in which we know things (44). He has found no other expedient than to ſay, that we ſee them in God, and that ideas are not produced in our ſoul. Some of the ancient Philoſophers have affirmed, that God is the general Intelligence of all Spirits, that is to ſay, he diffuſes knowledge among them, as the ſun does light upon bodies. Read the following paſſage of the Jeſuits of Coimbra: Prima ſententia fuit Alexandri libro ſecundo de Anima, cap. 20 & 21, exiſtimantis intellectum agentem eſſe intellectum univerſalem omnium conditorem, hoc eſt Deum; quod etiam Platonis dogma libro ſexto de republica fuiſſe creditur, qui intellectum agentem noſtros animos cœlitus irradiantem comparavit ſoli, ut ex Themiſtio hoc in libro refert divus Thomas Aquinas 1 part. quæſt. 79. articulo quarto. In eundem errorem lapſus fuit Priſcianus Lydus aſſerens intellectum agentem non eſſe partem animæ, ſed mentem primam atque divinam, vel ideam boni (45). i. e. "The firſt opinion was "that of Alexander in the ſecond Book de Anima, "c. 20 & 21, who thought that the acting Intellect "is the univerſal Intellect, the Creator of all things, "that is, which is likewiſe ſuppoſed to have been the "doctrine of Plato in his ſixth Book of a Common-"wealth, who compared the acting Intellect, which "enlightens our minds from heaven to the ſun, as "St. Thomas Aquinas tells 1 part, quæſt. 79. ar-"tic. 4. from Themiſtius upon this Book. Priſcianus "Lydus fell into the ſame error by aſſerting, that "the acting Intellect is not a part of the ſoul, but "the ſovereign and divine mind or idea of good." When a ſubject is very abſtruſe, there is no wonder, that the greateſt Philoſophers expreſs themſelves a little it condemned by the authority of the Pope [F]. This notion is, that there is an intelligence, which, without multiplying itſelf, animates all the individuals of the human ſpecies, as far as they exerciſe the faculties of a reaſonable ſoul. There is no book in which Averroes appears to have had better intentions than that which is intitled, Deſtructiones Deſtructionum contra Algazelem [G]. The religion of this Philoſopher is ſpoken very diſadvantageouſly tle obſcurely, and upon ſuppoſitions not eaſy to be underſtood. But if ever any ſubject was difficult, it is that of the formation of thought. It is perhaps more impenetrable than that of the origin of the ſoul. This is ſaying a great deal; for the reflection of Bartholine upon a ſtory related of St. Anſelm is a very ſenſible one. We are aſſured, that this Archbiſhop of Canterbury finding himſelf near death at the age of ſeventy ſix years, wiſh'd for a ſhort reſpite, in order to finiſh a very obſcure diſquiſition, which he had begun concerning the Origin of the ſoul (46). "If he had "been granted ſeventy ſix years more, ſays Bartho- "line, I doubt whether he would have been able to re- "ſolve ſo deep a queſtion." Valde dubito, ſi vel totidem annis quot vixerat illi addidiſſet Deus vitæ arbiter, ad finem quæſtionis dubiæ unquam poterat pervenire (47). We may remark, that the greateſt part of the Carteſians teach, that as no Being but God can give motion to bodies, there is none but he who can modify ſouls. They except thoſe actions, which render the ſoul criminal. But with regard to what is called ſenſation, imagination, paſſion, memory, and idea, they affirm, that God is the efficient and immediate cauſe of them, and that the action of objects, or the motion of our animal ſpirits is only the occaſional cauſe. This opinion is only an improvement of that, which is aſcribed to a celebrated interpreter of Ariſtotle, and which Mr. du Pleſſis Mornai confutes by plauſible arguments, tho' our Carteſians would not be the leaſt embaraſſed with them. With regard to the opinion of Alexander (Aphrodiſienſis), who aſſerts that there is an univerſal acting Intellect, which impreſſes the poſſible intellect, that is to ſay, the capacity of every perſon, and reduces it to action, the greateſt part of the arguments propoſed above againſt Averroes will ſerve likewiſe here. But ſince by this acting Intellect he ſeems to mean God himſelf, there is yet this further to be ſaid, that God, who is perfectly good and wiſe, would not impreſs upon our mind the follies and vices which we obſerve in it, nor leave ſo much ignorance and darkneſs, as we experience in it; but would ſubdue in all men the contagion, which attends this body; and tho' he ſhould not inſpire or influence one perſon ſo much as another, according to the different capacities of this tabula raſa, yet he would never paint in it ſo many falſe images, as we find every one in ourſelves. Again, this influence would either be perpetual or interrupted. If perpetual, we ſhould underſtand every thing, which our imagination ſhould preſent to us, without labour or art. If interrupted, we ſhould not be able to underſtand any thing whatever, nor will when he would. Now on the contrary, we find it difficult to comprehend ſome things, and we are obliged to conquer the ignorance of our minds as it were ſtep by ſtep; and there are other points, which we underſtand as ſoon as they are preſented, and whenever we pleaſe (48).
